REVIEW OF REVIEWS

EDITED BY W. T. STEAD

VOL. XXII.

JULY-DECEMBER, 1900.

Cop. 4

PRICE FIVE SHILLINGS.

The Review of Reviews

EDITORIAL OFFICE: MOWBRAY HOUSE, NORFOLK STREET, LONDON, W.C. PUBLISHED BY HORACE MARSHALL AND SON, 125, FLEET STREET, LONDON, E.C.

APR 5 1932

Annual Index to Periodicals.

WITH the help of the ANNUAL INDEX, the student or writer can easily ascertain in what Periodicals he can read articles on almost any subject; and, as the more recent Magazines and Reviews are to be found in the newer as well as the old Public Libraries, these mines of current thought need no longer remain unexplored on the shelves with such a handy Key, issued at a price within the means of all.

The ANNUAL INDEX is universally admitted to be the best work in its line ever published, and "an absolutely indispensable work of reference" for Librarians, Booksellers, Journalists, Clergymen, and all Contributors to the Literature of our time.

The First, Second, Fourth, and Fifth Volumes, covering the years 1890, 1891, 1893, 1894, are still to be had at 5s. each; or 5s. 6d. post free.

The Sixth, Seventh, Eighth, Ninth, and Tenth Volumes, covering 1895-1899, being greatly enlarged and elaborated, are issued at 10s. nett.

Vol. I., covering the year 1890.

Vol. III., covering the year 1892.

Vol. II., covering the year 1891.

Vol. IV., covering the year 1893.

VOL. V., covering the year 1894.

5s. per Volume; or 5s. 6d. post free.

Vol. VI., covering the year 1895.

Vol. VII., covering the year 1896.

Vol. VIII., covering the year 1897

Vol. IX., covering the year 1898.

Vol. X., covering the year 1899.

Vol. XI., covering the year 1900.

(In preparation.)

10s. per Volume post free.

"REVIEW OF REVIEWS" OFFICE: MOWBRAY HOUSE, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND, W.C.

INDEX TO VOL. XXII. OF REVIEW OF REVIEWS.

Abyssinia, see under Africa
Afghanistan and the Amir, 263, 362, 588
Afghanistan, Amir Abdur Rahman of, 263, 362, (with portrait) 588 Affica (see also Egypt):
Menelik of Abyssinia, 66
Morocco, 48
Revolt in Ashanti, 18
Relief of Coomassie, 112
The Delagoa Bay Arbitration, 272
The Beira Railway, 366
Dancing Dervishes, 358
Our Brothers in Mid-Africa, 264
Among Devils in Central Africa, 172
The New Cape Cabinet, 14, 215
The Loyal Dutch of the Cape and Their Grievance, 116
Cecil Rhodes's Future, 55
Sir Bartle Frere, 71
History of South Africa, 92
"From the Cape to Cairo," by E. S. Grogan and A. H. Sharp, 592
The Transvaal, the Orange Free State, the War, and the South African Question:
The Occupation of Pretoria, June 5 (with map), 10, 11 Question:
The Occupation of Pretoria. June 5 (with map), 10, 12
Annexation of the Transvaal, 212
Lord Roberts's Proclamation, 213-214
Execution of Hans Cordua, 214
Captured Letters written by Mr. Labouchere, Dr. Clark, and Others, Return of the C.I.V's, 417

Return of the C.I.V's, 417

Capture of British Force by C. de Wet at Dewetsdorp, 522

An Afrikander Appeal, 253

On the Conduct of the War, 52, 213-214

Our Failure in the Field, 115, 367

The Field Hospitals Scandal, 12, 261, 323

British Prisoners at Pretoria, 152

War against Women and Children, 369, 425, 519, 523

The Laws of War in South Africa, 550

Cost of the War, 113

Lessons from the War, 367

"The Candidates of Cain," 393

Questions of South African Reconstruction, 54, 57, 115, 365, 460

How to make Peace in South Africa; Topic of the Month (with map and illustrations), 540 Questions of South African Reconstruction, 54, 57, 115, 365, 460
How to make Peace in South Africa; Topic of the Month (with map and illustrations), 540
Paul Kruger's Mission to Europe, 519-522
Martial Law at the Cape, 115
Milnerism in South Africa, 364
Paul Kruger, 256, 426, 461
The Boers, 56, 363, 364, 549-550
Why the Boer swill triumph, 133
With the Boer Forces, 399
Through the Siege of Ladysmith, 136
Books on the War, 399, 498
Maps of the, War, 11, 116, 211, 323, 541
Other References to the War, 10-16, 21, 113-117, 120, 167, 209-215, 222, 323, 324, 336, 364, 365, 444-446, 430, 443, 519-523, 326, 531
Agriculture:
Colossal Wheat Combine; Russia and the United States, 154 America and the World's Wheat Supply, 464
Maize as Food, 463
Wheat-Breeding, 376
Alansle's Magazine reviewed, 356
Alaska: The Cape Nome Goldfield, by Miss E. Robins (illustrated), 343 Alexander, King, see Servia (King of)
Allen, Grant, 92
Allen's (James Lane) "The Increasing Purpose," 190
American Catholic Quarterly reviewed, 163
American People: Lessons from Europe, 166
An Anglo-American Social Alliance, 468
Anarchists:
Assassination of King Humbert, 109, 218
Attempted Assassination of the Shah, 217 Anarchists:
Assassination of King Humbert, 103, 218
Assassination of King Humbert, 103, 218
Attempted Assassination of the Shah, 217 Andersen, Hans, 502
Anglo-Saxons; a Predominant Race, 90 d'Annuzzio, Gabriele, 164
Antarctic Regions:
Life at the Poles, 470
Antarctic Exploration, 268
Arbitration, International, see under Peace and Disarmament Architectural Review reviewed, 599
Arctic Regions (see also Alaska):
Life at the Poles, 470
Armies: Armies Irmies:
Lord Wolseley, 537
The State of the Army, 210, 318
Plans of Military Reconstruction, 150, 367, 368, 445, 459, 548
Our Military Prestige Abroad, 369
Our Armaments in India, 211
The Public Schools and the Army, 548
The French Dash on London, 453
"The New Battle of Dorking," 300
Fraudulent Contractors, 19 77769

Armies—continued.

The Care of the Sick and Wounded in War Time, 261 Tommy on Crutches, 153
Field Hospital Scandals in South Africa, 12, 261, 323
The War in South Africa, see under Africa.
The C.D. Acts and the Health of the Army, 96
"Tommy" under Fire, 467
Miss H. S. Murphy's Shield (illustrated), 47
France's Colonial Army, 161
The Swiss Army System, 300
Art: Art:
The Review of Reviews Portfolios (illustrated), 43, 194, 237, 341, 440, 609
The World's Art at Paris, 158
The World's Greatest Pictures, 163
The Wallace Collection at Hertford House, 273, 300 The Wallace Collection at Hertford House, 273, 3 Joy in Art, 274
G. F. Watts, 168
Goya, Portrait-Painter, 274
Art in the Magazines, 97, 196, 303, 404, 505, 599
Art Annual reviewed, 505
Art Journal reviewed, 47, 97, 300, 303, 505, 599
Ashanti, see under Africa Asia (see also China, India, etc.,):
The Overland to China, 88
Astronomy. The Overland to China, 88
Astronomy:
The Picture-Book of the Stars, 260
The Solar Eclipse, May 1900, 272
Athletics, Gymnastics (see also Cycling, Cricket):
The Olympian Games in Paris, 63
Atlantic Monthly reviewed, 60, 63, 64, 71, 72, 73, 171, 478
Australasia (see also Australia, New Zealand):
The Federation Bill, 18, 58
The Greatness of the Commonwealth, 156
A New Flag for Australasia (illustrated), 568
Labour and Capital, 265
"A Federal Song, 1900," 366
Australia: "A Federal Song, 1900, 300 Australia : The Federation Bill, 18, 58 The Greatness of the Commonwealth, 156 The Bible in Australian Schools, 225 Austria, Emperor Francis Joseph of, 218 Authors and Authorship, see under Literature Bacteriology: Microbes, 274
Baden-Powell, Major-Gen., see Powell (Major-Gen.)
Balfour, A. J., and His Election Address, 315
Ballooning, Flying Machines, etc.: Count von Zeppelin's Air-Ship, 270
Bannerman, Henry Campbell, see Campbell-Bannerman (Henry)
Barrie, J. M., and His Books, 400, 499.
Bavaria (see also Tyrol):
The Passion Play at Oberammergau (illustrated), 347, 567
Beira Railway, see under Africa
Bible and Biblical Criticism:
The Crucifixion: a New Theory, 468
The Twentieth Century New Testament, Vol. II., 401
Bibliography, see Indexes The Twentieth Century New Testament, Vol. II., 401 Bibliography, see Indexes
Big Ben, 471
Biography: The Dictionary of National Biography, 192
Birds: The Art of Bird-Nesting, 92
Blackwood's Magazine reviewed, 27, 48, 75, 141, 145, 259, 277, 368, 372, 386, 449, 459, 469, 467, 450, 551
Bloch, J. de, on China, 245
Book of the Month:

"The Anatomy of Misery," by J. C. Kenworthy, 186
"The Anatomy of Misery," by Marie Corelli, 291
"The Candidates of Gain," 393
"Napoleon," by Lord Rosebery, 490
"Prof. Huxley," by L. Huxley, 492
"Oliver Cromvell," by John Morley, 493
"Joseph Chamberlain," by Miss Marris, 495
"Sir Arthur Cotton," by Lady Hope, 497
Books: Books; How to open a New Book, 65 Bernard Quaritch, Bookseller, 72 Books, New Publications, 87-94, 190-193, 298-301, 398-402, 414, 490-503, 587-Books, New Publications, 87-94, 190-193, 298-301, 390-4 598 Bordighera, 49
Boxers, see under China
Boy's Own Paper reviewed, 502
Bresci, Assassin, 100, 218
British Empire, see Colonies and the Empire
Browning, Robert, 63, 67
Bryan, W. J.,
Character Sketch, by C. B. Spahr (illustrated), 432
Other References, 60, 74, 319, 356, 337, 338, 450-452
Bulgaria and Roumania, 217
Bullen's (F. T.), "Men of the Merchant Service," 500
Billow, Count von, (with portrait), 428, 523, 558
Burgundy, 48

Burgundy, 48
Burial or Cremation? 157
Byron, Lord, 173

JUN 28 1901

```
Cabinets of Lord Salisbury, see under Parliamentary Campbell Bannerman, Henry, and His Election Address, 317, 318
Canadian Magazine reviewed, 556, 565

"Candidates of Cain," 373
Cape Colony, see under Africa
C.I.V. Day, 417
Cassell's Magazine reviewed, 253, 250, 584
Cassels's Magazine reviewed, 63, 181, 284, 375, 385, 479, 579
Century Magazine reviewed, 63, 181, 284, 375, 385, 479, 579
Century Magazine reviewed, 63, 187, 284, 375, 385, 479, 579
Century Magazine reviewed, 63, 71, 79, 174, 282, 288, 384, 392, 552, 564
Chassel's Magazine reviewed, 63, 71, 79, 174, 282, 288, 384, 392, 552, 564
Character Schetches, 17
Chamberlain, Joseph
His Election Address, 316
Miss Marris's "Joseph Chamberlain," 495
Other References, 49, 420, 443, 455, 458, 526
Character Sketches:
Tsze-Hsi, Empress of China (illustrated), 23
Count Muravieff (with portrait), 32
Count Muravieff (with portrait), 32
Count Muravieff (with portrait), 32
Count Muravieff (with maps), 322
Under Ressell of Killowen (illustrated), 425
The General Elector (with maps), 322
W. J. Bryan, by C. B. Spahr (illustrated), 432
The Nineteenth Century (illustrated), 433
Sir Arthur Sullivan (with portrait), 538
Cheiro, Palmist, 301
Children:
         Cheiro, Palmist, 301
                      hildren:
Town and Country Ideals, 47
The Cleverest Child in the World, 164
School Jokes, 377
Children in Workhouses, see under Pauperism Children in Workhouses, see under rauperiam hina:

The Revolt Against the Foreigner:

The Topic of the Month (with maps and illustrations), 35, 131, 241
The Story of Tsze-Hsi and Kwang-Su (illustrated), 23
A Month of Suspense, 109
The Rumours from Pekin, 109
Relief of the Legations, 242
Capture of Tientsin, 111
Looting of Pekin, 524
Attitude of Germany, 111, 321, 360, 523
The Anglo-German Agreement, 428
Attitude of Russin, 215, 242, 331, 359, 449
The United States and China, 246, 322
A Chinese Plea for Fair Play, 143
Why not a Commission d'Enquête? 242
What is to be done in China? 359-361, 447-449
Sir Robert Hart's Views, 447
The Crisis; Various Views, 50, 141-147, 170, 245-248, 359-361, 447, 555-556
Other References, 17, 122, 109-112, 215-216, 223, 321, 327, 427-429, 431, 443, 524
                        443: 524
Massacre of Chinese in Manchuria, 524
The Boxers, 144, 249, 447, 448
Secret Societies, 144
Missions and Missionaries, 145
Chinese Sectaries, 377
The Essence of Chinese Civilisation, 146
The Chinese People, 146, 298, 499
The Chinese as Engineers, 147
Village Life in China, 93
German Enterprise at Kiao Chau, 148
The Overland to China, 88
Gossip about China, 299
Books on China, 293, 298, 299
China, Emperor Kwang-Su of (illustrated), 23
China, Emperor Stare Hisi of,
Character Sketch (illustrated), 23
Chinese Question: Chinatown in London, 51
Church and Christianity (see also Bible):
The Passion Play at Oberammergau, see Oberammergau
The Church and the Orgies of C.I.V. Day, 419
The Church and Dominant Jingoism, 554
The Church and Dominant Jingoism, 554
The Church and the Drink Question, 446
The Crucifixion, 468
Church Quarterly Review reviewed, 173, 185, 554, 567, 584
Civil Service Training, 67
Clocks: Big Ben, 47x
Coal Question, 266, 375
Coburg, Duke of, 129
Colonies and the Empire:
Reorganisation of Empire, 140
Shall Britain become a Republic? 262
The Burden of Empire, 370
Colonies in the Cabinet, 58
Federation in Australasia, see under Australasia
Colonial Governments as Moneylenders, 562
The War in South Africa, see under Africa
Jamaica, 377
Colour Photography, see under Photography
                             Chinese Sectaries, 377
The Essence of Chinese Civilisation, 146
       Jamaica, 371
Colour Photography, see under Photography
Commerce, see Finance Condition of the People (see also Sociology, Labour, Pauperism, etc.):
The Tramp Problem, 561
Chinatown in London, 51
Old Age Pensions, see Insurance (National)
       Old Age 1 channels, Conservative Party:
The Salisbury Cabinets, see under Parliamentary Election Addresses, 315
       C. D. Acts, 96
```

```
Centemporary Review reviewed, 50, 57, 52, 70, 77, 142, 143, 150, 151, 156, 157, 176, 245, 258, 260, 267, 277, 300, 361, 364, 365, 366, 368, 379, 404, 430, 451, 454, 455, 460, 473, 554, 555, 556, 566, 573
Contents of Periodicals, 97-105, 195-206, 303-312, 404-414, 505-516, 599-608
Coomassie, see under Africa
Co-operation in Ireland, 372
Corelli, Marie, and "The Master Christian," 201
Cornhill Magazine reviewed, 48, 52, 54, 66, 71, 78, 150, 173, 178, 274, 283, 367, 378, 386, 448, 460, 468, 471, 478, 489, 498, 548, 580
Cosmopolitan reviewed, 82, 153, 251, 262, 263, 280, 476
Cotton, Sir Arthur, (Biography by Lady Hope), 437
Cremation, 157
                 Cotton, Sir Arthur, (Diography by Sanay
Cremation, 157
Crete, Ancient, 566
Cricket in Decay, 73
Critic reviewed, 404
Cromwell, Oliver, by John Morley, 493 Crucifixion; J. G. Fraser's Theory, 468
Cuba and Its Future, 320
                   Curzon, Lord, 157
Cycling: Ought Women to cycle? 46
                    Delagoa Bay, see under Africa Democracy; a Sorry Farce, 462
                   Denmark:
Skagen; a Danish Newlyn, 49
Old Age Pensions, 267
De Quincey, Thomas, 262
Derby Day, see under Racing
Dervishes, 358
Diary: for June, 20; for July, 120; for August, 222; for September, 326; for October, 430; for November, 530
Dicey, Edward, on South Africa, 57
                    Denmark:
                    Dickens, Charles, 565
Dickens, Charles, 565
Dissolution, see under Parliamentary Dixon, Canon R. W., 469
Dooley, Mr., 16
Doyle, Dr. Conan, 367, 498
Drama, see Theatres and the Drama
Drama, 367
                   Drams, see Theates and the Drams Dreams, 257
Dressing; an Art, 154
Drink Question, see under Temperance and the Liquor Traffic Dunne, F. P. ("Mr. Dooley"), 16
                Eclipses, see under Astronomy
Edinburgh Review reviewed, 149, 158, 161, 176, 456, 460, 466, 478 Education (see also Universities):
Training of Civil Servants, 67
Work of the London School Board, 462
The Bible in Australian Schools, 325
The Cleverest Child in the World, 164
A Royal Road (Hypnotic Suggestion) to Education, 64
School Jokes, 377
Educational Review reviewed, 45
Egypt: Missionary Scare, 148 Electoral:
The Dissolution, 53, 173, 203, 375
                            The Dissolution, 59, 113, 209, 315
The General Election, 1500, 315-319
The Passion Play at Oberammergau; a Parable of the General Election illustrated), 347
"The Candidates of Cain," 393
The General Elector, 329
                    The General Elector, 329
Result, 459-421, 442-445, 455
Maps showing General Elections of 1885, 1886, 1892, and 1835, 336-7
Election-ering Women, 458
Electric Railways in London, 325
Empire, 82e Colonies and the Empire
Engine-Driver as Poet, 171
                Engine Priver as Poet, 171 Engineering:
The Chinese as Engineers, 147
New Inventions, 270
Engineering Magazine reviewed, 72, 82, 147, 181, 251, 276, 385, 473, 573
England and the English People:
Merry England, 153
What We must do to be saved, 370
The Apotheosis of Mr. John Bull, 457
The Apotheosis of Mr. John Bull, 457
The Futtre of England, 554
The British Empire, see Colonics and the Empire English Problems, 553
English Blustrated Magazine reviewed, 51, 66, 152, 153
English-Speaking World: The Arglo-Saxons a Predominant Race, 90 European v. American Customs, 166 Exhibition at Paris, see Paris Exhibition Federation of the Australasian Colonies, see under Australasia
Feilden's Magazine reviewed, 79, 276
Ferrier, David,—Character Sketch (with portrait), 127
Ferrier, David,—Character Sketch (what present), --, Finance:
The State as Moneylender, 362
The Companies Bill and the Moneylenders Bill, 18 Trusts, Syndicates, see Syndicates
Small Industries not doomed, 159
Depression in Trade, 220
The Question of Foreign Competition, 318
The Decline of British Commerce, 465
The Future of England, 554
The Chief Dangers to British Trade, 556
```

Fi

Fir For

FETAE

For

Four Four Fran

Pi

A TI Fr Pa Vi Mo Pa Po Gra

Free Frenc Frenc 163 288

Frere Gentl

Georgi Georgi Germa

Germa Res

Cou

Geri Geri Is G

Germa Germa Girl's Girl's Gladst

Gold in Good V Gorst, Goya, Grahan Grand, Grey, I Grote, Guyot, Hague Hake, I Harmsy

Harper 383, 4 Hart, S

Henley, Hertford Hobbes Hofer, Hohenle Holmes, Home R

Hooligan Hope's (Hopetou

```
Finance—continued.

Food Supply, see under Agriculture
Map of American Exports, 464
Germany's Dependence on England, 155
A Century of Commerce, 563
Finnish Music, 376
Flying Ships, see under Ballooning Food Supply:
Maize as the Food of Millions, 463
Wheat, see under Agriculture
Foreign and International Policy:
Peace and Disarmament, International Arbitration see under Peace and Disarmament
450, 283,
                                                                                              Peace and Disarmament, International Arbitrational Peace and Disarmament, Internationalism, 9
The Progress of Internationalism, 9
The Socialists and Internationalism, 324
The New International. 244, 324
The United States of Europe, 47
The Rival Empires, 67
Te France v. England, 162, 252
England and Germany, 155, 250
The Powers and China, s.e under China
An Anglo-Russian Alliance, 588
England, Russia, and Japan, 160
Fortinghtly Review reviewed, 50, 54, 57, 58, 65, 63, 78, 141, 143, 153, 154, 160, 168, 177, 245, 254, 255, 261, 272, 273, 333, 353, 360, 361, 369, 370, 380, 447, 448, 450, 456, 458, 462, 468, 474, 581, 553, 568, 561, 572
Forum reviewed, 51, 58, 80, 146, 148, 166, 180, 233, 264, 281, 356, 382, 383, 449, 432, 456, 463, 468, 478, 481, 1555, 578
Fourth Party wanted, 553
France:
                                                                                                  France:
President Loubet's Banquet to the Mayors, 325 326;
                                                                                                             Naval Estimates, 18
France's Fleet and Her Colonial Army, 161
A Policy of Privateering, 252
The French Dash on London, 453
                                                                                             A Policy of Privateering, 252
The French Dash on London, 453
France v. England, 162, 252
Paul Kruger in France, 519-521
Vive la France 1/3
Monuments of Washington and Lafayette unveiled at Paris, 117
Paris Exhibition, see Paris Exhibition
Popular Universities, 161
Growing Disuse of French, 163
Paris Slums, 165
French Wit in the 18th Century, 471
Free Churches, see Nonconformists
French Magazines reviewed, 46, 47, 56, 82, 83, 95, 142, 144, 148, 161, 162, 163, 165, 166, 168, 181, 182, 183, 245, 249, 252, 250, 268, 284, 265, 286, 288, 302, 364, 372, 377, 390, 331, 332, 401, 470, 482, 483, 484, 501, 505, 558, 581, 582, 585
Frere, Sir Bartle, 71
                                                                                                Gentleman's Magazine reviewed, 49, 70, 93, 265, 283, 553, 584
Geographical Journal reviewed, 264, 257
George, St., and the Dragon, 258
German Magazines reviewed, 58, 85, 184, 248, 283, 388, 463, 484, 485, 578, 583
Germany :
                                                                                              Germany:

Resignation of Prince Hohenlohe, 428
Count von Bülow, German Chancellor, 429, 523, 558
Naval Estimates, 18
Germany and China, see under China
Germany's Dependence on England, 155
Is Germany England's Enemy? 250
Germany and the War in South Af.ica, 521-522
The Passion Play at Oberammergau, see Oberammergau
Germany, Kaiser William II. of, on the Crisis in China, 111, 523
Girl's Own Paper reviewed, 500
Girl's Realm reviewed, 501
Girl's Realm reviewed, 506
Gladstone, Mrs., 170
Gold in Alaska, see under Alaska
Good Words reviewed, 59, 62, 170, 253, 378, 387, 502, 531 Gorst, Sir John, 52)
Goya, 274
Goya, 574
lection
                                                                                                  Gorsa, 517 John, 523
Goya, 274
Graham, R. Cunninghame, 400
Grand, Sarah, 67
Grey, Lord, and Temperance Reform, 446
                                                                                                  Grote, Mrs., 560
Guyot, Yves, 55)
 90
                                                                                                  Hague Convention, see under Peace and Disarmament
Hake, Egmont, 165
Harmsworth Magazine reviewed, 270, 279, 376, 386, 471, 474
Harper's Magazine reviewed, 32, 53, 64, 66, 81, 172, 174, 257, 253, 271, 282, Harper's Magazine reviewed, 32, 53, 64, 66, 81, 172, 1 323, 477, 571
Hart, Sir Robert, on China, 447
Henley, W. E., 173
Hertford House ard the Wallace Collection, 273, 300
Hobbes's (John Oliver) "Robert Orange," 331 Hofer, Andreas, and the Tyrol illustrated), 350 Hohenlohe, Prince, (with portrait), 42)
Holmen, Oliver Wendell, 565
Home Rule for Ireland, see under Ireland
Hooliganism in London, 418
Hope's (Anthony) "Quisanté," 500
Hopetoun, Earl of, 262
```

```
India
```

```
Hornung's (E. W.) "Peccavi," 434
      Houss reviewed, 303
Humanitarian r.viewed, 47, 49, 6), 249, 387, 454, 467, 471, 559, 570, Humbert, King, see Italy (King of) Humour: School Jokes, 377
French Wit, 471
Huxley, Thomas Henry, (Biography), 472
Hymn Tunes with a History, 376
Hypnotism: A Royal Road to Education, 64 Illustrations (see also Portraits):
               nustrations (see also Fortraits: ; Caricatures, 16, 111, 119, 134, 137, 210, 221, 316, 328, 32), 339, 331, 332, 333, 334, 338, 339, 424, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 521, 522, 545
King Arthur of England, 323
Weight of the State of Cur Lord 1900, "after 333, 334, 338, 339, 434, 435, 430, 437, 438, 439, 521, 522, 545
King Arthur of England, 232
"Bethlehem stormed and captured in the Year of Our Lord 1900," after Felix Moscheles, 314
"The Story of the Prodigal," after Murillo, 42
"The Story of the Prodigal," after Murillo, 42
"Lear and Cordelia," after G. W. Joy, 45
Raphael's "Sistine Madonna," 194
"Heads of Angels," after Sir J. Reynolds, 228
"Maternal Anxiety," after E. Douglas, 227
"Cats," after Mdme. H. Ronner, 238
"Landscope and Cattle," after T. S. Cooper, 238
"The Young Bull," after P. Potter, 23)
"The Young Bull," after P. Potter, 23
"The Princass of Wales," after Edw. Hughes, 341
"A Summer Shower," after C. E. Perugini, 518
"Blossoms," after Albert Moore, 603
"The Fighting Temerature," after Turner, 610
"Venice," after Style, 533
Gift-Books for Christmas, 534, 535, 536
Photography in Natural Colours, 487
The Shield in Warfare, 47
The Shield in Warfare, 47
The Parnell Commission, 228, 231, 232
Lord Salisbury at Exeter Hall, 17
The Lord Mayor reading the Proclamation dissolving Parliament f.om the Steps of the Stock Exchange, 317
Alexandra Palace, 17
Railway Accident at Slough, 13
Paris Exhibition, 1-7
Funeral of King Humbert, 217, 218
Queen Wilhelmina and Her Prospective Consort, 423
Oberammergau and the Passion Play, 8, 346, 355
Andreas Hofer and His Country, 348, 349, 359, 351, 352, 353
Tientsin, 33
Tientsin, 34
Tientsin, 34
Tientsin, 34
Tientsin, 36
Tientsin, 37
Tientsi
                  Tientsin, 33
German Officers for China, 222
                  Chinese Anti-Foreign Posters, 135
French Officers for China, 216
                  Freito Omeers for China, 210
Explosion at Johannesburg, 12
The Entry into Pretoria, 114
A "Long Tom" as It was used after the Occupation of Preto.ia, 377
The Destruction of Boer Farmhouses, 542, 543
                  The Gelderland, 426
Mr. Kruger at Marseilles, 520
     Mr. Aruger at marseitis, 320
The Bremen on Fire, 118
Nome, Alaska, 344, 345, 346
W. J. Bryan addressing a Meeting, 438
Index to British and American Periodicals, 1877, 92, 185, 266, 365
Index (Cotgreave's) to General and Periodical Literature, 567
Index (Bailsy's) to the Times, 444
   India:
An Empire Adrift, 460
Lo:d Cu:zon, 157
Our Armaments in India, 211
Famine and Plague, 113, 219
How to mitigate Indian Famines, 191
Insurance, National.—Old Age Pensions;
The Magna Charta of the Aged, by F. Herbert Stead, 138
W. D. MacGregor's Scheme, 268
Old Age Pensions in Denmark. 267
International Arbitration, see under Peace and Disarmament Ireland:
     Ireland:
Policy of the Irish Party, 526
Home Rule in Sight, 58
Killing Home Rule with Kindness, 551
Co-operation in Ireland, 372
The Irish and the Greeks, 70
Sparkles from the Emerald Isle, 172
Italian Literature and G. d'Annunzio, 16;
Italian Magazines reviewed, 84, 170, 185, 270, 387, 482, 565, 580
Italian in Magazines reviewed, 84, 170, 185, 270, 387, 482, 565, 580
Italian Magazines reviewed, 04, 170, 103, Italy:
New Ministry, 17
Assassination of the King, 103
Unredeemed Italy, 557
Two Pictures of Modern Italy, 260
The Italian Riviera, 43
Sicily as a Holiday Resort, 163
Italy, King Humbert of,
Assassination of the King, 103, 218
Character Skatch illustrated), 122
Italy, King Victor Emanuel III. of, 218
```

7

```
Jamaica and the United States, 371
         Jaman: England, Russia, and Japan, 160
How Japan has scored, 250
The Industrial Revolution in Japan, 563
Mrs. Hugh Fraser on Japan, 253
Jews: The Zionist Congress, 219 Journalism:
Bailey's Index to the Times, 414
The Woes of an Editor's Wife, 465
        Kenworthy's (J. C.) "The Anatomy of Misery," 186
Kipling, Rudyard, 16, 260
Kruger, Paul,
His Mission to Europe, 519-522
Other References, 256, 426, 461
Kruger, Mrs., 61
      Labour Problems:
Small Industries not doomed, 159
Deputation of Trade Unionists to Paris, 426
The Tramp Problem, 561
Labour and Capital at the Antipodes, 265
New Zealand; a Country without Strikes, 300 |
The Eight Hours' Day in New Zealand, 566
Mir and Artel, 265
The Social Engineer, 564
Lady's Realm reviewed, 64, 154, 175, 279, 461, 480
Lamsdorff, Count, 238
Language, International, 112
Languages, Study of, by Correspondence, 95, 195, 302, 403, 504, 585
Lansdowne, Marquis of (with portrait), 422
Lawson, Sir Wilfird (with portrait), 422
Lawson, Sir Wilfird (with portrait), 424
Lawing Articless, 46-73, 147-173, 245-274, 356-378, 447-471, 548-567
      Lawson, Sir Wilfrid (with portrait), 87
Leading Articles, 46-73, 14-173, 942-974, 356-378, 447-471, 548-567
Leisure Hour reviewed, 69, 70, 279, 376, 391, 452, 502, 565

"Lest We Forget; "Review of Reviews Annual, 587
Liberals and the War, 144
Election Addresses, 317
The Liberal Party and the Election, 419, 455
The Post-Mortem of the Liberal Party, 551 Libraries: Libraries: 1
    Libraries: 70

The Pooling of Private Libraries, 70

The Circulating Library of the Review of Reviews, 483, 562

Library reviewed, 65, 70

Library reviewed, 76, 70
    Librature:
The Ways of Authors, 251
Publishers and Authors Sixty Years Ago, 469
London Elections, 529
London:
               Plea for a Central Railway Station, 70
      River Transit, 117
London School Board, see under Education
Longman's Magazine reviewed, 65, 83, 166, 255, 257, 283, 373, 377, 466, 557, 582
Loubet, President, and the Banquet to the French Mayors, 325
Love; Symposium, 461
Luther, Martin, 298
  McClure's Magazine reviewed, 82
Macdonald, Gen. H., 62
MacHardy, Malcolm,—Character Sketch (with portrait), 129
McKinley, William, and the Presidential Election, 319, 329, 358, 450
Macmillan's Magazine reviewed, 255, 360, 272, 378, 400, 584
Madagascar: Progress, 564
Magazine of Art reviewed, 07, 196, 300, 303, 404, 502, 505, 599
Mahomedanism: Dancing Dervishes, 358
Maize as the Food of Millions, 463
Manchuria: Massacre of Chinese, 524
Man's Evolving Destiny, 190
Maps:
Man's Evolving Destiny, 190
Man's Evolving Destiny, 190
Maps:
The World, 1801-1901, 532
The Elections in England, 1885, 1886, 1892, and 1895, 336-337
China, 34, 132
Road from Taku Forts to Pekin, 38
The March to Pekin, 214
The War in South Africa, 11, 116, 211, 323
The Guerilla War in South Africa, 541
Map of American Exports, 464
The Presidential Election, 1896 and 1900, 525
Medicine: David Ferrier and Malcolm McHardy (with portraits), 127
Menelik of Abyssinia, 65
Microbes, 274
Miner, Sir Alfred, 364
Mind v. Muscle, 165
Missions, Foreign,
 Missions, Foreign,
Lord Salisbury's Warning, 17
The Missionaries and the Chinese Crisis, see under China Missionaries in Egypt, 148
Monthly Review reviewed, 361, 362, 374, 378, 382, 448, 457, 459, 480, 574, Monthly Kevnew reviewed, 301, 302, 374, 588
Moose-Hunting, 48
Morley, John,
His Election Address, 317
"Oliver Cromwell," by John Morley, 493
```

```
Morocco, see under Africa
Municipal Government: The Limits of Municipal Trading, 466
Muravieff, Count,
Character Sketch (with portrait), 32
                        Other Reference, 258
                      usic:
Sir Arthur Sullivan, 538
Hymn Tunes with a History, 376
The Music of Finland, 376
          Napoleon I.:
Lord Rosebery's Book, 490
Other Reference, 533
National Character, 457
National Review reviewed, 59, 60, 73, 74, 75, 150, 151, 155, 160, 174, 211, 250, 233, 266, 275, 316, 333, 357, 359, 360, 381, 449, 453, 454, 457, 473, 525, Navies:
                    avies;
Faults in Our Fleet, 259
Suicidal Unreadiness, 453
The French Navy, 18, 161, 252, 259
The French Dash on London, 453
German Naval Expenditure, 18
      German Naval Expenditure, 18
Seven Sea Powers, 65
The Submarine Boat, 271
Submarine Boat 271
New England Magazine reviewed, 552
New Zealand:
The Future of New Zealand, 565
Labour and Capital, 265
A Country without Strikes, 300
The Eight Hours' Day, 566
The "Advances to Settlers" Act, 562
Newfoundland Magazine reviewed, 166
Nineteenth Century:
     Newfoundland Magazine revi:wed, 100
Nineteenth Century:
Character Sketch (illustrated), 533
"Lest We Forget," 587
Other References, 530, 529
Nineteenth Century Review reviewed, 47, 50, 53, 54, 59, 67, 70, 76, 141, 148, 150, 156, 159, 172, 177, 260, 261, 265, 278, 337, 370, 371, 381, 404, 453, 458, 459, 475, 528, 549, 550, 551, 553, 556, 575
Nome, Cape, and Its Goldfield, see under Alaska
Nonconformists: Free Church Mission, 1901, 257
Norman, Henry, 272
        Nonconformists: Free Church Mission, 1901, 257
Norman, Henry, 373
North American Review reviewed, 54, 55, 58, 60, 61, 63, 81, 143, 145, 146, 153, 155, 167, 179, 246, 247, 248, 282, 356, 360, 361, 384, 449, 451, 452, 465, 481, 555, 557, 563, 577
Northern Counties Magazine reviewed, 387, 469
Norway: The Fjords, 49
      Oberammergau and the Passion Play:
A Parable of the General Election, (illustrated), 347
Other Reference, 557
Obituary, 21, 121, 220, 223, 327, 431, 531
Old Age Pensions, see Insurance (National)
      Palestine: The Zionist Congress, 219
Pall Mall Magazine reviewed, 159, 173, 179, 262, 273, 230, 300, 378, 456, 469, 549, 566, 582
Palmistry: Cheiro and the Shah, 301
Paris Stums, 162
Paris Exhibition:
                 Illustrations, 1-8
Visit of Swedish Workmen, 118
                 The Pictures, x58
Is This the Last Paris Exhibition? 269
    Is This the Last Paris Exhibition? 269
The Upshot of the Exhibition, 454
Other References, 269, 429
Parliamentary (see also Liberal and Conservative Parties, Electoral):
Diary for June, 21; for July, 120; for August, 223
The Dissolution, 59, 113, 200, 315
In View of the General Election, 25
The General Election, see under Electoral
The Salisbury Ministry, 209, 255
The Outgoing Government; Balance Sheet, 254
The New Parliament; Topic of the Month, 442
A Cabinet of Commonplace, 552
Wanted—A New Fourth Party, 553
The Party System, 160, 374
     The Party System, 160, 374
Parnell, Samuel Duncan, and the Eight Hours' Day, 566 Arnell, Samuel Duncan, and the Eight Hours' Day, 566 Party System, 160
Party System, 160
Party System, 160
Passion Play at Oberammergau, see Oberammergau
Pauperism and the Poor Law:
Old Age Pensions, see under Insurance (National) Christmas Gift for the Workhouse Bairos, 488, 610
Peace and Disarmament, International Arbitration, etc.;
A Permanent International Tribunal, 9
The Heaue Convention, 24, 519, 529; ratified, 324
"The Peace Conference at the Hague," by F. W. Holls, 530
The New International, 244, 234
The Socialists and Internationalism, 324
The Peace Congress and the War in South Africa, 324
Why not a Commission of Enquête in China? 243 Paul Kruger's Mission to Europe and the Question of Arbitration on the War in South Africa, 519-522
The Union of Civilised Peoples, 467
```

CCCCEFFGGHHHHH

Ita Ita Ita

Ita La La Le Le

Portu Posta Powe Pract Presid

Preto Proce Progr Progr Jul No Psych F. V Progr Publis

Purita Quarit Quarte Quiver

Racing Radior Railwa Mr.

Plea The The Rails Relics Pearson's Magazine reviewed, 62, 270, 271, 272, 282, 374, 386, 480
Pekin, see under China
Perak Jungle Folk, 48
Persia, Shah of,
Attempted Assassination of the Shah in Paris, 217
Cheiro and the Shah, 301
Philippine Islands:
The Future of the Philippine 1 the Philippine Islands: Philippine Islands:
The Future of the Philippine Islands, 320
Mr. Bryan's Policy, 358
Phonograph, 67
Photograph with Francisch School of Photography in Natural Colours, by H. Snowden Ward (illustrated), 486
Plague in India, see under India
Plague in Scotland, 239
Poem; "A Federal Song, 1900," 365
Poetry: "A Federal Song, 1900," 365 Poetry: Poetry:
Poets as Rhymers, 557
The Engine Driver as Poet, 171
Poison in Beer, 527
Political Economy (see also Sociology, etc.):
"The Anatomy of Misery," by J. C. Kenworthy, 186
Politics and Political Science (see also Parliamentary, Electoral, etc.): Party System, 160, 374 Porto Rico, 261 Portraits:
Abyssinia, Menelik of, 237
Afghanistan, Amir Abdur Rahman Li Hung Chang, 136 Lincoln, Abraham, 535 Loch, Lord, 21 of, 588
Alverstone, Lord, 430
André, Gen., 119
Balfour, Gerald, 416
Bismarck, Prince, 535
Brodrick, Hon. St. John, 416
Bryan, W. Jr. 74, 432, 433, 437, 438
Bülow, Count von, 427
Carlos, Don, 531
China, Dowager Empress Tsze Hsi of, 22, 26 Londonderry, Lord, 416 MacDonald, Sir Claude, 20 McHardy, Malcolm, 130 McKinley, President, 220, 423, 434, McKinley, President, 220, 423, 434, 437, 437, Horace, 537
Marx, Karl, 534
Menelik of Abyssinia, 137
Miller, Prof. Max, 431
Munster, Prince, 530
Muravieff, Count, 33
Napoleon I., 535
Peabody, George, 537
Persia, Shah of, 117
Plunkett, Sir Francis, 322
Reid, R. G., 531
Richthofen, Freiherr von, 428
Robins, Miss Elizabeth, 342
Rosseelt, Col. Theedore, 434
Russell, Lord, of Killowen, 224, 227, 228, 234, 235 of, 22, 26 China, Emperor Kwang-Su of, 28, China, Emperor Kwang-Su of, 28, 30, 37
Cobden, Richard, 534
Coburg, Duke of, 108
Cooper, Peter, 537
Cordua, Hans, 212
Egypt, Khediwe of, 14
Faed, Thomas, 223
Faraday, Michael, 534
Ferrier, David, 128
Gaselee, Brigadier-Gen. Sir A., 10
Gladstone, Mrs., 15
Hawthorne, Nathaniel, 537
Hofer, Andreas, 351
Hohenlohe, Prince, 429
Holland, Queen Wilhelmina of, 429
Hopetoun, Lord, 120
Italy, King Humbert of, 123
Italy, King Humbert of, 124
Italy, King Victor Emanuel III. of, 126
Italy, Queen of, 124 Russell, Lord, of Killowen, 224, 227, 228, 234, 234, 235
Russia, Nicholas II. of, 586
Samuel, Sir Saul, 327
Satow, Sir E., 426
Saxony, Prince Albert of, 326
Schwarzenheim, Dr. M. von, 322
Selborne, Lord, 46
Servia, King Alexander of, 110
Seymour, Adm., 20
Sidgwick, Prof., 327
Stevenson, A. E., 433, 437
Sullivan, Sir Arthur, 548
Tolstoy, Count L., 186
Tupper, Sir Charles, 425
Waldersee, Fieldmarshal von, 215
Wales, Princess of, 341
Wet, Gen. C. de, 212
Wyndham, George, 416 136

Italy, Queen of, 124
Lamsdowff, Count, 322
Lansdowne, Marquis of, 422
Lawson, Sir Wilfrid, 87
Lee, Robert E., 537
Lewis, Sir George, 233
Portugal in Africa, see under Africa
Postal Service: Jubilee of the International Postal Union, 119
Powell, Major-Gen. Baden, 158
Practical Teacher reviewed, 95, 302, 504
Presidential Election in America, see under United States
Pretoria, see under Africa
Progress? 417 Proceedings of the Society for Fsychical Research Tevereu, 69
Progress 417
Progress of the World, with Diary, Maps, and Illustrations: in June, 9: in July, 109; in August, 209; in September, 315; in October, 417; in November, 519
Psychical Research:
F. W. H. Myers's Address, 68
Prophetic Clairvoyance, 371
Publishers and Authors Sixty Years Ago, 469
Puritan reviewed, 255, 257, 269, 371 Quaritch, Bernard, 72 Quarterly Review reviewed, 149, 157, 164, 175, 448, 455, 460, 477 Quiver reviewed, 49, 153, 174, 284, 367, 376, 591

Racing: The Prince of Wales and the Derby, 19 Radiophone, 270 Railways: Mr. Yerkes and the London Railways, 325 Plea for a Central London Station, 70 The Overland to China, 88 The Halford Gradient Railway, Railways in Africa, see under Africa Relics and Their Cult, 168

Religion (see also Church and Christianity, Bible):
The Passion Play at Oberammergau, see Oberammergau
Relics and Their Cult, 168
Review of Reviews (America) reviewed, 31, 74, 174, 275, 289, 319, 320, 322, 358, 371, 379, 463, 472, 569 Review of Reviews (Australasia) reviewed, 262, 265, 325, 379, 457, 458, 472, 565, 568 Reviews Reviewed, 74-86, 174-185, 275-290, 379-392, 472-485, 568-584 Rhodes, Cecil J., Cecil Rhodes's Future, 55 Other Reference, 457 Rhodes, Miss, 61 Riviera: Bordighera, 49 Roberts, Lord, 59, 212, 257, 523 Robins, Miss Elizabeth, on the Cape Nome Goldfield (illustrated), 343 Robins, Miss Elizabeth, on the Cape Nome Gold Rosebery, Lord, His Address at Glasgow University, 527-523 "Napoleon," by Lord Rosebery, 490 Other References, 53, 59, 315, 401, 527-523 Roumania and Bulgaria, 217 Round-About reviewed, 151, 374, 556 Royal Magazine reviewed, 64, 151, 249, 257, 475 "Rule Britannia," 147 "Ruskin, John, Ruskin and Christianity, 64 Ruskin's Economics Tolstoyed for the Masses, 186 Russell, Lord, of Killowen: Character Sketch (illustrated), 225 Russia: lussia : Count Muravieff, 32, 258 Count Lamsdorff, 258 England and Russia; the Rival Empires, 61 England, Russia, and Japan, 160 Massacre of Chinese in Manchuria, 524 Russia and China, see under China An Anglo-Russian Alliance, 558 Henry Norman on Russia, 373 Russian Dissenters, 559 Colossal Wheat Combine; Russia and the United States, 154; Mir and Artel, 265 Russia, Tsar Nicholas II. of, 62, 523

Salisbury, Marquis of,
His Speech at the Guildhall, 527
The Salisbury Ministries, see under Parliamentary
On the Missions in China, 27
Salvation Army in Sweden, 171
Scandinavian Reviews reviewed, 142
Schimmelmann, Countess, 371
School Board of London, see under Education School World reviewed, 95, 195, 302, 403 Scotland: Scotland:
Plague in Glasgow, 219
A French View of Scotland, 372
Scribner's Magazine reviewed, 57, 67, 80, 152, 251, 283, 363, 373, 378, 472 Scribner's Magazine leviewed, 57, 77, 50, 132 Sea Power, see Navies Serpents, see Snakes Servia, King Alexander of, Marriage of, 103 Shields in Warfare (illustrated), 47 Stiffens in Shipping: River Transit in London, 117

"Men of the Merchant Service," by F. T. Bullen, 500
Sicily as a Holiday Resort, 169
Slave Trade in America, 67, 251 Slave Trade in America, 67, 237
Snakes: Yenom of Serpents, 66
Social Engineer, 564
Sociology (see also Labour Problems, Insurance (National), Condition of the People, Pauperism and the Poor Law):
The Socialists and Internationalism, 324
"The Anatomy of Misery," by J. C. Kenworthy, 186
Mind v. Muscle, 165
Growth of Socialism in America, 562
The Social Engineer, 564
Spahr, Charles B., on W. J. Bryan (illustrated), 432
Stead, F. Herbert, on Old Age Pensions, 138
Stone, Marcus, 274
Stories from the Magazines, 173, 377, 378
Strand Magazine reviewed, 67, 163, 164, 180, 284, 383, 599
Studio reviewed, 97, 578 Strand Magazine reviewed, 97, 103, 104, 180, 284, 383, 599
Studio reviewed, 97, 578
Studiosts of Russia, 559
Submarine Boats, see under Navies
Sullivan, Sir Arthur (with portrait), 538
Sunday at Home reviewed, 62, 122, 271, 389, 502, 554, 562, 563, 591
Sunday Magazine reviewed, 81, 170, 288, 338, 554, 594
Sunday Strand reviewed, 80, 170, 267, 599 Sweden: Swedish Workmen at the Paris Exhibition, 118 The Salvation Army in Sweden, 171 Switzerland: Switzerland:
The Army System, 300
The William Tell Legend (illustrated), 350
Syndicates, Trusts:
Trusts in America, see under United States
Trusts in England, 463

Tapestry, 549 Telephone: Wireless Telephony, 272 Tell, William (illustrated), 350 on on the 4, 211,

3. 525.

41, 148.

4, 453,

15, T46,

78, 456,

Temperance and the Liquo Traffic:
Lord Grey's Plan of Campaign, 446
Poison in Bert, 523
Temple Bar reviewed, 53, 147, 376, 555, 581
Temple Magazine reviewed, 47, 167, 163, 268
Theatres and the Drama:
Simple v. Sumptuous Stage-Setting, 65
The Passion Play at Oberammergau, see Oberammergau
Tientsin, see under China
Tolstoy, Count L. 373, 470
Topic of the Month:
The Revolt of the Yellow Man (with maps and illustrations), 35
The Revolt of the Yellow Man (with maps and illustrations), 131
Internationalism at Pekin and Paris, 241
The Passion Play at Oberammergau; a Parable of the General Election
(illustrated), 347
The New Parliament, 442
The Wor to make Peace in South Africa (with map and illustrated), 540
Topedoes and Submarine Boats, see under Navies

The Passion Play at Oberammergan; a Parable of the Obercal Energillustrated), 347
The New Parliament, 442.
The New Parliament, 442.
The New Parliament, 442.
The New Tanase Pacce in South Africa (with map and illustrations), 540
Topedoes and Submarine Boats, see under Navies
Tramp Problem, 561
Transval, see under Africa
Travel (see also Sicily, etc.):
Out-of-the-Way Places, 43
Obiter Dicta of Travel, 552 Trusts, see Syndicates
Turkey: The Sultan's Jubiles, 216
Turkey, Sultan Abdul Hamid of, and His Jubilee, 216
Twain, Mark, 338
Tyrol: Andreas Hofer (illustrated), 350

United Service Magazine reviewed, 53, 7), 284, 459
United States:
The Presidential Election, 1900:
The Rival Platforms, 355, 358, 450-452
W. J. Bryan, 60, 74, 310, 356, 357, 358, 450, 451, 452
W. J. Bryan, Democratic Leader, by C. B. Spahr (illustrated), 432
Wm. McKniley, 319, 322, 358, 369, 451
The Elections, 1836 and 1300: Maps, 325
Other References, 16, 71, 155, 313, 322, 525
The Government of Cub and Porto Rico and of the Philippine Islands, see Cuba, Potto Rico, Philippine Islands
The United States and China, 322
Submarine Boats, 72

The United States and China, 322 Submarine Boats, 72 The Question of Trusts, 320, 356 Colossal Wheat Combine: Russia and the United States, 154 America and the World's Wheat Supply, 464 Map of American Exports, 464 The Negro Problem, 264 United States—continued.

The American Slave Trade, 67, 251
Growth of Socialism in America, 562
The Caps Nome Goldfield, by Miss E. Robins (illustrated), 343
An Anglo-American Social Alliance, 468
Lessons from Europe, 166
Columbia Triumphans! 71
United States of Europe, 47
United States of Europe, 47
Universities: Popular Universities in France, 161

Volunteers: The Return of the C.I.V.'s from Africa, 417

Wales, P. ince of, and the Derby, 19
Wallacs Collection at Hertford House, 273, 300

War (see also Peace and Disarmament):
M. Zola on War, 167
Ward, H. Snowden, on Photography in Natural Colours (illustrated), 486
Watts, G. F., 168
Wellington, Duke of, 274
West Indies, see Porto Rico, Cuba, Jamaica Westminster Review reviswed, 49, 79, 178, 255, 268, 274, 280, 36), 390, 443, 476, 576
Wet, C. de, 522
Wheat, see under Agriculture
William II. of Germany, see Germany (Emperor of) Windsor Magazine reviewed, 49, 67, 82, 171, 270, 290, 357, 389, 390, 464, 434, 577
Wit in France in the 18th Century, 471
Wolszley, Lord, 527
Woman at Home reviewed, 62, 158, 170, 284, 380, 465, 484, 574
Women and Women's Work:
The Women's International Conference in London, 1839, 93
Electioneering Women, 48
Long the Women to cycle 58
Long the Colour the Women to cycle 58
Long the Women to cycle 58

The Women's international Conference in London Electioneering Women, 458 Ought Women to cycle? 46
The Woes of an Editor's Wife, 465
Bygone Women of Note, 255
Women's Agricultural Times reviewed, 387
Workhouses, see under Pauperism
World's Work reviewed, 464, 478
Yerkes, Mr., and the London Railways, 325
Young England reviewed, 502
Young Man reviewed, 53, 86, 165, 260, 271, 274, 576
Young Oxford reviewed, 463
Young Woman reviewed, 46, 67, 171, 132, 253, 502

Zionist Congress, 219 Zola, Emile, on War, 167

THE ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION

FOR

THE REVIEW OF REVIEWS

E

8s. 6d.

Post free to any part of the World.

LONDON: PRINTED BY WILLIAM CLOWES AND SONS, L'MITED, STAMFORD STREET AND CHARING CROSS.

VIEWS OF THE PARIS EXHIBITION 1900.

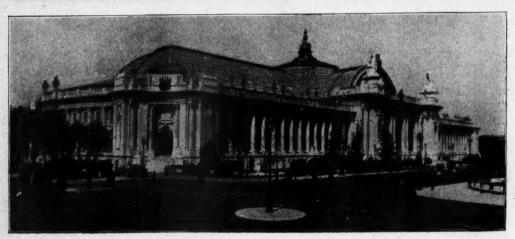

(Photographs by Albert Hautecœur, Paris.)

448,

, 434,

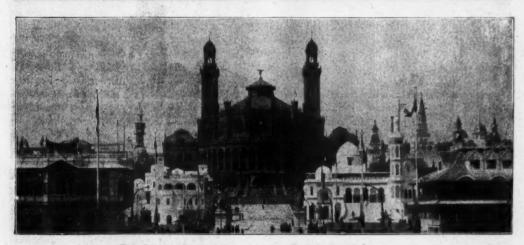

THE PRINCIPAL ENTRANCE TO THE EXHIBITION, PLACE DE LA CONCORDE.

THE PETIT PALAIS.

THE GRAND PALAIS DES BEAUX ARTS.

THE STREET OF THE SEINE WITH THE BRIDGE OF THE INVALIDES.

THE PALACE OF ASIATIC RUSSIA.

THE TROCADERO AND THE COLONIAL PALACES.

THE STREET OF NATIONS.
OLD PARIS.

ESPLANADE DES INVALIDES, FROM THE BRIDGE ALEXANDER III.
THE BRIDGE OF ALEXANDER III. AND THE GRAND PALAIS DES BEAUX ARTS.

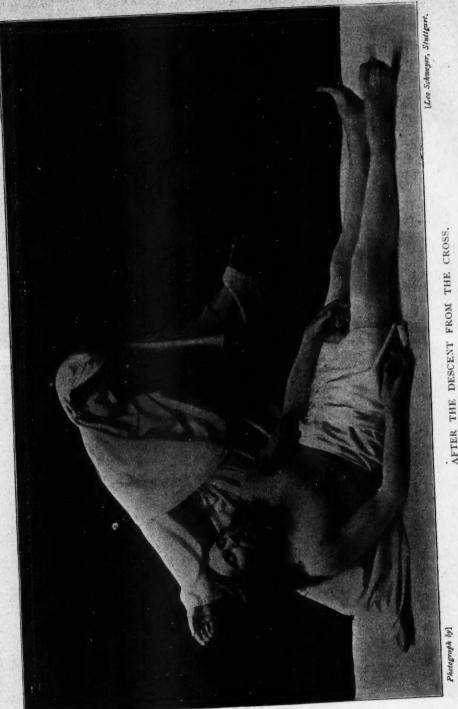

THE ITALIAN BUILDING IN THE STREET OF NATIONS.

GATE OF PEKIN IN THE TROCADERO PARK.

THE GARDEN OF THE EXHIBITION, WITH THE ELECTRICITY BUILDING. THE EIFFEL TOWER AND THE CHAMP DE MARS, FROM THE TROCADERO.

AFTER THE DESCENT FROM THE CROSS.

Scene from the Passion Play at Oberammer Eru-white fere rem arbit wou arbit necestion men white great can Perri nom roste Mar Trib as tibefo of til Russ of Jand Legi Empables new nuclei new nuclei new nuclei new nuclei series arbit series arbit

Re

THE PROGRESS OF THE WORLD.

Ju'y 2, 1900.

Real Progress.

The Emperor of Russia, true to his noble initiative, has taken the first step towards the constitution of the Permanent International Tribunal which it was decided to create at the Hague Conference. Each of the signatory Powers, it will be remembered, undertook to nominate as available arbitrators eminent persons of good standing, who would hold themselves in readiness to act as arbitrators whenever any international dispute arose necessitating the impanelling of a Court of Arbitration. Everything depends upon the calibre of the men whose names are entered upon the roster from which the arbitrators will be chosen. Hence the great importance of the Russian initiative. Nothing can demonstrate more clearly the status of the new Permanent Court than the high standing of the men nominated by the Tsar to represent his Empire on its They are four in number: (1) M. de Martens, who presided over the Venezuela Arbitration Tribunal; (2) M. Pobedonostzeff, who is best known as the Procurator of the Holy Synod, but who, long before he attained that post, was well known as one of the soundest lawyers and best informed men in Russia; (3) M. de Mouravieff, the present Minister of Justice, brother of the late Foreign Minister: and (4) M. de Frisch, who is president of the Legislative Department of the Council of the Empire. They are beyond all question four of the ablest and most distinguished men in Russia. The new Permanent Court could not have a sounder nucleus.

Whom will England nominate? If the British Government follows the excellent lead given it by the Tsar, there is no lack of competent and capable men available for the post. We have no longer Lord Herschell, it is true; but if Lord Salisbury were to nominate Lord Pauncefote, Lord Russell of Killowen, Sir Robert Reid and Sir Edward Clarke, Britain would be admirably represented by men whose standing, experience and general reputation would be no whit inferior to that of their Russian colleagues. To be enrolled on the roster of possible arbitrators will become one of the most coveted of all international distinctions. It is true that all the Russians appointed and all of the British suggested are lawyers. But they are also men of wide experience, statesmen and administrators; and, after all, the knowledge of law is no disqualification for the post of an international judge.

The Progress our ends, rough hew them as we will, seems to be at work in the Far East, where stirring events are afoot, some account of which will be found in "The Topic of the Month." The outbreak of nationalism in China has had as its immediate result the precipitation of the latent internationalism of Europe and America into the visible concrete shape of an international navy and an international army. Japan also takes her place in the international ranks. The presence of a common danger menacing the common interests of all Western Powers has brought about a practical federation of the West, the like of which has never been seen, even in the days of the Crusades.

Brigadier-General Sir A. Gasalee.
(In command of the division sent from India to China.)

We saw a beginning of this executive internationalism militant a year or two since in Crete. But the international action taken against the Turks was half-hearted and did not last long. The Concert of Europe is but a small thing compared to the Federation of the West, which has undertaken the pacification and resettlement of China. Japan and the United States constitute a very formidable reinforcement of the international muster. Nothing but the magnitude of a danger threatening all alike could have brought us into line.

One excellent and altogether un-One Benefit expected result of internationalism Internationalism in action is that it fails to excite warlike passions among the people. This is as it should be. The use of force cannot be forsworn in international affairs, but it is at least an immense advance to have discovered the existence of an instrument the employment of which excites none of the savage enthusiasm which all national The fate of Admiral Seymour and of the Foreign Legations at Pekin was a thousandfold more terrible than the worst which threatened Baden-Powell at Mafeking, or General White at Ladysmith. The heroism displayed by the international forces in endeavouring to relieve Tientsin and to rescue Admiral Seymour was far greater than anything which General French had occasion to show in relieving Kimberley, or Colonel Mahon in relieving Mafeking. But because the honours were shared with Russians, Germans, Japs, and Americans, the Man in the Street displayed little emotion and no enthusiasm. The fact is that international force is police force, whereas national wars are always more or less of a retrogression to the savage lust of sheer barbarism. As the great formula of progress is to substitute the policeman for the soldier, we welcome this evidence of the result of widening the area of international action as affording good ground that it may be possible to use force even in international affairs without letting loose the devil all round and setting the nations affame with the fire of hell.

No End to the

Another very reassuring, although exceedingly painful, fact which makes for progress is the prolongation of the struggle in South Africa. The Re

m ha

ing

sur

to i froi

bei

Me

sca

way of the transgressor is hard, and it would be a very bad thing for the transgressor himself if it was made smooth before his feet. Lord Roberts occupied Pretoria, after a very slight resistance, on June 5. One at least of the sapient oracles of the Man in the Street announced the news as "The End of the War," It is now the 1st of July, and the war is so far from being ended that Lord Roberts has declared he cannot allow a single man to be withdrawn from Africa for service in China. We have landed 204,000 soldiers in South Africa and have provided equipment for 30,000 Colonials. The Boers have not 30,000 fighting men left. But seven-to-one odds, in the opinion of Lord Roberts, must be kept up if he is to put the thing through. Michael Davitt reports that the Boers have ammunition enough yet for two years' fighting, with ample store of food, In his opinion the war is just about to enter upon its most serious and determined character. The newspapers publish the usual mendacious nonsense about the impending collapse of all resistance; but somehow or other the collapse does not come off. This is no doubt terrible for our poor soldiers, and terrible also for our brother Boers, but nothing would be so terrible as the easy triumph of exulting wrong.

The war, according to the Flag at Pretoria revellers who "Mafficked" to their hearts' content on the early nights of June, came to an end on June 5th. But read the following telegram from the Times correspondent as to the war which General De Wet, immediately after the fall of Johannesburg, began to wage upon the long line of our communications between Bloemfontein and Pretoria:-

eving

hared

s, the nd no

rce is more sheer is to lcome area

round

inter-

vil all fire of hough makes ion of

l be a

it was cupied

une 5.

in the of the ar is so eclared n from

04,000

ipment

30,000 in the f he is reports for two

In his its most spapers out the

> some-This

rs, and nothing

exulting

Flag at fficked"

he early

end on from the General

nesburg,

The

On June 3rd De Wet captured a convoy of forty waggons with stores and ammunition for the Highland Brigade, then at Heilbron. The capture was made half-way between Heilbron and Vredefort Road.

On June 4th Major Haig attempted the relief of the convoy, but failed, and returned to the railway.

De Wet moved south, and on the following day he appeared astride the railway and demolished Roodevaal Bridge. June 6th found De Wet forcing his way north, working destruction on the way. He occupied Vredefort Road Station and compelled Major Haig to retire six miles north to find a defensible position.

On June 7th Lord Methuen arrived at Heilbron, where General MacDonald was very short of supplies, his men having been on quarter rations for six days.

Meantime, De Wet, whose force had been largely augmented by his successes, had detached Commandant

Nel to attack Rhenoster. He effected a surprise, attacking in the moonlight, and the Derbyshire Militia surrendered after having one hundred casualties. On June 9th Lord Methuen moved out from Heilbron to re-occupy the railway. On the 10th he and the force from the Vaal concentrated at Vredefort Road, the Boers being still in the vicinity.

On June 11th the whole command under Lord Methuen moved south on both sides of the railway, and scattered a Boer commando at Reitvlei.

On June 14th the enemy again appeared at Rhenoster. They made a night attack on two construction trains, where Colonel Girouard was personally superintending repairs. The working party resisted stubbornly and were extricated by the timely arrival of support from a post to Lord Methuen returned from the east without having effected the capture of the Boer rearguard.

Add to this list the fact that on June 23rd De Wet cut up the post at Honing Spruit, broke the line of railway and telegraph, burnt three culverts, and only retired when reinforcements arrived too late to save the line.

The Deadly Drain Disease.

The Boers, it is estimated, have not more than 15,000 or 20,000 men in the field. We have nearly 20,000 men down with sickness and wounds in South Africa .- Every week seven or eight hundred wretched wrecks of humanity are started for home by the ocean ferry that plies ceaselessly between Cape Town and Southampton. The much-talked-of inoculation against enteric fever has proved a miserable fraud, like most of the new-fangled fads of the modern physician. Those who have died from disease are one thousand more than those who have been killed in battle. Nor is there any sign of the deadly drain being stopped. We have lost in killed, wounded, prisoners and disease nearly 40,000 able-bodied men, two for every one who signed the famous petition of the Uitlanders which was used as a pretext to bring on this war. To get the franchise for 20,000 Uitlanders two years earlier, rather than two years later, all this hideous expenditure of the health and life of the nation's youth has been incurred. Was there ever such disproportion between object aimed vaal and Orange Free State, whose land has been swept by a besom of flame. The sufferings of mere Boers do not appeal to the tender hearts of our Christian Jingoes. They are pleased with it rather. They clamour for more severity. They applaud the firing of the Boer homesteads, and indite hymns which would have disgraced a Carthaginian worshipper of Moloch to the "bloody baynit." We are now concerned solely about the sufferings of our own soldiers, poor fellows, who for the most part had no more option about taking part in the war than the at and the means taken to bring it about? But all this tells for good in the long run. It is the stern torture of the Just Gods by which nations learn the penalty of wanton war.

Map showing the British Advance in South Africa.

The Great Explosion at the Begbie Works, Johannesburg.

"Shall we let Hell loose in South Africa?" I asked last September, and the nation through its representatives in Parliament, Press and Pulpit cried out savagely, "Yes." And now we are beginning to see what the answer meant. I say nothing about the sufferings of our brothers the burghers of the Trans-

90,000 horses we have sent to perish in the veldt. What does the war mean to them? Read the following extract from the description given by Mr. Burdett-Coutts, M.P., of the condition of one of the field hospitals near Bloemfontein. In this particular hospital, he says—there were 316 patients, of whom half were typhoids. Their condition was almost indescribable. The tents were bell tents, in which usually six or eight soldiers sleep. In many of these tents there were ten typhoid cases lying closely packed together, the dying against the convalescent, the man in his "crisis" pressed against the offh the 1 is a that in w singl this l upon Hagu and : whole arbitr to a They chose let le sulphu

gr

te

wi

the end up cold eye gro the othe while

The the C

the st

boys a rulers.

Lord I and I retiring treasure man hastening to it. There was not room to step between them. With no beds or mattresses, and only forty-two stretchers in the whole hospital, it followed that 274 patients had to be on the earth. There was a great scarcity of blankets, and no patient could have more than one, with a waterproof sheet, between his body and the ground. The ground is hard as stone, and at night the temperature falls to freezing-point. There were no sheets or pillow-cases or pretence of bed linen of any kind; only the coarse rug grated against the sensitive skin burning with fever. The heat of these tents in the midday sun was overpowering, their odours sickening. Men lay with their faces covered with flies in black clusters too weak to raise a hand to brush them off, trying in vain to dislodge them by painful twitching of the features. There was no one to do it for them. At night there were not enough to prevent those in the delirious stage from getting up and wandering about the camp half naked in the bitter cold. In one tent, where some slept and others lay with eyes open and staring, a case of "perforation" was groaning out his life huddled against his neighbour on the ground. Men had not only to see, but often to feel, others die. It was a sad and sickening spectacle this, which I describe exactly as my eyes saw it, and without exaggeration or excuse.

The Moral of it all.

ere

ur

er.

the

ns

per

OW

wn

no

the veldt.

d the y Mr.

one of n this phoids.

e tents

soldiers typhoid inst the

inst the

"A sad and sickening spectacle" truly, and one for which it will be well if some one or more of those responsible were summarily hanged

offhand. This failure of the richest Government in the world to provide adequately for its dying soldiers is a scandal which will ring round the world. But that is only a single page out of the infernal chapter in which is written the annals of this war. Not one single man would have been thus tortured to death in this hideous fashion if Ministers had consented to act upon the principles which they professed at the Hague, and had accepted President Kruger's urgent and repeated appeal to allow the whole question to be referred to arbitration. They would not listen to any proposal of arbitration. They rejected arbitration. They chose war. Now war means Hell let loose, and one page of the sulphurous record is written in the story of that solitary hospital tent. It is the penalty which our boys are paying for the sins of their rulers. And the end is not yet.

The Progress of last month's of the Campaign. campaigning there is not much to say.

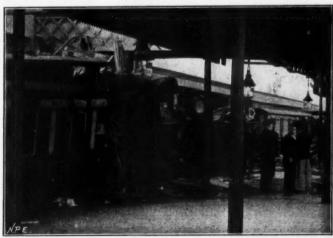

Lord Roberts rushed Johannesburg

and Pretoria, President Kruger retiring with his artillery and treasure intact to the north-eastern corner of the Transvaal, where the Boers declare their intention to hold out to the last. Pretoria being in the hands of Lord Roberts, the position of the Boers in front of Laing's Nek became untenable. It was evacuated, and Sir Redvers Buller, entering virtually unopposed, joined hands with Lord Roberts. The Boers as usual carried off all their guns and most of their stores. Although we are in possession of both their capitals, they have not only saved nearly all their artillery, but thanks to the cannon captured from us they have more guns than when the war began. In the Free State General De Wet has been busy severing communications and making prisoners. General Rundle down near Ficksburg continues to be on the point of cornering the Boer commandoes, but when the decisive moment arrives they slip through his fingers. So the war drags on, and is likely to drag on for many a weary month. Joubert is dead and Cronje is a prisoner. General Typhoid is a far more formidable foe than any commandant of them all. And while we are held by the heels in South Africa we are guaranteed against all temptation to quarrel with our neighbours in China or elsewhere.

The Future Settlement. It is rather too soon to talk about the resettlement of the country which we have partially overrun but which we have utterly failed to subdue. It is well to catch your hare before you cook it, even in South Africa, and at present the hare is very much at large. All the schemes for the future of the Republics which are mooted in the Photograph by]

[G. Drake, Slough.

After the Railway Accident at Slough Junction.

Photograph by]

[Dittrich, Cairo.

The Khedive of Egypt.

Press and on the platform assume, first, that they are to cease to be Republics, and, secondly, that sooner or later the burghers will acquiesce, sullenly or otherwise, in the extinction of their nationality. The evidence for the latter assumption is not exactly visible to the naked eye. Our rule in the Republics will extend, no doubt, as far as the range of our guns, and if we cover the whole country, which is larger than France, with a permanent garrison, we can, of course, burn and slay, as we are doing now, indefinitely. But that there will be any acquiescence in our authority, any recognition that we are other than lawless invaders, whom every burgher will regard as Englishmen would regard a French conqueror in Kent, remains to be proved. Dutch are a stubborn race. The African veldt is wide, and, excepting the Rand, there is nothing in it that our people would regard as worth holding. They may wear us out yet, as their ancestors wore out the Spaniards three centuries since. The optimists have always been wrong so far, and it is at least possible they are not right now.

The Action

There is another element to be taken into account. The majority of the white population in the Cape Colony is passionately hostile to the annexation of the Republics. Last month two representative

Congresses were held which affirmed in most emphatic fashion their unalterable repugnance to the extinction of the Republics. More significant still, the Schreiner Ministry has fallen at last; its disappearance being due to the reluctance of the Dutch Cape Colonists to allow a Ministry which they had constituted to be used as the instrument for punishing "rebels." It is surprising that the Bond tolerated so long the way in which Mr. Schreiner played into the hands of Sir Alfred Milner. Mr. Schreiner no doubt acted from the noblest motives, but as a matter of fact he sacrificed the situation. Imagine an Australian Prime Minister in his position! The fact is, the Dutch of the Cape are only beginning to wake up to the strength of the position of a majority in a self-governing colony. And when they do discover it they will use it to make the government of South Africa impossible until the Republics regain their independence.

The New Cape Cabinet.

form the head and the backbone of the new Cabinet. Mr. Rhodes is in Rhodesia, but two of the new Cabinet Ministers, Smart and Faure, are supposed to do his bidding. This is a mistake. Mr. Rhodes is no advocate for harrying the Dutch. He knows that South Africa is lost to the Empire unless the Dutch are conciliated, and unless the so-called Rhodesites wish to be sharply called to heel they will do well to think twice and even thrice before they do anything that will make it difficult for Mr. Rhodes and Mr. Hofmeyr to come together again. On the other hand, the Dutch would do well to remember that it is no use cutting off your nose to spite your face. Whatever grudge they may have against Mr. Rhodes for the Raid-which would never have taken place if Mr. Chamberlain had not messed things by his self-seeking intervention-Mr. Rhodes is the only Englishman in the country who is at once strong enough and intelligent enough to help them through their present trouble. No doubt they will pull things right by themselves in time. But it will be a long time, and the indulgence of a personal grudge is dearly bought at the price of the postponement for years of the recognition of their rightful position at the Cape.

In the month of June there have Liberal Leaders been few notable utterances by public men. Half the month was devoted the War. to the Whitsuntide holiday. Mr. Morley made a somewhat notable speech at Oxford, in which he declared that he, the champion in Sc attem Burgh of vie in the Africa on re passag ence e letter the tro the reli lo

Sir Gordon Sprigg and Mr. Rose Innes

sa

to sh

be

WC

be

for wit

Op

dec

you tha

to i

The

thei

is t

with nam

it do

The

shou

C. B

Ho

bei

tribut

smoke vermin. getting

" Aga

par excellence of the old individualistic Liberalism of the Manchester school, was ready to go over to the Socialists if, as he feared time might show, they were the only real opponents of Militarism. The significance of that declaration has been very strangely overlooked. It will be better appreciated twelve months hence. Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman made a long speech at Glasgow on the future settlement, in which there were too many "ifs" and "ans." If. said the Liberal leader, Lord Salisbury were to be taken seriously when he declared not a shadow of independent self-government was to be left to the Boers, then he, Sir Henry, would become an anti-annexationist. But he did not believe Lord Salisbury meant what he said. Therefore, etc., etc. This kind of thing plays Old Harry with the Liberal party. What is the use of being an Opposition if, whenever the Government makes a declaration absolutely opposed to Liberal principles, you refuse to oppose them because you cannot believe that they mean what they say? We are surely entitled to insist that they shall be judged by their own words. The fact is, the Opposition leaders, one and all of them, have forgotten that the business of an Opposition is to oppose. They are all associating themselves with the responsibilities of the Government in the name of patriotic Imperialism. It is very pretty, but it does not work. Let the cobbler stick to his last. The responsibilities of the Government are on the shoulders of the Government, not on those of C. B., J. M. & Co.

How the War is being Waged.

tic

on ner

ng

to be t is

in

Sir

om

criime

of

the

ern-

hey

frica

nde-

nnes

e of s is new

d to es is that outch

esites

ell to thing

Mr.

other hat it face.

hodes

place

by his only strong rough things

a long dge is ent for tion at e have public

levoted

eech at ampion

But

Some things worth noting have been published last month on the war. Chief amongst them are the letters which Mr. Michael Davitt has contributed to the Freeman's Journal from the seat of war in South Africa. They are the first really serious attempts that have been made to describe the Burghers' War of Independence from the Boers' point of view. I have republished the substance of them in the current number of "War against War in South Africa," a copy of which will be sent to any address on receipt of 1½d. in stamps. Two significant passages may be quoted from the special correspondence on the other side. One is from Mr. Stuart's letter in the Morning Post describing the temper of the troops and men camp followers who took part in the relief of Mafeking:—

"Again," says Mr. Stuart, "I had the joy of seeing the smoke of a rebel's house ascending." "These human vermin," he calls the rebels. "A beast of a rebel was getting his deserts"—and so on in many passages which we have no space to quote. Mr. Stuart says, "Colonel Mahon, however, objected to this sort of thing, and, greatly to our sorrow, forbade any more burnings. Looting was also forbidden."

Strange to say the Westminster Gazette solemnly rebukes the Morning Post for giving us even this stray glimpse of the devil's work we are doing in South Africa. Some things the Westminster Gazette seems to think are too bad to be spoken of. But if they are not too bad to be done by British troops with the enthusiastic applause of British special correspondents, why should we wince when they are chronicled? The other passage occurs in a letter from Mr. Hales, the famous Australian special correspondent, which the Daily News published on June 19th. Mr. Hales says:—

I want to place it on record that in my opinion the Boer farmer is as clean in his home life, as loving in his domestic arrangements, as pure in his morals as any class of people I have ever met. After six months, or nearly six months', close and careful observation of their habits, I have arrived at the conclusion that the Boer farmer, and his son and daughter, will compare very favourably with the farming folk of Australia, America and Great Britain.

These are the men whose homesteads we are offering up as a flaming holocaust to the fetish of Paramountcy, that modern idol of the market place belauded by all our "Moloch priests."

Photograph by]

[R. Faulkner.

The late Mrs. Gladstone.

Mr. Kipling Mr. Dooley.

Among the comic writers of the day Mr. Rudvard Kipling and Mr. Dooley distinguished themselves last month. As a serious storyteller, Mr. Kipling is proving every day in the columns of the Express that he no longer exists. But stray flashes of insight occur even in the dull and dreary copy which he is turning out about the South African War. picture of the imbecility and arrogance, the ignorance and incompetence of the army officer who despises "shop," puts on "side," and declasses all the rest of mankind who do not belong to his small social set as "outsiders-rank outsiders," is worthy to stand beside Mr. Rhodes's famous criticism of our generals after the relief of Kimberley. In the sketch of "The Outsider" we have a picture of a British officer well on his way to the pinnacle of ignorant self-sufficiency and tragic incompetence which the Chinese officer has hitherto been left to occupy The other writer who has made a notable contribution to the war literature of the month is the humorous Mr. Dooley, who hit off with cruel fidelity the contrast between the exuberance of American enthusiasm for the cause of the South African Republic and the studious cold shoulder with which the Boer delegates were treated by Mr. McKinley and official Americans:-

Th' amount iv sympathy that goes out fr a sthrugglin' people is reg'lated, Hinnissy, be th' amount iv sthrugglin' th' people can do. Th' wurruld, me la-ad, is with th' undher dog on'y as long as he has a good hold an' a chanst to tur'rn over.

"Ivrywhere th' dillygates tur-rns they see th' sign: 'This is me busy day.' An' whin they get back home they can tell th' people they found th' United States exudin' sympathy at ivry pore—'marked private.'"

"Don't ye think th' United States is enthusyastic fr th'

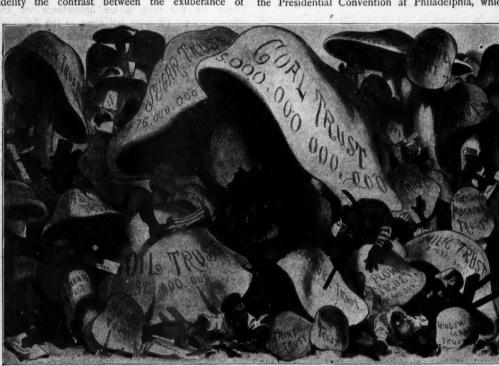

Boers?" asked the innocent Hennessy.

"It was," said Mr. Dooley. "But in th' las few weeks it's had so manny things to think iv. Th' enthusyasm iv this counthry, Hinnissy, always makes me think iv a benfire on an icefloe. It burns bright so long as ye feed it, an' it looks good, but it don't take hold, somehow, on th' ice."

The American Presidential Election.

The Boer delegates, who are expected to arrive in Havre on the 5th or 6th of July, professed themselves satisfied with the expression of sympathy introduced into the Republican platform adopted by the Presidential Convention at Philadelphia, which The Trusts in the States.

UNCLE SAM: "Something MUST be done, and quickly!

te T

av of

Ma

nominated Mr. McKinley for a second Presidential term, with Colonel Roosevelt, the popular Rough Rider and Governor of the State of New York, as Republican candidate for the Vice-Presidency. The second name on the ticket is much more popular than the first, and if Mr. McKinley could but promise to go to heaven at Christmas the Republican ticket would stand a fair chance of being accepted with acclamation in November. As no such guarantee is forthcoming, Mr. Roosevelt will have to wait for the Presidency till 1905, when the ordinary swing of the pendulum should bring the Republicans back to power if the McKinley ticket is defeated this year. Mr. W. J. Bryan will be re-nominated as Democratic candidate before these pages are printed, and it will be bad luck for him if he is not elected in November. It is time the Democrats had a turn. Mr. Bryan has grown in wisdom and in popularity since last election, and his return would signify that the American democracy is in no mood to add to its Imperial responsibilities over sea. The silver issue is practically dead. The battle will rage round two questions, and two questions only-Trusts and Imperialism. Mr. Bryan is against both.

Lord Salisbury's remarkable speech in the month of June. Addressing a missionary meeting at Exeter Hall, he seized the opportunity to implore the missionaries of the Cross to moderate their propagandist ardour. It was all very well for the early Christian apostles to go forth and preach to the heathen, knowing that they would have to pay with their lives for the liberty of their tongues. But we have changed all that. Nowadays, when the heathen slay a missionary, the missionary has become not so much a John the Baptist of the Gospel as an avant-courier of the General and the gunboat:—

The Chinese and other nations (said Lord Salisbury) have got the idea that missionary work is a mere instrument of the secular Government in order to achieve the objects it has in view. That is a most dangerous and terrible snare.

Therefore he implored missionaries to temper their enthusiasm with Christian prudence if they would avoid the discredit of being regarded as "an instrument of territorial greed and a weapon in the warfare which one secular power wages against another." Lord Salisbury went on to say that many warnings had reached him as to the danger of lighting a flame in Mahomedan countries which it might be hard to suppress. In the lands of Islam he bade the missionaries remember—you are dealing with a force which a pure, though mistaken, theism gives to a vast population. I think that your chances of conversion as proved by our experience are infinitely small compared to the danger of creating great perils and of producing serious convulsions and, maybe, of causing bloodshed, which will be a serious and permanent obstacle to that Christian religion which we desire above all things to preach.

Of which "great and serious danger" it behoves all men to take good heed.

Lord Salisbury arriving at Exeter Hall to speak at the S.P.G. Meeting.

The New Ministry in Italy. The General Election in Italy has been speedily followed by a change of Ministry. The new Italian Parliament met on the 17th ult., and although the Speaker proposed by the Government was elected by 242 to 212 votes, General Pelloux on the following day announced the resignation of the Cabinet. After considerable negotiation a new Ministry was got together under Signor Giuseppe Sarocco. It is Moderate Liberal in its composition, retaining Signor Venosta in his place at the Foreign Office. On the 27th the new Cabinet laid its programme before the Chamber in terms which might be repeated with advantage by the next British Ministry. This, said Signor Sarocco, is not the moment for vast programmes. National economy he put in the forefront, for, he declared "we firmly believe that the outh

Mr.

gglin'

gglin'

h th' an' a sign:

home

States

fr th'

veeks

sm iv

e feed

w, on ected r 6th

isfied

d by

which

discontent of the population is due to an economic malaise. Our first duty therefore will be to produce proposals calculated to alleviate their sufferings." We do not feel the pinch of poverty yet. But we are drawing bills on the future, and incurring new liabilities every year without increasing our resources. When the inevitable depression of trade comes we shall cry out for a Sarocco programme.

While the Italians have elected a The Menace new Chamber, whose first act has Naval Supremacy, been to instal a Ministry pledged to economy and the alleviation of the sufferings of the people, the German and French Governments vie with our own in the extravagance of their naval expenditure. Despite all opposition, the German Naval Bill-that most deliberate menace to our naval supremacy—has been carried triumphantly through the Reichstag to the no small delight of the The French, not to be behindhand, have been discussing naval estimates which entail an shipbuilding outlay in construction of £,4,000,000. The debaters in the French Chamber do not in the least deny that they have England in their mind's eye, and that the increase of the navy is expressly designed in order to enable them to hold their own if they were threatened with another Fashoda. The French, however, like ourselves, will have to reckon with the revolt of the conquered races, and China may give us all too much to do to leave us any leisure to quarrel amongst ourselves.

The news from Ashanti has got The Revolt steadily worse and worse. Coloured World, whole confederacy of tribes formerly dominated by the Ashantis appears to have rallied under the leadership of a female relative of King Prempeh, with the definite object of expelling the Pale-faces from the country beyond the Prah. The relieving columns, chiefly composed of black troops, have been beaten back. The Governor and his small garrison have been closely shut up in Kumasi by an overwhelming force of the tribesmen, and when we go to press the chances seem heavy that he and all his men have perished in a desperate effort to cut their way to the coast. The incident is serious in itself, but much more serious for what it implies. It fits in only too well with the much more formidable revolt in China. The coloured races have got tired of being bossed by a handful of whites. They are arming themselves with the white man's weapons, and although they may in the end be beaten by the superior intelligence of the minority, the majority means to have another try for independence. What that means to us with India on our hands who can imagine? This is not the time of all times for squandering the resources of the Empire.

After much negotiation Mr. Chamberlain has at last adopted the Melbourne Argus compromise, with which the delegates have expressed themselves content. On the 18th ult. he proposed a new clause which laid down that no appeal should be permitted to the Queen in Council from a decision of the High Court of the Commonwealth upon any question as to the limits inter se of the constitutional powers of the Commonwealth and those of any State, or as to the limits inter se of the constitutional powers of any two States, unless the High Court should certify that the question was one which ought to be determined by the Privy Council. Upon the question as to whether or not a power had been delegated, there would be an appeal as of right. The Opposition made some demur, but with the exception of Queensland it would seem as if the Australian Governments were prepared to accept the Argus compromise. Note, however, that the New Zealand Government have just declared in the opening of the new Parliament that they deem it "undesirable and inopportune" to federate for the present. While they object to federate they are willing to annex, and are preparing the public for such an extension of the boundaries of the colonies as would include various unappropriated islands of the southern seas.

Parliament and the Thieves. Parliament re-assembled on the 14th ult. after the Whitsun recess. Its proceedings have been followed with little interest save for the Ministerial replies as to the course of events in China. The Duke of Devonshire introduced the Secondary Education Bill into the House of Lords on Monday, June 25th, but as he said he did not expect to pass it this year, it may be noted in passing only as an indication of the indifference with which the public regards the peril which menaces our industrial supremacy. Two other measures which have made some progress show a glimmering perception of the need for creating fresh safeguards against the criminal practices by which smart men of business are able to swindle the public without bringing themselves within the scope of the law. Mr. Ritchie's Companies Bill contains a multitude of provisions all aimed at safeguarding the pockets of the investing public from the fingers of the fraudulent promoter. The Bill deals with the position of directors who acted without a qualification or took gifts of paid-up shares, and

u

hi

le te

tra bo at pr

W

pa tio

on

me

sta

COL

the

De

the low

the

Dia

of V

and

and othe

his !

wan

wha Wit

Prin

1

provided against bogus or fictitious subscriptions. The other Bill is that which is aimed at moneylenders. They are henceforth to register themselves, to be punished if they issue circulars to minors, and if they insist upon harsh and unconscionable bargains from which freedom of contract is absent, the County Court judge is to have power to annul them. The County Court judge thus becomes our Cadi under the Palm Tree who will administer justice as seemeth good in his own eyes.

Fraudulent

ır 11

nie

th

d

of ıy

al

e.

TS

ld be

on

d. on 15-its se.

ent

ia-

e "

to ng

of

ed

th

Its

ith rial

'he ary

ay,

s it

an olic

rial

ade

the

nal

to hin

Bill

afe-

the eals

t a

and

The need for some such corrective in Army Contractor, other departments than that of money-lending has been forcibly illustrated by the evidence tendered before the Committee on War Office Contracts. The firm of Samuel Brothers, Limited, bought boots from Cave and Son, of Rushton, Northampton, at 7s. 3d. per pair, less discount, which brought the price down to 6s. 91d. They then sold them to the Worcester Regiment of Volunteers for 12s. 6d. per pair, delivering them as the regulation Government ammunition boot. A little more than the regulation price was paid "to insure the boots being good ones." When the boots were delivered the Worcester men wore them for three days at Aldershot before starting for the front. The result was that "you could put your finger through the soles of most of them."

The Prince and his

So much has been said adversely concerning the Prince of Wales's Derby Winnings. devotion to the turf-not that he is much devoted to anything, the more's the pity-that it is only fair to him to quote the following paragraph which has been going the rounds of the press as an extract from the King of Sweden's Diary :-

The Heir-Apparent to the English Throne is the Prince of Wales by name; the Prince of Society by inclination; and the Prince of "good fellows" by nature. and the Princess of Wales are devotedly attached to each When the Prince's horse won the last Derby, his Royal Highness said to me before the race, "I do want to win to-day, because I always give the Princess whatever amount my success happens to bring to me. With the stake money of the last Derby I won the Princess provided 1,700 poor boys with a complete outfit where the Christian Endeavour Convention will be held.

Front of Alexandra Palace.

-clothes, underlinen, etc.-and stamped on each article was, "From your friend, the Prince."

It is a pretty little story—if true—and it would do Lord Rosebery all the good in the world if he could cap it by a similar idyll as to the way in which he disposed of the stakes won by Ladas.

Conventions Religious and Philanthropic. The temperance people have been holding conventions in London and in Edinburgh. The only notable thing about them was that they welcomed Lady Henry Somerset back to public life We have all missed her badly, and we rejoice to have her back in our midst again. The Christian Endeavour Convention at Alexandra Palace will be in full swing at the time this number is printed. Four steamers are carrying three thousand pilgrims from the United States to the great rendezvous-which will be the greatest international picnic yet held among the English-speaking folk. The session will last five days. Dr. Clark and Mr. Sheldon, author of "In His Steps," will be the chief American speakers.

The Vanishing Dissolution.

It only remains to be said in closing this chronicle that the great design of Mr. Chamberlain for sweeping the board by a sudden dissolution has miscarried. Lord Salisbury and Sir M. Hicks Beach never relished the scheme, which seemed too much like thimblerigging to please the Duke of Devonshire. The real reason, however, why Mr. Chamberlain did not get his way was the obstinate and unreasonable refusal of the Boers to facilitate his little game by laying down their arms.

DIARY FOR JUNE.

EVENTS OF THE MONTH.

June 1. There is a lively debate in the French Senate on the Amnesty Bill.
Lerd Rosebery, in a letter to the Western Daily Mercury, expresses his views on the British Empire.
a. The Amnesty Bill is passed by the French Senate by a large majority, and M. Waldeck-

Rousseau's speech in support of it is ordered to be placarded throughout France. The President of Chile gives a satisfactory account of the country on the opening of Congress.

A People's Congress is opened at Graaf Reinet, near Cape Town.

The "Boxers" in China burna r. ilway station on the Pekin-Tientsin Railway.

A resolution reported to the Senate from the American Interoceanic Canal Committee declares the Clayton-Bulwer treaty abrogated.

dmiral Kempff teleg aphs to Washington that he has landed fifty more seamen and a battalion of marines to reinforce those already g. Admiral landed in China.

6. The Reichstag passes the first clause of the German Reilway Bill.

The Legations at Pekin send their families away out of danger. The American fleet in Chinese waters is ordered to be increased.

Chinese waters is ordered to be increa: ed.
The Democratic party in New York State declares in favour of Mr. Bryan as President, Oregon in favour of Mr. McKinley.
Dr. von Buchka, Director of the Colonial Department of Germany, resigns, and is succeeded by Dr. Stu. bel.
The Ambassadors address identical notes to the

The Ambassadors address identical notes to the Porte protesting against the Customs Ta iff.

7. Debate in the Reichstag on the German Navy Bill. Dr. Von Simman (financier) protests against the increase of the Stamp Dutties as bearing hardly on the members of the Stock Ferbrage.

Exchange.

The King of Norway and Sweden visits the Paris Exhibition, being the first monarch to

The American Congress adjourns sine die.
The Indiana, South Dakota, and West Virginia Democratic Convention endorse Mr. Bryan's candidature for the Presidency.

8. Of the twenty-four State Democratic Conventions held, twenty-two, representing delegates to the Kansas City National Democrat Convention, instruct their delegates to support Mr. Bryan.

Photograph by [Maull and Fox. Admiral Seymour.

In Command of British Fleet in Chinese Waters.

8. The second reading of the Navy Bill passes

The second reading of the Navy Dill passes the Reichstag.

M. Georges Cochery is elected Chairman of the French Budget Committee.

At a meeting of the Paris Municipality the conduct of the police at the Communist anniversary at Père La Cheise is discussed, and the annual motion for the abolition of Government control of the Paris Police is carried. carried.

carried.

A scene of violent obstruction takes place in the Austrian Reichsrath, penny trumpets and whistles being used.

The Tsung-li-Yamen protests against the presence of a large foreign force at Pekin.

The R. ichstag concludes the second reading of the increase of Stamp Duties for the Jerman Navy Bill.

11. Changes are made in the Tsung-li-Yamên: one Chinese reti es and four Conservative Manchuser refles and four Conservative Manchus are appointed.

The trial of the Franco-Belgian Company, in the Sclall Railway case, brought by the Transvaal, begins at Brussels.
Anti-Semic riots at Konitz, West Plussia.
The New South Wales Pailiament opens after a recess lasting six months.

Mr. Holder, Premier of South Australia, says Air. Mointer, rremer or South Australia, says, he considers the compromise on the Federation Bill extremely unsatisfactory, and desirts the Bill be passed un.mended. he German Reichstag adjourns for the summer; the Navy Bill having been read a utird time and passed by a majority of 201

The Bureau of the French Chamber meets to nominate the Committee on the Amnesty

Kumassi still surrounde

Kumassi still surrounded.

Mr. Schreiner and his Ministry resign.

Mr. McLean, Premier of Victoria, telegraphs to the Australian Premiers, suggesting that Sir W. Lyne, Premier of New South Wales, should telegraph to Mr. Barton, strongly objecting to the proposed compromise on Clause 74, and urging its restoration to the original form.

The Porte informs the Ambassadors that ait.

The Porte informs the Ambassadors that it postpones the new Customs Tariff for a

14. Railway communication is cut between Tien-

14. Railway communication is cut between Tientsin and the foreign expedition under the command of Admiral Seymour at Lang-fang. The French Chamber agrees unanimously to the credit of 61,000,000 ft. for the defence of the Colonies. The French Senate agrees to the Colonial Army Bill.

Sir W. Lyne, Premier of New South Wales, and Mr. Lewis, Premier of Tasmania, concur in Mr. McLean's proposal to send a telegram to Mr. Barton, strongly opposing the compromise on Clause 74, of the Commonwealth Bill.

15. 350 of the Hong Kong regiment and Asiatics leave for Ka-Ku. G. neral Tung's Shan-hai-Kwang troops are moving on Pekin.

Sir J. Gordon Sprige experiences difficulty in forming a Cabinet.

The Congress of the Afrikander Bond opens at

The Congress of the Afrikander Bond opens at

Sir William Lyne telegraphs to Mr. Barton that public opinion throughout Australia is strongly opposed to the compromise in the Commonwealth Bill.

Commonwealth Bill.

The number of delegates to the National Democra ic Convention al eady elected and instructed to vote for Mr. Bryan exceeds 76, the necessary number required to nominate him to the Presidency.

M. Waldeck-Rousseau confers with the Committee of the French Chamber on the Ampsety Bill

Amnesty Bill.

Amnesty Bill.
Commissioners Sitwell and F. E. Silva with six police constables are killed on the barks of the Gambia River, West Africa.
At the Bond Congress, the Scoretary, Mr. De Waal, explains matters in connection with the Ministerial create. Ministerial cr'sis.

The German Emperor opens the canal con-necting the North Sea and the Baltic by way of the rivers Elbe and Trave at Lübeck.

Photograph by]

[Elliott and Fry.

T

June 1.

5. The m

6. B.it

B 8. Gen Be 9. The 11. Gen

Sir Claude MacDonald.

British Minister in Pekin.

The Italian (newly elected) Parliament is opened the Italian (newly elected) Farliament is opened by the king in person.

Bad railway accident at Slough station; five persons killed, and about seventy injured.

The Taku forts open fire on the combined fleet, which returns the fire, with the result that after a fight which last course house. that, after a fight which lasts seven hours, two of the forts are blown up, and the other two carried by assault.

18. The British sloop Daphne leaves Hong Kong. for Taku.

The German Minister reported to be murdered at Pekin by Chinese troops.

Sir Gordon Sprigg forms a Cabinet at Cape

Town.

Town.

The Acting Premier of Queensland approves of the compromise in the Commonwealth Bill.

The mew Italian Cobinet resigns.

The Bond Congress, at Paarl, passes a resolution insisting on the maintenance of the Parablics.

Republics. Reinforcements are sent to China by Russia, Japan, France, and the United States. The Republican Convention meets at Phila-delphia; it cominates Mr. McKinley for the Presidency. he Irish National Convention meets in Dublin. Funeral of Mrs. Gladstone in Westminster Abbey.

The German Emperor, at Kiel, supervises the measures for the mobilisation of Marines for measu China.

The Republican National Convention, at Philadelphia, declares its platform for this year's election.

The American Republican Convention nominates Colonel Roosevelt as Vice-President.

A royal decree is published in Madrid suspend-

A royal decree is published in Madrid suspending the constitutional guarantees in the case of shopkeepers who refuse to pay taxes.

22. The Chinese tombard Tientsin.

In the New South Wales Legislative Assembly the compromise on Clause 74 of the Commonwealth Bill is carried without a division.

23. The German consul at Chifu telegraphs that the bombardment of Tientsin continues. The Russo-American force, five hundred strong, fails to relieve Tientsin.

23. The United States Chargé d'Affaires at Constantinople again demands the indemnity for losses to American subjects during the Armenian massacres.
24. A new Italian Cabinet is completed.

A new Portuguese Ministry is also announced. The city of Mayence celebrates the sooth anniversary of the birth of Johann Guten-berg, the inventor of printing.

25. Dr. Jameson is returned unopposed as member for Kimberley, South Africa.

The Admiralty receives a telegram from Rear-Admiral Bruce from Chifu dated June 24th. No news from Tientsin.

An order of the Tsar raising the troops in the Amur district to a war footing is published.

The International Miners' Congress commences its deliberations in Paris, seventy-three delegates, representing 1,133,500 European miners, being present.

The funeral of Count Mouravieff takes place at St. Petersburg.
The French Chamber discusses the Bill for the

The French Chamber discusses the Bill for the in rase of the Navy.

26. Admi al Kempff telegraphs to Washington that Tintsin was relieved on Saturday.

Admiral Seymour re urns to Tintsin, having been unable to reach Pekin by rail.

Troops embark at Calcutta for China on board the Nerbuddie.

the Nerbudds.

Message arrives at the Foreign Office from Sir R. Hart, Pekin, dated June 19th, which states that the foreign Legations had been requested to leave Pekin on June 24th.

Mr. Burdett-Coutts' letter on Military Hospitals in South Africa is published in t.2 Times.

After a debate in the French Chamber on Army discipline the Nationalists are defeated on a resolution by M. Sembat by 328 votes to 129.

to 129.
A telegram from British Consul at Chifu states that Admiral Seymour is relieved and has returned to Tintsin.
Signor Villa is elected President of the Italian Parliament.

d Fry.

opened

red. mbined

e result e other

g Kong

urdered

at Cape

pproves

resoluof the

Russia,

t Phila-

for the eets in tminster

vises the

for this

n nomi-sident.

suspend-the case

ssembly common-

phs that ontin hundred

res.

A large and important deputation waits on Sir Alfred Milner at Cape Town to urge the retention of the Transvaal liquor laws in that country.

country,

2). The Foreign Office receives a telegram form British Consul, dated Tientsin, June 22th, sataing eastalties to British troops.
The American battleship Oregon goes ashore in a fog off Hu-ki Island, 35 miles north of Chis.

The French Chamber continues the discussion on the increase of the Navy.

The Miners' International Congress in Paris

A Convention is signed between the French and Spanish Governments fixing the limits of the irrespective possessions in North-West

the irrespective possessions in North-West Africa.
30. A great fire breaks out at the North German Lloyd's dock at Hoboken, New York, 400 persons said to be injured, and £2,000,000 of damage done. The frontage of the North German Lloyd pier, a quarter of a mile in extent, and three liners entirely destroyed. The marriage of the Archduke Franz Ferdinand de Est to Countess Sophia Chotek takes place in Bohemia.

The Pursian Diet passes a Bill imposing a tax

The Prussian Diet passes a Bill imposing a tax upon the turn-over of retail firms dealing with more than one class of goods.

A French Boer Independence Committee is formed in Paris.

The War in South Africa.

June 1. Pretoria surrenders; Lord Roberts occupies the city.

The Union Jack is hoisted over the Government buildings.

6. B.itish prisoners are removed to Watervaal Boven

8. General Buller's force outflanks the Boers at Botha's Pass.

The telegraph line is cut at Kroonstad by a body of Boers.

11. General Buller forces Almond's Nek. One thousand five hundred Boers are said to have surrendered in the Ficksburg District to General Brabant. A British Militia Battalion is surrounded by Boers at Roodeval and obliged to surrender.
 Lord Roberts's communications re-established.

Fighting severe outside Pretoria with Com-mandan: Botha's Burghers, Lord Kitchener joins hands with Lord Methuen near Heilbron.

13. Botha's force evacuate their position near Pretoria. Wakkerstroom, near Lang's Nek, surrenders. narrowly escapes being captured by the Boers.

General Hunter occupies Krugersdorp.
General Ian Hamilton's column reaches Springs in order to meet General Buller's force at Standerton.

23. Part of De Wet's Commando attack the railway

23. Part of De we'r's Commanuo atrack the fallway between Kroonstad and Honing Spruit. 29. There is sharp fighting in the Orange Free State, near Lindley, the Boers attacking British communications near Winburg and Senekal Seere is rampant in Barkley West district, seventy-five per cent of the natives and many Europeans being down with it.

Photograph by

[Elliott and Fry.

The late Lord Loch.

PARLIAMENTARY RECORD. House of Lords.

June 18. The House reassembles after the Whit-suntide Recess, Lord Salisbury replies in reference to China. Second reading of the Marriage Act Amendment Bill and the Burial Authorities (Cremation) Bill.

19. The County Councils (Elections) Act Amendment Bill and the Colonial Marriages (Deceased Wife's Sister) B'll pass through Committee.

Second reading Uganda Railway Bill.
Several bills advanced a stage.
The Commonwealth of Australia Constitution The Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Bill is brought up from the House of Commons a d read a first time. Secondary Education Bill; speech by the Duke of Deronshire. Prevention of Corruption Bill passes through Committee. Second reading of the R ilways (Prevention of Accidents) Bill. Second reading Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Bill. Speeches by Lord Carrington, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Kimberley and Lord Selborne.

House of Commons.

June 14. The House reassembles after the Whitsuntide Recess. China: statement by Mr. Brodrick. Education Estimate: concluding Vote to complete the sum of £9,585,000 for salaries and expenses of the Board of Education.

and expenses of the Board of Education.

5. Lord G. Hamiltorrestates that the total nowaber of persons on relief works in India is 5,800,000. Civil Service Estimates resumed in Committee of Supply, and the vote for the Board of Education; votes agreed to.

18. Mr. Balfour makes a statement regarding China. The Australian Commonwealth Bill is proceeded with: speech by Mr. Chamber-December 1, 1997.

is proceeded with: speech by Mr. Chamber-lain. Progress is reported.

1). Committee of Supply: votes agreed to.

2). Third reading Workmen's Compensation Act (1897) Extension Bill.

2). The Committee stage of the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Bill is resumed; speech by Mr. Chamberlain. The Bill is passed through Committee and is reported to the House. Second reading Elementary Education Bill. Education Bill.

22. The Birmingham (King Edward's School) Bill is discussed. Vote on Committee of Supply; progress reported.

progress reported. hird reading of the Commonwealth of Aus-tralia Constitution Bill. Discussion on the Housing of the Working Classes Act (1850) Amendment Bill, which is reported to the 25. Third House as having passed through the Committee stage.

mittee stage.

26 Second reading Companies Bill; speech by Mr. Ritchie.

27 Third reading Workmen's Compensation Act and of the Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Bill.

28 Sick and wounded in South Africa; statement by Mr. Balfour. S. cond reading Tithe Rent Charge (Ireland) Bill.

29 Debate on Mr. Burdett-Coutts' charges with regard to the sick and wounded in South Africa; statement by Mr. Wyndham.
Speeches by Mr. Burdett-Coutts, Mr. Balfour, Sir H. Campbell Bannerman, and others.

SPEECHES.

June z. Mr. Courtney, at Bristol, on the Settle-ment in South Africa.

4 Mr. W. H. Brown, President of the Co-opera-tive Union, at Cardiff, on the reforms-co-operators should work for.

co-operators should work for.

Mr. Bryce, at Aberdeen, on Liberal Imperialism.

Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, at Glasgow, on the Settlement after the War in South Africa.

Mr. Morley, at Oxford, on Liberal and University in Emperialism being one and the same thing.

The German Emperoy at United to go the more discountries.

it. The German Emperor, at Lübeck, on the need of a strong German Navy.

Mr. Chamberlain, in London, on the Settlement of South Africa.

Lord Salisbury, in London, on the position of Ord Saissoury, in London, on the position of Missionari'ss.

24. The French Minister of Education, M. Leygues, at Versailles, on the Army and the Republic.

25. Mrs. Humphry Ward, in London, on Mary Kingsley.

Mr. Burt, in Paris, on international good Mr. Burt, in Paris, of Europe.

Mr. Burt, in Paris, on international good feeling among the workers of Europe.
28. Gen ril André in the Γr:nch Clamber on Discipline in the Army, both as regards officers and men.
2). Mr. Chamberlain, in London, on Public Africa. 2). Mr. Char Affairs.

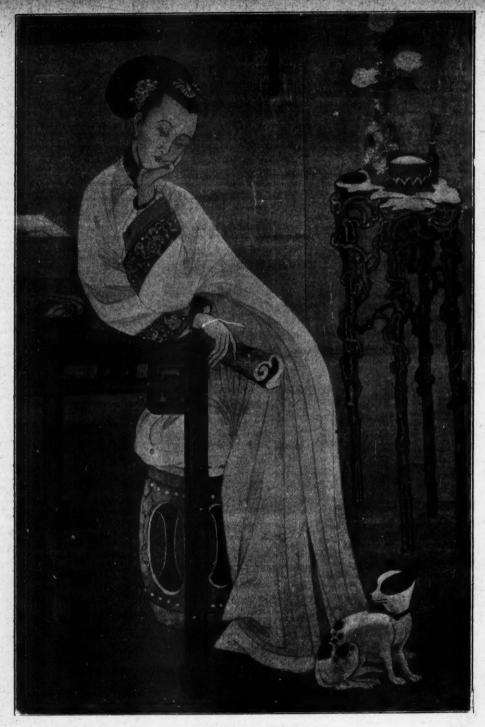

OBITUARY.

June 5. Miss Mary Kingsley (at Cape Town). Mr. Stephen Crane (American novelist), 29. 8. The Duke of Wellington, 54. 13. The Grand Duke of Oldenburg, 73.

14. Mrs. Gladstone, 88.
16. The Prince de Joinville, 81.
18. Sebastian Lang (Burgomaster of Ober-Ammergrul.

20. Lord Loch, 74.
21. Count Mouravieff, Russian Minister of Foreign Affairs.

es. Admirai Maxse, 66.

ar

Su acc pla pro

ped afti bea Yo the was Wi

my fatl

now

Pala how been who form Poss are Peki Emp is pi What is litt past and Emp beyon

In subject mome

THE CHINESE EMPRESS.

From a Drawing by a Native Artist.

CHARACTER SKETCHES.

I.-TSZE HSI, EMPRESS OF CHINA.

PORTY years ago a young woman fled with her child and its father in hot haste from the avenging fury of a European army. Hardly had they escaped from the city than the storm of destruction burst over their doomed home. The place was gutted to the walls, and then, to make the work of devastation complete, the plundered ruin was given to the flames.

HER FIRST IMPRESSIONS OF THE FOREIGNER.

General Gordon—afterwards illustrious as Gordon of Khartoum—was present on the occasion as a subaltern, and in his correspondence he thus described the scene:—

Owing to the ill-treatment the prisoners experienced at the Summer Palace, the General ordered it to be destroyed. We accordingly went out, and after pillaging it burnt the whole place, destroying in a Vandal-like manner most valuable property which could not be replaced for four millions. The people are civil, but I think the grandees hate us, as they must after what we did to the Palace. You can scarcely imagine the beauty and magnificence of the place we burnt. It made one's heart sore to burn them. Everybody was wild for plunder. You would hardly conceive the magnificence of this residence or the tremendous devastation the French have committed. There was as much splendour and civilisation as you would see at Windsor. The French have smashed everything in the most wanton way. It was a scene of utter destruction which passes my description.

The young woman who fled with her child and its father on the eve of the destruction of the Summer Palace, was none other than Tsze Hsi, the Empress of China, now the most famous old lady in the world—with the exception of our own Queen.

IS IT NEMESIS?

The grandees must hate us after what we did to the Palace," wrote General Gordon. If the grandees, then how much more the Empress, to whom the Palace had been a home, who quitted it a despairing fugitive, and who returned to it only to find a charred ruin where formerly had stood the treasure house of the Empire. Possibly in the flaring smoke-clouds which this month are said to have risen from the burning Legations at Pekin as the foreign quarter was given to the flames, the Empress Hsi-whose name I shall henceforth write as it is pronounced, She-saw the handwriting of Nemesis. Whatever reflections crossed that brooding brain, there is little doubt that never once during the whole of the past forty years did the Imperial She forget the dark and terrible day when she fled with her boy and the Emperor from the vengeance of the Foreign Devils from beyond the sea.

PUT YOURSELF IN HER SKIN.

In these Character Sketches I always try to paint the subjects as they appear to themselves at their best moments, not as they seem to their enemies at their worst. When General Gordon explained the way in which he wrote a famous memorandum, he said, "I wrote as a Chinaman. My object has been always to put myself into the skin of those I may be with, and I like these people as much, well, say nearly as much as I like my own countrymen." The same principle must be adopted if we are to make any attempt to understand the central figure in the great World Drama that is being enacted in the Farther East.

I.-THE SLAVE GIRL OF CANTON.

The Imperial She was not born in the purple. She is a Manchu, a member of the Imperial race which for two hundred and fifty years has governed the Chinese; but, like many other members of Imperial races, she was acquainted with adversity in her youth. Her story is a romance. Her career is one of the most glaring paradoxes of history. The Jews fondly cherish the tale of Esther, and every Sunday-scholar is familiar with the romance of Joseph, who was sold a captive into the country which he subsequently ruled as Grand Vizier of Pharaoh. But the story of Esther will not compare with the adventures of the Empress She, and although Joseph became prime minister via the pit and the dungeon, he was always the servant of Pharaoh.

FROM SLAVERY TO EMPIRE.

But the woman who for the last month has defied the allied fleets and armies of Western civilisation, and has reigned as Empress over 400,000,000 persons for nearly thirty years, was sold into slavery in her childhood by her own father. To leap from slavery to a throne is an almost miraculous achievement in any country. But in China, where the slave is a woman, the transition seemed absolutely impossible. Yet She accomplished this impossible thing, and confronts the world to-day an unmistakable concrete fact, with which all the world has to take account.

THE CHINESE ESTIMATE OF WOMEN.

There is indeed something grotesquely absurd in the spectacle of the Chinese Empire, of all places in the world, being ruled by a woman. It is true that we can exhibit something of the same paradox nearer home. In Britain no woman can vote for a member of Parliament. No woman can sit in Town or County Council. But the Sovereign, without whose consent nothing can be done, who must be consulted before any important despatch is sent off or any great officer appointed, is a woman. In China the insolent assumption by the male of a monopoly of all political wisdom is carried to lengths from which even Mr. Chamberlain or Mr. Labouchere would recoil. Says Dr. A. H. Smith in his book on "Village Life in China":—

The essence of the Chinese classical teaching on this subject is that woman is as inferior to man as the earth is inferior to heaven, and that she can never attain to full equality with man. According to Chinese philosophy, death and evil have their origin Yin, or female principle of Chinese dualism, while life and prosperity come from the subjection of it to the Yang, or male principle; hence it is regarded as a law of nature to keep woman completely under the power of man, and to allow her no will of her own.—P. 305.

NOT EVEN A RIGHT TO LIVE.

To such a length is this carried, that killing is no murder in China when female babies are concerned. The most ideally excellent daughter, says the Chinese proverb, is not equal to a splay-footed son. Miss Fielde in her book, "Pagoda Shadows," says that 160 Chinese mothers who had borne 631 sons and 538 daughters admitted that they had killed 158 of their daughters. One woman who had been exceptionally unfortunate admitted that she had put away eleven. Even the stoutest opponent of Woman's Rights in Britain draws the line—inconsistently, perhaps—before infanticide. The Chinese are more logical.

WOMAN TRIUMPHANT-EVEN IN CHINA.

Yet, in this stronghold of masculine ascendency we find the Imperial She lording it over emperors and mandarins with an authority to which our own Queen never ventures to aspire. Even in China exceptional women succeed in triumphing over the difficulties with which they are deliberately handicapped. Dr. Smith says:—

In one of the huge Chinese encyclopædias, out of 1,628 books, 376 are devoted to famous women, and of these, four chapters treat of female knowledge, and seven others of the literary productions of women, works which have been numerous and influential.—P. 300.

THE EMPRESS WU.

Nor is the Imperial She altogether alone in her glory. Twelve hundred years ago—five hundred years before the Norman Conquest—a Chinese woman, Wu-Tsi-tien by name, who entered the harem of the Emperor Tai-tsung at the age of fourteen, succeeded in making herself virtual ruler of China until her death at the age of eighty-one. The records of her reign, being written by men, must be accepted with reservation, for they seem to be compiled chiefly for the purpose of holding up the Empress Wu's reign as an awful example of what John Knox called the "Monstrous Regimen of Women."

A REALISABLE ASSET.

She's father was a Manchu official, a Taotai in the north of China, who fell on evil days, lost his money, and ultimately drifted, a broken man, to the neighbourhood of Canton. The family consisted of She, then a girl, and a boy with their parents. She was Manchu, and therefore had escaped the misery of having her feet bound. She was strong, healthy, and vigorous, and probably did her share like other Chinese girls of the poorer classes in collecting sticks for the family fire and scraping together dung dropped in the high road, to sell it as manure.

In 1838, when the family migrated to Canton, She was four years of age. This was before the first opium war, when the power of China was still unbroken, and the prestige of the Emperors, the brothers of the Sun, was still intact. Do what they could, however, She's parents could not manage to scrape together sufficient to stave off starvation. In southern China, where they were living, the parents of girl children, when the worst comes to the worst, have always one resource. A good-looking, healthy girl is always a realisable asset. If you cannot feed your daughter it is good form to sell her and feed yourself and your son on the proceeds. The story goes that She herself took the initiative of proposing that she should be sold to keep the family pot boiling. Her father recoiled at first from the proposal, for he was a Manchu and from the north. The practice of selling daughters is Chinese and prevails chiefly in the south. But hunger is a potent counsellor, and after a time She was sold to a purchaser who is variously described as a merchant, a mandarin, and a general. Whatever he was, he had the wherewithal not only to buy slaves but to feed them, and that was the supreme consideration. He seems to have been a kind master, and to have early appreciated She's talents.

HER EDUCATION.

How it came to pass that the slave girl conceived such a strange idea as that of learning to read or write no one has yet explained. There is a vague rumour current in China that there is some English blood in her veins, but how it got there no one explains; and even if She were Eurasian, the mystery of her character would not be explained. It is said that she learned to read and write before she was eight. No one ever dreamed in those days of teaching Chinese girls such accomplishments. Even now the idea is scouted; but how it came to pass that She could read and write a quarter of a century before we ventured to propose to make education compulsory no one knows. The fact, however, appears to be undisputed.*

THE ADVANTAGES OF SLAVERY.

Slavery has its advantages. If She had been, not the slave, but the daughter of her purchaser, she would have had her feet bandaged, and as soon as she neared her teens she would have been shut up a close prisoner in the Yamen. There is true pathos in the saying of a Shinese woman, who, after being tethered all her life to the family compound, declared that she hoped, on her next incarnation, she might be a dog, for then she could go about where she pleased. She, however, being a slave, was allowed to go about where she pleased. Being able to read and write, she was allowed to do the family marketing; and, in short, when she was in her teens, she had so well established her position as to be regarded almost as a member of the family.

II.—A CHINESE ESTHER.

So things went on until the year 1848, the year of the great European Revolution, and a year destined to affect, perhaps not less seriously, the destinies of the Far East. For in 1848 there went forth a decree from the Emperor Hien Fung, which recalls reminiscences of the days of King Ahasuerus. It is written in the Book of Esther that when the king wished to replace Vashti, his queen, by a more submissive spouse, "Then said the king's servants that ministered unto him, Let there be fair young virgins sought for the king. And let the king appoint officers in all the provinces of his kingdom, that they may gather together all the fair young virgins unto Shushan the palace, to the house of the women. And let the maiden which pleaseth the king be queen instead of Vashti. And the thing pleased the king, and he did so." A similar custom prevailed at one

T

h

b bi da

th

th

be

sp

ne

in a f

issi

Est

Fur

in

and take

the

Chi

in h her

and

She, that

whic

^{*}This unexplained mystery throws doubt upon the whole story. When these pages were passing through the press, the Westminster Gazette published an article by an anonymous contributor who roundly denies the authenticity of the slave gift tradition. He says the story of her sale into slavery has been almost universally accepted but, nevertheless, it is wholly fictitious, it being now ascertained that the remarkable woman, who was born in Pekin in 1834, was the daughter of one Shen-Yui, an eminent officer of the Li Pu (or Board of Rites), by the daughter of a Wang or Regulus of the first rank, and a, classman, of the Imperial House of Gioro. Her full name is Tszehi Toanyu Kangi Chaoyu Chuangcheng Shokung Chinhien Chung-Sih, and she is not Chinese, but of Manchu descent. As a child she is said to have attracted attention by her cleverness and desire for learning; and as a result of this her father procured for Tszehi that which few girls in China ever enjoy—an education. I give the Westminster Gasette's contributor's story as it stands. The reader can choose for himself which version he prefers.

time in Russia, and something like it is said still to exist in Persia. But in China the matter is as much a matter of settled custom as the practice of competitive examinations. Hien Fung was married. His Vashti had not fallen out of favour, but she had no son. It was essential that the Emperor should become a father, and to render this possible proclamations were issued throughout all the provinces of China, directing all eligible Manchu maidens between the ages of fifteen and eighteen, who cared to compete for the position of secondary wife to the Emperor, to present themselves at the palace of the Emperor at Pekin.

A TRY FOR A THRONE.

She, having the run of the streets, saw the proclamation, and being able to read soon mastered its contents. She was of the specified age. She was of Manchu descent. As for comeliness, that was hardly a question for her to decide, although, possibly enough, she had settled her opinion on that question before her mirror. Anyhow, she made up her mind that she would go in for the competition. To be secondary wife of the Emperor, the Sacred Son of Heaven, satisfied her ambitious yearnings for distinction and a career. She might not succeed, of course. But she decided at any cost to "have a try."

Her first step was to secure the assent of her owner. He was startled not a little at the proposal that his slave girl should go up to try her luck in the lottery for a seat near the Imperial throne. But She, like Mr. Rider Haggard's heroine, was "She that must be obeyed." The very loftiness of her aspiration, the incongruity of her ambition, and her position helped to win the first battle. Her owner not only consented to her adventure, but in order to improve her chances adopted her as his daughter, and sent her off to Pekin with a handsome outfit.

AN EMPEROR'S BRIDE.

Of the nature of the examinations to which the aspirants were subjected I know nothing, but whatever they were She passed them triumphantly. Out of thousands of candidates She was chosen as one of the best ten certified by the examiners as "a faultless specimen of womanhood, possessing all the virtues needful to the sex and in intelligence the equal of the graduate of the first Imperial examination." Like Esther in Shushan, She was installed in a suite of rooms in the palace of the women. She was one of ten. But she had a fair field, and she had no fear of the result, nor did the issue belie her confidence in her star. As it was with Esther and Ahasuerus, so it was with She and Hien Fung. She went in unto the Emperor and found favour in his sight. And behold she conceived and bare a son, and that son was Heir Apparent to the Imperial throne.

MOTHER OF AN HEIR TO THE THRONE.

She was about seventeen years old when she was taken to the palace of Hien Fung, and she was not more than twenty when the birth of Tung-Chi gave her the proud position of mother of the future Emperor of China. It may be said that there is nothing exceptional in her good luck. A pretty woman who has the luck to have a son by sultan, king or emperor, can usually make her way. It is often the case at Stamboul, at Teheran, and at Pekin. But what was exceptional in the case of She, and what marks her off from all her competitors, is that she won the favour of the Emperor by the tact with which she conciliated the Empress. If Esther had had to depend upon the favour of Vashti, it would have gone ill with her and her kinsfolk. But it is asserted that She played her cards with such consummate skill, that she won the good graces of the Empress and made herself the general favourite of all the women of the palace. It was as the friend and companion of the Empress she first saw the Empreor; and when the natural result followed, the Empress, instead of "rounding" upon the Imperial Hagar, became more than ever attached to the woman who had given a son to her husband.

III.-EMPRESS MOTHER.

All went well for a time. The mother of the future Emperor, who was also sworn friends with the legitimate wife and the beloved mistress of the Emperor, found nothing to complain of in her position in the palace. But a dark cloud rose out of the sea which burst in fury upon the Imperial household. The English and French sent armies against China. They bombarded the Taku forts and marched in triumph upon Pekin. The Emperor, accompanied by She and her six year old son, fled in hot haste to his hunting lodge at Jého, while the invaders worked their vengeful will upon the Summer Palace at Pekin.

HAGAR AND SARAH.

Hien Fung did not long survive this cruel blów. He died in 1861, leaving the throne to Tung-Chi, a boy of seven. Before his death Hien Fung constituted a council of regency, composed of two Imperial princes and the Minister Lung-Chê, but left the guardianship of his son to the two Empresses. The story goes that he left a sealed document in the hands of the legal wife empowering her, in the last extremity, to take absolute control of the boy into her own hands.

The fact that she never used this authority is the best testimony both to her good sense and the tact of the boy's mother. It is the rarest thing in the world that Hagar and Sarah get on well in a working partnership, but it must be almost impossible when Sarah has a private power of attorney to oust Hagar from the business. In Pekin, however, it was managed somehow, and the partnership worked well for twenty-eight years.

The difficulties were by no means slight :-

She found China with the prestige, resources, and peace of the realm reduced to their lowest ebb, with the most fruitful provinces a desert; with three great and apparently successful rebellions raging simultaneously in different parts of the Empire; with a load of debt caused by an unsuccessful foreign war, during which the capital was in the hands of the invader.

But none of these difficulties daunted her. What she did not like was the prospect of being a mere cipher in the government of the Empire. By Hien Fung's decision all power was vested in the Council of the Regency. She, who was then a young woman of twenty-seven, decided that this would never do. And, as She who wills the end wills the means, She was not long in deciding upon her course of action.

HER FIRST COUP D'ÉTAT.

It is always a difficult matter to apportion the responsibility which rightly belongs to actors in great historical tragedies. But for the subsequent career of the Empress She, few would be inclined to credit or to debit her with the responsibility for the coup detat which was the foundation of her power. Prince Kung being a man, a Minister, and withal the one who profited most conspicuously by the coup d'état, would naturally have been regarded as the chief author of the sudden stroke which abolished the Council of Regency. But the

the

ind

ave e's

ich

one

in ns.

She

not

and

in sh-

me

of a ion

ars

the

ave

the

nese

nily

rna-oout

was

e to ens,

rded

r of

ed to

the

from nces

the

olace

Then

, Let

d let

his oung

the g be

the

one

When azette es the le into wholly ho was officer alus of Ier full hinhien ild she ming; girls in seette's which part which the Empress has subsequently played naturally disposes us to regard her as the moving spirit in the conspiracy. Prince Kung, a younger brother of the late Emperor, was really ruling the Empire at the time of Hien Fung's death. When the Emperor fled to his hunting box the duty devolved upon Prince Kung of negotiating with the victorious generals, and it was he who ultimately drew up the treaty of peace. He was appointed presi-dent of the Tsungli-Yamen, which was constituted in 1861 as a department through which the Chinese Government would communicate with the foreigner. There is reason to believe that the Prince Kung had the as little love for the Regents as the Empress She herself, and he fell in with the project submitted to him by the Empress of carrying out a coup d'état. Chinese methods are summary, and conspirators in high places do not hesitate to kill. The Regents were returning from celebrating the funeral rites of the late Emperor, when they found themselves arrested by Prince Kung, accused of being guilty of grave omissions in the funeral rites due to the de-ceased Emperor, and there and then they were executed! As the Regents were dead there was no longer a Council of Regency, and the Empress She and the legitimate Empress were left in supreme control of the affairs at the Palace. Prince Kung for his part found abundant scope for his energy in managing the affairs of the Empire.

THE PREMIERSHIP OF PRINCE KUNG.

For three years all went well. China was slowly recovering from the results of the war and the Taiping rebellion, and Prince Kung came to be generally recognised as the man of the situation. The Empress however, was not a woman to encourage misunderstanding of this kind, and on April 2nd, 1865, an Imperial edict appeared dismissing Prince Kung from all his offices for the offence of having overrated his own importance. The Prince obeyed, but his disappearance gave rise to such embarrassments, that five weeks later he was restored by an Imperial decree reinstating him in all his offices except the presidency of the Council. He had had his lesson, and he had learned that the Empress was "She who must be obeyed."

CHOOSING A WIFE FOR THE EMPEROR.

The young Emperor Tung-Chi was growing up, and in 1872, when the time arrived for his marriage, his Imperial mother took the responsibility of selecting his bride. Manchu maidens were mustered at the Palace, and then ushered into the presence of the Imperial motherin-law-to-be groups of four or tive. Each girl as she entered handed a tablet to the Empress, upon which was inscribed her name and her age. If the first impression was unfavourable, they passed on without remark; but if their look pleased her she questioned them and made notes as to their answers. eunuchs who were in attendance received instructions, and all the rejected candidates were dismissed with the present of a piece of silver, of the weight of one ounce, in the shape of a shoe. Those who did not receive the silver shoe of dismissal came up for a second inspection, and those who were weeded out of this second examination received a roll of silk. At a third inspection the surviving candidates, who were reduced to very few, were subjected to a final scrutiny, when the lady whom the Empress decided to be the most suitable bride for her son was selected.

The Dowager-Empress of China.

From a drawing by a Chinese Artist.

Th of A Chen bride which The The sion, horse broug her a occas The fering curta son a thing

Th for ar or as and w -at to the put n her in tales or as lawles hersel The person

sovere

slande

"She

go do

sixty curta

and V Minis Alth play o ladies until a They easter Empre wester Accor the go to a st

The

proposi

After t had so been fu office a added, She wa long in the Sta the ma produce for the dorman further the eye

THE MARRIAGE TO AL-U-TE.

ınder-

5, an s own rance

later

y him

offices presi-

the e had esson.

had it the

was

must

GA

R.

THE

oung

Tung-

owing 1872, time

r his ponsi-

ecting

aidens

red at

, and eofthe

other-

our or

h girl

ntered

tablet

npress,

h was

e first

rable,

ed on

mark:

r look er she

them

notes

heir

o were ejected

iece of a shoe.

l came

veeded

of silk.

o were

rutiny,

to be

her

her

in

The

his , hıs nother

The choice of the Empress fell upon a girl of the name of Al-u-te, the good, wise, and virtuous daughter of Cheng. Three days before the wedding Tung-Chi sent his bride her phœnix robe; two days later a tablet of gold, on which was engraved the edict elevating her to the throne. The wedding-day was celebrated with lavish expenditure. The bride was escorted to the Palace by a great procession, headed by the Manchu princes, while thirty white horses followed the sedan chair in which the bride was brought to her new home. The Empress She received her daughter-in-law in state. It was one of the few occasions on which she was visible to the outside world. The Empress, although directing everything and interfering in everything, preferred to do so from behind the curtain. She was present at all interviews between her son and his Ministers; but although she heard every-thing she was never seen. It was not until she was sixty years of age that she ventured from behind the curtain, and received Ministers face to face.

SCANDALS OF THE PALACE.

The obscurity in which she lives renders it impossible for any one to speak positively either as to her character or as to her conduct. The unknown is always terrible, and when a woman is concerned it is usually scandalous at least, when the woman is on a throne. According to the gossip of Pekin, the Empress She was a lady who put no limit upon the indulgence of her curiosity or of her instincts. She is the centre of as many scandalous tales as is Queen Elizabeth, and possibly with as much or as little truth. To believe Pekin gossip, she was as lawless as Catherine the Great and rivalled Semiramis herself in the gratification of her caprices.

The tongue of scandal is ever busy about exalted personages, and when that woman is a widow and a sovereign there is no limit to the liberties which slanderous tongues will take with her reputation. But "She is one of the great women of the world, and will go down to history as the compeer of Catherine, Elizabeth, and Victoria," says an American statesman, formerly Minister to China.

A DUBIOUS STORY.

Although Prince Kung is said to have done his best to play off one Empress against the other, the two Imperial ladies seem to have lived together in harmony; at least until after the accession of the Emperor to the throne. They seldom met. The legitimate widow occupied the eastern wing of the Palace, and was known as the Eastern Empress; while the Empress-mother, who occupied the western wing, enjoyed the title of the Western Empress. According to a writer in Blackwood's Magazine of 1888, the good relations between the two Imperial ladies came to a sudden end in 1873. He says :-

The senior Empress sent a message to her Imperial sister, proposing an official meeting in a certain pavilion in the Palacc. After the ceremonial courtesies, the Eastern Empress said she had sought the interview because their common task had now been fulfilled, and it was fitting that they should lay down their office and take formal leave of each other. For her part, she added, she was well pleased to be relieved of the responsibility. She was also gratified that they two had been able to work so long in harmony for the welfare of the young Emperor and of the State. So far well; but the lady had a postscript to add, in the manner which is a stock device in plays and novels. She produced the private will of their late husband, and disclosed for the first time to her sister the powers which she had kept dormant these dozen years. "Now," she said, "there is no further use for such a document," whereupon she burned it before the eyes of the Western Empress. This dramatic scene made a terrible impression on the Empress-mother. She was not converted by it, but changed, giving way to sud!en hatred of the deceased Emperor who mistrusted her, and to the woman who had been made the confidante of that distrust.

DEATH OF THE EMPEROR.

Such is the story as told by the writer in Blackwood. It is somewhat difficult to credit it, because in the following year we find the two Empresses once more acting together and asserting their authority in affairs of State. It was in 1874 that the Emperor Tung-Chi issued a decree degrading Prince Kung and his son for using language in very many respects unbecoming. The very next day, however, Prince Kung was reinstated in office by a decree of the two Empresses, and there he remained until 1884, when he was finally dismissed by the Empress She. In 1875 the Emperor died. Little was known of him, and that little not altogether to his credit.

HER SECOND COUP D'ÉTAT.

He left his wife Al-u-te, the good, wise and virtuous daughter of Cheng, expecting to be a mother. This emergency brought the two Empresses once more together, and a second coup d'état, even more daring than the first, was promptly carried through. Properly speaking, the Empresses ought to have waited to see whether the expected child was a boy or not. In the former event his mother would become the Regent, and the two other ladies would have to retire into obscurity. If Al-u-te unluckily produced a daughter, then, according to Chinese law, a boy would be adopted as posthumous son of the deceased Emperor, and the widow would still take the post of Regent. The Empress She therefore, with the consent of her colleague and of Prince Kung, set aside the time-honoured usage, ignored the young wife, and adopted as heir to the throne a boy of four, the son of Chun, who was a younger brother of the Emperor Hien Fung. His chief qualifications were that, being a cousin of the late Emperor Tung-Chi, and not of a posterior generation, he could not, therefore, perform the ancestral rites to which the Chinese attach an extraordinary degree of importance. The advantage of this was, that the widow, Empress Al-u-te, was thrust on one side, and the regency of the Empress She and her colleague was secured for another term of years. The only protest that seems to have been made against that high-handed subversion of this wellestablished rule was the protest and suicide of a dis-tinguished literate, who killed himself in order to emphasise his protest against the disturbance of the line of descent which left the late Emperor without a son to perform the ancestral rites.

IV.—RULER OF CHINA.

The Empresses resumed the sovereignty of the palace, and Prince Kung worried along with them as best he could until 1884, when he was dismissed and degraded and replaced by Prince Chun, who, as father of the future Emperor, had long been used as a tool by the Empress. Chun, although a poet who exchanged verses with the Empress-who is also much given to the cultivation of the muse-was not a man of strong character, and the Empress supplemented his deficiencies by reliance upon the genius of the one Chinese statesman who is known in Europe-Li Hung Chang.

When there raged the great famine in the province of Shansi both the Queens-Regent won the hearts of their subjects by the following act of practical sympathy :-

Their Imperial Highnesses having ascertained that the value of the flesh-meats that are served by the Nuiwa-fui in the palace amounts to one hundred taels daily, they have resolved to eat no more meat while their people continue to lack food, and furthermore the amount of one hundred taels thus saved they order to be turned over to the relief fund of the province of Shansi.

The boy Emperor was placed under tutors, and it is to the credit of the Empress that she selected as his tutor Weng-Tung-cho, a man of whom every one speaks well, and who appears to have taken great pains in imbuing his Imperial ward with a sense of his responsibility, and to have made him singularly receptive to new ideas. The story goes that the boy showed a leaning to the other Empress and preferred her to the Empress She.

This, it is alleged, led to the sudden indisposition of the old Empress, who died in 1881, leaving the Empress She in a position of absolute power. The slave-girl of Canton was now practically undisputed Empress of China.

A CHINESE MARCHIONESS DE BRINVILLIERS?

There are those who would address her in the language addressed to Macbeth when he had achieved the throne by bloody paths. For her enemies do not hesitate to accuse her of removing by poison, assassination execution all those who stood in her path. No one could die in the Palace whose death removed an obstacle from her way without the occurrence being attributed to poison. Among her alleged victims are included the first three Regents, who were executed on a frivolous pretext; the Emperor Tung-Chi, her own son; the Empress Al-u-te, who died two months after her husband; the Marquis Tseng, who suddenly sickened and died after he had crossed her path; and now the Empress of the East, and so on to the last of those whose carcasses were the stepping-stones to suoreme power. There is probably very little ground for attributing to the Empress She such deliberate policy of murder. If she had been disposed to kill she would probably have wreaked her vengeance upon Prince Kung by the aid of poison; and the present Emperor, who has given her trouble enough although deprived of power, is still permitted to live.

MORE WIFE CHOOSING.

From 1884, when she dismissed Prince Kung, to 1888, when she chose a wife for the young Emperor, she seems to have had everything very much in her own hands. In December, 1888, the following decree appeared in the Pekin Gazette:—

"Special edict of the Empress dowager.

"The Emperor having reverently succeeded to his exalted inheritance and increasing day by day in maturity, it is becoming that he should select a virtuous consort to assist in the administration of the palace, to control the members of his household and to encourage the Emperor himself in upright conduct. Let, therefore, Tet-Ho-Na-La, a daughter of Deputy Lieut-Gen. Kuei Hsiang, whom we have selected for her dignified and virtuous character, become Empress.

"Further edict."

"Let Ta-Ta-La, aged fifteen years, a daughter of Chang Hsii, formerly Vice-President of a Board, become the secondary consort of the first rank, and Let Ta-Ta-La, aged thirteen, also daughter of Chang Hsii, formerly Vice-President of a Board, become imperial concubine of the second rank.

the second rank.
"Respect this."

af

th

SO

an

R

br

In

Re

she suc

por hav

her

her

was all.

she

res

way

188

tha

Tur

She

reco

had toge

disn

geni

prac

surr

shra

so lo

not '

indu

Some idea of the difficulty of forming any estimate as to the real character of the Empress may be gained from the fact that authorities differ radically even upon such a simple question as her attitude to the Japanese War. One writer declares that she vehemently opposed the war, while another says with confidence that she was the cause and origin of the whole quarrel. Equal differences of opinion prevail as to her character and disposition.

The Emperor as a Child.

KWANG-SU. PRINCE CHANG EMPEROR'S BROTHER. (FATHER OF EMPEROR).

THE EMPRESS AS SHE IS.

"She is a savage," a Russian told me, who knew Pekin well. But on the other hand, she is described by other residents as a woman of exceptional culture and refinement. She paints, she writes poetry, in token whereof she presented the Hamlin College with six hundred stanzas, all of her own making. Mr. F. G. Carpenter, writing from Pekin to the New York World on December 30th, 1888, said:—

The Empress Regent is now over fifty, and she is said to be well formed and dignified. She combs her hair, I am told, in the butterfly fashion common to the Manchus, having horns six inches long at the back of her head, and she fastens it with a gold hairpin. She is rather independent in thought and does as she pleases, regardless of Chinese etiquette. She is said to practise

s. In n the exalted coming lminisisehold Let, ..-Gen. d and ict."

ra-La, ears, a Chang Vice-Board, ondary e first et Tanirteen, eer of ormerly of a ne im-ine of k.

iis."

of the form-timate I charthe eay be norities ly even simple sher the War.
ecclares

sed the nother equal that cause of the arrel. erences prevail aracter ion.

vehe-

knew scribed culture etry, in ge with F. G. World id to be id, in the ix inches h a gold es as she practise

archery inside the walls of the palace, and she is reported as having taken lessons in boxing from an old eunuch. Minister Denby tells me that she studies and understands all subjects committed to her, and that she is very industrious. He thinks she will go down to history as one of the great rulers of the world, and says that through her China has attained its present high position among the nations. The Empress Regent has been one of the most progressive thinkers among the Chinese, and considering the isolation of China it seems strange to record that in a short time these palaces will be lighted with six thousand electric lights, and that the Emperor will eat his breakfast with ivory chopsticks tipped with gold under the rays of electricity.

Although sixty-six years of age, Tsze Hsi is described by one who has seen her recently as having raven hair without a single grey lock. She is of above the medium height, large-boned, her eyes dark, her complexion subolive, and her feet, contrary to the Chinese custom, of the natural size. Her voice, however, is harsh, and she is singularly fond of jewellery.

When she received the wives of the Diplomatists, Sir Claude MacDonald, our Minister at Pekin, thus described the reception:—

The ceremony passed off extremely well. The Empress-Dowager made a most favourable impression by her courtesy and affability. Those who went to the Palace under the idea that they would meet a cold and haughty person of strong imperious manner were agreeably surprised to find her Imperial Majesty a kind and courteous hostess, who displayed both the tact and softness of the womanly disposition.

WHAT HER ENEMIES SAY.

Her enemies accuse her of a love for gambling and an inordinate love of money. The chief accusations against her are, however, formulated by the exiled Reformer Kang-Yu-Wei, whose headlong Radicalism brought about the third coup d'état of the Empress She. In his farewell letter to the Foreign Ministers the defeated Reformer did not spare the Empress. In this letter—she is compared, more sinicâ, to the Empress Wu, who also succeeded in keeping her son in tutelage and keeping hold of power during a long and licentious life. She is charged with having tried to corrupt the Empress-Dowager of Hien Fung, and her daughter-in-law, the Empress-Dowager of Hien Fung, and her daughter-in-law, the Empress-Dowager of Tung Che. She is characterised as an Usurper, having deposed an Emperor who was full of brightness and promise, and is told that she is, after all, but a concubine-relict of Hien Fung, "whom by her acts she made die of spleen and indignation."

But this brings me to the story of the Emperor, whose restoration to the throne is urged by some as the best way of settling the present difficulty.

V .-- THE EMPEROR KWANG-SU.

The Emperor Kwang-Su, on coming to the throne in 1889, found China in a much more prosperous condition than it was when he was suddenly seized upon to succeed Tung-Chi. Whatever may be said of the Empress She, no one can deny that during her regency China recovered both prosperity and prestige. She may have had her differences with Prince Kung, but they worked together for nearly twenty years, and when she finally dismissed him she had discovered and utilised the genius of Li Hung Chang. From 1861 to 1889 she had practically governed China, and when the time came for surrendering power to the youth Kwang-Su she naturally shrank from the loss of the position which she had held so long.

ABDICATION (LIMITED).

The Empress She had her misgivings about Kwang-Su, not without reason. When he came to the throne she induced him to sign a formal convention, with no fewer than twenty-five articles, reserving to her as many attributes of sovereignty. But no sooner had he mounted the throne than he attempted to liberate himself one by one from the reservations by which he had agreed to be bound.

For the next ten years a struggle went on, more or less acute, between the boy-Emperor and the Empress She. His first success was the defeat of the proposal pressed by Li Hung Chang, and supported by the Empress, to construct the railway from Tientsin to Pekin. At the time it was held to indicate that the new Emperor was given over to blind and bigoted conservatism. In reality, it only meant that Kwang Su wished to teach the Empress that he was determined to assert himself. It was rather odd that he should have taken this mode of showing his independence. Before he came to the throne he had a special railway track laid down in the palace grounds, where he ran eight gorgeous railroad cars, given him by a French syndicate on the look-out for concessions. They were upholstered in rich satins of the gaudiest colours, and the one for the especial use of the Emperor had a downy divan of imperial yellow. The rest of its finish was red satin and plush, but the curtains, strange to say, were of white silk, an unpardonable mistake on the part of the donors, for white is, in China, the badge of death and of mourning. The syndicate hoped through them to get the Emperor's favour, and if railroads are adopted to have the first chance at the contract. The Emperor, however, refused to receive them for nothing, and he accepted them only on condition that the French syndicate accepted £2,000 for them. The cars cost well up towards £20,000.

THE EMPEROR'S STUDIES.

As a boy the Emperor was fond of engines, and not very fond of study. When he came to the throne he used to rise about two o'clock in the morning. He took a light breakfast at about 2.30, and by three was ready for work. He received his Ministers at four, five, or six o'clock, and it was at this time that he usually started out to perform his holy duties. He had his second breakfast at eleven, and he dined later in the day, going to bed very early.

At that time he was described as a slender, yellow-faced, almond-eyed, black-queued young Tartar. "I am told," said Mr. Carpenter, "he has all the instincts of the ordinary boy, and likes fun as well as any boy among his subjects. A few days ago he went out to visit some small steam launches, and to the horror of his eunuchs, rushed past them, and down into the engine-room. He here found a coolie with a dirty handkerchief tied round his head, oiling the machinery. He asked him his nationality, and the coolie replied that he was a Chinaman, a reply which was very pleasing to the Emperor."

WHAT MANNER OF MAN IS HE?

Two years later, in 1891, a Foreign Secretary of Legation wrote:—

The Emperor looks younger even than he is, not more than sixteen or seventeen. Although his features are essentially Chinese, or rather Manchu, they wear a particular air of personal distinction. Rather pale and dark, with a well-shaped forehead, long, black arched eyebrows, large mournful dark eyes, a sensitive mouth, and an unusually long chin, the young Emperor, together with an air of great gentleness and intelligence, wore an expression of melancholy, due, naturally enough, to the deprivation of nearly all the pleasures of his age and to the strict life which the hard and complicated duties of his high position force him to lead.

A year later another observer wrote :-

The young Emperor entirely fails to show either capacity or sense of duty, being given over to frivolity, and, report says, vice. The following description by the German Minister at a still later date seems to show that Kwang-Su did not profit by his emancipation from the control of the

Empress She :-

His Majesty looks older than he really is. With sunken head and yellow face, he looked shyly at the assembled diplomats, and his heavy eyes were lit up for the occasion by opium or morphia. A sorrowful, weary, and rather childish smile played about his mouth. When his lips are parted his long, irregular yellow teeth appear, and there are great hollows in either cheek. His face is not entirely wanting in sympathy, but rather betokens indifference, and from its features nothing of interest can be the Emperor three whole days to look over the essays. The task was long, but it was accomplished with care and attention to details. The list of the Examining Board was turned almost upside down, for the Emperor marked out six men as entitled to first honours (three of these stood amongst the last in the first list); seventy-seven to second-class honours; one hundred and twenty-three to third; and two men to the fourth or last class. Those who belonged to the first and second classes were promoted two steps, while the others were either degraded proportionately or deprived of from one to half a year's salary.

Imagine the sensation which such a sudden incursion into the domain of the Civil Service Commissioners would create in Britain. Multiply it a hundredfold, and we can form some faint estimate of the dismay occasioned by Kwang-Su's escapade in Pekin. The marvel is not that he was ultimately set aside, but that he was tolerated so long.

THE JAPANESE WAR.

Authorities differ as to the respective share of Emperor and Empress in the Japanese war. But there seems to be no doubt that the Emperor was against Li Hung Chang, and that, but for the intervention of Prince Kung and the Empress, Li would have been ordered to execution for the failure of the war which he had in vain endeavoured to evade. A fierce struggle ensued between the Emperor and Empress, in which the latter came off victor, and succeeded if not in reestablishing her old authority, at least in compelling Kwang-Su to abide by the convention of twenty-five reservations.

THE ADVENT OF KANG-YU-WEI.

So matters went on till 1896, when the advent of Kang-Yu-Wei, the Canton Radical, led the Emperor to embark upon a series of reforms so drastic as to lead to his own summary supersession. Kang-Yu-Wei was a young man of thirty-eight, who had achieved considerable reputation as a teacher at Canton. He was fascinated by the history of Peter the Great, and had conceived the idea of launching China upon a career of reform. He wrote a memorial which attracted the attention of the Emperor. Of this he has given the following account:

I told the Emperor that all the old customs and ways and manners of his ancestors must be removed. Nothing could be usefully followed so far as Chinese history was concerned. I advised the Emperor to follow in the footsteps of Japan, or of Peter the Great in Russia.

As a preliminary step I advised the Emperor to command all his Ministers of State and all the high officials in Pekin to go before the places where they worshipped the gods, and also to the ancestral halls, there to register an oath that they were determined to introduce reforms.

determined to introduce reforms.

My second suggestion was to have the laws and administration revised; my third, that he should open a Communication or Despatch Department, through which any one could be able to memorialise the Throne. I told him he had no means of finding out the desires of the people; that the responsibility of administration was too widely diffused; that he should select young, intelligent men, well imbued with Western ideas, to read; in fact, the Emperor impressed me as being self-restrained, cold, apathetic, wanting in capacity, worn out, and as though half dead. I felt that whatever passed before his eyes had not the slightest interest for him, and that it mattered not in the least to him whether he understood the meaning of the ceremony. A man who wears a look as if life were a burden to him must surely be on the down grade.

Kwang-su, 16 years old, with his father.

AN IMPULSIVE EMPEROR.

The Emperor displayed sudden impulses, which filled his courtiers with alarm. One of these led him, in 1894, suddenly to announce his intention to set aside the award of the Examining Board which had just pronounced upon the result of its examinations, and place the essayists according to his own estimate of their excellence:—

There were two hundred and eight competitors, and it took

XUM

We I I the Imp from I 4000 (nat ban reforaise coll

be c reference Man Su We the hear H to to vene dism sing

posit

for g

was a other from Ky morts and ging. Pekintails:

Thand

venti

mem

The been class the I his so They langu of his by Ka and I refusi power which the E and d the 1 promi and o

Th

excel

no fo

tiona

and a

assist in the regeneration of the Empire, irrespective of their social position, whether they were lowly born or of high degree. I advised the creation of twelve new departments modelled on Western lines, and foreigners to be engaged to advise and assist.

The

ntion

lmost

ed to

e first

l and class.

were

ry.

ners

ly it

some oned ekin.

was

was ctive

n the

is to

was

t, but

Kung

been re of en-

uggle

and ne off

n re-

least le by reser-

when

the

or to ns so mary

as a

had

as a

nated

, and

ching

d the

is he

s and

ld be or of nd all to go lso to

were nistra-cation

able ins of lity of select as, to

He

EI.

I pointed out the enormous loss of revenue that occurred yearly. I recommended a complete change of the system, under which the whole of the revenues of the country would go into the Imperial purse, comparing China with India, and adducing from the experience of India the financial resources of China.

I told the Emperor that from ordinary taxes the sum of 400,000,000 taels could be raised annually, and if the lekin (native customs) were abolished, and a tariff properly adjusted, banknotes issued, stamp duty established, and other financial reforms adopted, at least another 300,000,000 taels could be raised. With this money in hand it would be an easy thing to get an army and a navy to protect our coast, and to establish colleges for the training of officers. State railways could also be constructed.

A CHINESE PETER THE GREAT.

The Chinese mandarins to whom the memorial was referred, replied stolidly, "Why should we change the manners and customs of our ancestors?" But Kwang-Su thought otherwise. He decided to give Kang-Yu-Wei's ideas a chance. Mr. W. E. Curtis, writing in the American Review of Reviews, thus summarizes the headlong measures taken by Kwang-Su:—

He banished Weng Tung Ho, the tutor of his youth, for trying to teach him moderation. He degraded the most eminent and venerable princes at the court for disputing his opinion. He dismissed thousands of men from office—five thousand with a single stroke of his sacred vermilion pencil. Many of them held positions that were hereditary and had passed from father to son for generations. Others were held as rewards for distinguished services to previous sovereigns.

One of his most startling assaults upon tradition and propriety was an order to the viceroys, governors, military authorities, and other magistrates, that hereafter they would receive instructions from the Emperor by telegraph.

Kwang-Su proposed to go to Tientsin just like any ordinary mortal, parade himself before the public like a petty mandarin, and gratify his own vulgar curiosity in a manner that was shocking. No wonder that the people believed a story circulated in Pekin that he intended to command them to cut off their pigtails and put on European dress.

The Emperor issued a decree granting freedom to the press and the right of petition direct to the throne without the intervention of the various boards and bureaus through which memorials were formerly filtered.

The last straw that broke the camel's back appears to have been furnished under that edict by one Wang H'sun, a secondclass secretary of the board of rites, who drew up a petition to the Emperor for certain reforms, which were very offensive to his superiors and to nearly all the princes about the court. They denounced his audacity and revolutionary ideas in severe language and recommended that the Emperor make an example of him. To their amazement, however, his Majesty, prompted by Kang-Yu-Wei, issued an edict commending the moral courage and resolution of Wang H'sun, the secretary in question, "for refusing to recant even when threatened by a whole array of powerful ministers," and rewarded him by promotion to a rank which otherwise would have required several severe examinations and at least fifteen years of service to attain. At the same time the Emperor reprimanded a dozen or more princes most severely and dismissed from office the two presidents of the board of rites, the two vice-presidents, and several other officials equally prominent, "for daring to interfere with the rights of the people and oppose our desire to reform our government."

HER THIRD COUP D'ÉTAT.

The reforms which the Emperor proposed may have been excellent in themselves, but, unlike Peter the Great, he had no force behind him. The officials, scared at the revolutionary proceedings of the madcap on the throne, appealed to the Empress. The Emperor had drafted a decree which ordered her confinement in an island in the palace grounds. Another order doomed the commander of the forces to immediate execution. The Empress concentrated a trustworthy body of soldiers round the palace and, instead of waiting to be arrested and imprisoned, turned the tables upon the Emperor. On September 21st, 1898, she emerged from her retreat, and the next day a decree was issued in the Emperor's name declaring his incapacity for government and begging her to resume the guidance of affairs.

Portrait of the Chinese Emperor.

The Reformers fled—those of them, that is to say, who, like Kang-Yu-Wei, were warned in time; others, less fortunate, were seized, and six of them summarily executed without even a form of trial. Chang-Yen-Huan—whom many of us remember as special envoy at the Queen's Diamond Jubilee—was banished to Turkestan.

VI.-EMPRESS ONCE MORE.

Empress She was once more on top. Kwang-Su was a prisoner in his own palace. He was, however, still used as the serviceable puppet, and all decrees were issued in his name. It was he who had to consent to the surrender of Kiao Chau, of Port Arthur, and of Wei-Hai-Wei, the three successive steps towards the dismemberment of China which brought about the present commotion. He had also at the beginning of this year to issue a decree declaring his own inability to beget offspring, and to announce that he had prayed the Empress to select a legal heir to the throne, and that she had done so by choosing Pu Chun, son of Tsai-Yi, Prince Tuan, as heir to the late Emperor Tung Chi.

VENCEANCE

There was considerable agitation amongst the Chinese outside China over the fate of the Reformers. Memorials were drawn up at Singapore and elsewhere, which irritated the Empress into launching a decree offering a heavy price for the head of Kang-Yu-Wei and his colleague. The proclamation recites the misdeeds of the Reformers, and continues:—

Language is insufficient to express our indignation and anger at the conduct of these men. We therefore hereby again command the Viceroys and Governors of all our provinces to issue proclamations giving out in clear and plain terms that the Imperial Government guarantees a reward of Tis. 100,000 (about £15,000) to any one, without distinction of class or social standing, who shall be able to hand over to the authorities the actual persons of Kang-Yu-Wei and Liang Chi-Chao; or should these men be slain, it will only be necessary to have their bodies identified to receive the same reward now offered.

HER RECEPTION OF PRINCE HENRY.

There is not much mildness in this decree. But to all outward appearance the Empress is as good-natured an old lady as our own Queen. She is said to be fond of private theatricals and of musical-boxes. Her palace is full of Swiss musical-boxes, and she also rejoices in the possession of an orchestrion. The first Europeans to set eyes upon the Empress were Prince Henry of Prussia and his suite, who were received by the Empress She after the cession of Kiao Chau:

The Empress sat behind a table on which were arranged pyramids of oranges and vases of peonies. She wore no veil, and had not painted her face. She expressed no surprise or emotion at seeing the foreign prince, and at once made use of the Li Hung Chang method of asking a string of questions herself. Prince Henry managed to tell her, however, that the European ladies in Pekin would like to be received at her court, and she promised that they should be invited to the next state reception.

After Prince Henry visited the Emperor the latter returned the visit, bringing with him as presents "two fans painted by the Empress-Dowager's own hand."

"A BENEVOLENT OLD LADY."

The Empress was as good as her word in the matter of the next reception. Nor did she confine herself to one reception. On March 8th, 1900, the wives of the Foreign Ministers were received a second time :-

In the Reception Hall the Dowager-Empress, a benevolentlooking old lady of sixty-four, and not at all the relentless virago she is commonly depicted, was seated on a raised dais, and on a slightly lower seat sat the Emperor, who looked more cheerful than usual, but was evidently in very feeble health.

After the formal reception the ladies were conducted into an adjoining room, where tea and refreshments were served, and soon after the Imperial trio came in and mingled unceremoniously with their guests, saying a few words to each and shaking hands. Every time the Dowager-Empress made a remark her Chinese interpreters fell prostrate on the ground.

Young Prince Pu Chun, a well-grown, strong, and healthy-looking boy of fourteen, the heir to the throne, was brought forward and introduced to the ladies,

The Dowager-Empress presented each lady with a pearl ring and some handsome brocades, and each of the Chinese secretaries received four rolls of silk,

Since then nothing has been seen of the Empress. Under the heading of "The Topic of the Month" I discuss the political aspects of the present trouble at Pekin. Let us leave the Empress here, and remember her as the "benevolent-looking lady of sixty-four" who beamed upon the ladies of the Legations, and dispensed tea and brocades and pearl rings so recently as last

II.—THE LATE COUNT MOURAVIEFF.

DEATH of the Russian Foreign Minister," on the placard of one of the evening papers, caught my We were eve on the afternoon of June 22nd. passing through one of the locks on the river Thames, in the lovely reach of river above Henley. "Death of the Russian Foreign Minister!" I could hardly believe my eyes. I had just written to Count Mouravieff the previous Saturday and was expecting his answer on my return to town, and now—" Death of the Russian Foreign Minister!" It seemed impossible.

But when the newsboy handed over his latest "special" the telegram which told "the steel-cold fact with one laconic thrust" was not to be denied. "In the midst of life we are in death "-one of the tritest of all sayingsseems to acquire new pungency as we read how Count Mouravieff was found lying dead at his desk, with the cup of coffee but half emptied and the unfinished cigarette still smouldering by his side. An apoplectic stroke had carried off Count Mouravieff even more suddenly than the affection of the heart which smote down his predecessor. In one moment how much of active life ceased to be, or rather ceased to find any manifestation on this mundane plane of physical existence! But yesterday the chief of the one Foreign Office in the world which everyone regards with an almost superstitious fear, until it has been invested in the vulgar mind with something of the diabolic halo of omnipotent omniscience which encircles the order of the Jesuits, and now

Mingled with the natural sensation of the shock occasioned when sudden death removes any one from the circle of your acquaintance, I was conscious of a certain feeling of remorseful regret. For in the first year of his ministry I had not been altogether just to Count Mouravieff. Nay, it is perhaps more accurate to say that I had been unjust, and, as he himself said when we spoke of it afterwards, a little cruel. It was the Port

Arthur business which led to that, and the appearance of a shuffle where the straight course was so much the safer and more dignified. Count Mouravieff had been the advocate for the occupation of Port Arthur, and his management of the Chinese, to say nothing of his explanations to the British Ambassador, led me to say and to write things which were too harsh. any rate, even if his conduct was open to censure, it hardly became an Englishman to say so, considering the infinitely more scandalous neglect by our own Foreign Office of honour and good faith. I was, perhaps, a little prejudiced againt the Count. I had only met him once before. It was in 1888, when he was attached to the Russian Embassy at Berlin. We had a long conversation, in which I was more impressed by his cynical candour than attracted by his genial abandon. Afterwards when I met him in St. Petersburg on the eve of the Peace Congress the cynicism was softened and the geniality remained the same. And on the whole, now that he has gone, I reproach myself somewhat that I did not make more allowance for the difficulties of his position, and was not more sympathetic to the Minister who had the extremely arduous duty imposed upon him of filling the vacant chair of Prince Lobanoff.

Count Mouravieff may have occupied Port Arthur as the sequel of the German occupation of Kiao Chau, just as we occupied Wei-Hai-Wei as the sequel to the Russian occupation of Port Arthur; but it is not for the pot to call the kettle black. And it must never be forgotten that Count Mouravieff, the Tsar himself being witness, was of all his Ministers the most sympathetic and enthusiastic in his support of the Peace Rescript. Count Mouravieff did not originate it; he was not a man of initiative. But when it came into his hands, he gave it his hearty and unflinching support. Therein he differed from other Ministerial colleagues, some of whom made

Cou Times day b

wa

the

pa

an fav

ma

fail ele

aff

WI

litt

phr

Bis

ver

and alw cen

Bi

mai

talk

cap

was free pate tran the lecti

talk

him

burg

tha

mon he la folly

andmore

how deple

polic Bobr

in Fi

if w soldie and we no

said

a pi

did

Finla

But

Coun

but e throu

dema

milita

Count

and C

the in

of the such ( blasph

to

natter to one oreign no secret of their scepticism as to the probable outcome of the Hague Conference. Count Mouravieff never wavered, and to his steady support of the Imperial project he probably owed much of the confidence which the Tsar bestowed upon him.

The late Foreig' Minister was a charming companion, full of aneclote, with a quick sense of humour and a human geniality which made him a general favourite in Society, diplomatic and other. Like many other men trained in diplomacy, he probably failed to appreciate at its full value the ethical element as a factor in the affairs of men. When he was "a little secretary," to use his own phrase, Prince Bismarck was very kind to him, and there was always a reminiscence of the Bismarckian manner in his talk. But what capital talk it was-so full, so free, so emanci-pated from all trammels! I have the liveliest recollection of the last talk I had with him in St. Petersburg little more than twelve months ago. How he laughed at the folly of the Censor. and-which is still more surprisinghow frankly he deplored the impolicy of the Bobrikoff régime in Finland! "As if we had not soldiers enough and more than we need already,3 said he. "What a pity it is we did not leave Finland alone." But therein Count Mouravieff

volent-

virago

d on a heerful

into an ed, and emonihaking

ark her ealthy-

prought

arl ring

retaries

npress.

nth " I ble at ember

" who pensed

as last ance of

e safer

en the nd his

of his

me to

. At

ensure,

, con-

by our

I was:

ad only

he was

by his

the eve

and the le, now

osition,

ho had filling

thur as

au, just

Russian

pot to rgotten

witness,

ic and

Count

man of gave it differed

n made

but echoed the universal opinion of every friend of Russia throughout the world. Even if logical consistency demanded the assimilation of the Finnish and Russian military system, the game was not worth the candle. Count Bobrikoff is a kind of Russian Mr. Chamberlain, and Count Mouravieff certainly left me in no doubt as to the intense satisfaction with which he would have heard of the reversal of the policy in Finland, which has given such occasion to the enemies of Russia everywhere to blaspheme.

Count Mouravieff under-estimated the Chinese. The Times' correspondent at St. Petersburg reports that the day before his death he committed himself to the astonishing dictum that the taking of the Taku forts would have a salutary rather than an exasperating effect upon the Chinese. "It would be all over in a fortnight," he thought. He was an optimist in the skin of a cynic, and he always hoped things would happen according to his wishes. He had always found the Chinese prompt to yield to pressure, and he could not conceive the possibility of a general revolt. In Turkey he left no mark. He continued the policy of Prince Lobanoff. Time was not given him to develop the more humane policy which he meditated both in Macedonia and Armenia. continuation the historic rôle of Russia as the protector of the Christians of the East will fall in to the hands of his successor. In European politics he has been faithful to the French Alliance, knowing that it means peace and not war. He had a very difficult part to play during the crisis over Fashoda, but he played it with address, audacity and success. He had to convince the French that Russia would not desert her ally, and at the same time to compel that ally to face the unpleasant fact that war with England at that time and in her then condition would have been suicidal folly. achieved that apparently impossible task, and earned the thanks of both English and French, al-

The late Count Mouravieff.

Russian Foreign Minister.

though from our side his services—as usual when they are rendered by a Russian—were never adequately appreciated.

The task of directing Russian foreign policy is not a sinecure. Prince Gortchakoff stood the strain for a long time, and after him M. de Giers. But the pressure of work on the Foreign Offices of the world is increasing every year. The sudden death of Count Mouravieff, following upon the equally sudden death of Prince Lobanoff, is significant. Count Lamsdorff, who is now acting as Foreign Minister, as he did before Count Mouravieff's appointment, stands the strain well. Whether under a new Foreign Minister or alone, he will do the collar work of the Foreign Office.

value of the trade. Means of Communication, such as inland waterways, railways, and canals, are laid down, but we have purposely avoided—for the sake of clearness—the insertion of railways which have not advanced beyond the concession stage. All the Foreign Possessions in China are indicated and name!, while a diagram of the Annual Foreign Trade of China shows the percentages contributed by the The above pictorial map has been designed to illustrate in a graphic manner the physical and economic factors which underlie the Far Eastern Question. The Areas of the various provinces of China are compared with a map of England on the same scale—a map of Europe inside the Chinese frontier. The Populations of the provinces are-by means of Chinamen-compared with the population of England. It will be seen that Shantung and England have practically the same area and population. The Treaty Ports are indicated by circles, which are sized in proportion to the annual amount of revenues collected, while the annual foreign trade of the scaports is shown by steamers drawn in proportion to the British Empire, Japan, United States, and other European countries.

has and you hav thi fac

be De the Di ab of a p it So addins is, oth ext ext set Hu is f wa and wh

swii sand wood sim V still case

34

value of the trade. Means of Communication, such as inland waterways, railways, and canals, are laid down, but we have purposely avoided—for the sake of clearness—the insertion of railways which have not advanced beyond the concession stage. All the Foreign Possessions in China are indicated and name!, while a diagram of the Annual Foreign Trade of China shows the percentages contributed by the British Empire, Japan, United States, and other European countries.

THE TOPIC OF THE MONTH.

THE REVOLT OF THE YELLOW MAN.

You think that because the Chinaman is inert, careless, and simple, he is a child. There never was a greater mistake. He has learned the secret of being happy. His life is placid, and nothing troubles him so long as his conscience is clear. There you have our character in a sentence. Let us alone, and we will let you alone. We want to be free to enjoy our beautiful country and the fruits of our centuries of experience. When we ask you to go away you refuse, and you even threaten us if we do not give you our harbours, our land, our towns. And now, having carefully considered the matter, we of the so-called Boxers' Society have decided that the only way to get rid of you is to kill you. We are not naturally bloodthirsty. We certainly are not thieves. But when persuasion, and argument, and appeals to your sense of justice, are of no avail, we find ourselves face to face with the fact that the only resource is to put you out of existence.—Interview with Chinese gentleman (a "Boxer") in London. "Daily Express," Yune 13.

I.—THE BOXERS AND THEIR BACKERS.

To the Imperial Righteous Harmony Boxers.—You are summoned for such and such a date. Exalt the Dynasty. Kill the foreigners. Whoever disobeys this summons will lose his head.

Such is the "whip" to which the Chinese nationalists are responding all over China.

"Kill the Foreigners!" A succinct formula. It may be more accurately translated "Death to the Devils—Death!" It is, as the Boxer interviewed in London by the Express said, "the only way" to get rid of them. Did not Mr. Winston Churchill say much the same thing about the Boers? His famous phrase about the necessity of reducing the personnel of these stubborn burghers by a prolonged process of attrition, has ever since he uttered it been diligently translated into fact by our armies in South Africa. "Kill! Kill! Now the Yellow man adopts our watchword, and does his best to better our instructions.

"CAPARISONS ARE ODOROUS."

There is more excuse for them than there is for us. He is, at least, defending his own country. He is not invading other people's land. No one can deny that he has exhausted all the resources of peaceful protest. He must either submit to the intrusion of the Foreign Devils, or settle the business once for all by killing them wholesale. Human suffering is no deterrent. Chinese philosophy is familiar with all the cynical excuses which Christian warriors employ as anodynes to their conscience. The anonymous writer of "The New Battle of Dorking," which Mr. Grant Richards has just published, points out that the soldier allows no question of the aggregate of suffering to influence him in the performance of what he believes to be his duty:—

All London might be in flames before his eyes, our streets be swimming in blood; men, women, and children falling in thousands under the pitiless hail of shell-fire. But the "Cease Fire" would not be sounded on that account, any more than under similar conditions before Paris we should sound it ourselves.

We did not spare Cronje's laager; we should not spare Paris; still less will the French spare London. Morally, all three cases are on the same level.

And so the Chinese Nationalist cheerfully slays the pale-faced foreign devil, who, if not slain, will sooner or later seize his fatherland.

THE DRAGON AT BAY.

"Death to the Devils-Death!" It is inconvenient for the devils in question-ourselves to wit-but no honest man can for a single moment deny, that if we were in their place we should act as they have done only perhaps more so. We are eating up their country and we know it. We are maintaining a vast army of missionaries to undermine the whole religious faith of the nation, and we are sending out a still greater army of adventurers and speculators whose one object is to enrich themselves with the wealth of China. We have acted in China-we the Europeans-more as Brigands than as From the opium war down to the seizure of Wei-Hai-Wei, the white man has treated the yellow man as if he had no rights to be respected, and then we forget that even a yellow man may have wrongs to be redressed. Never have we endeavoured to do unto the Chinese as we would that the Chinese should do unto us. We have trampled them under our feet as if they were worms, and not men.

To-day the worm has turned.

And behold, we are discovering that it is no worm, but a veritable dragon, breathing forth fiery death!

HOW THE YELLOW MAN FEELS IT.

It is not difficult to understand the Boxers' point of view. There is not a man amongst us worth his salt who would not be a Boxer to-morrow if any foreigners dared to treat us as we have uniformly treated the Chinese. And the curious thing is that this high-handed method of dealing with our yellow-skinned brother has come to be regarded as quite right, proper, and humane. Of this a very interesting illustration was afforded us only the other day. Sir Howard Vincent, M.P., is a philanthropist. He is an enthusiastic patriot who honestly believes that the Englishman is one of the most humane of men. But the notion of treating a Chinaman as he would treat an Englishman is absolutely inconceivable to him. Of which read the following little anecdote in proof. In the Daily Mail of June 23rd Sir Howard Vincent is describing his journey from Taku to Pekin. He says:—

We enter the Peiho—a narrow entrance, a narrow river, a course like the Suez Canal. We steam slowly. Our swell washes the banks. The inhabitants of a mud hut jeer at us. "Full steam ahead," says the captain down the tube. A dozen extra revolutions, and we lash the waters into such a storm that the effects of the jeering family on the bank are swept into the stream. He laughs best who laughs last.

Just think of that. A Chinese bargee on the bank shouts a jibe at a passing foreigner. Thereupon the foreigner, by way of repartee, deliberately hurls the "effects of the jeering family on the bank" into the stream. And the civilised, Christian, philanthropic M.P. chronicles the incident with complacent approval. But what must the Chinese family have thought as their "effects," as dear to them as Mr. Vincent's furniture is to him, and far less easily replaceable, were swept away into the stream? "Foreign devil!" indeed must have been their reflection, and devilish it was, no doubt.

The Street of the Ambassadors, Pekin.

So the cry has gone forth, "Death to the Devils—

So the cry has gone forth, "Death to the Devils— Death!" a much more respectable formula than the British variant of "Death to the Republics—Death!" For devils deserve to die, whereas the assassination of Republics is universally reprobated by mankind.

THE ORIGIN OF THE TERM "BOXER."

The so-called "Boxers" is a slang term by which is described a Chinese nationalist organisation which calls itself I-ho-ch'uan, or the League of United Patriots.

What is the origin of its popular designation "Boxers" (says a writer in the Times) is uncertain. This name may have been given them from the prominence its members appear to attach to gymnastics in their training, or by a pun on the last character in their Chinese name, ch'uan also meaning "fists"—the characters are different, but the pronunciation the same.

Patriots they are in their own estimation. Boxers they will always be called by Europeans.

HANDS OFF!

Their object is simple. What they say to us Mr. Gladstone said to Austria in speaking of the Balkan Peninsula, "Hands off!" Whatever may be the ultimate development of the Boxers, they are at present the avant garde of the Chinese army, the unofficial popular wing of the national forces, at the head of which stands the Empress. According to the extremely interesting and apparently authentic report of an interview between the Empress and Wang, the Governor of Pekin, published by the North China Herald, the Empress did not originate the League of Patriots, any more than Mr. Chamberlain originated the Primrose League. But as Mr. Chamberlain was prompt to profit by the zeal of the Primrose Dames, so her Imperial Majesty was quick to avail herself of the help of the Boxers. Wang, before his sudden promotion to the Governorship of Pekin, was a censor or sixth grade official. "Recently" Wang the censor had an interview with the Empress, which resulted in his sudden promotion.

THE EMPRESS AND THE BOXERS.

The conversation between them is thus reported :-

The EMPRESS: "You are a native of this province and so ought to know. What do you think of the 'Boxers' in Chi-li? Do you really think that when the time comes for action they will really join the troops in fighting the 'foreign devils'?"

WANG: "I am certain of it, your Majesty. Moreover, the tenets taught the members of the society are, 'Protect to the death the Heavenly dynasty ("Fen Ch'ao) and death to the devils' ('Kuei-tze'). For your servant's own part, so deeply do I believe in the destiny of the society to crush the 'devils' that young and old of your servant's family are now practising the incantations of the 'Boxers,' every one of us having joined the society to 'Protect the Heavenly dynasty' and drive the 'devils' into the sea. Had I the power given me I would willingly lead the 'Boxers' in the van of the avenging army when the time comes, and before that time do all I can to assist them in organising and arming them."

The Empress Dowager nodded her head in approval, and after ruminating in her mind, cried "Aye! It is a grand society! But I am afraid that, having no experienced men at their head just now, these 'Boxers' will act rashly and get the Government into trouble with these 'Yang kuei-tze,' before everything is ready."

Then after another pause, "That's it. These 'Boxers' must have some responsible men in Chi-li and Shan-tung to guide their conduct," ship

the Chi Chi bet on reve I in C chie Chi Shu this men Tige Ban unde nucl to b imm Chi 44 B the Pref prov this

L

on imn

poli

The next morning she appointed Wang to the Governorship of Pekin, where he has apparently been guiding the Boxers' conduct ever since.

THE GREAT CONSPIRACY.

The Boxer movement is, therefore, only the popular and urresponsible form of the opposition to foreigners which is the dominating principle of the Manchu Government of China to-day. The Pekin correspondent of the North China Herald, the same who reported the conversation between Wang and the Empress, published in that paper on May 16th a solemn warning as to the impending revolt, which no one seems to have noticed. He said:—

I write in all seriousness and sincerity to inform you that there is a great secret scheme, having for its aim to crush all foreigners in China and wrest back the territories "leased" to them. The chief leaders of this movement are the Empress Dowager, Prince Ching, Prince Tuan (the heir-apparent's father), Kang Yi, Chao Shu-chiao, and Li Ping-heng. The forces to be used to achieve this end are all Manchus, viz. :—the Pekin Field Force (50,000 men); under Prince Ching; the Husheng Corps or "Glorified Tigers" (10,000 strong), under Prince Tuan; and the various Banner Corps of the Imperial Guards (aggregating 12,000 men), under Kang Yi and others. These 72,000 men are to form the nucleus of the "Army of Avengers," whilst the "Boxers" are to be counted upon as auxiliaries to the great fight, that is more imminent than foreigners in Pekin or elsewhere dream. All Chinese of the upper classes know this. . . . Not only have the "Boxers" increased tenfold in numbers since the beginning of the year in Shan-tung and Chi-li, but even the Imperial Prefecture of Shuntien (Pekin) and the three north-eastern provinces (Manchuria) are now filled with the ramifications of this dangerous society.

Lord Charles Beresford six months ago and more defended the war in South Africa to a French interviewer on the ground that everyone knew a great struggle was imminent in China and therefore it was necessary to polish off old Kruger before the Chinese trouble began.

The work of polishing off old Kruger has not been so simple or so rapidly accomplished as the Jingoes believed, and the Chinese trouble has burst upon us at a time when Lord Roberts cannot spare a single man from the immense army he has accumulated in South Africa.

THE PLUM-CAKE THEORY OF CHINA-

The origin of the mischief lies far away back. But the immediate source of the present outbreak lies near at hand. The real author of the revolt is the German Emperor. It was his sudden seizure of Kiao-Chau that started the whole thing. He was the first to give practical effect to what may be called the plum-cake theory of China. Speaking at the Bankers' Banquet in the City on the 27th ult. Sir Michael Hicks-Beach said:

Ever since the war between China and Japan there have been persons, not in this country alone, who have seemed to look upon the great Chinese Empire as if it were a kind of plum-cake which might be divided among the different civilized Powers of the world as easily and unresistingly as a cake is cut up by schoolboys, provided the Powers did not quarrel among themselves. I doubt if any one would put forward that view now. It has never been the view of her Majesty's Government. We have always desired that there should be a stable Chinese Government in China, able to enforce decent order and security, and ready to give the facilities to which we are entitled by treaty, and increased facilities, if possible, for our commerce and our trade.

-AND ITS RESULT.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer forgets that, whatever may have been the theory of Her Majesty's Government, they insisted upon taking a slice of the Chinese cake despite all protests. The chief outbreak of the Boxers has taken place in Shantung, the province in which both Kiao Chau and Wei-Hai-Wei are situated. A well-informed correspondent of the Times, signing himself

South-East Tower of City Wall, Pekin.

ed by

ginate erlain erlain ames, of the notion sixth d an his nd so hi-li? they

r, the

to the o the o the o the o the oly do 'that g the d the evils' y lead time em in and grand en at the before guide

"Shanghai," in describing the origin of the outbreak, says:-

The seizure of Kiao Chau by Germany, as one of the measures of punishment for the murder of two Catholic missionaries in Shan-tung, and the consequent acquisition (practically seizure) of Port Arthur and Ta-lien Bay by Russia, of Wei-Hai-Wei by England, and of Kwang Chau by France, gave rise to a general belief among the Chinese that the chief source of international complications lies in missionary propaganda, and that if missionaries and converts could be once got rid of things would run smoothly.

That was the idea which led to the present revolt.

THE RESPONSIBILITIES OF MISSIONARIES-

Prince Kung long ago remarked that but for opium and missionaries there would be little trouble for Europeans in China. Official reports received from the Belgian Minister in China, as also from the Belgian Consuls at Tien-Shanghai, tsin, Canton, Han-kauand Nanking, declare that the foreign missionary associations, and in particular the Roman Catholic communities, are mainly responsible for the present unfavourable state of affairs in China for foreigners. The Jesuits and other religious orders engaged in propa-Chrisgating tianity in the Far East have not always fulfilled their duties with the necessary tact and consideration.

That it is not only the Roman Catholic missionaries who are lacking in tact may safely be assumed from Lord Salisbury's fervent appeal to the English Church missionaries to temper their enthusiasm by Christian prudence. Hence it is not surprising that the fury of the Boxers should be directed principally against mission houses and churches. The Chinese prefer the Russian to all other Europeans, as they do not dream of making propaganda for the Greek Orthodox faith in China. The Boxers are not by any means the only secret society which aims at the extirpation of the missionaries. The Society of the Long Knife, which attacked the Franciscan missionaries on the borders of Shantung, offered to spare the lives of the Christians on the following terms:—

Firstly, renunciation of the Roman Catholic faith in a written document to be certified by the mandarin of the district; secondly, all church vessels and religious pictures and books to be burned; thirdly, the churches to be transformed into pagodas and provided with heathen images; fourthly, the expulsion of the missionaries; and fifthly, the payment of a contribution of 4,000 oz. of silver.

We may therefore take it for granted that the political and religious factors act and react upon each other. The missionary is hated because he is the most conspicuous foreigner, because he directly attacks the superstitions of the people, and most of all because he is constantly used as a pretext by encroaching Governments for the seizure of Chinese territory, or for levying fines on the Chinese Exchequer. Therefore it was inevitable, whenever the day of the rising took place, the first brunt of the popular fury would fall upon the missionaries.

-AND OF RAILWAYS.

Another contributory cause was the making of railways. Railways in the long run increase the demand for labour, but at first they create an economic revolution in which many are thrown out of work. Many of the Chinese regard railways as the drivers of stage coaches regarded them in this country 70 years since.

II. THE EXTENT OF THE OUTBREAK.

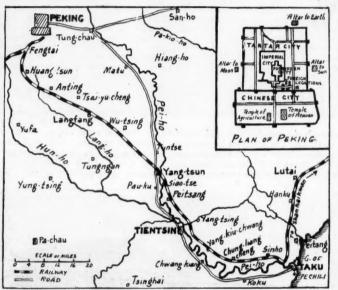

In the month of May, the movement of the Boxers, although troublesome, was generally poohpoohed as a comparatively insignificant manifestation of riotous and predatory individuals whom a slight display of vigour would reduce to obedience. The attack on the Belgian the Taku Forts to Pekin.

reduce to obedience. The attack on the Belgian railway line in the province of Shansi, in the neighbourhood of Pekin, created something of a scare, but those who wrote most seriously about it were derided as alarmists. Governments, however, were uneasy, and on May 31st the railway from Tientsin brought to the Chinese capital a composite force of 340 armed men, of whom seventy-five were British. Some demur was made by the Chinese Government to admitting them within the walls, but ultimately they were received and allowed to garrison their respective Legations.

AT FIRST OFFICIALLY DISCOUNTENANCED-

The popular ferment, however, shows no signs of abating. On June 3 Hung-tsun was sacked and burnt. Two days later two Anglican missionaries, Messrs. Norman and Robinson, met a martyr's death in Yung-Chen, where they were put to death with the usual fiendish concomitants of Chinese executions. The following day came out an Map showing the road from the Taku Forts to Pekin.

Im and be how Boot troo the mil Loi but day of t

of t

Tapp
the to h
Gov
In
has
with expe

anyt

be a

Gove

cons

and ;

0 leav burn

acco

Chin

in C

ports mass down Fron Kian Shan Ame asser missi of th there Hung autho The valley for o river that a comin the d are b peans

Jun decisi Empre train

2,000

these theref

who I

in pe

shado

great

in of

The

conthe

the

he is nents es on

table,

brunt ways.

I for lution many out of ny of nese elways ers of es rem in y 70

ENT EAK. month movethe hough , was poohcomisigniifestais and indiom a ay of ould obediattack elgian the scare, erided neasy, ought

Some admitwere ective

days n and te they nitants out an Imperial decree blessing the Boxers with faint blame, and giving all men to understand that no reliance could be placed upon the Government of Pekin. A show, however, was made of showing a stern front towards the Boxers, and General Nieh was ordered to take some troops and disperse the Boxers who had fastened upon the railway line from Pekin, destroying it to within thirty miles of Tientsin. General Nieh went up by train to Lofa, where he dispersed and killed some of the Boxers, but soon abandoned the attempt as hopeless. From that day the Boxers appear to have kept undisputed possession of the northern half of the Tientsin-Pekin line.

-BUT REALLY APPROVED.

There appears to be no doubt that the Empress really approved of the movement. A secret order is said by the Tientsin correspondent of the Hong Kong Telegraph to have been addressed, about three months ago, to the Governor of Shan-tung:—

In reply to the Governor of Shan-tung, who reports that he has found it necessary to repress the Patriotic Boxer Society with a strong and heavy hand, we remark that it cannot be expected that such a simple people can know that they have done anything amiss. If the strong hand is manifest, will there not be a permanent grudge against the Governor? We assure the Governor that if future trouble arise he himself must bear the consequences. Let the good people be dealt with in a merciful and generous way, to the benefit of all.

THE SPREAD OF THE MOVEMENT.

On June 8th the American missionaries fled to Pekin, leaving their college at Tung-Chan to be pillaged and burnt. This punctually took place next day, and was accompanied by the massacre of some seventy-five Chinese converts to Christianity. In many other districts in China the missionaries began to flock to the treaty ports, where they could at least feel secure against massacre. From the West River they began to pour down to Canton and Hong Kong. From the districts in the Yang-tse-Kiang valley they came flocking to Shanghai. One hundred and fifty American and British missionaries assembled at Chefoo; fifty French missionaries came down to the mouth of the Yellow River. Everywhere there was anxiety and alarm. Hung Chang in vain asserted his authority to dispel panic in Canton. The Viceroys in the Yang-tse-Kiang valley declared that they could answer for order; but the merchants in the, river trembled before the mere report that an emissary from the palace was coming to raise the cry, "Death to the devils—death!" In China there are between 10,000 and 15,000 Europeans, of whom 5,000 are British and 2,000 American. The majority of these are in the treaty ports, and therefore comparatively safe. But all who lived inland felt that they were in peril of their lives, and under the shadow of that great dread began the great trek to the sea.

THE MASK THROWN OFF.

June 9th appears to have been the decisive date. On that day the Empress with the Emperor in her train returned to Pekin. The Tsung-li-

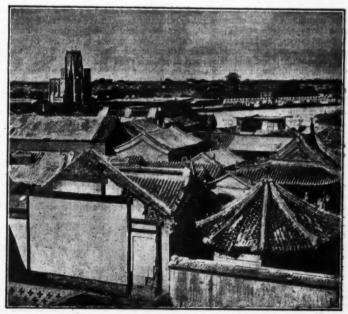

Yamen was strengthened by the addition of four pure Manchus, while Tuan, the father of the Heir to the throne and a notorious patron of the Boxers, was made president in the place of Prince Ching. From that moment the die seems to have been cast. The Empress and her Ministers arrayed themselves behind the Boxers.

Events followed each other in quick succession. Telegraphic railway communication had been severed between Pekin and Tientsin for some days. The Siberian wire, however, still afforded the Ministers at the Chinese capital a means of communicating with the outer world. The small force that had been sent up to Pekin on May 31st to protect the Legations was felt to be inadequate for the protection of the European residents.

ADMIRAL SEYMOUR'S RELIEF EXPEDITION.

Admiral Seymour got together a relief command of 2,000 men: British, 915; German, 350; Russian, 300; French, 158; American, 104; Japanese, 52; Italian, 40; Austrian, 25, and started by rail on June 10th. The distance is covered in a day if the railway is open, and the little column only took one week's rations and 150 cartridges per man. For the first eighteen miles, as far as Yang-tsun, the line was practically uninjured. Beyond Yang-tsun the trains had to creep warily along, for it was evident that the Boxers had made various attempts to destroy bridges and damage the line. The country was deserted. The railway was repaired as rapidly as possible, but the progress was slow, and it was not till late at night that the little army steamed into the station at Lofa.

Next morning, the 11th, the advance was resumed. But the Boxers had done their work much more thoroughly, and by nightfall Admiral Seymour was only three miles nearer Pekin than in the morning. The Boxers had attacked the working party and had to be driven off by the marines. In this first skirmish the Boxers lost some two score killed and wounded. It was hoped the lesson would lead them to abandon the attempt to block the line. It did no such thing. Next day the Admiral's little force succeeded in forging ahead till it reached Lang-fung, the midway station between Pekin and Tientsin. There it halted.

A View of Tientsin,

A CHINESE ST. BARTHOLOMEW.

Threatened by the advance of a hostile army to their capital, the Chinese dealt their counter-stroke. same night on which Admiral Seymour had encamped at Lang-fung, a storm of popular fury burst out in the city of Pekin. Some of the finest buildings in the eastern part of the city, including the Roman Catholic Cathedral and the large premises of the London Missionary Society and the American Board of Missions, as well as those occupied by the employés of Sir Robert Hart, were burnt to the ground. Hundreds of native Christians and servants employed by foreigners were massacred by the mob. The Chinese troops do not seem to have made even a pretence of opposing the popular frenzy. that moment it may be said of the Chinese soldiers that they are all Boxers now. The Chinese St. Bartholomew marks the definite acceptance by the Chinese Government of the gauge of battle hurled at them by the West.

THE EMPRESS'S COUNTER STROKE.

The Empress did not lose any time. The troops under her favourite General Tung-fuh-siang, a man famous for the ruthlessness with which he suppressed the Moslem rebellion in the Western Provinces, were placed in battle array to resist the advance of Admiral Seymour upon Pekin. She then organized a counter attack. The Boxers cut the railway line twenty miles behind Admiral Seymour, severing his communications with his base, which itself became the object of a fierce attack by a large force of Chinese troops well supplied with heavy artillery.

On June 11th the telegraph from Pekin to Siberia was cut, and all means of communicating with the Legations was lost. On the 15th Tientsin, which was held by a foreign garrison of 3,000, was also cut off from communication with the outer world. The Boxers attacked the European quarters, and the garrison, which was but scantily supplied with munitions of war, stood at bay.

Meantime in the far south of China similar disturbances broke out, the French and British missionary stations in Yunnan were destroyed, and the French Resident was made prisoner.

THE CAPTURE OF THE TAKU FORTS.

News reached the international flotilla at Taku that a determined attempt would be made to close the mouth of the Peiho against the foreigner. On the 16th an ultimatum was despatched to the Chinese officer in command, insisting upon the immediate disbandment of the troops which were being massed at Taku. A mixed force of 1,200 men was landed to take the forts in the The ultimatum was to expire at two o'clock on the morning of the 17th, but at 12.50 the Chinese took the initiative by opening fire upon the gunboats in the harbour. A fierce conflict ensued. six hours the firing was incessant. The allied force under Russian command consisted entirely of gunboats, sloops, and torpedo-destroyers. The larger ships could not approach near enough to fire with effect. The Russians, who had three gunboats, appear to have borne the brunt of the fighting. The French and Germans had one gunboat each; the British had one sloop and two torpedo-destroyers. Two of the forts were blown up; the others were attacked and stormed from the land side. Two of the Russian gunboats were seriously injured. The allies lost 120 men killed and wounded, of whom eighty-seven were Russians. The slaughter of the Chinese was terrible; over 1,000 corpses were collected by the victors and burnt. The forts were charnel-houses reeking with blood. The Taku forts passed for the second time into the hands of the foreign devils.

Meanwhile Admiral Seymour was hard pressed. His rations were only calculated to last him till the 17th. He was confronted by an overwhelming force of Chinese troops, which barred all access to Pekin. Tientsin in his rear was besieged by an army of 10,000 men with quickfiring guns and heavy artillery. On the 16th he decided to fall back on Yang-tsan.

On the 19th, when the news of the capture of the Taku forts reached Pekin, twenty-four hours' notice was given to the Foreign Ministers to clear out. Where they were to go, and in what direction, did not exactly appear.

THE MUSTERING OF THE WHITE MEN.

On the 20th a message was despatched from Tientsin saying that the need for reinforcements was urgent. Supplies were running short, and the Chinese kept up an incessant fire with heavy guns. The Powers were hurrying up all available forces from every direction. On the 18th it was calculated that the Russians had 2,500 men at Taku, the British 1,000, and the Germans 1,300. The Japanese were hurrying up 2,000 men. The French had only 2,000 men in Chinese waters. They made haste to despatch 2,000 more. Germany got ready reinforcements of 2,800 marines. Britain gave orders for the despatch of 10,000 troops from India. The Tsar ordered his army in Eastern Siberia to be put on a war footing. For the immediate relief of Tientsin an army of 8,000 troops, of whom 1,300 were Germans, was despatched from Taku, and Europe waited in suspense to hear the news of its fate.

THE RELIEF OF TIENTSIN.

Not till the 26th was the welcome news received that the relief column entered Tientsin on the 23rd. It appears to have been under the command of the Russian General Stössel, who had with him a small contingent of American and Japanese soldiers. Another report says that the force was under the command of a Japanese general, and that the British Naval Brigade led the van.

Admiral Seymour was reported to be at Peitsang, nine miles north of Tientsin. Heavy firing was heard. He was known to be short of food and encumbered with sick. Sixty-two of his gallant force had been killed. After another day of terrible suspense, the welcome news came to hand that on the night of the 25th a Russian detachment of four companies, with an equal number of allies, had succeeded in reaching Admiral Seymour and brought his wounded back to Tientsin. The honour of his relief is claimed by the British under Colonel Durward. There is some danger lest international rivalry may mar the fruits of the international alliance.

THE REVOLT SPREADING.

The situation, although the immediate tension was relieved, continued to be formidable in the extreme. Admiral Seymouf had failed to reach Pekin. The Chinese counter-attack on Tientsin had been beaten off, but the Legations, with all the European residents, were at the mercy of the Chinese authorities, whose armed forces were estimated at 60,000 men. It would be weeks before the Indian contingent could arrive. The Japanese were hurrying up 13,000, and the Russians were sending on all the men they could apare. The need for troops, however, increased daily. The Boxers threatened from of th the e their station very n burnt the Br rivers was a labour In Ho or of a this po interio A pr

Neu

Mukd

The the basisland, proceed the sludisapped It is

The upon will manche the state of the sludisapped It is great n

may be go on improba Chinese kill out happen. the ha They a they ar Seymou village 1 by occu had to face of would se are not the allied the assu pitched question. should b

The au
It is a known as his feet," the latter
The Chir
Genera
with the
the Chin
the world
China's

troops, in t

Neu Chwang, and destroyed the military school at Mukden. More massacres of missionaries were reported from the interior. More appalling than the slaughter of the few missionaries were the reports reaching the coast of horrible massacres committed upon their unfortunate converts. The Protestant Mission station at Kwei-hsien was burned down on the very night Admiral Seymour was relieved. The Boxers burnt down the city of Wa-hsiou, three days' march from the British fortress of Wei-Hai-Wei. From all the great rivers fugitives came streaming into the seaports. Trade was at a standstill. Scores of thousands of Chinese labourers suddenly found themselves thrown out of work. In Hong Kong and at Shanghai all thought of business, or of anything save self-defence, was abandoned. And at this point, with panic on the coast and massacre in the interior, the curtain falls for the moment.

A pretty commentary upon the plum-cake theory upon which the Kaiser was so keen to act.

side.

jured.

whom

y the eking

time

His

He

inese

in his quickecided

Taku

given

were

entsin

rgent.

up an rrying

e 18th

nen at h had ste to ments

spatch

army

or the ops, of Taku, ts fate.

d that

d. It

ussian

ingent

rt says

panese e van.

g, nine

l. He

d with killed.

e news

ussian

ber of

ur and nour of rward.

ay mar

n was treme.

ten off,

s, were armed panese ending troops,

atened

The

THE SLUMBERING KRAKEN.

The mariners in the old legend who disembarked upon the back of a monstrous kraken, mistaking it for an island, were very comfortable for a while. But when they proceeded to light a fire upon their island, the heat woke the slumbering monster, and their "island" suddenly disappeared, leaving them floundering in the waves.

It is even so with the white men in China.

III.-THE OUTLOOK.

The question of what is to happen now depends chiefly upon whether the present revolt is really Chinese or only Manchu. If it is only confined to the Manchus, and the great mass of the Chinese are indifferent, the Empress may be dethroned, Pekin occupied, and everything may go on pretty much as before. But if, as seems not improbable from the widespread nature of the rising, the Chinese masses have decided that the hour has come to kill out the foreign devils once for all, anything may happen. The Chinese stood to their guns under the hail of modern explosives at the Taku forts. They appear to be armed with good artillery, and they are not likely to want for cartridges. Admiral Seymour reports: "Boxers (?) when defeated in one village retiring on next, and skilfully retarding advance by occupying well-selected positions from which they had to be forced often at point of bayonet in face of galling fire difficult to locate." The Boxer, it would seem, is not unlike his brother the Boer. They are not likely to stand up in pitched battle against the allied forces. If they do they will be defeated. But the assumption that, because we can defeat them in a pitched battle and take their capital, we can settle the question, is a fallacy which our South African experience should be sufficient to dispel.

THE TACTICS OF THE BARE-FOOT MAN.

The author of "Village Life in China" says :-

It is a common saying that "the barefoot man (otherwise known as 'mud-legs') is not afraid of him who has stockings on his feet," for the former can at once retreat into the mud, where the latter dare not follow.

The Chinese tactics will be those of the bare-foot man.
General Gordon when he last visited China indicated with the unerring precision of genius the method which the Chinese will of necessity employ in their war against the world:—

China's power lies in her numbers, in the quick moving of her toops, in the little baggage they require, and in their few wants. It is known that men armed with sword and spear can overcome the best regular troops equipped with breechloading rifles if the country is at all difficult, and if the men with the spears and the swords outnumber their foe by ten to one. If this is the case when men are armed with spears and swords, it will be much truer when those men are themselves armed with breechloaders. China should never engage in pitched battles; her strength is in quick movements, in cutting off trains of baggage and in night attacks not pushed home—in a continuous worrying of her enemies.—Boulger's "Life of Gordon," Vol. II., p. 52.

WHAT WILL IT COST?

The conditions of modern war have immensely improved the chances of the defence. They have also enormously increased the cost of conquest. If it costs us £60,000,000 to conquer 250,000 Boers, how much will it cost Europe plus America and Japan to conquer 400,000,000 of Chinese?

Of course, if we are dealing only with the Manchus that is another matter. We should then only need to put the Russians in the place of the Manchus, and the Middle Kingdom would continue to exist in the future as it has in the past.

GORDON'S PROGNOSTIC.

But are we only dealing with the Manchus? Gordon, who knew China with the knowledge that is only possible to those who, to use his own expressive phrase, can put themselves inside the skin of the Chinese, constantly contemplated a revolt against the foreigner, as the outcome not of Manchu, but of Chinese sentiment. For instance he wrote on one occasion:—

There is the probability that a proud people like the Chinese may sicken at this continual eating of humble pie, that the Pekin Government at some time, by skirting too closely the precipice of war, may fall into it, and then that the sequence may be anarchy and rebellion throughout the Middle Kingdom, which may last for years and cause endless misery.

That was Gordon's prognostic. And a gloomy one it is. Gordon was Chinese Gordon, not Manchu. He regarded the Manchu dynasty as doomed. He wrote:—

If I were the Government I would consider the part that should be taken when the inevitable fall of the Manchu dynasty takes place, what steps they would take, and how they would act in the break-up, which, however, will only end in a fresh cohesion of China, for neither we, nor any other power, could ever for long hold the country. At Penang, Singapore, etc., the Chinese will eventually oust us in another generation.

GORDON'S WARNING.

That was Gordon's deliberate judgment. Neither we nor any other Power can ever hold China. Against this, of course, we shall have the confident assurances of the Anglo-Chinese merchants. But as to their vaticinations Gordon also had a word of warning. He said:—

As for the European population in China, write them down as identical with Europe in all affairs. Their sole idea is, without any distinction of nationality, an increased power over China for their own trade, and for opening up the country as they call it, and any war would be popular with them; so they will egg on any Power to make it.

WHAT IS TO BE DONE?

What then is to be done? As little as possible. Stand shoulder to shoulder with Russia, whose Tsar loathes the very idea of undertaking fresh responsibilities in China. Keep the Concert together on the basis of no conquest, and let Japan clearly understand that there is to be no disturbance of the general peace for the gratification of Japanese ambitions. Above all, let our aim be to leave the Chinese as much alone as possible to manage their own affairs in their own way. More than that it is at present impossible to say.

XUM

1.—A certain man had two sons. And the younger said to his father: Father, give me the portion of goods that falleth unto me. And he divided unto them his living.

II.—And not many days after the younger son gathered all together and took his journey unto a far country.

III .- And there wasted his substance with riotous living.

IV .- And when he had spent all.

V.—And he would fain have filled his belly with the husks that the swine did eat, and no man gave unto him. And he said, "I will arise and go to my father."

VI.—When his father saw him he had compassion on him, and ran, and fell on his neck, and kissed him.

THE STORY OF THE PRODIGAL: BY MURILLO. 42

be prin that in delay 1 Those No. that w school devoted restrict whiteministr longing Sunday its atte of beau imposs could 1 putting pieces (the lan reason is a fa portfoli and pro

It is sermon of Eye Protesta cause | therefor a barn, Such wa best thi Puritan Idolatro hates so glory an We h children privilege

Its con monoto room an centurie Board s which s chool Illustrate without appealin neglecte to teach

PICTURES FOR SUNDAY SCHOOL CLASS-ROOMS.

OUR SECOND PORTFOLIO: RAPHAEL AND MURILLO.

WHY cannot you give us some pictures for our Sunday schools?"

"I'll try. What do you say to Portfolio No. 2?"
Portfolio No. 1 has been sold out and reprinted. But fine art collotype pictures like "The Golden Stairs" cannot be printed off as rapidly as the sheets of a daily paper. To produce a portfolio time is essential. I hope, therefore, that impatient correspondents will excuse the unavoidable delay now that their orders have at length been executed. Those who want No. 2 had better order it immediately.

No. 2 is an attempt to meet the demand for pictures that will help to relieve the bare walls of the Sundayschool class-room, the mission-room, and other buildings devoted to the teaching of religion. I am necessarily restricted by the price to reproduction in black and white—the more's the pity. I was in Christ Church Cathedral at Oxford last month, and as I sat under the ministry of Burne-Jones's windows I could not help longing that every church and every chapel and every Sunday-school in the land could place at the disposal of its attendants the same soothing and inspiring influence of beauty, grace, and colour. That, however, is, alas! impossible. Not even Mr. Carnegie, that modern Crossus, could meet the expenditure that would be involved in putting "storied windows richly dight" with the masterpieces of Burne-Jones's brush in every place of worship in the land. But because we cannot do everything that is no reason why we should not do something; and although it s a far cry from a Burne-Jones's window to a shilling portfolio. I venture to hope that those who have enjoyed and profited by the former may not despise the latter. Its contents will at least do something to relieve the flat monotony of plastered wall.

THE IMPORTANCE OF EYEGATE.

It is an old text on which I have inflicted many a sermon upon the readers of this Review—the Importance of Eyegate as an entrance to the Soul of Man. We Protestants rely far too exclusively upon Eargate. Because pictures abound in Roman Catholic churches, therefore we must make our sacred edifices as bare as a barn, and as hideous as whitewash can make them. Such was the Puritan reaction. Puritanism is one of the best things the world has ever seen. But it is unjust to Puritanism to saddle it with an antipathy to pictures. Idolatrous pictures no doubt it hates as the Moslem hates sculpture. But no poet ever revelled more in the glory and the beauty of art than the Puritan Milton.

We have no more right to rob our children and our children's children for ever and ever and evermore of the privilege and the joy of seeing pictures on the wall of school-room and church because some people made an idol of art centuries ago, than we have to starve the scholars in our Board schools year after year because of the gluttony which some schools indulged in twenty years ago at a school treat. To-day everything that succeeds is illustrated. Magazines without pictures are magazines without circulation. Newspapers find it more and more necessary to employ the pencil as well as the pen in appealing to the multitude. Eyegate can no longer be neglected. Those who will not illustrate what they want to teach will have no scholars. A school without pictures is a school without windows. Pictures let in the light of another and a different world.

SOME PRACTICAL CONSIDERATIONS.

Those who, like myself, have had the unspeakable privilege of an actual compulsory sojourn in a convict prison can testify to the hunger of the eyes for something more human and more beautiful than the stone wall, the barred skylight, and the locked door. The Russians in this, as in many other things, are more humane than the English. A Russian prison chapel is ablaze with colour. The walls glow with pictures, and the convicts have at least the consolation of once a day coming out of their grey grim cells into the light and glory of a radiant art consecrated to the service of religion. The contrast between the St. Petersburg prison chapel and the chapels of Coldbath-in-the-Fields and Holloway impressed me very much.

There is the same contrast, to a greater or less extent. between the churches and class-rooms of the Protestants and the Roman Catholics. I am well aware that to many good people nothing can prejudice my plea for pictures more than this reference to the practice of Romanists. But descending to the level of such critics, may I remind them that the famous maxim that there is no reason why the devil should have all the best tunes. expresses a sound principle which may equally well be applied to pictures. Why should the staunch Protestant give the Papist a monopoly of pictures? There is nothing papistical in a picture per se. Fas est et ab hoste doceri. It is not only lawful but wise to take lessons from the enemy. And the wise man, instead of confounding all pictures in Sunday-schools with the anathema hurled against the Scarlet Woman of Babylon, will carefully utilize all that is good in pictures in the mural decoration of school-rooms and mission-rooms, and only avoid that which is evil.

A CONCESSION TO PREJUDICES.

These considerations led me to select as the subject for my second Portfolio a series of pictures suitable for the decoration of the walls of Sunday-schools, class-rooms, and mission-rooms. As a concession to Protestant prejudices, I have made no attempt to embody in my series of pictures the leading events in the Evangelical story. From one point of view the Sunday School Portfolio should have contained pictures of the Annunciation, the Nativity, the Baptism, the Transfiguration, the Lord's Supper, the Crucifixion, and the Ascension. But the best artists who have treated these subjects are not Protestants, and these themes form the common stock-in-trade, so to speak, of the decorators of every papistical conventicle. To make visible the story that transformed the world. men carved it in stone and built it in the cathedral, and then, lest even the light of Heaven should come to the eye of man without bearing with it the Story of the Cross, they filled their church windows with stained glass, so that the sun should not shine without throwing into higher relief the leading features of the wonder-working epic of His life and death." But this method of enforcing the salient features of the Evangelical story upon the multitude has, in the minds of many, almost come to have a Romanist taint. Therefore I have adopted another line.

d ran, and

ogether and

THE WORLD ROMANCE OF THE PRODIGAL SON.

Instead of twelve small pictures, such as those in Portfolio No. 1, I am publishing six twice the size, in order that they may be the more easily seen on the walls. When once the central episodes of the Life of Christ are excluded, there is nothing in the Gospel which embodies more of the essential truth of Christianity than the parable of the Prodigal Son. Nor is it only Christianity that this parable embodies; it is instinct with humanity. Men of all religions and of none recognise the pathos and the truth of the story, which touches the highest height and the lowest depth of human experience. It is a worldromance told in the compass of the shortest of short stories. It contains every ingredient that makes up the tragedy and the comedy of life—youth and age, wanton pleasure and sad remorse, feasting and starvation, opulence and poverty, reckless selfishness and humble penitence, the joy of life and the dregs of despair, the whole redeemed and glorified by the tender, forgiving love of the father. There is no parable like it in literature, no teaching more universal, more direct, or more true. The parable of the Prodigal Son is the storied commentary and explanation of the first words in the Lord's Prayer.

MURILLO FOR THE MULTITUDE.

Murillo, the Spanish artist, devoted his genius to the painting of a series of six pictures, which in six acts or scenes set forth the whole parable. These pictures have never been photographed or engraved, or rendered generally accessible to the public. Five of them for a long time belonged to Lord Dudley, but the gem of the collection, which was regarded as one of the treasures of the Vatican, belonged to the Pope. It was only in recent years that Lord Dudley was able, by arts into which it is well not to look too closely, to gain possession of the sixth picture. The whole set subsequently passed into the possession of Mr. Alfred Beit, and they now hang in his beautiful palace in Park Lane. I first saw them when dining with Mr. Beit and Mr. Fitzpatrick just before the outbreak of the present war, and was immensely struck with the life and vigour of the pictures. Hence when I began the publication of the Portfolios and I wanted a scripture subject for our Sunday-schools, I at once recalled these splendid Murillos. If Mr. Beit had been like many of my friends—friends who in their zeal to slay their brother Boer have excommunicated me for pleading for mercy, justice, and arbitration-I should have hesitated to apply to him for the privilege of reproducing the pictures of the Prodigal Son. But Mr. Beit being of the school of Mr. Rhodes, does not allow honest differences of opinion on political matters to prejudice his private friendships. He at once gave me leave to photograph the Murillos. And so it comes to pass that our Sunday-schools for the first time have the opportunity of securing copies of the six best pictures of the Prodigal Son in existence for the decoration of Each of the pictures measures 13 ins. by 10 ins. without the margin. The full size of the plates for framing is 16 ins. by 13 ins. The set of six, framed complete in neat black frame and glazed, will be sent by parcel post to any one in the United Kingdom for a postal order or 7s. 6d. And with the six pictures of the Prodigal will be sent as a presentation plate a collotype reproduction of the Sistine Madonna, Raphael's masterpiece. If any friend and sympathiser with Sunday-school work wishes to help the Sunday-school in which he is interested, he can give the Prodigals to the Sunday-school and keep the Madonna for himself. The Portfolio, unframed, will be sent anywhere in the United Kingdom for 1s. 4d., or to any foreign address for 1s. 6d.

A SUGGESTION FOR FRIENDS OF SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

It has occurred to me, as an old Sunday-school teacher, that the issue of this Portfolio affords superintendents and teachers an admirable opportunity of interesting their scholars in the decoration of their class-rooms. Why should not each class be asked to collect the sum necessary to buy, framed and glazed, the set of the Prodigal Son? Or, in poorer districts, why should not the same appeal be made to buy the Portfolio without frames? Fastened with drawing pins to the wall, they look very well. There is no class so poor but it could collect 1s. 6d. Very few would find any difficulty in collecting 7s. 6d. A penny per head in a school of 100 would more than defray the cost of the set, framed and glazed. A penny a head in a school of twenty would more than pay the cost of the Portfolio. In a circular to the Sunday-schools I propose to issue a small collecting card, so that any scholar desirous of brightening the walls of the schoolroom can find an immediate and easy method of gratifying his pious ambitions. And at the foot of each picture bought by such means and presented to the school the name of the donor or collector might be written in a space left blank after the words, "Presented by ." There are many, from the great Popes downwards, who are willing to do great things and give great sums for the adornment of sacred edifices, but they like to have their name inscribed thereupon. The collector could in all cases have the presentation plate for his pains, if, as sometimes would be the case, some of his fellow-teachers objected to the appearance of the Madonna on the walls of the schoolroom. The words "presented by" are only printed on the Prodigal Series supplied direct to schools which have raised the sum for the Portfolio in this fashion.

The Sistine Madonna is too well known to need any description. It has long been recognised as the most ideal type of proud motherhood and happy childhood that has ever been placed on canvas. The Prodigal Son Series can best be judged by a glance at the reproductions in miniature which form the frontispiece of this article. The diminutive size of the reproduction does no justice to the clearness and excellence of the picture. But they tell the story.

TEN PORTFOLIOS FOR TEN SHILLINGS.

A North Country Vicar, writing to me about Portfolio No. 1, says:—

I have just procured Part I of your Portfolio, and am fairly astounded at the beauty and tone of the thirteen pictures it contains. The working-classes have now absolutely no excuse for not possessing tasteful works of true art. I trust that such as these will quickly take the place of the daubs and caricatures so extensively found in the homes of the poor.

In the provision of cheap literature and art you have made yourself a national benefactor. I shall certainly recommend this Masterniece Portfolio to my parishioners.

this Masterpiece Portfolio to my parishioners.

P.S.—Cheap as these pictures are—surprisingly so—could any arrangements be made by which a man like myself could supply them to others without cost of carriage, etc.?

In answer to his postscript, I can only say that any one who will buy ten Portfolios can have them for 10s., carriage paid, to any one address in the United Kingdom, which will render it possible for our North Country friend to carry out his benevolent desire.

far in write All congrof picthe m think confu

If eleme can, "swe you w far (e. If Rose pictur Turne statue

Enthe enaturintered As for thing is a district Briton gilt fi and v

to pa

the a

the w

good The excel

HOOLS.

y-school perintenteresting s-rooms. the sum t of the should Portfolio the wall, r but it difficulty chool of , framed ty would circular ollecting ghtening mediate nbitions. h means lonor or after the re many, g to do ornment r name in all s, if, as teachers he walls are only schools in this eed any he most ood that gal Son ductions article. ustice to they tell Portfolio

am fairly ictures it o excuse that such aricatures ve made commend

ould any ld supply

any one or Ios., ingdom, Country

From Portfolio No. 1.

LEAR AND CORDELIA.

By G. W. Joy.

AN ARTIST'S TESTIMONY.

I have received many other letters from near and from far in praise of the contents of Portfolio No. 1. An artist writes from Hastings :-

Allow me as an artist to add one more to the many congratulations you must have received on the excellent Portfolio of pictures you have issued. They are simply wonderful for the money, and for the most part very well chosen, though I think pictures like the "Israel in Egypt" too elaborate and confused in composition for reproduction on so small a scale.

If you can only, to use your own words, "introduce some elements of beauty in the daily lives of your fellow-men," and can, by the subtle yet far-reaching force of art, in any way "sweeten the temper, soften the heart, and soothe the nerves, you will have put past achievements in the shade, and have gone far (excuse me) to atone for your attitude on the present war!

If it is possible to obtain them, might I suggest "The Briar Rose" of Burne-Jones, and some of the late Albert Moore's pictures for pure beauty of line and composition, some of Turner's from the National Gallery, or a portfolio of famous statues, so that people might learn that there is something in a work of art besides the subject?

English people are, as a rule, so profoundly ignorant of even the elements of art, so much more literary than artistic both by nature and training, that subject is all they care for. If that interests them, they like a picture; if it does not, they dislike it. As for beauty of line, of colour, of composition—in fact, all things an artist strives for—they understand nothing about it; it is a dead letter to them.

I am only afraid the vulgarity of taste innate in the average Briton will still make him prefer his hideous chromos in sham gilt frames, and consider them more decorative than simple black and white. I have been invalided for some years, and obliged to pass most of my time in lodgings at various health resorts, and the awful chromos and terrible oil-daubs that invariably disfigure the walls have been a continual source of suffering. May your good endeavours bring forth fruit.

A LESSON FROM AMERICA.

The Art for Schools Association has been carrying on excellent work for some years past. But nothing that we have done in this country approaches the systematic fashion in which they have attempted to give schoolroom instruction in some of the American States. "The photographic art," says a writer in the Educational Review. "has made possible schoolroom instruction in the great works of architecture, sculpture, painting." He suggests that every school should have photographs, although good collotypes would be quite as good, of the following masterpieces in architecture, painting and sculpture :-

1. Architecture. The Parthenon. Cologne Cathedral.

2. Painting. Raphael's "Transfiguration," "Sistine Madonna," and "St.
Cecilia"; of Holbein's "Dresden Madonna"; of Coreggio's "Holy Night," and Da Vincis" (Last Supper."

3. Sculpture. The "Apollo Belvedere," the Laocoon," Michael Angelo's "Moses," and the Mudici merches and also of the

and the Medici marbles, and also of the antique busts of "Zeus Otricoli" and "Hera Ludovisi."

He suggests that the teachers should "on stated occasions, say twice a month, explain to the pupils the motives that the artist has depicted in the composition of his pictures—for the composition is the first thing to study in a work of art. The pupils will become skilful in interpreting pictures after the analysis of a few famous ones from the great masters."

A NEW PORTFOLIO FOR THE DAY SCHOOLS.

This programme is, I fear, a little above the heads of us poor Britishers-at least at present. The immediate want most felt by our elementary school teachers is pictures, not of the classical order, but pictures which will interest their children and at the same time afford them texts on which to tell them stories. It has been specially impressed upon me that the Board schoolteacher wants to have good pictures of animals and living creatures, for the purpose of inculcating kindliness and sympathy in our dealings with our poor relations in fur and feathers. So, in order to meet this need, I have in preparation a third Portfolio, differing from both No. 1 and No. 2, in that it will be solely devoted to pictures of animals. By dispensing with a presentation plate, Portfolio No. 3 will contain eighteen beautiful reproductions of some of the best pictures of animals and birds that are accessible in any of our galleries. I do not expect to be able to publish No. 3 before the middle May I suggest to managers of schools and others what a pleasant surprise it would be, both for teachers and scholars, if in the summer holidays the schoolroom were to be decorated by placing these eighteen pictures on the walls?

Portfolios by Post.

The Portfolio can be sent by post direct from this Office, and when properly packed and posted the cost of No. 1 Portfolio is as follows:

To Addresses in the United Kingdom.—One Portfolio for is. 4d.; two for 2s. 4d. (if sent in one parcel); three for 3s. 5d.; four for 4s. 6d.

To Addresses Abroad. - One Portfolio for 1s. 6d.; two for 2s. 8d. (if sent in one parcel); three for 3s. 11d.; four for 5s. 1d.; or five for 6s. 4d.

LEADING ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

OUGHT WOMEN TO CYCLE, ROW, ETC.?

AN INTERESTING FRENCH SYMPOSIUM.

OUR enterprising contemporary, the Revue des Revues of Paris, henceforth to be known as La Revue et Revue des Revues, published in its July number a most interesting symposium upon "Women and Modern Sports."

The questions submitted to a great number of eminent persons were these:—

I. Are women ceasing to be women through their devotion to the physical exercises known under the general head of Sports?

2. Are these out-of-door recreations a healthy diversion, or are they to be considered as a kind of infatuation prejudicial to her future?

The balance of opinion in the replies received was undoubtedly in favour of women enjoying themselves in out-of-door sports. Although few are quite so enthusiastic as M. Berenger, who sees in the movement a possible reconciliation of Minerva and Aphrodite, most of the women and many of the men are strongly opposed to excluding women from the healthful recreation supplied by out-of-door sports.

M. ZOLA ON THE CYCLING SKIRT.

The most elaborate reply is that of M. Emile Zola:-

I am a partisan of all physical exercises which can assist in the development of woman, always providing that she does not abuse it. I am not speaking simply of physical beauty, but chiefly of moral development, the manifestations of individuality which the practice of sports brings more rapidly to young girls.

The bicycle, which one can take as a type par excellence of modern sport, seems to me to be capable of contributing in a large measure to this individual development.

As for the comradeship which sport quickly establishes between young men and young women, I think that it cannot but aid to better knowledge in view of marriage. I have always contended for mixed education, which as you know has had such splendid results in England and America. The bringing together of both sexes in youth gives excellent results.

As regards the costume of sportswomen, I do not find it so disgraceful as some pretend. It is comfortable, practical, and a well-built woman would always know how to show off her figure even if the costume in which she was dressed resembled somewhat that of a man. At bottom it is a question of fashion, which a clever costumier can change from day to day. I must confess that English women have reconciled me to the skirt. The provision centres of London are sufficiently far removed from the smiling cottages of the outskirts, to cause young ladies to go awheel for provisions in the morning, and however uninteresting they may be on foot, I always watched them pedalling to market with the greatest pleasure. Turn over the leaves in some drawing-room of an old album containing the portraits of the ancestors of the family, or better still before the time when photography was discovered, pass round the fashion plates of the time of the restoration, or of Louis Philippe, and you will hear the young ladies of to-day ask how people dared go out dressed in that way.

You fear that the introduction of sports amongst women will make them so virile that their companions will not show them that respectful deference, that particular courtesy towards all women, which is called gallantry. Reassure yourself. While retaining the observation of that politeness which is due to her, I do not think that one should see in woman an idol whom one should only address with timid respect. That familiarity which shocks you amongst sportsmen, is a manifestation of audacity, and audacity pleases women better than timidity.

THE QUEEN OF ROUMANIA.

N

of 1

Jun Sta

the pol

sce

Eu

gra

al

frui

Jur

and

cor

Fra

to 1

fer

nat

Sta

he

of]

of

civ

fut be

the

exp

acc

pla

wa

vei

Mı

sin

ma

thi

pl:

the

thi

on

vei

ral

tha

to

ing

we

tha

twe

life

a c tha kil

I would allow all modern sports to woman if she remains gracious and sympathetic like Sakountala, if she succours the unhappy like Saint Genevieve, if she composes music like Saint Cecilia, if she spins like Queen Bertha, if she weaves like Penelope, if she embroiders like the ancient Roumanian Princesses, if she paints books of hours like Ann of Brittany, if she cares for the wounded like Florence Nightingale, if she makes verses like Margaret of Navarre and like the Empress Elizabeth of Austria. . . .

As for courage in women I do not think there is need to recall Joan of Arc, or the daughter of the Dacian King, who used her arm in place of a bolt across the door which barred the last retreat of her Father Decebal, or the martyrs, or the mothers: the courage of woman is proved, she has no need of sport to convince the world of it.

If sport gives rise to any disquietude within me it is because I fear to see the chivalrous man slain by the modern Amazon.

CARMEN SYLVA.

THE DUCHESSE D'UZES.

Certainly I approve. All sports are hygienic up to the moment when they cause too much fatigue.

I think that this style is not the result of a simple fashion or chic, but is the necessary environment of new manners. Everything changes. The time has passed for the womanlets of the lounge chair, who are not women, but mere articles of furniture.

I am a feminist, but I trust in a good way. Because woman is the guardian of the cradle, the more you elevate woman the more you elevate the family. That is why I am not afraid when the mother, the wife, the sister, the daughter follows more or less her sons, husband, brother, or father in sport.

Could the woman who knows how to confront every danger bear a son who knows fear?

BARONESS BERTHA VON SUTTNER.

Everywhere there is evolution, everywhere change. Take care, my contemporaries, my brothers, to change your ideal also. Do not think that the type of woman whom you prefer, either by conviction or by habit, represents "woman," and that every woman who wishes to introduce a new trait into her life ought so to modify it that she may always remain the "lady of your dreams."

Modify your dreams, rather, gentlemen!

Sport is health. Therefore it is an element of happiness for the individual and for the race.

Thus riding, swimming, cycling, gymnastics, all these should form part of a young girl's education. I would like to see hunting excluded from sports, for, while I admit that it strengthens the muscles, I fear that it hardens the heart.

DR. MAX NORDAU.

Whatever she does, I believe that psychically a woman remains a woman. In sports, even of the most masculine character, she has other ambitions and other aspirations than man. The question of dress pre-occupies her. She tries to please by her provess.

It is another form of coquetry, it is always coquetry. I have often thought that Diana, if she had worn a pretty hunting costume, would have been happy to have excited the admiration of Actæon. She had him slain simply because he had the indelicacy to look at her before the seamstress had done her work.

The adventures of Penthesilea prove, it seems to me, how much even the belligerent Amazon remains a woman even to die for love!

Why do women give themselves up to sport? I am not competent to answer this question; it should be asked of the women.

THE UNITED STATES OF EUROPE.

A NEW RÔLE FOR FRANCE.

M. ANATOLE LEROY-BEAULIEU, the eminent member of the Institute, contributes to the Revue des Revues of June 1st a powerful and eloquent essay on "The United States of Europe." He argues that a rapprochement of the European peoples is not only a possibility, it is also a political and economic necessity. Not even the most sceptical statesmen, he says, will venture to assert that Europe is condemned for ever to remain a mere geographical expression, and that all efforts to constitute a living and compact federation will always remain

M. Mielle takes up the discussion in the Revue of June 15th, in an admirable paper entitled "Patriotism He argues with fervour and and Internationalism." conviction that the transformation is inevitable, and that France ought, as the international country par excellence, to take the initiative in bringing it about. France, says this fervid patriot, is the natural nucleus round which other nations would group themselves and form the United States of the future. In the fulfilment of that beau rôle, he declares, lies the secret of her glory and the fulfilment of her destinies. France must become the point of union of the peoples, the heart of Europe, the heart of the civilised world. Internationalism is the watchword of the future. It rests with Frenchmen to say whether it will be for them or against them. If France does not take the lead the task will inevitably be accomplished at her expense. France must be international or there will be no more France.

Shields in Warfare.

BEFORE Lord Roberts left for the front he kindly accepted a shield or breastplate of aluminium which was sent him by its inventor, Miss Helen S. The Chinese Murphy. since then have been making inquiries as to the supply in large numbers of this bullet-proof breastplate, although, with characteristic precaution, they wanted them doubly thick. Miss Murphy is one of our few women inventors, and she is naturally pleased at the thought that in these feminine days it has been left for a lady to replace Vulcan in forging the breastplate of Mars.

THE COUNTESS DE LA WARR contributes very interesting "Gleanings of the Past" to the May Humanitarian. Among other curious facts she mentions this :-

In an old copy of the Spectator, published just when railroads were beginning, I have read an article in which the writer said that anyone must be mad who could believe that a speed of twenty miles an hour could ever be attained without danger to life. He added, you might just as well talk of being shot out of a cannon from Woolwich to London, as to hint at such a thing. that the mere fact of going through the air at that speed would kill you.

TOWN AND COUNTRY IDEALS.

ONE of the most interesting articles in the Nineteenth Century for July is that of Mrs. S. A. Barnett, entitled, "Town Children in the Country." It is an account of an attempt made to get from city-bred children their impressions of country life. Various questions were put to the children, and many of the answers are well worth

In reply to a question as to the names of the young of various animals, the following answers were given :-

- "A baby horse is a ponny."
- "A baby fox is an ox-a thorn."
- "A baby deer is a reindeer-a oxen."
- "A baby frog is a tertpol-a fresher-a toad."
- "A baby sheep is a bar lamb."
- "A baby rabbit is a mammal."

ASTRONOMY FROM THE SLUMS.

The following are some of the replies of fifth and sixth standard children to the question, "What causes the moon to shine?"

- " Electricity causes the moon to shine."
- "The moon revolving round the sun, which gives light by unknown planets.
 - "It is the darkness which shows it up."
- "The moon is the shadow of the earth on the clouds."
- "The eclipse of the sun."
 The clou ls."

RABBITS AND BOARHOUNDS.

In reply to the question, "Why does a rabbit wobble its head," some strange answers were given :—

- "To make holes in the ground," wrote one child.
 "To account for the formation of its head," was the philosophy
- "It does it when it does what a cow does digests it food," is
- a profound but an unsatisfactory explanation.

 "Its washing its face," shows more credulity than observation; while another discarded reasons, and declared in large round text-hand, regardless of grammar: "I have seen a number of rabbits wobblings its nose!"

Seven only answered the question rightly; but one child, although no inquiry was put concerning dogs, volunteered the information that "French puddles are kept for fancy, Irish terriers as ratters, but the boerhounds are kept for hunting the Boers."

THE JOYS OF THE COUNTRY.

In reply to the question what they most enjoyed in the country, the children replied :-

- "The country boys taught me to swim."
- "The head lady who was Mrs. MacRosee what paid for me at the sports,"
 - "The drive a gentleman gave us in his carriage."
- "The food I had."
- "A game called 'Sister come to Quakers' meeting."
- "A laddie where I stayed. She was a kind and gentle laddie.'
 - "The party which Mrs. Cartwright gave us."
 - " Paddling at a place called flood gates."

"Watching a woman milking a cow. She held the can between her knees and pulled the milk out of the cow. I should like," adds this observer, "to be a farmer."

"I also liked the way in witch I was treated and also liked the respectability of Mrs. Byfield my charge," writes one young prig; but many, both boys and girls, wrote the same sentiment in simpler language—a delightful tribute to our working-class

AMONG the English periodicals containing articles on the Paris Exhibition are the Art Journal and the Temple Magazine for May.

remains ours the

ke Saint

ves like umanian

ittany, if

, if she

Empress

to recall used her

the last nothers :

sport to ecause I

moment

hion or

Everyof the rniture.

woman

nan the id when

e or less danger

Take

al also.

prefer.

nd that her life

lady of ness for should

to see that it

woman

sculine

as than tries to

I have nunting

niration

ad the ne her e, how

m not

of the

on.

YLVA.

GLIMPSES OF TRAVEL

IN OUT-OF-THE-WAY PLACES.

HOLIDAY-READING is an order of literature distinct yet undefined. Everyone has some sort of an idea of what he wants to read on his vacation-trip. He will probably express his preference by negatives; he craves for literature that is expansion and escape. "The common round, the daily task," and all connected with them are precisely what he most wishes to avoid. He takes to poetry rarely. Fiction and works of humour more often form his mental fare. But he probably finds most congenial pasture in the travel papers of the magazines. They suit his mood, and take him furthest from use and wont. The July magazines show a quickening sense of these needs. They cater plentifully for hot weather and the holidays, and samples of the supply they offer may fitly find place here.

AMONG THE JUNGLE-FOLK.

About as far away as could well be from our crowded civilisation are the jungle-folk whom Mr. Edward A. Irving, writing from Perak, introduces to the readers of Blackwood as "primitive socialists." They call themselves the Upland people and inhabit the highlands of the Malay Peninsula. Mr. Irving got to know them by an Italian whom the British Government employs to keep a bridle-path clear of obstruction, and who in his turn employs the Upland people to do the work. They are small of stature, very few of the men over five feet; far from muscular; of brown skin and curly black hair; and not ill-looking. They live in one-roomed huts about fifteen feet by twelve, with walls about two feet high. Their livelihood was won by snaring and killing game, including rats; but the Italian official has brought them some of the rudiments of civilisation. "He has given them clothes, he has made them plant corn." The harvest supplies them with a mighty orgy of feasting. Every month he replenishes their stock of farinaceous food, tobacco and betel nut. He sees in them the archetype of what Italy ought to be, no political superiority, no use of service, of riches or of poverty, no soldiery, no police, no Pope. Mr. Irving is first impressed with their inoffensiveness:—

Pugnacity seems to be an idea foreign to them. They possess a deadly weapon, the blow-pipe; but I never heard of its being turned against a fellow-man. It may be that the severity of their life has been sufficient to keep down their numbers: the jungle being wide enough for all, competition has never enforced the lesson that the fighter alone is fit to survive. The same gentleness governs their household relationships. . . . But that which most strikes an Englishman on coming into contact with these little creatures, and which draws him at once towards them, is the remarkable openness and candour of their expression. They look at a stranger neither defiantly nor in any way cringing, but carefully and steadily, as if ready for unforeseen action on his part; but when they are reassured, with an expression that is dignified in its simplicity.

ON THE TRAIL OF THE MOOSE.

Another writer in Blackwood describes his adventures "'mid the haunts of the Moose." This is his opening picture:—

No camera can ever reproduce the still beauty of that morning scene when we left the train at 5 a.m. and made ready to leave the little outpost of civilisation. The cool autumn air, fragrant with a hundred scents from the surrounding woods, was still hazy with the smoke of forest-fires that had been smouldering all the summer. Through this gauze-like veil the maples and birches, already turned to gold and crimson beneath the touch of early frosts, shone with a strange luminous beauty that for miles in every direction lit up the ocean of trees with flaming patches of glory. And all was still and silent. There was no wind astir, and the air only trembled very faintly to the musical roar of the waterfalls and tumbling rapids of the Ottawa below.

The party pushed on to Lake Cogawanna, the favourite resort of the moose, on the northern shore of which they pitched their camp :-

When the sun finally disappeared, the shadows of the night fell over a camp as cosy as any hunter could desire, and perhaps a little more comfortable, because one of the party happened to be a young lady. The stillness was almost undearthly when the moon rose over the lake, silvering untold distances, and throwing impenetrable shadows under the trees.

The writer sighted and shot his game, a huge beast, with horns measuring fifty-two inches across and numbering twenty-eight points.

AMID THE VINES OF BURGUNDY.

Blackwood is strong on travels. Mrs. P. G. Hamerton sketches village life in the Val d'Or, amid the vinegrowers and vine-dressers of Burgundy. It is a land not of grapes alone, but of peaches, apricots, and all manner of fruit. The people, she says, generally live in their own inherited houses. Even the vine-dressers are independent:—

Girls of the working class enjoy a great deal of liberty. They are constantly out of doors, know everybody, and laugh and joke with every passer-by. They often dance at night, for it is a custom of the place to grant free entrance to all the balls which take place at the hotel—even to private ones, such as those given at a wedding-feast.

The population is poor, but impressed the writer with its general expression of satisfaction, which she regards as a survival of the old prosperous days, before the deadly phylloxera appeared :--

They are cheerful, light-hearted, sociable, and obliging, though they lack the pleasant politeness of the peasantry. They are proud and democratic, and assume towards everyone a tone of familiarity which it is not always easy to repress without appearing harsh or self-asserting. A little incident which I witnessed may be given as an illustration. A lady of rank, who was driving in her carriage on the main road, stopped her coachman, and addressing a vigneron at work close by, said, "Mon brave homme" (My good man), "what is the name of the village on the top of this hill?" "Ma brave femme, c'est Alluze, pour vous servir," he rejoined with a chuckle.

"No occasion for conviviality is neglected"; but the writer regrets the excessive consumption of wine which, though rarely producing outward signs of drunkenness, impairs the popular physique.

IN A MOORISH GARDEN.

"Moorish Memories" is a vivid sketch in Cornhill of the experience of a concession-hunter. He declares:—

Morocco is the true land of rest, the country of to-morrow, whence are banished by Shereefian decree and national inclination all the discomforts attending ambition, progress, and punctuality. Here, disgusted with the haste of a hurrying world, sick of the obligations and exactions of a pretentious civilisation more tyrannous than the slavery of the East, the pilgrim on life's toilsome journey may rest as a storm-tossed vessel in a mangrove swamp—rest and rust and be thankful for the chance.

... In his Moorish garden, hammocked between two overladen orange trees, inhaling the fragrance of lime and lilac, shaded from the fiery enemy overhead by the cool verdure of mulberry, fig, and pomegranate, the wanderer may here realise the true art of living, with no regret for the past, no unrest about the future.

... What on earth do all these episodes of the civilised life signify to one breathing the atmosphere of Bible days, battling with mosquitoes and sun-rays, lost in a white crowd of worshippers of a creed that scorns innovation as it scorns women? Having, with a wet towel in lieu of white flag, patched up a truce with the sand-flies and mosquitoes, he muses

alo fille Ha and We and tend mirrof in hues the

and.

desc at C

ac

on

the

A cult inner Turn Kirg the vand and tourt Vienew, is, ho

wood

this to the s wood which frame each d covers rest, b by rop admits is a d supplie by rop during ture us general

A M
"Bo
pleasin who do
of the beyond way se isolated is the rately o peacefully on the beauties of the Moorish life, and the music of water plashing from a marble basin on the cool mosaic pavement below is soothing to him in this mood.

stir,

the

irite

they night

and

party

unploto

east,

and rton

vinel not nner

their

are

They l joke is a

which

given

with gards

eadly

iging, They

a tone

ithout

nich I

, who

d her

, said,

e, c'est ut the

which, nness,

hill of es :--

orrow,

nclina-

s, and world, lisation rim on el in a chance.

d lilac,

dure of realise

st about

s of the

of Bible

a white

n as it

ite flag,

e muses

es.

The exquisite beauty of a moonlit evening, the writer observes, is felt only vaguely by the Syrian, not at all by the Moor; "it is the imperturbable Englishman, the shopkeeper, the unromantic slave of Shaitan and fluss," who is impressed by it.

By Norwegian Fjords.

H. Schütz-Wilson, in Gentleman's, gives a pleasing account of a tour along the Norwegian coast. Here is one picture:—

The body supine but the mind active, we saunter down the great Hardanger Fjord. It is, perhaps, a quarter to half a mile in breadth. On the left, islands, and beyond them the sea; on the right, hills, which grow grander and wilder as we swim along. In a day long, long past, all these romantic fjords were filled with ice. On our day the sun shone softly on the Hardanger, and the placid sky was studded with cirro-stratus and with cumulus clouds. These fjords are often very deep. We hear of 600 to 800 fathoms, and the ship cannot sometimes anchor. Nowhere is water purer, clearer, or more lovely in tender colour. The reflections of the shore are most vivid in the mirror of the calm fjord; and the green of grass, the dark grey of rocks, are reflected in colours which surpass in quality the hues of the actual objects. From the Hardanger we pass into the Sór Fjord. The trees chiefly seen are pines, alders, birches; and, now and then, there is a patch of coast which looks as desolate as a bit of Greenland shore. At last, our ship stops at Odde.

WITH THE KIRGHIZ TATARS.

A singular instance of the way in which Western culture is flowing through Russian universities to the innermost recesses of Asia is furnished by Dr. H. Turner's paper in the July Humanitarian. The son of a Kirghiz Sultan, studying at Moscow University, invited the writer to go home with him. By rail, by steamer, and by horse, they travelled into the land of the Kirghizes, and the English guest was entertained in their tent or tourta. He says:—

Viewed from the outside, a tourta, except when it is quite new, looks rather like a large marquee tent that is very dirty. It is, however, constructed differently. A circular trellis-work of wood in three or four parts forms the frame of the tourta. From this trellis, which is about four and a-half feet high, branch out the supports for the roof. These supports are fastened to a wooden hoop, which is kept in position by two cross-pieces, which meet at right angles in the centre of the circle. This frame is covered with large pieces of thick felt, which overlap each other, and reach down to the ground. The felt, which covers the wooden hoop in the centre, is not fastened like the rest, but is drawn backwards and forwards, as occasion requires, by ropes which hang down the sides of the tourta. This hole admits light and lets out smoke when there is a fire. There is a door which is left open during the day, its place being supplied by a piece of felt or mat. At night the door is fastened by ropes on the inside, and when all the inhabitants are out during the day, it is fastened with a padlock. The only furni-ture usually is a bedstead, which stands opposite the door. It is generally of wood, and is overlaid with bone, more or less elabo-

A NEST OF ROSE AND PALM IN SIGHT OF ALPS.

"Bordighera, Past and Present," is the theme of a pleasing paper in the Westminster Review by W. Miller, who describes himself as one of the most devoted lovers of the place. Lying on the Riviera, just three miles beyond the French frontier, it has one of the worst rail-way services to be found in Italy. It is consequently isolated, unspoiled, and unspotted from the world. "It is the most celebrated place in Europe for its palms."

It supplies Rome with the palms required for Church festivals. It has a great trade in roses and carnations. George Macdonald is the uncrowned king of the British colony, of which Mr. Clarence Bicknell and Lord Strathmore are distinguished members. Mr. Miller says:—

The peculiar charm of Bordighera is the great number and variety of its walks and drives. Each of the valleys near it abounds in picturesque sites, where villages rise on the side of olive-clad hills, and streams meander over beds of stone between vineyards and oliveyards. These villages have each some special feature. . . But one need not stir from Bordighera itself to find picturesque houses and charming views. While the new town that has grown up down in the plain near the sea is not strikingly interesting, the old town on the cape is a model of a medieval city on a small scale, with its high walls, its steep and narrow streets, its tall houses and its quaint gateways, one of them still bearing the cross of St. George, emblem of the Genoese Republic. . . From the old town the prospect is splendid. . . . On a clear day, after snow has fallen on the high peaks of the Maritime Alps, one has the additional charm of a glimpse of Alpine scenery under a southern sky.

WITH THE HEROES OF THE LIFEBOAT.

Mr. A. E. Fletcher, in the Windsor, sketches what he calls "A Danish Newlyn," the fishing township Skagen, the northern tip of Denmark. Although it is now accessible by rail, Mr. Fletcher does not anticipate it will lose its unconventional character. "The Skagen folk rather pride themselves" on being said to be "beyond the confines of civilisation." He tells how the shifting sand-dunes have been secured by a grass called "marchalm," which holds the grains together, and in a few years forms a soil on which firs can grow. So "thousands of acres of barren sand have been converted into forest." He says:—

For the artist and man of letters this quaint seaboard parish is never likely to lose its charm. Not only has Nature here as a colourist done some of her best work, producing atmospheric effects of rare richness and variety, but she has peopled the place with as sturdy a race of men as ever braved the hurricane or gave inspiration to bards of heroic song. . . As some three hundred vessels pass the lightship off Skagen Point every day, and as near that lightship there is a very dangerous reef, the services of the Skagen lifeboatmen are more often needed here than elsewhere on the Danish coast.

than elsewhere on the Danish coast.

Like our own delightful fishing village of Newlyn, on the Cornish coast, . . . Skagen and its wild surroundings have given inspiration to a school of painters. Three of Denmark's most famous artists, Peter Severin Kröyer, Michael Peter Ancher, and his wife, have made Skagen their home, and other artists, not only from Denmark, but from Norway and Sweden, have chosen it from time to time as their headquarters. Kröyer is the most famous of this group. . . . Kröyer is now generally regarded as the head of the new school of Danish painters—that is to say, the school which has broken with the Eckersberg tradition which dominated Danish art.

Mr. Fletcher, whose paper is adorned by reproductions of the works of Kröyer and Ancher, closes with this fine remark:—

The more I study the works of Kröyer and Ancher—the more I gaze upon the sturdy forms and look into the calm, beautiful, heroic faces they have grouped and painted, the less I wonder why Christ should have chosen fishermen for His companions.

CHURCHES built at a cost of five shillings, ten pounds and upwards are a rudimentary form of ecclesiastical architecture which Mr. F. M. Holmes introduces to the readers of the July Quiver. From a few poles hung with mats, or mere wattle and daub structures, these "native-built churches" advance to stone buildings and vast cathedrals.

THE CRISIS IN CHINA.

MR. NORMAN'S AXIOMS.

THE first article in the Nineteenth Century for July is by Mr. Henry Norman, and is entitled "Our Vacillation in China and its Consequences." The consequences, Mr. Norman points out, have been a long string of humiliations. Owing to the vacillation of the Government we have failed in China wherever we have taken a hand, and have got nothing from all our scheming except Wei Hai Wei, which is entirely useless, and which, indeed, we have never attempted to turn to any use.

Mr. Norman lays down four axioms which should govern our future relations with China. The first is that there is no such thing as China as a distinct entity:—

It is because there is no such thing as "China" that the military caste of the Manchus, comparatively infinitesimal in numbers, have been able to impose their rule upon the enormous masses of Chinese. Thus it is unwise to predicate anything of China as a whole, or to believe that what suits one part will necessarily suit another. To this extent the partition of China would rest upon a scientific and practical basis.

The second axiom is that China will never reform itself:—

There is not the slightest possibility of the establishment by Chinese authority of a national army, or navy, or civil service. And the corruption which is the fatal curse of China is directly due to the fact that there is not and cannot be any central authority to exercise control over local officials, or, in the absence of this, to pay them. The Chinese people, in the language of physics, is a mechanical mixture and not a chemical compound, and therefore it is irresponsive to the action of any single reagent, and incapable of exhibiting any common property.

Thirdly, Mr. Norman postulates that "Russian ambition has no limits":—

Russia will take all she can possibly get, and, like the rest of us, what she cannot get she will do without. Instead of abusing her, it would be wiser to emulate her qualities, and so seek to put a barrier in her way at the points where the interests of our own country become imperative. It is easy for a strong nation to come to a durable understanding with her—witness Germany and Austria. But we shall never do it by writing sarcastic despatches and making rude speeches, and then meekly accepting her fact accomplished to our injury. That is the policy of the boy who puts his finger to his nose and runs away—and it has been ours for too long.

And the fourth is that "Japan is face to face with a life and death issue in the Far East." If Japan fights it must be not later than six months hence.

Mr. Norman recommends that the Empress should be deported, and the Emperor replaced under the control of representatives of the Powers. The Open Door Policy being dead, each Power should keep order in its sphere:—

Every Power would enter into a formal engagement with all the others that no duties beyond those agreed upon by all should be levied, that no preferential or differential railway rates should be imposed in its sphere, that no force should be raised beyond that necessary to keep order, and that all matters of intercommunication should be decided by the Council of foreign representatives.

An advisory committee of Chinese experts should be formed in London, and Mr. Norman suggests Professor Douglas as a member.

WHAT "DIPLOMATICUS" THINKS.

In the Fortnightly, "Diplomaticus" finds grave fault with the apathy and inattention of the Powers while the present storm was brewing. They have been surprised, he says, but there is absolutely no excuse for their surprise. The coup d'état of the Empress, the decrees she issued, the growth of the Boxer movement, had been the chief topic of discussion in the Far Eastern press, and their gravity proclaimed on the housetops of the Treaty ports. And yet the Powers took no notice and no precautions. "The reforming efforts of the Emperor should have had all our sympathy, and, as far as possible, our active support." For the future, the writer urges that we should cultivate the friendship of Japan rather than that of Russia. He proceeds:—

Our wisest policy is to keep our hands absolutely free, and to be prepared to defead our interests and the status quo ante with adequate strength, both in the north and the west of China, should the occasion arise. We should hold the balance fairly between all the Powers. For the moment there is no necessity to take sides, as in the work of pacification all the Powers are equally interested. Japan is not a whit less interested than Russia, and I can see no reason why she should not participate in the restoration of order on an equality with her great rival. When the pacification is accomplished, our policy is clear. We have to take our stand by the Integrity of China and the Open Door, and we have to insist on the restoration of the legitimate Emperor, with a guarantee of his absolute independence.

A "SCRAMBLE FOR CHINA."

Mr. Demetrius Boulger puts no faith in the Policy of the Open Door as a means of holding China together. In an article in the Contemporary Review he denounces the Open Door as a sham, and prophesies that we are about to witness a scramble for China. Russia, he asserts, is at the back of the Dowager-Empress, and Russia will not consent to her punishment or removal:—

As I have several times pointed out in these pages, our diplomacy has no chance of success in a game of fence with Russia at Pekin, because the trumps are in her hand. Her base of operations is near the scene and drawing closer and closer, the high officials in the capital are under the spell of her power, and in many cases have been suborned from their allegiance by the effect of her money. At the utmost we can only avert the inevitable for a few years, unless the country can be brought to face what would be a colossal struggle with Russia. There is no middle course between opposing Russia tooth and nail on behalf of a worthless and condemned administration, and leaving her undisturbed to realise her objects at Pekin so far as she can, and in accordance with general requirements.

WHAT BRITAIN MUST TAKE.

China is to be divided into spheres, and what Great Britain must do is—to acquire a base for operations in the Vangtse Valley similar to that Russia possesses in the north with regard to Pekin. There cannot be two opinions as to what that base is. The island of Chusan with its unequalled harbour of Tinghai represents exactly the position of which we have need. We occupied it during both of our China wars, and by the Davis Convention we retain the right to prevent any other Power occupying it.

Using Chusan as a base, we could raise any number of local troops; and—in a few years we should have created the best force for controlling our sphere by the successive occupation of Chinkiang-fu, Nanking, Ganking, and Hankow. Our occupation would begiven a Chinese colour, and without direct annexation we could organise dependent governments, or, better still, revive in Central China a kingdom of Nanking.

THE REAL ORIGIN OF "BOXERS."

Another article in the Contemporary on China is that of Mr. Arthur Sowerby, a twenty years' resident in China. Mr. Sowerby has nothing very new to say, but he believes in the capacity of the Chinese people. In the Emperor, however, there is no hope. He is not an able man, and his health is bad. The following is Mr. Sowerby's explanation of the origin of the Boxers:—

to des Ge rec bee sev nar wit

sc bl Ca of ha

pol pea eas rec ext

tion

the

but whi

dea

Ma mi Stat Unit in the A perm Chine Chine Chine

Franche which and, if there three Chines sole in Chine That if fact the Chines in the

An had u of Ca up inc tive :- Chir conflict materia mentio at any

Yet profess their orts. ions. had ctive nould at of nd to with fairly cessity rs are than cipate rival. We Open icy of er. In es the about s, is at ll not s, our e with timate

er base ser, the er, and by the ert the ight to re is no behalf ing her an, and similar Pekin. s. The ghai red. We e Davis Power for conciang-fu, ould be ve could Central is that China. believes imperor, an, and owerby's The "Boxer" movement is the work of Yü Hsien, ex-Governor of Shantung. He took advantage of a spirit of discontent that had arisen from two or three causes in Chih-li and Shantung. The occupation of Kiao Chau by the Germans, the scarcity of rain last autumn—for which the Buddhist priests blamed the Christians—and some differences between the Catholics and their neighbours in Chih-li, were the chief sources of the trouble. No serious difficulty would have arisen had not Yü Hsien given the malcontents his protection and assisted them to organize themselves into the "Great Sword Sect." The movement increased under this patronage, and the winter days, when the villagers and canal population can afford to be idle, were spent by them in drilling, combined with a good deal of rhodomontade. Yü Hsien, through the pressure of the German Government, was removed from Shantung; but he was received at Pekin with great favour and high rewards, and has been appointed Governor of Shansi. He should be marked for severe and condign punishment. The "Boxers" assumed the name "I Ho Chüan," which means "Righteousness conjoined with Protection," and by a pun it becomes "I Ho Ch'uan," "Righteousness and the Fist," hence the nickname "Boxers."

The ranks of the Boxers are composed of the scum population on the banks of the Grand Canal and the peasant farmers in Chih-li and Shantung. They could be easily subdued by a few disciplined troops. Mr. Sowerby recommends the removal of the Empress and the extinction of the Manchu dynasty.

CHINESE COMPETITION WITH AMERICANS.

It is well to be reminded that Europeans have obligations to China as well as China to Europe. Mr. Ho Yow, the Chinese Consul-General to the United States, contributes to the Forum for June a very interesting article, in which he protests against American exclusiveness in dealing with China.

Mr. Ho Yow points out that the Chinese are not really a migratory race. They have never overrun the smaller States which surround them; and the Chinese in the United States have all come from two or three districts in the Kwang-tung province. When they did emigrate to America, it was not with the intention of settling there permanently, and many thousands of them returned to China without any savings. At the present day, in California, so far from cutting down wages, they will not work for wages at which white labour can be procured:—

Chinese cooks and household servants command from forty to fifty dollars per month, and are the best servants on the coast. Chinese labourers get thirty dollars per month, while in San Francisco alone hundreds of white men are daily taking jobs which do not pay them more than twenty-five dollars per month, and, in addition, have to board themselves. In San Francisco there is a large firm of Chinese fruit-packers employing perhaps three hundred hands. A few years ago they discharged all their Chinese help, and put white girls in their stead, for the sole reason that the latter would work for less wages than Chinese would accept when the quantity of work was considered. That they found this policy to be wise is demonstrated by the fact that after a trial of three years they are still tabooing the Chinese and employing whites.

An American official, in 1876, declared that the Chinese had up to that time added 289,700,000 dols. to the wealth of California, and they had done this chiefly by taking up industries which white men could not make remunerative:—

Chinese fit into the world's 'industry in ways which do not conflict with white labour. They work up the odds and ends of materials and convert them into useful forms. The tule lands mentioned were reed swamps upon which whites would not work at any price, owing to the prevalence of malaria.

AMERICAN ILL-TREATMENT OF CHINESE.

Yet not only labourers, but Chinese merchants and professional men are subjected to all kinds of restrictions even when merely travelling. They are kept in confinement for long periods while waiting for their certificates:—

In this prison are held, for long periods, Chinese gentlemen worth hundreds of thousands of dollars; men of vast interests, tea merchants, scholars, owners of extensive establishments of chinaware, bankers, owners of ships. They are deprived of their liberty, and subjected to indignities of exquisite refinement, while their pecuniary loss is beyond computation. Indeed, it does not seem possible to devise a scheme whereby greater impediment, discomfort, and hardship could be imposed upon the merchants of China doing business in this country in an orderly manner. By recent rulings of the Treasury Department all Chinese bankers, lawyers, doctors, teachers, and missionaries are debarred from the United States as not being entitled to enter this country—a ruling which was never made or thought of before, and which entails an additional hardship upon the Chinese.

CHINA TOWN IN LONDON.

THE Yellow Problem, which is taking on so sanguinary a tinge in the Far East, may be studied at least in miniature and "on the spot" a great deal nearer home. Mr. George A. Wade reminds us in the English Illustrated that there is a piece of genuine China in England. Limehouse Causeway in the East End of London is the Chinese quarter of the British Metropolis. Mr. Wade says:—

It is probably twelve years or so since the Celestials first settled in this district, where to-day they reign supreme. They have some seven or eight shops there, and these are on the whole fairly clean, even to our eyes, which view things so differently from those of the Chinese. . . . And over the doors and windows of the latter you will see painted in full glory the classic names of Lum Yat Wah, Wong Chung Wei, and such-like.

AH SIN AS A HUSBAND.

John Chinaman readily adopts English names like his own, as, for example, "John Chance," or "Charles King," and also English wives. Such weddings are frequent, and Chinese husbands are popular. Mr. Wade quotes the testimony of an expert. He says:—

I had the pleasure of seeing, while pursuing my researches in this neighbourhood, a voluble Irishwoman who had, in the first case, had for her husband a son of Erin, and then, on his decease, had taken, "for better or for worse," a Chinaman. She assured me that she much preferred the second husband to the first; and, indeed, as she still keeps about the locality, though again a widow, there is once more an opportunity for any Celestial who desires to make Ireland have one injustice the less.

Here truly is a complication of the Yellow difficulty. If the Chinaman beats the Englishman in connubial competition, the outlook becomes appalling.

"HARMLESS, KINDLY, PICTURESQUE."

The Chinaman never quarrels with his neighbours, and they are on excellent terms with him. They bear willing witness to his goodness and kindness to the children around him. The children of the Anglo-Chinese marriages are sometimes unmistakably English, sometimes as pronouncedly Chinese. They are always given English names, both Christian and surname, and wear English dress. John Chinaman's vices are principally gin-drinking and opium-smoking. Mr. Wade sums up his impressions thus:—

Taken altogether, however, the Chinaman in Limehouse is a most peaceable, inoffensive, harmless character. He is on good terms with his neighbours, most of whom speak well of him. He is picturesque in a region where it is sadly needed; his street is unique in this country. It might be thought that the district would somewhat resent his presence there, but, on the whole, it must be confessed that Limehouse is rather proud of the honour done it by his being where he is!

ON THE CONDUCT OF THE WAR.

AN INEXPLICABLE RETREAT.

It is a grim picture, terrible in its realism, which Mr. G. O. Moorhead draws in Cornhill of his experience with a Boer ambulance in Natal. The effect of the first British victory makes one marvel that it was not at once followed up. There is something painful to an English reader in the cynical account the Boers gave of our troops' advance:—

The troops, they said, had come out into the open in their time-honoured and expected style, had attacked the hill in their best go-ahead manner and had been shot in droves; but the shell fire had been too much for Boer flesh and blood to stand. . . . The Boers were much dispirited at their reverse, and blamed their generals and officers freely. . . On the march we found out how great had been the moral effect of Friday's battle on the Boers, for most of the Commandos were shorn of half their strength. The farmers had in many instances ridden straight home from the field; thus the Piet Retief burghers, who went into action some 400 strong and had lost about fifteen men, now mustered only some ninety—the others had vanished; not for long, however, for they were very soon driven back.

The doctor records the horror of his surprise when he found that the British were in retreat—he uses the word rout. He says:—

To us who knew the demoralised condition of the burghers the retreat seemed inexplicable. Some madness seemed to have seized these hardy troops, who had given so good an account of themselves at Talana, or very possibly some terrible pressure we knew nothing of had caused this ill-omened retreat.

HOW DUNDEE WAS EVACUATED.

Mr. E. E. Easton continues his narrative, "Inside the Boer Lines," in the July number of Harper's Magazine. He deals with the evacuation of Dundee, the battles of Elandslaagte and Rietfontein, and the investment of Ladysmith. When the Boers occupied Dundee they found, writes Mr. Easton:—

Decuments, portfolios, sketches, and maps, all marked "Secret military information." . . . There were portfolios of military sketches of the various routes for an invasion into the Transvaal and the Orange Free State, prepared by a Major Grant, Captain Melvill, and Captain Gale, immediately after the Jameson Raid. One of the documents was entitled "Reconnaissance Reports of Lines of Advance through the Free State," prepared by Captain Wolley, of the English Intelligence Division of the War Office in 1897, and accompanied by the usual memorandum, signed by Sir Redvers Buller, to keep it secret. In one of the papers giving in minute detail the physical features of the Transvaal and the Free State, the fortifications in each, and the population and military resources of the two Republics, it was estimated that possibly four thousand Cape and Natal colonists would attempt to side with the Republics in the event of war. In commenting upon the Boers individually the author expressed the opinion that a large proportion of young Boers had materially deteriorated in marksmanship and horsemanship from the standard of their fathers in the previous war for independence, having entered more sedentary pursuits.

JOUBERT'S GENEROSITY.

Concerning the late General Joubert there are several sympathetic passages, of which the following are the most interesting:—

I saw him almost daily for many weeks subsequent to this, but at no time did he impress me other than as a kind-hearted old man with a fatherly spirit. He was out of place as the commanding officer of the Boers; personally he was too tender and sympathetic for a military officer in the field. He had remarkable ability as a strategist; he had too high an estimation of human life, even that of the enemy, to execute some of his own plans for offensive operations.

And later, after he had received the affidavits of several burghers with reference to the conduct of the Lancers after Elandslaagte—

General Joubert told me that he did not believe the English commanding officers would countenance such acts of barbarism on the part of individuals in their troops. The old Boer general explained these acts as natural on the part of irresponsible soldiers seasoned in numerous wars against savages.

According to Mr. Easton, the memory of Elandslaagte was the most potent influence which led to the investment of Ladysmith.

FRONTAL ATTACKS NOT OBSOLETE.

Mr. J. Bürde, an ex-infantry officer in the Prussian army, has an article in the Contemporary Review on "The War and Modern Tactics," in which he combats the contention that the present war has shown the obsoleteness of modern tactics, and especially of the system of frontal attack. The battles which raised the outcry of obsolete tactics were Stormberg, Magersfontein and Colenso, and Mr. Bürde points out that owing to accidental circumstances Colenso was the only battle which could count. But at Colenso the defeat was caused by failure to carry out the frontal attack properly, and not by the inadequacy of the plan. The bombardment was begun three days before the fight, the Boers repairing their trenches every night, whereas the artillery attack should properly not have been separated from the infantry attack. Another mistake was the neglect to send a sufficient force against Hlangwane Hill. Finally, the loss of the batteries caused the loss of the battle, which Mr. Bürde thinks would otherwise have been a victory. He thinks that General Buller made an error of judgment when he decided to retreat after the battery incident :

And why was the attack broken off? To the student of military history only one cause suggests itself, and that is, the old experience that a general who goes to the front himself is liable to be influenced by local occurrences, and thereby loses the ability of conducting a battle as an organic whole. Steinmetz and Skobeloff had to learn that the front line is not the place for a general, so long as there are still reserves to be disposed of; Prince Kraft narrates another example of the same kind, and warns generals against the danger accruing from their being with the firing line. The Prussian staff insist that officers commanding battalions and larger units should accustom themselves in peace maneauvres to conduct the fight from behind. A British officer who served with distinction in the last Egyptian campaign made the following remark to me shortly after the war:—"In the battles of this campaign our generals, with very few exceptions, were with the firing line. If they do the same thing when fighting with a force trained on the European model, then I do not know how they will be able to conduct a battle."

Colenso was therefore lost owing to the bad execution of the plan, not to its inherent inadequacy, and it proved nothing whatever as to the obsoleteness of frontal attacks. As to the superiority of flank attacks, Mr. Bürde points out that Lord Roberts's success was due, not to flank attacks, but to strategical turning movements executed by his mounted arms.

THE PRESS AT THE FRONT.

In Harper's Magazine, Mr. F. A. Mackenzie writes concerning the correspondents in South Africa. Special mention is made of Mr. Pearse, of the Daily News, Mr. Steevens, of the Daily Mail, and Mr. Knight and Mr. Winston Churchill, of the Morning Post. The writer gives a very good account of the hardships attendant upon a special correspondent's life, and deals especially with the censorship of despatches in South Africa. He gives a very good example of the effect of the censorship:—

Africant online Britant lon

M

and the othe stro gun man and side Rol

I

not,

brou

have suffiheav how char T fact had our service come orga with associated war.

(1) of the charge of the of States It its for such inclu An Rose a num

Th

Color and t before which which The s thinks

The correspondent writes: "Heavy Boer attack. Guns rain shell fire on position. Severe losses, both yesterday and to-day."
The message reaches the foreign editor in London thus:
"Heavy rain yesterday and to-day."

eral

cers

glish

n on peral

sible

agte

nent

sian

on bats

the

the

the tein

g to attle

was erly,

ard-

oers

lery

the

t to ally,

ttle,

en a rror

ttery

nt of

, the loses

tein-

t the e dis-

same

their ficers

hemptian r the verv

same odel,

le."

ution

oved

acks.

oints

cuted

vrites

ecial

, Mr. Mr.

vriter

dant

· He

ip:-

IN DEFENCE OF ARTILLERY.

Major-General C. H. Owen writes in the United Service Magazine on "The Employment of Artillery in South Africa." He does not share the general belief that artillery has been shown to be ineffective by the experience of the war. The Boer artillery did little damage only because it was posted at extreme ranges, and the British artillery was ineffective only because in most cases it was employed against entrenchments constructed long in advance. General Owen says:—

In Sir R. Buller's attack on Pieter's Hill, when the field guns and howitzers were massed and could get a cross or enfliade fire, the effect of their shells was very destructive, as well as in the other attempts to force a way to Ladysmith. Against the strongly entrenched positions in Natal, firing direct, the field guns could of course do little, but the field howitzers were in many cases effective. Official despatches show that both horse and field artillery have been of the greatest assistance on the west side of the operations, both before and after the arrival of Lord Roberts.

As to the complaint that the British artillery was inferior to that of the Boers, General Owen says:—

It is true that our field artillery has been frequently out-ranged; not, however, by field artillery, but by position and siege guns brought into entrenched positions. This does not, as the public have been led to believe, show that our field guns are not sufficiently powerful. We have, perhaps, the most formidable heavy field piece that has yet been used in warfare—the field howitzer, which fires a shell weighing 50 lbs., with a bursting charge of lyddite.

The neglect to provide position artillery was due to the fact that for years we had been fighting enemies who had no artillery at all. It is doubtful whether most of our generals have ever heard of such a class of ordnance.

DEMAND FOR SERVICE REFORM—A VIGILANCE COMMITTEE.

The widespread demand for reform in the public services, which is about the only good thing that has come out of the South African adventure, is about to take organised form at last. The Nineteenth Century opens with the announcement that it is proposed to form a new association, having for its object to fix public attention steadily upon the more important lessons taught by the war. Foremost among such lessons are:—

(1) the necessity for examining the condition of the defences of the Empire and their administration by the public offices charged therewith; and (2) the need for conducting the business of the country, as administered by all the various Departments of State, upon ordinary business principles and methods.

It is a pity that the new association did not set among its foremost "lessons taught by the war," the lesson that such wars ought not to be made again. If it would only include this in its programme it would promise well.

Among the members already secured are Lord Rosebery, Cardinal Vaughan, the Bishop of London, and a number of prominent M.P.'s.

POINTS FOR HOME GENERALS.

The Nineteenth Century for July contains an article by Colonel Lonsdale Hale, entitled "The Home Generals and their Work in the Coming Autumn." The problems before the home generals this autumn will be of a kind which will necessitate a complete break with the system which has been in vogue at our great training centres. The study of ground will be the first problem. Colonel Hale thinks it is very doubtful whether the Boers constructed their deep trenches, and believes that the greater part of the work was done by Kaffirs, and if so we must take a lesson from them, and provide willing arms beforehand to aid our fighting men in obtaining the necessary cover:—

Heavy manual labour seems hardly compatible with maintaining fighting men in the physical condition necessary for actual fighting in the field. A soldier can scrape a hole for himself, but he won't be much good with his rifle if before using it he has to dig out a human rabbit-burrow.

Another serious problem before our generals is how to raise the spirit of initiative in the lower ranks:—

Besides the study of ground and learning all about it, there is yet one other matter which our Generals must insist upon in the elementary stages of the training, and without which the troops will be but ill prepared for the further work. During this preparatory period, there must be fostered, in and out of barracks, on the parade ground or at the tactical exercise, the habit of delegation of command and control to the lower leaders, and of co-operation of these among themselves. Never mind how little many captains may know of their work as company commanders, and how helpless a colonel would be if compelled to rely on them only with no adjutant at hand, this habit must be inculcated and practised now, no matter how great the inconvenience may be—a battalion dependent in close country on its colonel or its adjutant for guidance had better be excluded from the Ordre de Bataille.

"Minister for London."

THE future of Lord Rosebery is exercising many minds, among the rest the mind of Mr. Arthur Mee, who writes on the subject in the Young Man for July. He says:—

There is one post to which Lord Rosebery could elect himself, in which he would render incalculable service to the State and establish for himself a unique place in the Empire. The situation is vacant, and Lord Rosebery might step into it tomorrow, with the united support of six millions of people, and the sympathy and goodwill of the nation. It is the post of Minister for London. The office does not exist, but that matters nothing. The great man makes his own place. Nobody knows better than Lord Rosebery the needs of the Capital of the Empire; nobody understands better than he how they might be It may be said that the work would be too local, but it is Lord Rosebe y himself who says that the problem of London is the greatest problem in the British Empire. He would make London a city worth living in, and if, as he darkly hinted, he paid the price with his head, he would surely give his head without a growl for the glory of solving the greatest problem ever set a statesman-the organising and civilising of the kingdom of London, the heart and soul of the greatest Empire the world has ever seen.

One of O'Connell's Stories.

COUNSELLOR O'CONNELL is the subject of a sketch by Michael MacDonagh in Temple Bar. Here is one out of many stories told of or by the great Irishman:—

Some years ago, while attending the Clonmel Assizes, I witnessed a trial which I shall never forget. A wretched man was charged with the murder of his neighbour. The evidence was running strong against the prisoner. In fact it was the strongest case of circumstantial evidence I have ever met with. As a matter of form—for of his guilt there was no doubt—the prisoner was called on for his defence. He called, to the amazement of the whole Court, he called—the murdered man. And the murdered man came forward! The case was clear; the prisoner was innocent. The judge told the jury it was unnecessary to charge them. Yet they requested permission to retire. They returned to court in about two hours, when the foreman, with a long face, handed in a verdict of guilty! Everyone was astonished. "Good God!" cried the judge, "of what is he guilty? Not of murder, surely?" "No, my lord," replied the foreman, "but if he didn't murder the man, shure he stole me grey mare three years ago."

QUESTIONS OF SOUTH AFRICAN RECONSTRUCTION.

MAKE TWO GREAT COLONIES?

THE North American Review for June contains an article by Sir Sidney Shippard, in which he gives his views as to "How England should Treat the Vanquished Boers." The principle which should govern the settlement is, he says:—

A statesman's first duty is to safeguard the interests of his own country, and if this cannot be done without hurting the feelings of others, tant pis pour les autres.

As to the concrete application of this principle, he says that the capital should be removed to Johannesburg:—

The advantages of uniting the present colony of Natal and the Transvaal and Orange territory in one great colony would, I think, be very great. It would have an excellent seaboard. It would be a fair political and commercial counterpoise to the Cape Colony. An Appeal Court for all South Africa below the Zambesi might at once be established at Cape Town, with rights of ultimate appeal to the Privy Council. The Cape University system might be extended over all South Africa. The postal and telegraph systems would be uniform, and could be worked from one centre. Due provision would be made, of course, for extradition and for the reciprocal enforcement of legal process. Union as between the great Eastern and Western Colonies for defensive purposes could be easily arranged. The laws of Natal and of the two extinct republics would have to be examined and compared, and a law commission should be appointed to draft a series of consolidating enactments applicable to the entire territory. These enactments, of course, would have to be submitted to the present Natal Legislature, whose consent would be a condition precedent to any such arrangement; but, as regards the conquered territories, legislation should be by proclamation, pending the establishment of a limited form of representative government. Full Parliamentary institutions with responsible government could not be safely introduced until all danger of disturbances shall have been finally removed.

CALL IN MR. RHODES?

Mr. Edward Dicey, writing in the Fortnightly on the Policy of Peace, recognises that British supremacy in a self-governed South Africa can best be secured by an increase in the British resident population. Government irrigation works might make it worth while for younger sons of good family, now serving under Lord Roberts, to settle on the land. But his chief hope is that the staffing of the railways, the building and mine-sinking which will follow the war, will retain a large number of skilled artisans among the Reservists, Militia and Yeomanry. He especially urges the development of the mining industry, and pays this tribute to its present chiefs:—

I know of no mining community where the capitalists have done so much to provide for the comfort and convenience of the workers in their service, have lavished money so freely on all works of public utility, or have so identified themselves with the interests of the industry by which they have made their fortunes.

He also insists :-

The time has come to put aside the prejudices caused by the Raid, and to avail ourselves freely of the services of the British party, of which, in fact, if not in name, Mr. Cecil Rhodes still remains the leader. We have a hard task before us, and we need the help of all South African statesmen who, whatever errors they may be deemed to have committed, have always been loyal in their allegiance to the Mother Country.

SETTLE SOLDIERS AS FARMERS?

Colonel J. G. B. Stopford has an article in the Nineteenth Century dealing with the proposals for settling time-expired soldiers in South Africa. The bulk of his article is devoted to a recapitulation of the difficulties which settlers would meet with, but he does not think the project by any means impossible. He says:—

If the force which it is necessary to maintain in Africa be composed of men chosen because of their wish to settle permanently in the country, they might be divided into regiments of 1,000 or 500, or a less number of men, as the facilities for accumulating water might render advisable, and be settled in communities, whose houses might extend for some miles along α course, the centre part of which would be supplied with water from a dam made by blocking a valley or depression in the ground.

For a year, or two years, or as long as it was necessary to complete the works, these men might receive pay and be under military discipline, and would work under the direction of officers. During this time they would construct a dam, and build themselves houses and fences, and prepare the land for sowing.

As the force, after their recent experiences, would not require much military training, the whole of their time would be available to make the farm, and, when they were released from service, they should be able to continue in their houses and on their holdings at such terms as might be arranged.

"COMMANDEERING THE ALMIGHTY."

The only passage worth quoting from Miss Anna Howarth's sketch in Cornhill of the Boer at home is her witness to the strength and sincerity of his religious convictions:—

The Boer is nothing if not religious. . . . He does undoubtedly believe that his cause is a sacred one, and that the Lord is fighting on his side. "What!" exclaimed a profane Englishman, on hearing this sentiment expressed, "have you commandeered the Almighty too?" The phrase was not unapt. The Boer has commandeered the Almighty, and is by this time greatly disappointed that the Almighty has not performed what was expected of Him. "If we do not win in this war," said a sturdy old Boer, "I will throw my Bible in the fire, and never read it again."

THE UNMAKERS OF ENGLAND.

Karl Blind, writing in the July Fortnightly on France, Russia, and the peace of the world, concludes that "there are great perils ahead for England." He says:—

For the calm observer there can be no doubt that the conscience of the civilised world has, in this South African war, been as much shocked as if some Continental Power were to destroy by force of arms the independence and the Republican institutions of Switzerland, or the independence and the somewhat Conservative institutions of the Netherlands. An outcry of indignation at such a deed would ring all over the world. Such an outcry has rung, in the present instance, from Europe to America, and it is being taken up even by cultured Indians of the most loyal character. The friends of England abroad are angered and sad at heart. Her enemies are reckoning upon what may befall her some day, when she will be assailed by a variety of complications. More than one storm-cloud is already in course of formation. The time may not be too far when those answerable for what is done now will appear before history, not as the makers of new Imperial glories, but as the thoughtless unmakers of England.

A VILLAGE INSTITUTE WITH GAMES.—A clerical correspondent in the country writes to ask me if any of my readers can give him information as to whether there is known to exist any country parish where an Institute has been run successfully in which all the parishioners have found their games. He would prefer to hear of a country parish, but the lessons learned in a town would help. If any of our readers can send me any information on this point I will be much obliged.

Print I sa stay also to 1 Print I su hush som fath I shor

Prin

left i

She

Rev

varie moth the name the Print Print

Afric

born

Pr Revi Rho him num accu fight the v Princ tions that infor Rhoc future Ag has m of by seekin peace politic it will Empire by the param thousan in him

by ha declar Africa says:-

in him

country

Pri

CECIL RHODES'S FUTURE.

By PRINCESS RADZIWILL.

A DOZEN years ago Mme. Novikoff introduced me to Princess Radziwill at the Hôtel de l'Europe, St. Petersburg. I saw a good deal of her in those days, for we were all staying at the same hotel, where Miss Maude Gonne was also a guest. Eleven years passed, and I was astonished to receive one day a letter from Cape Town from the Princess enclosing an article upon Mr. Rhodes, which I subsequently published in the Review of Reviews. I was told that Princess Radziwill had divorced her husband, and had gone to South Africa to look after some property in Rhodesia which was left her by her father.

I heard little more of the Princess until Mr. Rhodes's short visit to London after the relief of Kimberley. Princess Radziwill returned to London before Mr. Rhodes left for South Africa, and there she has remained ever since. She has contributed articles to the Pall Mall Gazette, the Review of the Week, and to the North American Review. Last month, however, the robbery of her pearls and of various treasures which she had received from her mother and from her cousin General Skobeleff, made her the talk of the town, and made many familiar with her name who are completely innocent of all knowledge of the political and journalistic sphere in which the Princess moves and enjoys herself.

Princess Radziwill is half Polish and half Russian, but she wields her pen as if she were English born, and she has thrown herself into the exciting arena of South African politics with as great élan as if she had been born on the slopes of Table Mountain.

THE PRINCESS'S PROPHECY.

Princess Radziwill contributes to the North American Review for June a vigorous article in defence of Mr. Rhodes from a somewhat unreasonable attack made upon him by an anonymous British officer in a previous number of the Review. Mr. Rhodes's assailant had accused him of misleading the Government as to the fighting capacity of the Boers, and of having deflected the whole plan of campaign in his own interest. The Princess has little difficulty in disposing of these accusations, and then, after having pointed out the absurdity that the Government was dependent, either for its information or for its plan of campaign, upon Mr. Rhodes's action, she proceeds to prophesy as to the future of Mr. Rhodes. She says:—

A great future awaits him, greater than the one Mr. Chamberlain has marked out for himself and obstinately denied to his friend of bygone days, perhaps his accomplice in far-fetched and far-seeking schemes. When this war is over, when commercial peace and prosperity are restored to South Africa, when the political life of the country begins again, the world will see that it will fall to Mr. Rhodes to direct the destinies of the new Empire over which Queen Victoria will preside. He will again, by the very force of circumstances, become the leading and paramount power in it; his genius will urge him on to it; the thousands of people who believe now, and will later on believe in him, will carry him to the zenith of political influence.

AN EMBODIMENT OF ENGLISH PRESTIGE.

Princess Radziwill is not a woman who does anything by halves, as may be seen from the following emphatic declarations of what Mr. Rhodes has done in South Africa. Speaking of his position in that continent, she says:—

English prestige, whatever his enemies may say, is embodied in him. Governors come and go; the claims of the mother country, though recognised, are often not admitted; and, rightly or wrongly, since Majuba a strong feeling of distrust against the Government at home exists amongst a certain class of Colonials. Mr. Rhodes alone is always there. It is he who changed the gloomy wilderness of the past into a settled country, who opened it to the life of people and, it may be said, created South Africa. He worked these mines over the possession of which two nations are fighting now; he joined the country to the civilised world by means of railways and telegraphs; he felled forests, drained swamps, built factories, founded villages and settlements, brought in colonists, put down robbers, defended settlers against Matabele or Basuto raids, maintained the peace necessary for the welfare of the vast territory he had conquered, and introduced the rule of law and justice into it. It is through him that South Africa has lived, grown and flourished; and whatever some people in England may say or do, they will never wipe out the memory of these great deeds, they will never succeed in effacing that man's name from the annals of the land which he has brought before the notice of the world and given to his own country.

THE HOPE OF THE EMPIRE-

As for the notion that he is not to be trusted, which Lord Salisbury appears to entertain, she asserts that as Mr. Rhodes was the first to start the Imperialistic idea in South Africa, he is the indispensable agent by which the Dutch are to be brought into line with the Imperialists at the Cape. She says:—

In the task of pacifying the country and at the same time imbuing the Dutch population with the conviction that England's supremacy must never be disputed again, the Government have not got a more powerful auxiliary than Mr. Rhodes.

-AND THE CHAMPION OF THE DUTCH.

She is even sanguine enough to believe that the Dutch will themselves welcome Mr. Rhodes as their friend and champion. As long as President Kruger reigned in Pretoria there were two men in Africa; now there is only one. Princess Radziwill says:—

Nothing will be left for the Afrikander but to accept the situation, and recognise Mr. Rhodes in his true light, that of the greatest Imperialist of his time, and they will naturally expect him to help them in their difficulty. He will be, and he is, the only man in South Africa capable of enforcing a reasonable settlement, in which the rights of every private individual will be respected, but at the same time where there will be no maudlin attempt to patch up peace and buy loyalty by Imperial concessions. One must have a clean slate, clean to the best interests of Imperialism. In a country like South Africa, with only a million whites, there is no need for five cantankerous states; there has been already too much of home rule and race hatred; the sections must be politically united.

The Dutch, both in the Cape Colony and in the Transvaal, coming more and more in contact with the English, will naturally turn to Mr. Rhodes for at least material, if not political, support. He has so identified himself with South Africa that no one living in it will ever dream of turning in its needs toward any one else. Governors only represent a distant authority; besides, they are changed. Mr. Rhodes is always there, and, as all are aware, never fails to redress, if he can do so, the wrongs of those who come to him in their need.

THE RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE RAID.

As for the Raid, Princess Radziwill does not think that this will be an insuperable obstacle in his path. Nay, she even lets fall a pregnant hint that if the truth were told, Mr. Rhodes would be found to be much more sinned against than sinning in that matter. She says:—

The last word has not yet been spoken with regard to the Raid, and perhaps time will show that Mr. Rhodes was in this sad business just as generous as he was imprudent, just as ready as he ever is, when he thinks it necessary for his country's welfare, to sacrifice his person in order to screen its prestige—even when that prestige is embodied in the person of Mr. Chamberlain, who is always as willing to disavow anything or any of r there nstitute nioners ar of a would mation clerical

oes not says :-

frica be

o settle giments

ttled in along a h water

in the ssarv to e under ction of m, and

and for require uld be ed from

and on

Anna

is her ligious es un-

nd that claimed pressed, phrase mighty,

hty has

Bible in rance, s that ays :-

nat the African

ublican

some-outery

world. Europe

dians of oad are

g upon

ed by a already

r when before

as the

anybody he believes to be compromising to himself, as he is forgetful of services rendered to him in the past.

PRINCESS RADZIWILL'S FRIENDS.

Princess Radziwill first came into contact with English statesmen at the Berlin Congress. She met Lord Beaconsfield at dinner at the Austrian Embassy. She went into dinner hating the Turcophile Jew, and came out completely subjugated by Lord Beaconsfield's charm. They continued to correspond until his death. Princess Radziwill made the acquaintance of Lord Salisbury at the same time, and the acquaintance has continued down to the present hour. The Princess is expected to sail to Africa with her son, who is going out to Rhodesia, before the end of this month. Her ideas as to the necessity of conciliating the Dutch are sound, and she would take a hand in the political game, as if, instead of being Polish and Russian born, she were a native of South Africa.

THE BOERS.

THE GREAT TREK.

In the first June number of the Revue des Deux Mondes M. Leclercq writes an interesting paper on "The Origins of the South African Republics." Of these he says that, while it is well known how England seized the Colony of the Cape in 1806, where the Dutch had been established towards the middle of the seventeenth century. it is not so well known how the descendants of those same Dutchmen, unable to bear the foreign yoke, expatriated themselves in that famous exodus which the Boers call the Great Trek. James Anthony Froude describes it in "Oceana." The desire to change one's abode is with the Boers a kind of sixth sense. They are, unlike other peasants, fond of leading a sedentary life at certain times, and at other times they are nomads. That is why every Boer possesses, or desires to possess, several farms separated by considerable distances. If his pastoral occupations are not successful at one farm, the Boer will trek with his live stock and his family to another, perhaps more favourably situated. M. Leclercq compares the Boers to the Irish, who were, he says, similarly expatriated at the same time, and also to the Israelites, who had a similar absolute confidence in God. He assures us that the Voortrekkers always led a pure life, free from drunkenness, luxury, and quarrels, although they had no law courts and no police; and he says that the fact that the people could remain for so many years outside all contact with civilisation without falling into gross barbarism, would be inexplicable if the cause were sought for elsewhere than in the fear of God and the principles of the Decalogue with which the Boers were inspired.

BRITISH CALUMNIES

The moving spirit of the Great Trek was Prinsloo-the Protector of the People, as the Boers called him. Colonial Government attempted to repress the rebellion with ruthless severity; and there is a story of the execution of five rebels, who had to be hanged twice because the first time they broke the rope with their weight, which is still remembered in South Africa. The language question caused great bitterness, for Dutch was not taught in the schools, all legal proceedings were conducted in English, and no one could serve on a jury unless he understood English. All this wounded the pride of the Boers. On the other side, the worst accusations were launched against the Boers by the natives, which, being credited by the English, caused the name of Boer to become an object of execration throughout Europe. The Boers were accused of assassinating the natives with the most horrible refinements of cruelty, and M. Leclercq tells us that, under the pretext of philanthropy and religious propaganda, these calumnies were spread by the English missionaries. The accusations were so precise that the Government instituted an inquiry which lasted for several months, and ended, according to M. Leclercq, in no single one of the horrible accusations being proved.

THE KAFFIR QUESTION.

M. Leclercq also defends the Boers from the charge of subjecting the natives to degrading slavery. Their condition he represents rather as that of the manservants and maidservants who formed the household of the old biblical patriarchs. Moreover, the Boers as a whole desired to abolish the titular institution of slavery. In a meeting which was held at Graaf Reinet, in 1826, it was expressly declared that "All the members of the assembly wished for the complete suppression of slavery, provided that this desire could be realised in reasonable conditions. The only difficulty was the mode of carrying it out." The objection which the Boers entertained to the freeing of the slaves appears, therefore, to have been not one of principle, but directed to the suddenness of the measure. Emancipation was decreed in 1834, and the British Parliament voted the sum of £20,000,000 sterling as compensation for securing the liberty of the slaves in all the British colonies. At the Cape there were 39,000 slaves who were valued at over £3,000,000 sterling; nevertheless the share which South Africa obtained of the compensation was reduced to £1,200,000. This aroused absolute consternation in the Colony, for many of the Boers had pledged their slaves as security for loans; and, moreover, the compensation was only payable in London, so that the slave owners were obliged to employ agents, who took care to secure an enormous profit. The result was widespread misery at the Cape, and many hundreds of families who had been well to do were reduced to poverty.

Another cause had previously contributed to the ruin of the Boers, namely, the action of the London Government in the year 1824 in withdrawing certain small banknotes which had been issued at 4s., and were withdrawn at a reduction of more than 50 per cent. But the principal cause of the Great Trek was the Kaffir question. The Boers, M. Leclercq explains, had bitter experience of the falseness, "slimness" and rapacity of the Kaffirs, who were always pillaging and robbing them; whereas the English viewed the Kaffirs through the rosy spectacles of the Protestant missionaries. It is needless to follow M. Leclercq through the rest of his extremely interesting article, in which he shows how much the Boers had to contend with, and what astonishing blunders were made by the English.

SOCIAL PSYCHOLOGY OF THE BOERS.

To the second June number of the Revue de Paris M. Mille contributes a study of the Boers from the point of view of social psychology. M. Mille notes with of view of social psychology, astonishment that the English have practically not astonishment that the English have practically not the Boers themselves. The studied at all the nature of the Boers themselves. books written about South Africa, at any rate before the war broke out, dealt with gold mines or big game shooting, and M. Mille could only find two exceptions-those of Livingstone and Mr. Bryce. The inquirer who sought to understand the Boer nature was obliged to have recourse to Dutch or German books, or to the notes made by the French Protestant missionaries in Basutoland. M. Mille relates various stories which go to show the ignorance of the Boer of everything outside South Africa, and even of mad rura in I num dary M. M educ Euro comp the I also said dilig plot acco As to ie A He I Aust becar South excite as to made distin that 1

M

som

patr

to e

The any v prove He sa The driven conqu races

razed

conce

will ta

cion u thing l accusa comme prepos Genera a man laager again e that we The subord be who small eviden they so told th action result i Mr. M Boers :

> It do occurre retreatin

y, and shilanwere ations nquiry ing to ations

Their rvants ne old whole In a it was embly ovided out."

reeing
one of asure.
British ng as in all 39,000
never-

of the roused of the oans; ble in mploy profit., and o were e ruin overnbankawn at ncipal The of the owere nglish of the w M. esting and to made

Paris point
with y not
The ore the ooting, ose of ght to course

ose of ght to course by the . Mille nce of even of some things that are inside. He brings out clearly the patriarchal cohesion of the Boer families, and he goes on to explain the efforts which the Pretoria Government made in the cause of education. In 1886 there were 159 rural schools and 20 urban schools, and these had risen in 1896 to 330 and to 34 respectively; while the total number of pupils had risen from 4,016 to 7,738. Secondary education, too, had received a great impetus; but M. Mille does not disguise the fact that this interest in education is comparatively modern, and came from Europe—indeed, the majority of the teaching-staff was composed of Hollanders and Germans. Nevertheless, the Boer is a great reader, and not of the Bible alone, but also of newspapers; in fact, as one shrewd observer has said of him, he is a politician to the marrow of his bones.

M. Mille then goes on to show that the theory-so diligently propagated in England—that the Dutch element in South Africa had formed an old and long-elaborated plot for the destruction of British supremacy is not in accordance with the facts, but is rather contrary to them. As to the future, M. Mille declares that the gulf between he Afrikanders and the English is now perhaps impassable. He prophecies that England will attempt to submerge the Boers beneath a flood of emigrants from Scotland, Australia, and Canada, which he thinks will be a pity, because Australia and Canada are richer countries than South Africa, where the mines alone will continue to excite men's covetousness. M. Mille does not go so far as to say that reconciliation is impossible; the future is made up of so many elements that they cannot all be distinguished. But it is, he thinks, permissible to declare that no such difficult task has ever been imposed upon a conqueror. The economic antagonism between the two races will not disappear because the Pretoria forts are razed. The language, the family, the religious and social conceptions of the Boers will survive, and he thinks it will take many years to kill them.

THE BOER AS SOLDIER.

Theoretically speaking the Boers had no right to have any victories in the war at all. This is very clearly proved by Thomas F. Millard in Scribner's Magazine. He says:—

The Boer detests, hates, loathes war. He will not fight unless driven to it. Before he will take the field he will endure coercion up to any point short of an undisguised assault upon the thing he holds dearest of all things on earth—his political independence. To any man who has watched the Boer in war, any accusation which fastens upon him the responsibility for the commencement of hostilities falls to the ground as absolutely preposterous. There is not a man, from the Commandant-General down, who does not daily pray for peace. There is not a man who is not heartily sick of fighting and the hardship of laager life, and who would not readily purchase the privilege to again enjoy the comfort and quiet of home with any concession that would leave him his liberty.

The principal trouble is that the Boer is hopelessly insubordinate. He will not obey commands, and has to be wheedled into doing the most apparent of duties. The small value of foreign military leaders to the Boers is evident, since they would hardly obey strangers when they scarcely dreamed of doing what their own generals told them to. No punishment is possible, because such action on the part of the commandant would assuredly result in his being shot by the burghers of his commando. Mr. Millard writes concerning the lack of initiative of the Boers after a victory:—

It does seem ridiculous, however, to see, as has repeatedly occurred in this war, the British force, shattered and broken, retreating in one direction, while the Boers calmly retire in the opposite direction, toward their laagers. How often must the English generals give thanks for such tactics on the part of the enemy? No wonder that Colonel Villebois-Mareuil said, as he shrugged his shoulders despairingly at Colenso: "The British lose; but the Boers do not win."

How hopeless it was for the generals to adopt another course may be seen from the fact that, after the battle of Colenso, the commando ordered by General Botha to attack the retreating forces of Buller's army, calmly refused to cross the Tugela.

MISPLACED QUOTATION MARKS.

29, Piccadilly, W., May 24th, 1900. To the Editor of the "Review of Reviews."

My dear Sir—In the May issue of the Review of Reviews there appears a very fair and friendly notice of my article on South African Reconstruction in the current Fortnightly Review, which, owing to my absence abroad, I have only just seen, and for which I have to thank you.

There is, however, one statement in this notice to which I would call your kind attention.

I find to my astonishment that I am quoted in your notice, in inverted commas, as saying that "Crown Colony administration is one which would be certain to provoke rebellion both on the part of Boers and Britons."

I immediately re-read my own article most carefully, and cannot find a single line justifying such an interpretation of my views, which, whether sound or unsound, are utterly at variance with the statement in question.

The following are the only allusions to the subject I can discover:—p. 863, l. 16, "States which have been for years accustomed to self-government cannot be expected to remain contented with being administered as Crown Colonies, however wisely or loyally that administration may be conducted."

Again, p. 870, l. 15: "The system of Crown Colony administration, however great its intrinsic merits, is one which can never be popular with colonists, either of British or Boer race."

The above statements I have no desire to modify in any way. But to assert upon the strength of these statements that I anticipate a rebellion on the part of Boer and British colonists alike, as the result of the Transvaal and the Orange Free State being administered as Crown Colonies, seems to me an utterly unwarrantable assertion.

I should therefore be greatly obliged if, in your forthcoming issue, you would state that the words you have used as a quotation from my article are not words used by me, but simply an inference drawn by the writer of the notice, an inference from which I dissent most strongly, on public as well as personal grounds.

I rely on your acceding to this not, I think, unreasonable request, not only on account of the invariable courtesy I, as a publicist, utterly opposed to you in my political and social views, have hitherto received from you in your criticisms of my writings, but of the uniform fairness you have made your rule in newspaper discussions.—Believe me, my dear sir, yours faithfully,

EDWARD DICEY.

[I am very sorry the mistake occurred. The explanation is simple. I dictated the notice. My secretary, who typed it out, thought I was quoting textually what I was summarising, and inserted quotation marks where they had no right to be. Another member of my staff who read the proofs had not read the original article. I usually read my own proofs. Had I done so on this occasion I should have noticed and have deleted the offending inverted commas.—ED.]

PLANS OF IMPERIAL REORGANISATION.

THE AUSTRALIAN FEDERATION BILL.

MR. EDMUND BARTON contributes to the North American Review for June a sketch of the Australian Federation Bill. The article does not enter into controversial questions, but gives a very lucid account of the new Constitution and its working. It is at once more democratic than the Constitution of the United States, and not only more democratic, but more Federal than that of Canada:—

Instead of being elected by the several Legislatures, as in the United States, senators are to be directly chosen by the people. They will each represent the whole of the State which elects them; while, in the House of Representatives, the members will be representatives of districts. The voters for each house will be the same persons, the difference being that, in voting for senators, each State is to be one entire electorate, and will have equal representation without respect of numbers; while, in voting for the House of Representatives, each State will be represented in electoral divisions, purely according to the numbers of inhabitants. There is one broad fact which secures that each House will be popularly representative.

The conditions for membership of either of the Federal Houses are the following:—

1. The attainment of the age of twenty-one years;

2. The qualification of an elector for the House of Representatives;

3. A three years' residence within the limits of the Federal Commonwealth;

4. The being a British subject, either natural born or for five years naturalised.

COLONIES IN THE CABINET.

A plea for the entire reorganisation of our Colonial Department is put forward by Mr. Beckles Willson in the July Fortnightly under the awkward title of "An Overworked Minister—and a Remedy," as if the health of Mr. Chamberlain were a ground sufficient to justify the readjustment of an Empire. After an instructive survey of the previous development of the department, the writer considers first the suggestion that there should be two Colonial Secretaries, one to have charge of the Crown Colonies, the other to supervise the self-governing Colonies. This change he dismisses as insufficient. He says:—

There is, however, another need, another aspiration which is now presenting itself to the mind of the Sovereign, the statesmen, and the people of the Empire, one which recent unforeseen events have caused to become very prominent. It is the necessity for a direct participation of the greater Colonies in Imperial Councils. If it is really desirable that we should "invite the Colonies to share in the responsibilities and privileges of Empire in such a manner as not to disturb the constitution of this country or that which is enjoyed by the Colonies," in what simpler and yet more effective manner could this end be attained than by the establishment of a Secretaryship of State for each of the great federations of Colonies, the incumbent of which should be representative, as well as advisory and executive? Why should not a Canadian, with a full knowledge of Canada, advise his Sovereign on Canadian affairs, in so far as they affect Imperial interests?

With a Secretary of State for Canada, another for Australia, and another for South Africa, each having a seat in the House of Lords, and charged with the oversight of the affairs, so far as the British Empire is concerned, of their respective States, we have a scheme which should assist us on our way. With its adoption there would still remain work enough and more than enough, seeing that the Empire is in a state of growth, for the Secretary of State for the "Colonies." Canada and Australia are, properly speaking, no longer Colonies, but Nations, Kingdoms, or Commonwealths.

These Secretaries of State would, the writer suggests, absorb the functions of the present Agents-General.

HOME RULE IN SIGHT.

MR. E. REDMOND, M.P., contributes to the Forum for June a short article on "The Present Position of the Irish Question." Home Rule, he says, is now in sight, and it is the South African war which has made it so.

THE FRUIT OF THE WAR.

The first result of the war was the union of the Irish parties. The war outraged the conscience of the Irish people, who saw their own history reproduced in the history of the South African Republics. The sympathy of Ireland went out to the Dutch, and it was the painful consciousness of the impotence of disunited Ireland to make her sympathy felt that led to the end of all dissension:—

Thus, peace in Ireland was produced by war in South Africa. It is only two months since this peace was proclaimed, and already the results are apparent. In Ireland a great popular national organization, on the lines of the old National League, is springing into being. The Irish members in the House of Commons have proclaimed their complete independence of all English parties. They are once more a power and a menace, and the Irish Question has once more arisen phoenix-like from its ashes.

IRELAND ALONE HOSTILE.

The second service of the war to Ireland was the testimony it afforded as to the failure of British statesmanship. All parts of the Empire gave willing aid; but from Ireland only came bitter and uncompromising hostility. Yet in spite of this—on the field of battle England has in the end been obliged to rely upon the genius and the valour of the generals and the soldiers who are the sons of that land which is still vainly clamouring for its rights. The recent visit of the Queen to Ireland is a proof of what I say; and more than likely it has served to intensify the feeling which undoubtedly exists in England at this moment—that Ireland has been treated unjustly, and that the Empire itself has suffered severely in its prestige and its power by the injustice.

THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT GERM.

Together with the Queen's visit came the complete success of the Local Government Act. Of this Mr. Redmond says that he has always believed it to be the greatest step towards the granting of Home Rule:—

The working of the new system has been a complete and admitted success. The administration of local affairs has been better and more economical than it ever was before. Men of all religions and politics and classes have been elected to these boards. Landlords and tenants, Catholics and Protestants, Orangemen and Nationalists sit side by side and amicably transact the business of the country. I say the success of this Act destroys the chief argument against Home Rule; and I believe the day is near at hand when, by general assent, Ireland will obtain Legislative Home Rule in a Parliament in Dublin.

E. M. EMMERS writes a brief account of the Countess of Flanders in Haus und Welt. From this sketch it would appear that the Countess was above all a family mother, who does not busy herself much with politics. She is idolised by the Belgian people. The life led by her husband and herself is said to have been ideal. An instance is given of this. The prince always had his breakfast at 8.30, and was never happy unless his wife was there to have it with him. So, even if she did not return home until three or four o'clock in the morning, she was always ready and waiting for him at the breakfast table at 8.30. The close relationship of the European reigning families is shown in her case. Her daughter will be the future Queen of Belgium, one of her brothers is King Karl of Roumania, and her sister was the late Queen of Portugal.

Kh Ag an Go poi can effe lead

last blusteris or v their enco

cor

of p thin

have

the

N

that and Hen obvi politic even the high the point cand emotive the politic even the high the political emotivation in the political emotion in the political emotivation in the political emotivation in the political emotion in the

M

abst

in t auth siler Lo authoconc And that of t Minimena

Gove a ma threa unco by p that will are c dwell of th John in oropini only ill w

THE QUESTION OF DISSOLUTION.

IN the National Review for July "A Conservative M.P." writes a short article on the prospect of "A Kaki Dissolution," which he will not have at any price. A general election fought when the constituencies were in anything like the temper that prevailed at Manchester and the Isle of Wight would not result in a strong Government, and even from the merely electioneering point is not to be desired:—

No one who has watched the life of this House of Commons can think that huge majorities make strong Governments. Their effect is all the other way. Huge majorities demoralise the leaders and the led. They produce a fatal sense of security in the Government and its supporters. Over and over again in the last five years this Government has committed the most gratuitous blunders. These blunders have been as palpable to Ministerialists as to the Opposition. But Unionist members, rightly or wrongly, have refused to mark their sense of the errors of their leaders; for, if they had done so, they would only have encouraged the ambitions and the policy of infinitely more divided, more incapable, and less patriotic politicians.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN'S MISTAKE.

The majority would probably be huge, but would correspond with no permanent or deep-felt convictions of public policy:—

Mr. Chamberlain is greatly mistaken when he appears to think that it is the opinion of the nation that the Government have covered themselves with distinction. The nation prefers the Government to the leaders of the Opposition, and believes that they may be more safely trusted to bring the war to an end, and to devise a peaceful settlement in South Africa, than Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman and his colleagues. But, as is obvious enough to all men, it is not the statesmen, it is not the politicians, who have distinguished themselves during the moving events of the last year. England's present position is due to the temper of her people, and not to any resolute purpose or high courage and ability on the part of her rulers. And this the people know well enough. And so, when, with the enthusiasm of the war still hot on their minds, they vote for Unionist candidates their votes will be given mainly because of a passing emotion, and certainly more for the relative than the positive record of these politicians.

A SACRED PREROGATIVE.

Mr. Edmund Robertson, Q.C., discusses, from a very abstract point of view, "The Prerogative of Dissolution" in the Nineteenth Century for July. He quotes several authorities to show that to threaten a dissolution in order to s'lence criticism is against the spirit of the Constitution:—

Lord John Russell and Sir R. Peel are perhaps weightier authorities on constitutional practice than Mr. Disraeli, but the concurrence of all three in the same doctrine is very remarkable. And what is the doctrine? That to tell the House beforehand that it will be dissolved in the event of its rejecting the proposals of the Government is an unconstitutional proceeding. The Ministers who were accused of using the menace denied the menace, but did not dispute the doctrine. Even when the Government of the day was ho'ding office by sufferance, having a majority of the House of Commons in general opposition, a threat to dissolve in the event of defeat was declared to be unconstitutional. Recently we have been openly told not only by party newspapers and party politicians, but by Ministers, that the present Government, with a majority of 130 behind it, will dissolve the House of Commons, not if certain proposals are defeated, but if they are even opposed. I do not wish to dwell too much on the immediately contemporaneous bearings of the question, but I may permit myself again to quote Lord John Russell. "If we are to have repeated threats of dissolution in order to compel members of the House, contrary to their own opinions, to vote according to the behests of a Minister, I can only say this House will stand ill with the Crown and will stand ill with the country." We seem to be far removed in spirit from the times when Sir Robert Peel could say that he declined to advise Her Majesty to dissolve, because "it was his opinion that that was a most delicate and sacred prerogative of the Crown, and ought not to be exercised for the purpose of any individual who might be at the head of affairs or for the purpose of any party."

Mr. Robertson concludes his article by pleading for the formation of a Ministry of Affairs, which he thinks at the present time would command more public confidence than any party administration.

"The Only Possible Leader."

In the Nineteenth Century for July, Dr. Guinness Rogers voices the cry for a leader, and ends by nominating Lord Rosebery as the only possible leader of the Liberal Party. Liberal principles are still very strong in the country, although the Liberal Party is weak, but unless the Liberal Party can come to a general agreement in relation to the war, it will destroy its position in the country for years to come:—

In short, it can hardly be doubted that Liberal Imperialism is an extremely powerful—it would not be too much to say the dominant—element in the party at the present time, and assuredly it is the only form of Liberalism which is at all likely to command the suffrages of the electors. He has himself told us that we are at the parting of the way, and that is true alike of parties and their leaders. It is, I venture to think, particularly true of himself. He simply cannot remain in his present detached position and yet discharge that duty to his country which he regards as so imperative. No one who knows even a little of the inner life of politics can reasonably blame him for abandoning a leadership in which his action was so hampered, or deny him the credit of abstaining from any action since his retirement that was likely to damage the influence of his successors. On the contrary, he has materially helped them by a criticism of the Government of the most trenchant and effective character. But his position is anomalous and cannot be continued without serious risk to his own influence. He is marked out for a leader. and it is an open secret that there are men in the Unionist party who would feel distinctly relieved if he was at the head of affairs. It is that which may possibly have suggested the idea that his rôle should be that of the chief of a great National party. He has a considerable personal following, and, if he were dominated by selfish ambition, might be tempted to adopt this independent course, and to shake himself from all party trammels. It is sin-cerely to be hoped for his own sake, for that of the party with which he has been so honourably associated, and above all for the sake of the nation, that he will eschew a course so dangerous.

What made "Bobs" a Humanitarian.

IN Good Words for May, Mr. W. J. Mathams, writing a sketch of Lord Roberts, tells the following story, which is quite of the old moral class-book kind:—

It is interesting that his first strong impulse in this direction came in his second year in India, when he was compelled to witness the flogging of two Horse Artillerymen. The men were in the wrong, but the punishment was brutal, and the unwilling witness must have felt the sting and fire and throb from the descending lash almost as keenly as the men themselves. Naturally they sinned again and were sentenced again, but through the clemency of the colonel the further punishment was remitted. Lord Roberts says he watched the effect of that forgiveness for some years, and found that the men proved themselves worthy of it. Henceforth, therefore, in his view, the man was greater than the uniform, and on this principle he has based the actions which have won him such renown. "Better the conditions of the soldier, and you will elevate the character of the man," he once said to me, and the saying was unconsciously autobiographical. On this plan of progress he reformed the old canteen system in India, or rather replaced it by the establishment of soldiers' institutes, and the broad, human, redemptive and preventive agency of the Army Temperance Association.

Irish
Irish
n the pathy ainful make
on:
Africa.

m for

of the sight,

d, and opular eague, ouse of all enace, e from tates-; but nising ged to nd the vainly een to it has ists in justly,

s the nplete s Mr.

te and s been Men of these stants, iicably of this and I reland blin.

untess
tch it family blitics.
ed by
An d his s wife d not rning, breakopean

ighter

others

e late

THE STRUGGLE FOR THE PRESIDENCY.

A MANIFESTO BY MR. BRYAN.

THE North American Review for June opens with an article by Mr. W. J. Bryan, entitled "The Issue of the Presidential Campaign."

WHAT THE ISSUE IS.

The issue in the present campaign, he says, is the issue between plutocracy and democracy, and all the questions upon which the Democrats and Republicans differ, if analysed, disclose the conflict between the dollar and the man. The three great questions to be decided-the gold standard, trusts, and Imperialism-are inextricably involved with one another, and imply a corresponding attitude on minor questions :-

If a man opposes the gold standard, trusts, and imperialismall three—the chances are a hundred to one that he is in favour of arbitration, the income tax and the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the people, and is opposed to government by injunction and the black-list. If a man favours the gold standard, the trust, and imperialism—all three—the chances are equally great that he regards the demand for arbitration as an impertinence, defends government by injunction and the blacklist, views the income tax as "a discouragement to thrift," and will oppose the election of Senators by the people as soon as he learns that it will lessen the influence of corporations in the Senate. When a person is with the Democrats on one or two of these questions, but not on all, his position on the subordinate questions is not so easily calculated.

TRUSTS AND BIMETALLISM.

Of bimetallism Mr. Bryan makes it clear he is as strong an advocate as ever, though he does not make it the predominating feature of the contest. Of the trust question

The line must be drawn at the point where the corporation seeks to establish a monopoly and deprive individuals or smaller corporations of the right to compete. In other words, the legislation necessary at this time must be directed against private monopoly in whatever form it appears. Those who desire to protect society from the evil results of the trust must take the position that a private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable. The power to control the price of anything which the people need cannot safely be entrusted to any private individual or association of individuals, because selfishness is universal and the temptation to use such a power for personal advantage is too great.

The Republican party cannot be relied upon to deal with trusts, for it numbers to-day all the trust-magnates it ever had, and in addition numbers all the trustmagnates who formerly belonged to the Democratic party.

IMPERIALISM.

The Anti-Imperialist campaign revolves mainly around the Philippine question. On this subject Mr. Bryan will make no compromise. He stands by the letter of the Declaration of Independence :

If the Filipino is to be a subject, our form of government must be entirely changed. A republic can have no subjects, The doctrine that a people can be kept in a state of perpetual vassalage, owing allegiance to the flag, but having no voice in the government, is entirely at variance with the principles upon which this government has been founded. An imperial policy nullifies every principle set forth in the Declaration of Independence.

The "white man's burden" argument is merely a resuscitation of the arguments formerly employed to justify kingcraft: as Lincoln said:

"Kings always bestride the necks of the people, not because they desire to do so, but because the people are better off for being THE DEMOCRAT'S POLICY.

The policy of the Democrats on the Philippine subject is definite and uncompromising:-

Hostilities can be terminated at any moment by a declaration of this nation's purpose : first, to establish a stable government ; second, to give the Filipinos their independence; third, to give them protection from outside interference while they work out their destiny. Such a declaration would be in harmony with American principles, American traditions and American interests. Such protection would be valuable to the Filipinos and inexpensive to us, just as protection to the South American and hexpensive to us, just as protection to them, while it has imposed no burden upon us. The Bates treaty, negotiated by the administration last summer, provides that the United States shall protect the Sultan of Sulu from foreign interference. It ought to be as easy to protect a republic as to stand sponsor for a despot,

MR. BRYAN'S PROSPECTS

In the National Review the section devoted to "The Month in America" is wholly taken up with the prospects of the rival candidates for the Presidency. Mr. Low is evidently of the opinion that the luck is going more and more on the side of Mr. McKinley, and the most he can say for Mr. Bryan's chance is, that it "is not an utter improbability." The Republicans have greatly strengthened their ticket by nominating for the Vice-Presidency Governor Roosevelt, who is at present the most popular man in the United States. The elimination of Admiral Dewey has been equally favourable to the Republicans. The continued defection of the Gold Democrats is equally unfortunate for Mr. Bryan.

A BLOW OF ICE.

But the worst blow Mr. Bryan has received is the New York Ice Trust Scandal, in which Tammany Hall is implicated. Ice in America is as essential as water, and it is as necessary for the poor as for the rich. The Ice Trust has succeeded in raising its price 300 per cent., and at the same time in raising an outcry which is likely to be fatal to Mr. Bryan :-

Politically, the exposé has damaged Mr. Bryan, who, personally, has no more concern in the operations of the Ice Trust than has the reader. But the Democratic Party has always posed as the friend of the people, the foe of monopoly, and the enemy of trusts. It has wept scalding tears as it has thought of the trust iniquities foisted upon an innocent and confiding people by the corrupt Republicans, and it has sworn by the seven gods-and it would have sworn by the seventy or 700 if necessary—that when it came into power it would smash the trusts. Now to have it proved that the beneficiaries of the most detested monopoly are Democrats, not unknown men but the men who hold the Democratic vote of the State of New York in the hollow of their hands, naturally gives the Republicans a weapon which they have not been slow to avail themselves of.

THE June Atlantic Monthly is a most valuable number. Ouoted elsewhere are Mr. Stillman's recollections of Ruskin and the Brownings; Mr. Lee's poetry of a machine age; Dean Sage's sketch of the late Mr. Quaritch; Charles Conant's economic tendencies; Mr. Sanborn's letter from Paris, and Mr. Grover Cleveland's lecture on the American presidency. Mr. Ephraim Emerton laments the passing of the combination known as gentleman and scholar, and demands that the new education shall bring it back by "the conception of a necessary and essential union between learning and the higher life of the spirit. Mr. W. C. Lawton deals with a kindred subject when he proposes as "a substitute for Greek" the study of "the true history of civilisation," which shall adjust the minutest fact or the largest principle "to the whole law of truth one and indivisible."

WHI TI serie The chief tion of se

survi

The way o world east o the po races the op should then, Chines into fi eternal what s again e govern strong Univer restrict in an prolong The diplom he sha race an that th superio a belie dream

princip

to-day

mean,

Conti practise pursued wanton Philip (at Cons the hand to beat : Irishman nople, w the Fore In C shows a

No s Demetr quite ti advises says, so pieces. earth-sh answers before o Russia capture

ENGLAND AND RUSSIA:

WHICH WILL BRING IN UNIVERSAL BROTHERHOOD?

THE North American Review for June contains a series of articles under the title of "The Rival Empires." The first of the series is signed by "A Diplomat," and is chiefly interesting for the writer's prediction of the absorption of all the small European states, and the creation of several great world-powers, outside which nothing can survive. He says:—

The principle of nationalities, which is the only obstacle in the way of a simplification of the present political divisions of the world, is one whose career, although successful in the southeast of Europe, does not warrant the expectation of a failure of the policy of expansion through the absorption of inferior or weak races which suggests itself to-day to the great Powers. Who is the optimistic politician who can predict anything but extinction to Holland, Belgium, Denmark and Norway and Sweden?

And having foreseen this reduction of European factors, why should he stop at that point and go no further? Supposing, then, that the rollers of American, British, German, Russian and Chinese supremacy have crushed political and ethnical distinctions into five uniform masses, there are but two alternatives left: eternal peace on the basis of a federation of these five masses, or, what seems less probable, a further process of simplification, and again eternal peace on the basis of a fusion of the five into one government—Muscovite, in all likelihood, for her youth and strong rule are chances in favour of the survival of Russia? Universal federation will mean universal brotherhood in a restricted sense; universal fusion will mean universal brotherhood in an absolute sense; and what is considered as the highest dream of humanity will have been realised at the expense of principles which, with more than usual inconsistency, we cherish to-day to the point of staking our lives for them, although they mean, in the form of patriotism and national competitions, the prolongation of universal strife and hatred.

The writer concludes that by its very nature British diplomacy is and must always be unsuccessful, whereas he shares the prevalent idea that the Russian is both by race and training a natural diplomat. He thinks, also, that the Russian mode of dealing with Oriental nations is superior to our own method, which is founded on force and a belief in our own superiority:—

Continuing a policy of empty threats and intimidation, practised since the eighties, in place of the tactics formerly pursued at Constantinople, indulging on every occasion in a wanton display of contempt and provocation, for which Sir Philip Currie was an admirably chosen instrument as Ambassador at Constantinople, the English played with amazing naïveté into the hands of the Russians, and finally found themselves obliged to beat an ignominious retreat. It will take some time for the Irishman who acts to-day as British Ambassador at Constantinople, with a mission to inaugurate a more sensible policy, to repair the effect of the blunders dictated to his predecessor by the Foreign Office.

In China and Persia the writer says our influence shows a similar decline.

MR. BOULGER WANTS WAR AT ONCE.

No such sober speculations occupy the brain of Mr. Demetrius Boulger. Poor Mr. Boulger's head has been quite turned by Lord Roberts's success, and he calmly advises us to pick a quarrel with Russia—for war, he says, sooner or later is "inevitable"—and pull her to pieces. "Has the moment come for this historic and earth-shaking struggle?" he asks magnificently; and answers, it has. We are not only stronger than ever before on sea, but we are strong enough on land to invade Russia in Manchuria, beat her on the Indian Frontier, capture her Black Sea forts; and—but this is thrown in casually as befits a little thing—send 250,000 men to attack and capture St. Petersburg, which Mr. Boulger tells us would be quite easy. We could, of course, do all this without assistance, but Mr. Boulger informs us that "the alliance of Japan is actually assured to us." Our other allies in this "earth-shaking," and we may add side-splitting struggle, are Sweden, Norway, Poland, Austria, Turkey, and Italy. As for French opposition we have merely to lock up their fleet in the harbours:—

Now is the moment to bring the rivalry of this determined and relentless enemy to an issue, and to have recourse to the remedy of war as an insurance against an inevitable and manifest danger being allowed to become too difficult and formidable. England is ready and Russia is not. Russia has the itching to clutch India without the power to do so; and if England is firm and resolute, and fights in a proper spirit and not in the silly, hypercivilised manner she has pursued in South Africa, she can shatter the Asiatic dominion of the Tsar to its base, and give the Russians something else to think of than the invasion of India for another hundred years.

Compared with this magnificent vision, Sir Richard Temple, who follows with an article on "Great Britain in Asia," must needs cut a poor figure. Sir Richard's article is devoted to a review of our present position in Asia, and is not controversial. He thinks, however, that the Russian movement of troops to Kushk and the Persian concessions are unfriendly to this country.

MRS. KRUGER AND MISS RHODES.

MR. ARTHUR MEE chats pleasantly in the Young Woman for May about "Some Women of South Africa." He tells how Mrs. Joubert was the first to see the redcoats on the summit of Majuba Hill, where they had climbed under cover of the night.

Mrs. Kruger in some respects sets an example which may be commended to certain of her supercilious English

She is kind and thoughtful and has a womanly heart. Nobody ever saw her with a feather in her bonnet. She trims all her own bonnets and makes all her own dresses; but she has the strongest objection to wearing birds' feathers or anything else involving suffering or cruelty. She sets her own fashions and wears what she pleases.

THE SISTER OF THE COLOSSUS.

By the side of another great South African stands a female figure less known to fame. Says Mr. Mee:—

It is not generally known that Mr. Cecil Rhodes has a sister living in South Africa. At Groote Schuur, Mr. Rhodes' beautiful home, a few miles from Cape Town, Miss Edith Rhodes entertains her brother's guests. She is said to dislike men as much as her brother dislikes women. She dispenses hospitality on the most lavish scale. Miss Rhodes is of masculine appearance, and has been described as resembling "the English squire of sporting prints." She is rich, generous, and businesslike, and her impulsive nature wins her many friends. Miss Rhodes has many peculiarities, but as she has an ample fortune a good deal is forgiven her. On board a steamer not long ago she gained herself a tremendous popularity by regulating the handicaps for the running matches and acting as umpire in the tugs-of-war. Away from home she is thoroughly masculine, and takes her part with men in any sport; but at home, where she has a lady companion in constant attendance on her, she is as feminine as any woman can be, and makes a genial hostess. She is greatly interested in the Zoo at Groote Schuur, upon which Mr. Rhodes has spent a fortune, and is fond of driving about the estate, which comprises six miles of splendid drives. Miss Rhodes has a better grasp of South African politics than some members of the Colonial Office, and it is needless to say that she is the loyal champion of her brother Cecil and all in which he is concerned.

bject

ration

nent:

give k out

with

ed by States e. It or for

The pects ow is e and e can t an reatly Vice-

t the ninaole to Gold

the Hall vater, The cent., likely

t than osed as emy of e trust by the and it when have it oly are Demo-f their duable collectry of Mr.; Mr. land's hraim known e new of a of the with a te for ation," prinFROM COUNTER-JUMPER TO GENERAL.

GENERAL HECTOR MACDONALD is the subject of a sketch by Alexander Macintosh in the Woman at Home for July. From this it appears that "Fighting Mac" was born at Rootfield, in Ross-shire. His father was a farmer, but it is said that from his mother, who was a Boyd, he got his fighting grit. He got his education at the parish school. His first step on leaving the care of his dominie gave slight promise of what lay before him:—

The future General began life in the more "genteel" occupation of a draper. Early in his teens he wanted to be a soldier. His parents, like many other Scottish folk, thought that the army was the very last and lowest occupation for their sons. To cool Hector's courage they sent him to learn the drapery trade with Mr. William Mackay, of the Clan Tartan Warehouse, in High Street, Inverness. Once loose, however, from his mother's apron-strings, his natural bent asserted itself. The draper did not extinguish the soldier. He was found one morning drilling all the assistants in the shop! The volunteering spirit ran high at Inverness in 1870. He joined the Merchants' Company on March 7th, 1870, and on the last day of that month he subscribed the battalion roll.

He kept up and extended his education in evening classes. His career as a draper came to an abrupt end in his eighteenth year. He was sent downstairs to cut out patterns:—

His employer, on going to see how he was getting on, found fault with Macdonald's work, and asked sarcastically if he had cut out the patterns with a spade. "No," replied the youth; "I did it with a shovel." And so, as the story runs, he put on his bonnet and went off to seek the recruiting-sergeant.

In 1871 he ceased to be a volunteer and became a Gordon Highlander:—

His parents, on hearing of his enlistment, wished to buy him out; but he was only too happy in his new sphere, and he was determined to succeed.

He did not mean, he said, to be a common soldier all his life. He became drill-corporal in 1872, sergeant in 1873, colour-sergeant in 1874, and won his commission as second-lieutenant in 1879. Step by step he has risen to take at last the command of the Highland Brigade. His remarkable rise is attributed to his genius in handling men as well as to hard work and to his uncommon tact. The writer—himself a Mac—declares that "there is no race more politely deferential than the Highland." And the General has so managed to captivate men that his success has excited little envy.

He is essentially tartan at heart, and cherishes still the Gaelic tongue. This he turned to practical account in a noted campaign:—

During his sojourn in the Soudan he wrote home in "the good old Gaelic tongue," so that if the Dervishes captured his letters they were none the wiser.

DR. DILLON'S VIEW OF THE TSAR.

Good Words for July has a character sketch of the Tsar from the pen of Dr. Dillon. After describing his education, he says:—

Speaking in the language of sobriety, Nicholas II. is a man of much more than average intelligence, quick of apprehension, keen in investigating, fertile in distinctions, but somewhat slow in reaching definite conclusions, and slower still in drawing practical consequences from them. The two qualities which have heretofore stood him in best stead are his power of observation and his splendid memory. He can take a man's measure in a twinkling, and store it away in his memory for years. His mind, one of his professors told me, is wax to receive and granite to retain impressions.

His knowledge of English literature is most unusual. Dr. Dillon says:—

The Tsar's professors assured me that there is no epoch of our literature with which he is not fairly well acquainted. That a cultivated foreigner should have read "Macbeth," "Hamlet," the "Midsummer Night's Dream," "Childe Harold" and "In Memoriam," is not perhaps surprising; but one is somewhat startled to learn that a Russian who is being trained specially not in philology but in artillery, strategy and statecraft, should con the "Canterbury Tales," peruse the "Faërie Queene," dip into the "Arcadia" and make a favourite of Marlowe, carrying about a selection from their masterpieces in his brain. Yet this is what Nicholas II. did when Tsarevitch. Of all English literature he prefers the historical plays of Shakespeare, which he has read over and over again. A diplomatist, who is himself a well-known English writer, seriously declared that it is impossible to discover by a wrongly-placed accent, a foreign idiom, or any other token that the Tsar is not an Englishman.

Dr. Dillon explodes again the ridiculous stories of the Tsar's ill-health, and declares :—

he is wholly free from organic ailments, and is endowed with powers of endurance which are considerably above the average. He is a splendid walker, both as regards speed and the length of time he can go on without resting; and on horseback, too, he can hold his own with the best. "He is as wiry as a mannequin," said an officer to me, "and his nerves sometimes seem to be made of Sheffield steel." "He is as sensitive as a woman," one of his professors assured me, "and the number of persons who are aware of this soft side of his nature could be counted on the fingers of one's hands." He never gives way to his feelings before others, no matter how near and dear to him 'hey may be.

But students of character find the Tsar no easy subject to read :—

His shyness, which is constitutional, is a most disturbing factor for those who endeavour to make an estimate of his character. But some of its other effects are much more serious still. It weakens the force of his personal influence upon his surroundings, empties his language of the emotion which interpenetrates his thoughts, and renders it like the utterances of the Delphic oracle or the remarks of a contemporary diplomatist. . . . His words are words only, for he uses the algebra, not the poetry, of conversation.

Dr. Dillon himself concludes in a somewhat oracular vein:—

If conjecture were not rash, his feelings might be characterised as intense, and his aims as vague, the sentiments being seldom precipitated in thought and the ideas rarely made emotion-proof.

OF the papers in Pearson's this month what most appeals to the reader in the dog-days will probably be Mr. W. Henry's sketch of Diving as a Fine Art, practised The separate attitudes of the skilled by the Swedes. divers are shown to be as graceful as their combination dives and double dives are wonder-compelling. Or Dr. Cook's discussion of the possibilities of reaching the four poles (the two magnetic poles being added to the usual complement), will suggest coolness to the perspiring reader, until he learns that, in the judgment of the writer, the poles will only be reached by walking. A less dubious relief is called to the mind by Turner Morton's sketch of Midnight Mountaineering in Norway, where the climber has the added charm of sea view and the close proximity of the hotel steamer in the fiord below. Should the heat prove desperate, there is a desperate consolation provided by Mr. Herbert Fyfe's pile of gruesome surmises borrowed from science and fiction as to how the world will end. To steady the whirling imagination as it riots among the ruins of the world, Professor Simon Newcomb's precise explanation how the planets are weighed may be welcome. The direst eventuality of all is hinted at in Mr. George Griffith's account of the criminal lunatic asylum at Broadmoor. But may the temperature be merciful'

hel and Pie an gan

190

the

eng

mer owin Con athl Amy wha prep com men depu

Th

Gym

fifth,

Car

Drill

athle distar ships, severa distan becon (instea race o are o manne jumps in ide nation Lawn Bowls others, only c

Gyr

societ

The interv Vinc all; bu Boulog extremi to cert gymnas dimensi tracks wanting there c sailing, the sho ordinary that the in the place at pretty sp wide an good lin

journey

THE OLYMPIAN GAMES IN PARIS.

h of our

That a

lamlet,"

and "In mewhat

specially

, should ne," dip carrying

Yet this

English

e, which himself

s impos-diom, or

s of the red with average.

length of too, he nequin," em to be an," one sons who

d on the gs before

subject

isturbing te of his

e serious

upon his ch interes of the olomatist.

, not the oracular

racterised

g seldom on-proof.

at most bably be practised

e skilled bination

ng. Or ching the

d to the erspiring

ne writer, s dubious

sketch of climber

proximity

the heat

provided borrowed will end.

mong the

's precise welcome.

r. George

sylum at iful '

FOUR years ago the first of the modern Olympiads was held in Athens. Paris is the meeting-place this year, and in the North American Keview for June Baron Pierre de Coubertin, the originator of the scheme, gives an interesting account of the conditions under which the games will be held.

THE ORGANISATION OF THE SPORTS.

The chief difference between the games of 1896 and 1900 is the preponderance of the technical element in the present year. In Athens the committee was so much engaged with providing decorations and auxiliary amusements that the purely athletic side was neglected; but owing to the attractions of the Exhibition, the French Committee have been able to devote all their energies to athletics. The International Committee, on which Lord Ampthill is the English representative, only decides in what country the games will take place, leaving all preparations to the local sub-committee. The subcommittee of 1900 was appointed by the French Government, and is presided over by M. Merillon, a former deputy.

THEIR CLASSIFICATION.

This year there are ten sections :-

The first comprises Athletic Sports and Games; the second, Gymnastics; the third, Fencing; the fourth, Shooting; the fifth, Equestrian Sports; the sixth, Cycling; the seventh, Motor Car Racing; the eighth, Aquatic Sports; the ninth, Firemen's Drill; the tenth, Ballooning. The first section comprises athletic sports, foot races, jumping, etc., and games. The distances of the foot races are those of the French championships, in which the best English runners have taken part on several occasions within the last ten years; that is to say, the distances are very nearly the same. If the "100 yards" has become with us 100 metres, and the "100 metres (instead of 1,609, the exact equivalent of the mile), the hurdle race corresponds exactly to the English distance; the hurdles are of the same height, and they are arranged in the same manner. As to the running competitions, the long and high jumps, pole-vaulting, and putting the weight, they are performed in identically the same fashion. The games entered as international are Football (Rugby and Association), Hockey, Cricket, Lawn Tennis, Croquet and Golf; there will also be a match at Bowls. All these games are played in France. There are others, such as Baseball, La Crosse, etc., of which exhibitions only can be given, as they are not played in France.

Gymnastics are only open to individuals, and not to societies.

WHERE THEY TAKE PLACE.

The various contests will take place at considerable intervals, and will not be all held in the same place:—

Vincennes had been first chosen as capable of uniting them all; but although possessing a wood which almost rivals that of Boulogne, situated on the other side of Paris, just at the other extremity, Vincennes does not offer the conditions indispensable to certain sports. It is perfectly adapted for athletic sports, gymnastics, cycling and lawn tennis; a cycling track of fine dimensions is already in course of construction; there will be tracks for the foot races and good tennis grounds. But it is wanting in space for golf, shooting and polo; as for the lakes, there can be no question of having the rowing, still less the sailing, matches upon them. It is therefore almost decided that the shooting will take place at Satory, near Versailles, in the ordinary exercising ground of the troops garrisoned in Paris; that the polo matches will be played on the Polo Club ground in the Bois de Boulogne; that the rowing matches will take place at Courbevoie, and the sailing matches at Meulan, two pretty spots in the neighbourhood of Paris, where the Seine is wide and straight. As for the golf matches, in order to find good links one will have to go to Compiegne, an hour's railway journey from Paris. The Society of Sport at Compiègne has made links which would satisfy the wishes of the most exacting players.

PROFESSIONALS AND AMATEURS.

Professionals will not be allowed to compete with amateurs; but distinct competitions in which they alone take part will be included in the programme. In regard to athleticism in general, Baron de Coubertin says that most progress is observable in Germany and Sweden. Berlin is on the way to becoming a great sporting centre. In Vienna an athletic club has recently been opened in the Prater, and there is a movement in favour of athleticism in St. Petersburg. In short, sport is spreading all over the world.

BROWNING'S FATHER AND MOTHER.

THE character of Browning becomes more explicable in the light of what Mr. W. J. Stillman tells us in the June Atlantic Monthly of both his parents. Mr. Stillman recalls a winter in Paris which was greatly brightened by the acquaintance of the father and sister of the poet. He says:—

"Old Mr. Browning," we have always called him, though the qualification of "old," by which we distinguished him from his son Robert, seemed a misnomer, for he had the perpetual juvenility of a blessed child. If to live in the world as if not of it indicates a saintly nature, then Robert Browning, the elder, was a saint, a serene, untroubled soul, conscious of no moral or theological problem to disturb his serenity, gentle as a gentle woman, a man in whom it seemed to me no moral conflict could ever have arisen to cloud his frank acceptance of life as it came to him. . . . His unworldliness had not a flaw. So beautiful a life could never have become distinguished in the struggles and antagonisms which make the career of the man of the world or even the man of letters, as letters are now written, for he was one, and the only man I ever knew, of whom it could be said that he applied in the divine sense the maxim of Christ, "Resist not evil"—he simply, and by the necessity of his own nature, ignored it.

THE POET'S BULLDOG.

Of the elder Mrs. Browning Mr. Stillman reports a trait which we have not seen mentioned elsewhere. He says:—

Of Miss Browning, who still lives, I will not speak, but what she told me of the poet's mother may, I think, be repeated without indiscretion. She had the extraordinary power over animals of which we hear sometimes, but of which I have never known a case so perfect as hers. She would lure the butterflies in the garden to her, and the domestic animals obeyed her as if they reasoned. Somebody had given Robert a pureblooded bulldog of a rare breed, which tolerated no interference from any person except him or his mother. Even her husband was not allowed to take the slightest liberty with her in the dog's presence, and when Robert was more familiar with her than the dog thought proper, he showed his teeth to him. . . . They had a favourite cat to which the dog had the usual antipathy of dogs, and one day he chased her under a cupboard and kept her there besieged, unable to reach her, and she unable to escape, till Mrs. Browning intervened and gave the dog a lecture, in which she told him of their attachment for the cat and charged him never to molest her more. If the creature had understood speech he could not have obeyed better, for from that time he was never known to molest the cat, while she, taking her revenge for past tyranny, bore herself most insolently with him, and when she scratched him over the head, he only whimpered and turned away as if to avoid temptation.

In the July number of the Century Magazine Mr. William Mason begins "Memories of a Musical Life." The reminiscences include interesting notes on Lowell Mason (his father), Meyerbeer, Liszt, Moscheles, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Wagner, and others.

HOW RUSKIN BROKE WITH CHRISTIANITY.

MR. W. J. STILLMAN'S autobiography in the Atlantic Monthly is full of interesting matter. In the June number he tells how he went, at Ruskin's invitation, to spend the summer with him in Switzerland. He says: "More princely hospitality than his no man ever received, or more kindly companionship."

A GHOST STORY.

He mentions one spookish incident which, being given on the authority of Ruskin, may claim some attention even from an incredulous public—

a story which Ruskin told me of a locality in the valley of Chamouni, haunted by a ghost that could only be seen by children. It was the figure of a woman who raked the dead leaves, and when she looked up at them the children said they only saw a skull in place of a face. Ruskin sent to a neighbouring valley for a child who could know nothing of the legend, and went with him to the locality which the ghost was reported to haunt. Arrived there, he said to the boy, "What a lonely place! there is nobody here but ourselves." "Yes, there is," said the child, "there is a woman there raking the leaves," pointing in a certain direction. "Let us go nearer to her," said Ruskin, and they walked that way, when the boy stopped and said that he did not want to go nearer, for the woman looked up, and he said that she had no eyes in her head, "only holes."

ON SABBATH OBSERVANCE.

At Chamouni, on Sundays, Ruskin would write "a sermon for a girls' school in which he was much interested, but not a line of drawing would he do." Mr. Stillman had always regarded the sanctity of the first day of the week as a theological fiction—

so that this slavery to a formality in which Ruskin was held by his terrible conscience provoked me to the discussion of the subject. I declared that there was no authority for the transference of the weekly rest from the seventh to the first day of the week.

They went over the texts together which bore on the question; and Ruskin "could not make a defence":—

The creed had so bound him to the letter that the least enlargement of the stricture broke it, and he rejected not only the tradition of the Sunday sabbath, but the whole of the ecclesiastical interpretation of the texts. He said, "If they have deceived me in this, they have probably deceived me in all." This I had not conceived as a possible consequence of the criticism of his creed, and it gave me great pain, for I was not a sceptic, as, I have since learned, he for a time became. It was useless to argue with him for the spirit of the gospel—he had always held to its infallibility and the exactitude of doctrine, and his indignation was too strong to be pacified. He returned somewhat, I have heard, to his original beliefs in later days, as old men will to the beliefs of their younger years, for his Christianity was too sincere and profound for a matter of mistaken credence in mere formalities ever to affect its substance; and the years which followed showed that in no essential trait had the religious foundations of his character been moved. For myself, I was still a sincere believer in the substantial accuracy of the body of Christian doctrine, and the revolt of Ruskin from it hurt me deeply.

There is something almost comic as well as tragic in the idea of a dispute as to a first- or a seventh-day Sabbath upsetting the Christian faith of a soul like Ruskin's.

WHAT will probably attract the most attention in the Royal for July is Margaret Collinson's paper on the Queen and her family as artists, and in especial the two drawings by Her Majesty and the one by the Princess Royal. Bible readers may be interested to find in the fiction that the little captive maid of Naaman appears as the heroine of a love story.

A ROYAL ROAD TO EDUCATION.

IT would appear from an article by J. D. Quackenbos, in Harper's Magazine, that hypnotic suggestion is of immense educational value:—

"Not only may dull minds be polished, unbalanced minds adjusted, gifted minds empowered to develop their talents, but the educating mind of the school-child may tread that royal road to learning which ancient philosophers sought for in vain; the matured mind of the scholar may be clothed with perceptive faculty, with keenest insight, tireless capacity for application, unerring taste; and the imaginative mind of painter, poet, musician, discoverer, may be crowned with creative efficiency in the line of ideals that are high and true."

The writer gives several examples of the effect of such treatment in cases of unnaturally stupid children with excellent results. In many of these cases the hypnotic treatment was persisted in for months, until the desired trend was permanently given to the mental and moral experience.

An instance is given of the treatment of a boy whose case was so serious that it was practically whether approaching insanity or congenital mental unbalance could be successfully treated by hypnotism.

After the lapse of some time devoted to hypnotic suggestion the boy's state was much improved. The writer says:—

A marked character change has certainly been effected. The boy is now docile, obedient and happy. The tangled faculties have been unravelled, and he has become rational and quick of comprehension.

It is, however, not alone the young who can benefit by this treatment. Mr. Quackenbos tells wonderful stories concerning its effect upon those requiring assistance in musical work:—

Proficiency in piano-playing on the part of those who understand the technic is assured in a comparatively short time by suggestive instruction of this nature.

It is not even necessary that the suggestor should be possessed of musical ability. One case is cited in which a singer was cured of hoarseness, a thickened condition of the vocal chords and a morbid expectation of failure. When hypnotised she was assured the atmosphere would have no effect upon her vocal chords, that her voice would be smooth and capable of every demand made upon it. These suggestions had an immediate effect.

Many would-be writers of fiction have been under treatment, the following being the method pursued:—

To these were imparted, in hypnosis, first, a knowledge of the canons of narration; secondly, of the laws of construction in the case of the novel, its functions and technic, and its legitimate material.

The results are reported to have been most successful. The writer seems to turn with relief to the treatment of actresses, who apparently are easily influenced by suggestions of their merit and superiority to other stars, and whose consequent improvement is so marked as to easily lead them to the front of their profession.

It would be most interesting to hear more about the after-life of those who have undergone the treatment, as to if they need hypnotism as a stimulant, and whether there comes a time when a reaction sets in. Certainly, if Mr. Quackenbos is able to achieve in every case anything like the success he reports in this article, he is likely to be a very busy man very soon.

THE Lady's Realm for July is a double summer number. It offers a very attractive combination of light articles and well-reproduced pictures, pleasant to glance through, but scarcely suitable to quote.

of it to a cate Chiral Ethat hold book ward front "sta

It

vexit

T

arti

is all mate mate neces book that broke open will grate In sixtee by the leaves less f

the con eather in those are a closin before by a centre three angle Thopen.

three-gather few lethat (Again be he presse leavin leather an act little study simple has oc octave minute

FR

Eugé of tin is obl Lane-July Ages through

HOW TO OPEN A NEW BOOK.

THE Library is not a mere technical review containing articles of interest to the librarian only. A fair proportion of its contents will be found to be of considerable interest to all lovers of books. It is from one of the latter category that the following advice, given by Mr. Cedric Chivers, is culled. He writes:—

Every librarian knows, and every lover of books soon learns, that to insert the two thumbs in the centre of a book, and to hold the leaves down against the covers tightly, and force the book open flat, is an unwise proceeding. The book ever afterwards has a tendency to fall open in the same place, and if the front edge be marbled or gilt, an ugly ridge, technically called a "start," defaces it as a result.

It should be remembered that in opening a book the convexity of the back is suddenly changed into concavity, and if it is also understood that the back, underneath the covering material, has been coated with glue, paper, or other stiff:ning material, so that quite a brittle surface has to be dealt with, the necessity for conducting the operation of "breaking in" the book gently is sufficiently apparent. Care, then, is required that the alternative concavity of the back shall not be sharply broken at an angle, but that an attempt should be made when opening the book for the first few times to bend it in an arc. It will in this way become pliable, and will afterwards open gratefully where it is desired.

In order to effect this, a few of the leaves of a new book, say sixteen or so, on each side, shou'd be held tightly to the boards by the first fingers, while the thumbs should be inserted a few leaves nearer the centre, and made to hold these leaves a little less firmly as the covers are opened slightly apart.

The book is then closed, and, taking a few more leaves from the centre, the fingers and thumb's are inserted in the same way on each side. It is to be carefully observed that the leaves held by the index finger close to the boards are to be tightly held, whilst those held by the thumbs are to be allowed to give as the boards are again forced open, this time a little further back. Again closing the book, the fingers and thumbs in the same way as before, gather more leaves from the centre of the volume, and force the covers yet farther. The same operation is repeated by again gathering more leaves toward the covers until the centre of the book is nearly reached, some two dozen leaves, or three sections, being left to prevent the production of an acute angle.

angle.

The back of the book has now been bent, and not broken open. Its pliability may be further improved by holding about three-fourths of the leaves in the right hand, and with the left gathering a few of the leaves under the thumb, and leaving a few leaves loose; the cover should be pressed downwards, so that the back at the commencement of the book may be bent. Again closing it, and opening it at the other end, the book must be held by the left hand, and the cover and last few leaves pressed back in the same way by the right, always, however, leaving some sixteen or twenty leaves loose, so that the lining or leather at the back of the volume shall never be folded back at an acute angle.

These operations may seem a little complicated, but a very little practice will amply repay the trouble of a few moments' study of this description. The operations themselves are so simple, and may be so quickly performed, that the writer, who has occasion frequently to open in this way some two hundred octavo volumes, can dispose of that number in about thirty minutes.

FROM Cleopatra sailing on the Nile, to the Empress Eugénie opening the Suez Canal, stretches a vast tract of time; but this gap between ancient and modern Egypt is obligingly, if cursorily, filled up by Professor Stanley Lane-Poole within the limits of a single article in the July Longman's. His sketch of Egypt in the Middle Ages is an example of the way in which history filters through the magazine into the mind of the average reader.

SIMPLE v. SUMPTUOUS STAGE-SETTING.

THE battle between Puritan and Ritualist, which rages around the question of the proper accessories of public worship, appears also in the dramatic arena and centres on the problem of the staging of Shakespeare. Shall the great plays be set to all the gorgeous accompaniment of modern scenic art, or be given on a stage more akin to the simple arrangements of Elizabethan days? In the July Fortnightly Mr. H. Beerbohm Tree enters the lists to defend the Ritualistic view. He insists that it is unmistakably the popular view, and speaking from his own managerial experience, he declares it to yield in practice a substantial pecuniary profit. He argues also for its being right in taste. He calls Shakespeare himself as witness, and contends that "Shakespeare intended to leave as little to the imagination as possible, and to put upon the stage as gorgeous and as complete a picture as the resources of the theatre could supply." He raises an interesting historical question when he asks:—

Are we not inclined to undervalue a little the stage resources of the Elizabethan period? Are we not prone to assume that Shakespeare had far less in this direction to his hand than we give him credit for? Of scenery in the public theatres there was practically none, but in the private houses and in the castles of the nobles, when plays were played at the celebration of births and marriages and comings-of-age, we find that mounting, scenery, costume, and music were largely employed as adjuncts to these performances. In fact, when we read the description of some of the masques and interludes, when we consider the gorgeousness of display and the money that was expended for only single performances, we may well doubt whether, even in our day, we have surpassed what our forefathers of three centuries ago attained. So that in justifying the lavishness of modern productions we are not altogether thrown back upon the theory of Shakespeare's "prophetic vision" of what the stage would compass when he had been laid in his grave. These shows were undoubtedly witnessed by Shakespeare himself, and it is indeed not unreasonable to suppose that he acquired the love of gorgeous stage decorations from such performances witnessed by him in early life. Take the question of what we call properties: Shakespeare more than any other author seems to demand these at every turn. Swords, helmets, doublets, rings and bracelets, caskets and crowns are the inevitable paraphernalia of the Shakespearean drama; while as to music, the existence of an orchestra is vouched for by the recent discovery by a German savant of a contemporary drawing of the interior of the old Swan Theatre.

The writer finds the case still stronger in regard to costumes, and appeals to the lavish stock entered in an inventory still in existence of the costume wardrobe of a London theatre in Shakespeare's time. He contends that the more magnificent setting is required by the actor himself, in the interest of his art, much rather than by the manager in the interest of his pocket.

"Possibly the twentieth century will see the world evangelised." This is the hope which a review of the nineteenth century inspires in the breast of Rev. Richard Lovett, writing in the July Sunday at Home on the "New York Conference on Missions." Rev. T. H. Darlow, in the same number, indicates one way of realising this hope by telling the story of the Bible in Africa, as it is now translated into more than a hundred different African languages; while Rev. F. B. Meyer is selected as a specimen of intensive evangelism, or of "men who reach the masses at home." Tissof's picture of the Beatitudes forms a valuable frontispiece.

kenbos, n is of

ents, but

yal road

in ; the rceptive

r, poet, iency in of such en with ypnotic desired

whose whether palance ypnotic

The

moral faculties quick of nefit by stories ance in under-

l. The time by ould be a which ndition failure. e would e would upon it.

under :-ge of the ction in gitimate essful.

atment ced by r stars, l as to

nent, as whether rtainly, mything ikely to umber. articles irough,

FROM COUNTER-JUMPER TO GENERAL.

GENERAL HECTOR MACDONALD is the subject of a sketch by Alexander Macintosh in the Woman at Home for July. From this it appears that "Fighting Mac" was born at Rootfield, in Ross-shire. His father was a farmer, but it is said that from his mother, who was a Boyd, he got his fighting grit. He got his education at the parish school. His first step on leaving the care of his dominie gave slight promise of what lay before him:

The future General began life in the more "genteel" occupation of a draper. Early in his teens he wanted to be a soldier. His parents, like many other Scottish folk, thought that the army was the very last and lowest occupation for their sons. To cool Hector's courage they sent him to learn the drapery trade with Mr. William Mackay, of the Clan Tartan Warehouse, in High Street, Inverness. Once loose, however, from his mother's apron-strings, his natural bent asserted itself. The draper did not extinguish the soldier. He was found one morning drilling all the assistants in the shop! The volunteering spirit ran high at Inverness in 1870. He joined the Merchants' Company on March 7th, 1870, and on the last day of that month he subscribed the battalion roll.

He kept up and extended his education in evening classes. His career as a draper came to an abrupt end in his eighteenth year. He was sent downstairs to cut out patterns :-

His employer, on going to see how he was getting on, found fault with Macdonald's work, and asked sarcastically if he had cut out the patterns with a spade. "No," replied the youth; "I did it with a shovel." And so, as the story runs, he put on his bonnet and went off to seek the recruiting-sergeant.

In 1871 he ceased to be a volunteer and became a Gordon Highlander:—

His parents, on hearing of his enlistment, wished to buy him out; but he was only too happy in his new sphere, and he was determined to succeed.

He did not mean, he said, to be a common soldier all his life. He became drill-corporal in 1872, sergeant in 1873, colour-sergeant in 1874, and won his commission as second-lieutenant in 1879. Step by step he has risen to take at last the command of the Highland Brigade. His remarkable rise is attributed to his genius in handling men as well as to hard work and to his uncommon tact. The writer—himself a Mac—declares that "there is no race more politely deferential than the Highland." And the General has so managed to captivate men that his success has excited little envy.

He is essentially tartan at heart, and cherishes still the Gaelic tongue. This he turned to practical account in a noted campaign :-

During his sojourn in the Soudan he wrote home in "the good old Gaelic tongue," so that if the Dervishes captured his letters they were none the wiser.

DR. DILLON'S VIEW OF THE TSAR.

Good Words for July has a character sketch of the Tsar from the pen of Dr. Dillon. After describing his education, he says:—

Speaking in the language of sobriety, Nicholas II. is a man of much more than average intelligence, quick of apprehension, keen in investigating, fertile in distinctions, but somewhat slow in reaching definite conclusions, and slower still in drawing practical consequences from them. The two qualities which have heretofore stood him in best stead are his power of observation and his splendid memory. He can take a man's measure in a twinkling, and store it away in his memory for years. His mind, one of his professors told me, is wax to receive and granite to retain impressions.

His knowledge of English literature is most unusual. Dr. Dillon says:—

The Tsar's professors assured the that there is so epoch of our iterature with which he is not fairly well acquainted. That a cultivated foreigner should have read "Macbeth," of Hamlet, "the "Midsummer Night's Dream," of Childe Harold "and "Indemoriam," is not perhaps surprising; but one is somewhat startled to learn that a Russian who is being trained specially not in philology but in artillery, strategy and statecraft, should con the "Canterbury Tales," peruse the "Faërie Queene, "dip into the "Arcadia," and make a favoarite of Marlowe, carryling about a selection from their masterpieces in his brain. Yet this is what Nicholas II. did when Tsarevitch. Of all English literature he prefers the historical plays of Shakespeare, which he has read over and over again. A diplomatist, who is himself a well-known English writer, seriously declared that it is impossible to discover by a wrongly-placed accent, a foreign idiom, or any other token that the Tar is not an Englishman.

Dr. Dillon explodes again the ridiculous stories of the Tsar's ill-health, and declares :-

he is wholly free from organic ailments, and is endowed with powers of endurance which are considerably above the average. He is a splendid walker, both as regards speed and the length of time he can go on without resting; and on horseback, too, he can hold his own with the best. "He is as wiry as a mannequin," said an officer to me, "and his nerves sometimes seem to be made of Sheffield steel." "He is as sensitive as a woman," one of his professors assured me, "and the number of persons who are aware of this soft side of his nature could be counted on the fingers of one's hands." He never gives way to his feelings before others, no matter how near and dear to him they may be.

But students of character find the Tsar no easy subject to read:—

His shyness, which is constitutional, is a most disturbing factor for those who endeavour to make an estimate of his character. But some of its other effects are much more serious still. It weakens the force of his personal influence upon his surroundings, empties his language of the emotion which interpenetrates his thoughts, and renders it like the utterances of the Delphic oracle or the remarks of a contemporary diplomatist. . . . His words are words only, for he uses the algebra, not the poetry, of conversation.

Dr. Dillon himself concludes in a somewhat oracular precipitated in thought and the ideas rarely made emotion-proof.

If conjecture were not rash, his feelings might be characterised as intense, and his aims as vague, the sentiments being seldom

OF the papers in Pearson's this month what most appeals to the reader in the dog-days will probably be Mr. W. Henry's sketch of Diving as a Fine Art, practised The separate attitudes of the skilled by the Swedes. divers are shown to be as graceful as their combination dives and double dives are wonder-compelling. Dr. Cook's discussion of the possibilities of reaching the four poles (the two magnetic poles being added to the usual complement), will suggest coolness to the perspiring reader, until he learns that, in the judgment of the writer, the poles will only be reached by walking. A less dubious relief is called to the mind by Turner Morton's sketch of Midnight Mountaineering in Norway, where the climber has the added charm of sea view and the close proximity of the hotel steamer in the fiord below. Should the heat prove desperate, there is a desperate consolation provided by Mr. Herbert Fyfe's pile of gruesome surmises borrowed from science and fiction as to how the world will end. To steady the whirling imagination as it riots among the ruins of the world, Professor Simon Newcomb's precise explanation how the planets are weighed may be welcome. The direst eventuality of all is hinted at in Mr. George Griffith's account of the criminal lunatic asylum at Broadmoor. But may the temperature be merciful'

hel

Pic

gai

the

eng

Cor

ath

Am

wha

pre

con

mer

dep

Gym fifth,

Car

Drill

athle

dista

ships

sever

dista

beco

(inste race

are (

manr

jump

in id

natio

Lawr

Bowl

other

Gy

Th

Vin

inter

all; t

Boulo

extren

to cer

gymna

dimen

tracks

wantir

there sailing

the sh

ordina

that th

in the place :

pretty :

wide a good li ourney

socie

T

THE OLYMPIAN GAMES IN PARIS.

h of our That a

lamlet,"

pecially , should ne," dip carrying Yet this

English e, which s himself

diom, or

of the red with

average.

too, he nequin,"

an," one ons who

d on the subject

isturbing te of his

e serious

upon his ch interes of the lomatist.

, not the

oracular

racterised g seldom

on-proof.

at most ractised skilled bination

hing the

d to the

erspiring

e writer,

ketch of climber

roximity

the heat

provided

orrowed will end.

nong the velcome.

George ylum at ful

ng. Or

FOUR years ago the first of the modern Olympiads was held in Athens. Paris is the meeting-place this year, and in the North American Neview for June Baron Pierre de Coubertin, the originator of the scheme, gives an interesting account of the conditions under which the games will be held.

THE ORGANISATION OF THE SPORTS.

The chief difference between the games of 1896 and 1900 is the preponderance of the technical element in the present yar. In Athens the committee was so much engaged with providing decorations and auxiliary amusements that the purely athletic side was neglected; but owing to the attractions of the Exhibition, the French Committee have been able to devote all their energies to athletics. The International Committee, on which Lord Ampthill is the English representative, only decides in what country the games will take place, leaving all preparations to the local sub-committee. The sub-committee of 1900 was appointed by the French Government, and is presided over by M. Merillon, a former deputy.

THEIR CLASSIFICATION.

This year there are ten sections :-

The first comprises Athletic Sports and Games; the second, Gymnastics; the third, Fencing; the fourth, Shooting; the fifth, Equestrian Sports; the sixth, Cycling; the seventh, Motor Car Racing; the eighth, Aquatic Sports; the ninth, Firemen's Drill; the tenth, Billooning. The first section comprises athletic sports, foot races, jumping, etc., and games. The distances of the foot races are those of the French championships, in which the best English runners have taken part on several occasions within the last ten years; that is to say, the distances are very nearly the same. If the "100 yards" has become with us 100 metres, and the "one mile" 1,500 metres (instead of 1,609, the exact equivalent of the mile), the hurdle race corresponds exactly to the English distance; the hurdles are of the same height, and they are arranged in the same manner. As to the running competitions, the long and high jumps, pole-vaulting, and putting the weight, they are performed in identically the same fashion. The games entered as international are Football (Rugby ard Association), Hockey, Cricket, Lawn Tennis, Croquet and Golf; there will also be a match at Bowls. All these games are played in France. There are others, such as Baseball, La Crosse, etc., of which exhibitions only can be given, as they are not played in France.

Gymnastics are only open to individuals, and not to societies.

WHERE THEY TAKE PLACE.

The various contests will take place at considerable intervals, and will not be all held in the same place:—

Vincennes had been first chosen as capable of uniting them all; but although possessing a wood which almost rivals that of Boulogne, situated on the other side of Paris, just at the other extremity, Vincennes does not offer the conditions indispensable to certain sports. It is perfectly adapted for athletic sports, gymnastics, cycling and lawn tennis; a cycling track of fine dimensions is already in course of construction; there will be tracks for the foot races and good tennis grounds. But it is wanting in space for golf, shooting and polo; as for the lakes, there can be no question of having the rowing, still less the sailing, matches upon them. It is therefore almost decided that the shooting will take place at Satory, near Versailles, in the ordinary exercising ground of the troops garrisoned in Paris; that the polo matches will be played on the Polo Club ground in the Bois de Boulogne; that the rowing matches will take place at Courbevoic, and the sailing matches at Meulan, two pretty spots in the neighbourhood of Paris, where the Seine is wide and straight. As for the golf matches, in order to find good links one will have to go to Compiègne, an hour's railway journey from Paris. The Society of Sport at Compiègne has made links which would entiry the wishes of the execting players.

PROFESSIONALS AND AMATRURS.

Professionals will not be allowed to compete with amateurs; but distinct competitions in which they alone take part will be included in the programme. In regard to athleticism in general, Baron de Coubertin says that most progress is observable in Germany and Sweden. Berlin is on the way to becoming a great sporting centre. In Vienna an athletic club has recently been opened in the Prater, and there is a movement in favour of athleticism in St. Petersburg. In short, sport is spreading all over the world.

BROWNING'S FATHER AND MOTHER.

THE character of Browning becomes more explicable in the light of what Mr. W. J. Stillman tells us in the June Atlantic Monthly of both his parents. Mr. Stillman recalls a winter in Paris which was greatly brightened by the acquaintance of the father and sister of the poet. He says

"Old Mr. Browning," we have always called him, though the qualification of "old," by which we distinguished him from his son Robert, seemed a misnomer, for he had the perpetual juvenility of a blessed child. If to live in the world as if not of it indicates a saintly nature, then Robert Browning, the elder, was a saint, a serene, untroubled soul, conscious of no moral or theological problem to disturb his serenity, gentle as a gentle woman, a man in whom it seemed to me no moral conflict could ever have arisen to cloud his frank acceptance of life as it came to him. . . His unworldliness had not a flaw. So beautiful a life could never have become distinguished in the struggles and antagonisms which make the career of the man of the world or even the man of letters, as letters are now written, for he was one, and the only man I ever knew, of whom it could be said that he applied in the divine sense the maxim of Christ, "Resist not evil"—he simply, and by the necessity of his own nature, ignored it.

THE POET'S BULLDOG.

Of the elder Mrs. Browning Mr. Stillman reports a trait which we have not seen mentioned elsewhere. He says:—

Of Miss Browning, who still lives, I will not speak, but what she told me of the poet's mother may, I think, he repeated without indiscretion. She had the extraordinary power over animals of which we hear sometimes, but of which I have never known a case so perfect as hers. She would lure the butterflies in the garden to her, and the domestic animals obeyed her as if they reasoned. Somebody had given Robert a pure-blooded bulldog of a rare breed, which tolerated no interference from any person except him or his mother. Even her husband was not allowed to take the slightest liberty with her in the dog's presence, and when Robert was more familiar with her than the dog thought proper, he showed his teeth to him, . . They had a favourite cat to which the dog had the usual antipathy of dogs, and one day he chased her under a cupboard and kept her there besieged, unable to reach her, and she unable to escape, till Mrs. Browning intervened and gave the dog a lecture, in which she told him of their attachment for the cat and charged him never to molest her more. If the creature had understood speech he could not have obeyed better, for from that time he was never known to molest the cat, while she, taking her revenge for past tyranny, hore herself most insolently with him, and when she scratched him over the head, he only whimpered and turned away as if to avoid temptation.

In the July number of the Century Magazine Mr. William Mason begins "Memories of a Musical Life." The reminiscences include interesting notes on Lowell Mason (his father), Meyerbeer, Liszt, Moscheles, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Wagner, and others.

HOW RUSKIN BROKE WITH CHRISTIANITY.

MR. W. J. STILLMAN'S 'autobiography in the Atlantic Monthly is full of interesting matter. In the June number he tells how he went, at Ruskin's invitation, to spend the summer with him in Switzerland. He says: "More princely hospitality than his no man ever received, or more kindly companionship."

A GHOST STORY.

He mentions one spookish incident which, being given on the authority of Ruskin, may claim some attention even from an incredulous public—

a story which Ruskin told me of a locality in the valley of Chamouni, haunted by a ghost that could only be seen by children. It was the figure of a woman who raked the dead leaves, and when she looked up at them the children said they only saw a skull in place of a face. Ruskin sent to a neighbouring valley for a child who could know nothing of the legend, and went with him to the locality which the ghost was reported to haunt. Arrived there, he said to the boy, "What a lonely place! there is nobody here but ourselves." "Yes, there is," said the child, "there is a woman there raking the leaves," pointing in a certain direction. "Let us go nearer to her," said Ruskin, and they walked that way, when the boy stopped and said that he did not want to go nearer, for the woman looked up, and he said that she had no eyes in her head, "only holes."

ON SABBATH OBSERVANCE.

At Chamouni, on Sundays, Ruskin would write "a sermon for a girls' school in which he was much interested, but not a line of drawing would he do." Mr. Stillman had always regarded the sanctity of the first day of the week as a theological fiction—

so that this slavery to a formality in which Ruskin was held by his terrible conscience provoked me to the discussion of the subject. I declared that there was no authority for the transference of the weekly rest from the seventh to the first day of the week

They went over the texts together which bore on the question; and Ruskin "could not make a defence":—

The creed had so bound him to the letter that the least enlargement of the stricture broke it, and he rejected not only the tradition of the Sunday sabbath, but the whole of the ecclesiastical interpretation of the texts. He said, "If they have deceived me in this, they have probably deceived me in all." This I had not conceived as a possible consequence of the criticism of his creed, and it gave me great pain, for I was not a sceptic, as, I have since learned, he for a time became. It was useless to argue with him for the spirit of the gospel—he had always held to its infallibility and the exactitude of doctrine, and his indignation was too strong to be pacified. He returned somewhat, I have heard, to his original beliefs in later days, as old men will to the beliefs of their younger years, for his Christianity was too sincere and profound for a matter of mistaken credence in mere formalities ever to affect its substance; and the years which followed showed that in no essential trait had the religious foundations of his character been moved. For myself, I was still a sincere believer in the substantial accuracy of the body of Christian doctrine, and the revolt of Ruskin from it hurt me deeply.

There is something almost comic as well as tragic in the idea of a dispute as to a first- or a seventh-day Sabbath upsetting the Christian faith of a soul like Ruskin's.

WHAT will probably attract the most attention in the Royal for July is Margaret Collinson's paper on the Queen and her family as artists, and in especial the two drawings by Her Majesty and the one by the Princess Royal. Bible readers may be interested to find in the fiction that the little captive maid of Naaman appears as the heroine of a love story.

A ROYAL ROAD TO EDUCATION.

IT would appear from an article by J. D. Quackenbos, in Harper's Magazine, that hypnotic suggestion is of immense educational value:—

of to

Ca

the ho bo wa fro

ma

ma

ne

bo

tha

op wi

six

by lea les

the

on

the

the

clo

for

by cer

thr

ang

ope

gat

tha

Ag

be pre

lea

lea

litt

stu

sim

has oct

mir

Eu

of

is La Jul

Ag

thr

rea

"Not only may dull minds be polished, unbalanced minds adjusted, gifted minds empowered to develop their talents, but the educating mind of the school-child may tread that royal road to learning which ancient philosophers sought for in vain; the matured mind of the scholar may be clothed with perceptive faculty, with keenest insight, tireless capacity for application, unerring taste; and the imaginative mind of painter, poet, musician, discoverer, may be crowned with creative efficiency in the line of ideals that are high and true."

The writer gives several examples of the effect of such treatment in cases of unnaturally stupid children with excellent results. In many of these cases the hypnotic treatment was persisted in for menths, until the desired trend was permanently given to the mental and moral energies.

An instance is given of the treatment of a boy whose case was so serious that it was practically whether approaching insanity or congenital mental unbalance could be successfully treated by hypnotism.

After the lapse of some time devoted to hypnotic suggestion the boy's state was much improved. The writer says:—

A marked character change has certainly been effected. The boy is now docile, obedient and happy. The tangled faculties have been unravelled, and he has become rational and quick of comprehension.

It is, however, not alone the young who can benefit by this treatment. Mr. Quackenbos tells wonderful stories concerning its effect upon those requiring assistance in musical work:—

Proficiency in piano-playing on the part of those who understand the technic is assured in a comparatively short time by suggestive instruction of this nature.

It is not even necessary that the suggestor should be possessed of musical ability. One case is cited in which a singer was cured of hoarseness, a thickened condition of the vocal chords and a morbid expectation of failure. When hypnotised she was assured the atmosphere would have no effect upon her vocal chords, that her voice would be smooth and capable of every demand made upon it. These suggestions had an immediate effect.

Many would-be writers of fiction have been under treatment, the following being the method pursued:—

To these were imparted, in hypnosis, first, a knowledge of the canons of narration; secondly, of the laws of construction in the case of the novel, its functions and technic, and its legitimate material.

The results are reported to have been most successful. The writer seems to turn with relief to the treatment of actresses, who apparently are easily influenced by suggestions of their merit and superiority to other stars, and whose consequent improvement is so marked as to easily lead them to the front of their profession.

It would be most interesting to hear more about the after-life of those who have undergone the treatment, as to if they need hypnotism as a stimulant, and whether there comes a time when a reaction sets in. Certainly, if Mr. Quackenbos is able to achieve in every case anything like the success he reports in this article, he is likely to be a very busy man very soon.

THE Lady's Realm for July is a double summer number. It offers a very attractive combination of light articles and well-reproduced pictures, pleasant to glance through, but scarcely suitable to quote.

HOW TO OPEN A NEW BOOK.

THE Library is not a mere technical review containing articles of interest to the librarian only. A fair proportion of its contents will be found to be of considerable interest to all lovers of books. It is from one of the latter category that the following advice, given by Mr. Cedric Chivers, is culled. He writes:—

Every librarian knows, and every lover of books soon learns, that to insert the two thumbs in the centre of a book, and to hold the leaves down against the covers tightly, and force the book open flat, is an unwise proceeding. The book ever afterwards has a tendency to fall open in the same place, and if the front edge be marbled or gilt, an ugly ridge, technically called a "start," defaces it as a result.

It should be remembered that in opening a book the convexity of the back is suddenly changed into concavity, and if it is also understood that the back, underneath the covering material, has been coated with glue, paper, or other stiff:ning material, so that quite a brittle surface has to be dealt with, the necessity for conducting the operation of "breaking in" the book gently is sufficiently apparent. Care, then, is required that the alternative concavity of the back shall not be sharply broken at an angle, but that an attempt should be made when opening the book for the first few times to bend it in an are. It will in this way become pliable, and will afterwards open gratefully where it is desired.

In order to effect this, a few of the leaves of a new book, say sixteen or so, on each side, should be held tightly to the boards by the first fingers, while the thumbs should be inserted a few leaves nearer the centre, and made to hold these leaves a little less firmly as the covers are opened slightly apart.

The book is then closed, and, taking a few more leaves from the centre, the fingers and thumbs are inserted in the same way on each side. It is to be carefully observed that the leaves held by the index finger close to the boards are to be tightly held, whilst those held by the thumbs are to be allowed to give as the boards are again forced open, this time a little further back. Again closing the book, the fingers and thumbs in the same way as before, gather more leaves from the centre of the volume, and force the covers yet farther. The same operation is repeated by again gathering more leaves toward the covers util the centre of the book is nearly reached, some two dozen leaves, or three sections, being left to prevent the production of an acute angle.

The back of the book has now been bent, and not broken open. Its pliability may be further improved by holding about three-fourths of the leaves in the right hand, and with the left gathering a few of the leaves under the thumb, and leaving a few leaves loose; the cover should be pressed downwards, so that the back at the commencement of the book may be bent. Again closing it, and opening it at the other end, the book must be held by the left hand, and the cover and last few leaves pressed back in the same way by the right, always, however, leaving some sixteen or twenty leaves loose, so that the lining or leather at the back of the volume shall never be folded back at an acute angie.

These operations may seem a little complicated, but a very little practice will amply repay the trouble of a few moments' study of this description. The operations themselves are so simple, and may be so quickly performed, that the writer, who has occasion frequently to open in this way some two hundred octavo volumes, can dispose of that number in about thirty minutes.

FROM Cleopatra sailing on the Nile, to the Empress Eugénie opening the Suez Canal, stretches a vast tract of time; but this gap between ancient and modern Egypt is obligingly, if cursorily, filled up by Professor Stanley Lane-Poole within the limits of a single article in the July Longman's. His sketch of Egypt in the Middle Ages is an example of the way in which history filters through the magazine into the mind of the average reader.

SIMPLE V. SUMPTUOUS STAGE-SETTING.

The battle between Puritan and Ritualist, which rages around the question of the proper accessories of public worship, appears also in the dramatic arena and centres on the problem of the staging of Shakespeare. Shall the great plays be set to all the gorgeous accompaniment of modern scenic art, or be given on a stage more akin to the simple arrangements of Elizabethan days? In the July Fortnightly Mr. H. Beerbohm Tree enters the lists to defend the Ritualistic view. He insists that it is unmistakably the popular view, and speaking from his own managerial experience, he declares it to yield in practice a substantial pecuniary profit. He argues also for its being right in taste. He calls Shakespeare himself as witness, and contends that "Shakespeare intended to leave as little to the imagination as possible, and to put upon the stage as gorgeous and as complete a picture as the resources of the theatre could supply." He raises an interesting historical question when he asks:—

Are we not inclined to undervalue a little the stage resources of the Elizabethan period? Are we not prone to assume that Shakespeare had far less in this direction to his hand than we give him credit for? Of scenery in the public theatres there was practically none, but in the private houses and in the castles of the nobles, when plays were played at the celebration of births and marriages and comings-of-age, we find that mounting, scenery, costume, and music were largely employed as adjuncts to these performances. In fact, when we read the description of some of the masques and interludes, when we consider the gorgeousness of display and the money that was expended for only single performances, we may well doubt whether, even in our day, we have surpassed what our forefathers of three centuries ago attained. So that in justifying the lavishness of modern productions we are not altogether thrown back upon the theory of Shakespeare's "prophetic vision" of what the stage would compass when he had been laid in his grave. These shows were undoubtedly witnessed by Shakespeare himself, and it is indeed not unreasonable to suppose that he acquired the love of gorgeous stage decorations from such performances witnessed by him in early life. Take the question of what we call properties: Shakespeare more than any other author seems to demand these at every turn. Swords, helmets, doublets, rings and bracelets, caskets and crowns are the inevitable paraphernalia of the Shakespearean drama; while as to music, the existence of an orchestra is vouched for by the recent discovery by a German savant of a contemporary drawing of the interior of the old Swan Theatre.

The writer finds the case still stronger in regard to costumes, and appeals to the lavish stock entered in an inventory still in existence of the costume wardrobe of a London theatre in Shakespeare's time. He contends that the more magnificent setting is required by the actor himself, in the interest of his art, much rather than by the manager in the interest of his pocket.

"Possibly the twentieth century will see the world evangelised." This is the hope which a review of the nineteenth century inspires in the breast of Rev. Richard Lovett, writing in the July Sunday at Home on the "New York Conference on Missions." Rev. T. H. Darlow, in the same number, indicates one way of realising this hope by telling the story of the Bible in Africa, as it is now translated into more than a hundred different African languages; while Rev. F. B. Meyer is selected as a specimen of intensive evangelism, or of "men who reach the masses at home." Tissot's picture of the Beatitudes forms a valuable frontispiece.

ckenbos,

on is of

ed minds lents, but oval road

vain; the perceptive

plication,

er, poet,

iciency in

of such ren with hypnotic desired

d moral

y whose whether hypnotic d. The

ed. The faculties

quick of enefit by ance in

o under-

ould be n which ondition

failure.

re would

e would upon it.

ge of the action in egitimate

cessful.

eatment

nced by er stars, d as to out the nent, as whether

ertainly, nything

likely to

d :-

HOW THE VENOM OF SERPENTS IS COLLECTED.

THE East is of a truth strangely jumbled with the West to-day, when we find snake charmers in India regularly employed by the Pasteur Institute in Paris to furnish a supply of snake-poison for innoculation purposes. It is this fact which lends an added flavour of interest to the paper in the July Cornhill on "Venomous Snakes: how they are caught and handled." It appears that during the last ten years an annual average of 21,000 deaths have occurred in India from snake bites. The British Government has offered for many years a reward of four pence for every cobra killed, and two pence for each viper or kerait. The undiminished number of venomous reptiles makes one hope for a better remedy from the methods of preventive medicine. The writer says:—

Much interest has been aroused lately among medical men in India, and other countries where venomous snakes abound, by a discovery, which Professor Calmette, of the Pasteur Institute at Lille, claims to have made, of an antitoxic serum, the hypodermic or intravenous injection of which, if made before the graver symptoms have advanced very far, is an almost certain antidote to snake-bite. This serum, which the Professor terms Antivenene, is taken from the blood of horses rendered immune by repeated minute injections of snake venom. In the year 1897 Professor Calmette applied to the Government of India for help-in collecting venom for his experiments.

THE SNAKE-CHARMER.

The writer tells how large quantities were secured and forwarded by Major Dennys, at Delhi. For a pound a month "the master snake-catcher of the district, a lowbred Mohammedan of the name of Kullan," undertook to supply one hundred living venomous snakes weekly and to extract their venom. The man disclaimed all pretence of magic. He pulled vipers and cobras from their holes by means of a stick, and then flung them into his bag:—

He used no reed instruments or music of any kind to propitiate the reptiles. He would simply squat on his haunches in front of them, and after they had been hissing and swaying their uplifted heads backwards and forwards for a few minutes he raised his hands above their heads and slowly made them descend till they rested on the snakes' heads. He then stroked them gently on the back of their necks, speaking all the time in the most endearing of Hindustani terms. The serpents appeared spell-bound. They made no effort to resent the liberty, but remained quite still with heads uplifted, and seemed to rather enjoy it.

Then he let them twine about his neck and arms. He even allowed a large black cobra to crawl into his mouth and then shut his teeth on its head. Its violent resentment was unavailing; the head was later released without injury to snake or man.

AN INFURIATED COBRA.

The extraction of poison is a process carried out under more menacing conditions. This is how Kullan dealt with a large and angry cobra:—

He would hold up and shake a rag in his left hand. On this the infuriated reptile would rivet its gaze. With his right hand, from behind, the man would then suddenly seize it round the neck about three inches below the head, and an assistant would fasten firmly on to its tail to prevent it winding round Kullan's arm. His right hand would then slide forward till he had fastened his fingers round the neck, just behind the jaw. He would then insert the rim of a watch-glass between the jaws, the grip on the neck would be slightly relaxed, and the serpent would viciously close its jaws on the watch-glass, and in doing so squirt the whole of its venom through the tiny holes of its fangs, into the concavity of the glass. In this manner snake after snake was made to part with its venom into a watch-glass. Often between sixty and a hundred snakes were so dealt with in the course of a morning.

21 S

un

ce

ea

pr

de

en

sa

ho

wh

WO

ho

las mo che

the

in £2

per wil

Fyf

ma

wei

cap

it c box

ove

whe

cyli

ten

is 6

wat

be i

Am

T

in tholic

If

into

have conv

to so they them make by o

under tried summ

THE DESICCATED VENOM.

The watch-glasses were then placed on small glass stands in a plate swimming with melted beeswax. Large glass bell jars were then heated so as to drive out most of the air in them, and these were inverted over the plate on to the wax. The entire plate was then placed on a shelf, and the venom allowed to dry in vacuo for seven days. At the end of that time the dried venom (a flaky yellow powder) was scraped off the glass with a sterilised knife, the powder was hermetically sealed up in small glass tubes, the tubes labelled showing the species of snake and date on which the venom was extracted, and the whole supply forwarded weekly to Professor Calmette. In this condition the desiccated venom maintains its virulence for months.

A VISIT TO MENELIK.

CAPTAIN M. S. WELLBY continues his account of his visit to the Abyssinian capital in the July number of Harper's Magazine. He gives the following description of the King of Kings, as Menelik is called:—

Such a brief meeting scarcely allowed me to form a fair judgment of the king. Squatting, as he was, when we entered, I should have taken him to be quite a small man, whereas he stands five feet ten inches high. Though by no means handsome, there is yet a very taking and frank look about his features; or perhaps, I should more correctly say, an open look. Shahzad Mir, my Indian surveyor, summed his appearance up in these words: "I saw a very little man and a very big mouth."

Captain Wellby gives some excellent descriptions of the surroundings of the king, both at his capital and in one of his provinces, whither he betook himself during the writer's visit.

About the customs of the Abyssinians we learn that there are practically no smokers in the country. This is due to an edict of King John, which absolutely forbade smoking.

The British agent, Captain Harrington, had brought out a phonographic message from Queen Victoria to "Jhanoi," as Melelik is called by the Abyssinians:—

A table was arranged in front of the king, and on this the phonograph was placed. With the exception of the gurgling sound produced by the instrument, dead silence pervaded the tent. The Negus was highly gratified with the message, even standing up that he might the more distinctly catch the words, for he was much struck with their clearness and firmness. He listened to the Queen's gracious words time after time, and readily consented to my attempting to photograph the scene.

Queen Taitu also listened to the Queen's words time after time.

THE English Illustrated for July is an interesting number. Mr. George Wade's "Cockney John Chinaman" claims separate notice. Cecil de Thierry narrates the exploits of certain distinguished colonial soldiers, accompanying his sketch with a few pleasing portraits. "The Resuscitation of a Sea Monster" is Helen Gordon's way of describing the salvage of the Milwankee, the steamer which left her fore half on the rocks, and steamed with her stern portion away to a port, where she was fitted with a new fore part. Frederick Dolman recounts what he has seen of ancient Roman civilisation in the Naples Museum under the title of "Nothing New under the Sun." A pleasant account is given of the surroundings and treatment of the convicts at Princetown.

THE AMERICAN SLAVE TRADF.

MR. JOHN R. SPEARS contributes to Scribner's Magazine the first of a series of articles dealing with "The Slave Trade in America." He tells in this article of the gathering of the slaves, and it is probable that part of his story will surprise many of his readers; for instance,

The fact is the student of slaver history is not unlikely to feel a degree of sympathy for the old-time slaver captains, and that it is an inclination which should not be restrained if a right understanding of the merits of the trade is wanted.

A time soon came, however, when the slave captains ceased to be content with buying the slaves as in the early days, but incited and even assisted the tribes to prey upon one another. The nature of the work degraded the captains and crews until there seemed no end to the infamy they were capable of. The writer

How the degradation of the slaver's deck was contagious; how it spread to the owners of the ships; how these owners, while posing as Christians, became, through inciting such acts, worse than the captains who participated actively in the infamies; how communities and nations were thus made rotten, until at last the greatest slave nation of them all regained health by the most frightful of modern wars, can only be suggested here.

That the trade was very profitable may be judged from the Liverpool ship Enterprise, belonging to T. Leyland and Co., in a voyage made about the first of the present century, cleared £24,430 8s. 11d. on a cargo of 392 slaves, or more than £62 per head, old and young all counted in.

The article is excellently written, and much interest will be felt to read the succeeding chapters.

A Mammoth Locomotive.

"THE biggest engine in the world "evokes Mr. Herbert Fyfe's admiring notice in the July Windsor. mammoth locomotive, recently built at Pittsburg, weighs with its tender 167 tons, and has a hauling capacity on a level track of 6,650 tons. In other words, it can pull at the rate of ten miles an hour a train of 166 box-cars loaded with wheat, which would form a train over a mile in length, and would contain the produce in wheat of more than fourteen square miles of land. Its cylinders are 23 inches in diameter. Its boiler is over ten feet in height. Its total length of engine and tender is 63 feet 31 inches. The tender carries 5,000 gallons of water and to tons of coal. Such huge locomotives would be impossible on our restricted permanent ways, but in America are found to pay.

Sarah Grand on Girls' Holidays.

THERE is much sensible advice give by Sarah Grand in the July Young Woman on making the best of a holiday. Perhaps the most piquant piece is this :—

If the English girl would only put some of her intelligence into the art of cooking, what holidays she and her friends might have! They might club together, don rational dress for comfort, convenience, and safety's sake, mount their bicycles, and be off to some delightful spot where their tents could be pitched; and they might lead such a life of freedom and ease as should set them, we mentally and physically for a long time to come and them up mentally and physically for a long time to come, and make capable women of them. The experiment has been made by one cycling association with the most perfect success, I understand; and it certainly seems to be one which might be tried more extensively with great advantage, especially when summers are hot and dry, as they have been of late years.

TO TRAIN CIVIL SERVANTS.

MR. P. LYTTELTON GELL'S article on "Administrative Reform in the Public Service" comes appropriately in the same number of the Nin-teenth Century as Mr. Knowles's "Business Method Association." Mr. Gell's is a very interesting article, but his criticism is mainly devoted to the higher grades of the Civil Service. There has not been sufficient expansion in the service to meet Imperial development, and the first step must therefore be to enlarge the number of well-paid and responsible posts. The second is no less important, for it is to break up the system of watertight compartments and stereo-typed positions in the public service. I would urge that the whole Higher Division should be regarded as a single service. It should not be merely permissible and exceptional, but an absolute rule, that men, especially young men, should be shifted from office to office in order to widen their experience, to freshen their views, and to elicit their abilities by contact with new questions and new conditions.

Mr. Gell points out that a large number of our most successful officials have had experience of a variety of services, civil and military. What is required to effect these and other reforms is a small but strong Board of Administrative Control :-

This board would be as independent of all departments (the Treasury not excepted) as the Audit Office is in regard to accounts; and, like the Audit Office, it would present an independent report to Parliament, or, where expedient, a confidential report to a Parliamentary committee. It might consist of three paid commissioners, of whom not more than one should be a civil servant, two being men of experience in the industrial or commercial world. To these may be added four or six unpaid commissioners, who would be members of the Upper or Lower House, chosen for their business reputation—great shipowners, railway managers, or provincial manufacturers. It would be essential that there should be no ex officio members, except perhaps the First Civil Service Commissioner. Above all, its political independence must be absolute.

Browning and the Phonograph.

In the course of a very interesting interview in the Strand with Mr. Rudolph de Cordova, Mr. G. H. Boughton, R.A., tells the following story about Browning:-

"Browning had the most marvellous memory I ever knew," he said, as we talked of him, "and could quote Milton, Shakespeare, Spenser, and a host of other poets by the page together. If one wanted a quotation for a picture, one had only to go to him, and he would be able to give the necessary lines without a reference to any book, and he'd reel them off letterperfect. I remember once, though, a funny failure of his memory -the funnier because it was in one of his own poems. When the phonograph was first brought over to London it was being shown at the house of an artist, and we were all asked to speak something into the receiver. Browning modestly declined for a time, but we egged him on, and at last someone said, 'Quote some lines from one of your own poems,'

"'I know those least of all,' he replied, with a smile, and eventually he said he thought he knew 'How they brought the good news from Aix to Ghent' better than he knew anything else. He began splendidly :-

"'We sprang to the saddle, and Joris and he; I galloped, Dirk galloped, we galloped all three; We—we—; we—we—!

"'Upon my word, I've forgotten my own verses,' he exclaimed, and stopped there. Somebody prompted him; he took up the thread again, but he couldn't get on any farther. "He apologised, but the owner of the phonograph declared that the cylinder was more valuable to him on account of the breakdown than if the poet had recited it right through."

Chinaarrates oldiers, ortraits. ordon's kee, the teamed he was ecounts n in the v under rround-

r snake

h-glass.

with in nds in a ell jars

em, and e entire

d to dry e dried

with a n small

ke and supply

of his ber of ription

ir judgout his en look.

mouth."

ions of

and in during n that

This is forbade

rought

oria to this the gurgling ded the ge, even words,

ss. He

me, and is time

eresting

ene.

tered. ereas he

TO PROVE THE PREAMBLE OF ALL RELIGIONS.

To prove the preamble of all religions, according to Mr. F. W. H. Myers, is the duty and the mission of the new century's leaders of spiritual thought, and this great task has to be achieved viâ the Psychical Research Society, which has just elected Mr. Myers President in succession to Sir William Crookes. Mr. Myers' presidential address has just been published in the Proceedings of the S.P.R., and a very remarkable address it is. It is partly a confession of faith, partly a record of progress already achieved, and partly a prophecy of things to come. That it is eloquent, need not be said, for when is Mr. Myers not eloquent? But it possesses higher qualities than eloquence; it is instinct with intense conviction. Mr. Myers, after thirty years' continuous study of the Borderland, proclaims aloud the conviction at which he has arrived. He announces:—

Our method has revealed to us a hidden world within us, and this hidden world within us has revealed to us an invisible world

AGAINST UNSCIENTIFIC MEN OF SCIENCE.

The hidden world within us is the subliminal self, the invisible world without is that in which dwells the myriad multitude of departed spirits. Mr. Myers is somewhat ahead of the majority of psychical researchers. He believes more because he knows more, has studied the subject more closely, and is more quick to realise the facts which the Society has now verified beyond all dispute. In his presidential address he argues with force and fervour against the unscientific attitude of many scientific men who are false to the first principles of science in refusing to recognise the possible significance of facts, the existence of which cannot be denied, and the relation of which to existing systems has not yet been ascertained. Mr. Myers says:—

The faith to which Science is sworn is a faith in the uniformity, the coherence, the intelligibility of, at any rate, the material universe. Science herself is but the practical development of this mighty postulate. And if any phenomenon on which she chances on her onward way seems arbitrary, or incoherent, or unintelligible, she does not therefore suppose that she has come upon an unravelled end in the texture of things; but rather takes for granted that a rational answer to the new problem must somewhere exist—an answer which will be all the more instructive because it will involve facts of which that first question must have failed to take due account.

Science asserts the conservation of matter and the conservation of energy, but against the doctrine of the conservation of energy there stands the fact of death:—

If death be really, as it seems, a sheer truncation of moral progress, absolute alike for the individual and for the race—then any human conception of a moral universe must simply be given up. We are shut in land-locked pools; why speak to us of an infinite sea?

THE WORLD-OLD AND WORLD-WIDE DESIRE.

Science, therefore, confronted thus with this peremptory negation of one of its primary dogmas, should hail with intense interest any facts which afford reason to suspect that this truncation is illusory, and investigate with the utmost eagerness any facts which might promise to prove that on the moral side there is also conservation and persistence, and that the supreme law which covers matter is not less uniform in the domain of life. But unfortunately, despite Mr. Myers' arguments, the majority of scientific men are coldly oblivious of the possible significance of telepathy and the evidences that point to the doctrine of spirit return. It is therefore for the S.P.R. to pursue its task of accumulating and verifying facts which will in the long run, in Mr. Myers' opinion, convert scientists to a belief of the metetherial environment of life, as they have now learned to believe in ether:—

wi

dis

on tha

tha

inc

eve

oh

Di

wh

ing ph

phi

hav

COL

wh

of ver

COI

ren

by agg

the ina

VO

de

life

rec

str

the att

Ca

Mi

one

Tol

wh

cra fro

nea

sta

the

En

wit

aut

sal

Us

Un

Pla

This search for new facts is precisely what our society undertakes. Starting from various standpoints, we endeavour to carry the newer, the intellectual virtues into regions where dispassionate tranquillity has seldom yet been known. As compared with the claims of theologians, we set before ourselves a humbler, yet a difficult task. We do not seek to shape the clauses of the great act of faith, but merely to prove its preamble. To prove the preamble of all religions; to be able to say to theologian or to philosopher, "Thus and thus we demonstrate that a spiritual world exists—a world of independent and abiding realities, not a mere 'epiphenomenon' or transitory effect of the material world—a world of things, concrete and living, not a mere system of abstract ideas—now, therefore, reason on that world or feel towards it as you will." This would indeed, in my view, be the weightiest service which any research could render to the deep disquiet of our time—nay, to the desiderium orbis catholici, the world-old and world-wide desire.

Our duty is not the founding of a new sect, nor even the establishment of a new science, but is rather the expansion of Science herself until she can satisfy those questions which the human heart will rightly ask, but to which Religion alone has thus far attempted an answer. Or rather, this is the duty, the mission, of the coming century's leaders of spiritual thought. Our own more special duty is to offer through an age of transition more momentous than mankind has ever known, that help in steadying and stimulating psychical research all over the world which our collective experience should enable us richly to bestow

If our inquiry lead us first through a jungle of fraud and folly, need that alarm us? As well might Columbus have yielded to the sailors' panic when he was entangled in the Sargasso Sea. If our first clear facts about the Unseen World seem small and trivial, should that deter us from the quest? As well might Columbus have sailed home again, with America in the offing, on the ground that it was not worth while to discover a continent which manifested itself only by dead logs.

If the belief in the other world is re-established on a scientific foundation among others, says Mr. Myers—

One point is clear; and on that point it is already urgently necessary to insist. We must maintain, in old theological language, that the intellectual virtues have now become necessary to salvation. Curiosity, candou, care—these are the intellectual virtues—disinterested curiosity, unselfish candour, unremitting care.

A NEW WORLD-RELIGION AT HAND.

But from this fusion of religion and science a new world religion will come :—

For just as a kind of spiritual fusion of Europe under Roman sway prepared the way for Christi inity to become the European religion, so now also it seems to me that a growing conception of the unity, the solidarity, of the human race is preparing the way for a world-religion which expresses and rests upon that solidarity; which conceives it in a fuller, more vital fashion than either Positivist or Catholic had ever dreamed. For the new conception is neither of benefactors dead and done for, inspiring us automatically from their dates in an almanac, nor of shadowy saints imagined to intercede for us at Tribunals more shadowy still; but rather of a human unity—close-linked beneath an unknown Sway—wherein every man, who hath been, or now is, makes a living element; inalienably incorporate, and imperishably co-operant, and joint-inheritor of one infinite Hope.

LOSING HIS FAITH TO FIND IT.

If the careless reader is disposed to shrug his shoulders at that expression of great hope, he may perhaps modify his attitude when he reads the following passage, when Mr. Myers describes his own personal experiences as to the study of psychical phenomena:—

When, after deriving much happiness from Christian faith, I felt myself forced by growing knowledge to recognise that the evidence for that culminant instance of spirit return was not adequate, as standing alone, to justify conviction, I did honestly surrender that great joy; although its loss was more grievous to me than anything else which has happened to me in life.

100'0

Then with little hope—nay, almost with reluctant scorn—but with the feeling that no last and least chance of the great discovery should be thrown aside, I turn to such poor efforts at psychical research as were at that time possible; and now it is only after thirty years of such study as I have been able to give that I say to myself at last, Habes total quod mente petisti—"Thou hast what thine whole heart desired;"—that I recognise that for me this fresh evidence—while raising that great historic incident of the Resurrection into new credibility—has also filled me with a sense of insight and of thankfulness such as even my first ardent Christianity did not bestow.

Those who are interested in the subject will do well to obtain the presidential address, which is published at sixpence in the Proceedings of the S.P.R. by Kegan Paul, Trench and Co.

MIRACLES BECOMING CREDIBLE.

I will conclude this notice by quoting a passage from Dr. Dolbear's book on "Matter, Ether and Motion," which has just been published by the S.P.C.K. Speaking of telepathy, and what may be described as the phenomena of the Borderland, Dr. Dolbear says:—

If these things be true, they are of more importance to philosophy than the whole body of physical knowledge we now have, and of vast importance to humanity, for it gives to religion corroborative testimony of the real existence of possibilities for which it has always contended. The antecedent improbabilities of such occurrences as have been called miracles, which were very great because they were plainly incompatible with the commonly held theory of matter and its forces, have been removed, and their antecedent probabilities greatly strengthened by this new knowledge, and religion will soon be able to be aggressive with a new weapon.

AGNES G. LEWIS in the Humanitarian utters a strong protest against the social tyranny of paying calls. Than the waste of time and energy and life, and "the irrational inanity of indiscriminate visiting," social extinction, she vows, were far better. She adds the warning, "If we decide that a round of paying and receiving calls is not life at all, but a mere vegetable existence, we must recognise, and bravely face, the fact that a higher ideal of life means, in truth, a life of ceaseless, strenuous struggle, and of frequent solitude."

THERE is much that is breezy and out-of-door-like in the July Leisure Hour. Its cool green cover presents an attractive reproduction of Marcus Stone's "Summertime." Camp-life in British New Guinea is vividly sketched by Mr. C. Ross-Johnson, who conveys an impressive idea at once of the country and of the way we are civilising it. John Walker describes his run through St. Helena, which Cronje's imprisonment and the late Napoleonic craze have thrust into prominence. A few pictures from a Paris sketch-book bring the interest of travel nearer home, while Mr. W. J. Gordon combines statistics and the charm of the open air in his paper on Salmon. Mr. Gordon urges as a requisite for the effective preservation of salmon, not separate laws for England, Scotland, and Ireland, but a general Act dealing with the United Kingdom as a whole, only giving to local authorities power to modify details by by-laws. The salmon, he evidently opines, is a pronounced Unionist. Useful but incomplete information is supplied as to University education, and what it costs. The late Lyon Playfair is sketched by Wm. Stevens.

SEVEN SEA POWERS,

AND THEIR RELATIVE FIGHTING WEIGHT.

MR. J. HOLT SCHOOLING contributes to the fuly Fortnightly an ingenious paper on the Naval Strength of the Seven Sea Powers. He takes the figures of fighting tonnage given in Government returns, and discounts them according to the age of the men-of-war. His estimate is:—

THE PARTY OF	400 0
The		ships are worth	100 pe	r cent.
9.9	1890-1894		80	33
99	1885-1889	23	60	33
100	1880-1884	STREWING BAD. I D	40	9.0

He then sets side by side figures gross and net:—

As compiled from Admiralty Return. Percentage of Tons. Total Tonnige.			been depreciated on account of the age of ships, Percentage of Tons, Total Fonnage.
Great Britain .	821,605	39.4	604,141	38.3
France	339,599	16.3	220,635	14'0
Russia	262,912	12'6	221,988	14' L
Italy	193,004	9'3	112,899	7'X
Germany	191,259	9.2	152,929	9.7
United States .	184, 144	8.8	176,708	11.2
Japan	92,420	4'4	88,088	5.6
Total	2,084,943	100.0	1,577,388	100.0

CRUISERS. After tonnage has

As compiled i	rom Admiralty Keturn.	on account of the age of ships.
	Percentage of	Percentage of
	Tons. Total Tonnage.	Tons. Total Tonnag:
Great Britain .	. 827,430 47'9	650,779 46.5
France	297,486 17'3	255,351 18.3
Russia	. 144,673 8.4	111,063 7'9
United States		120,379 8.6
Japan	. 114.479 6.6	103,141 7'4
Germany .	. 107,844 6.3	81,626 5.8
Italy	93,673 5'4	76,958 5.5

Total . . . 1,725,859 100'0 1,399,297

After dealing similarly with other classes of ships, the writer offers this summary of the total strength of the Powers:—

Here are the seven Navies arranged in the order of their strength:-

	in Harris pur	Fighting-Weight.		Taking the Navy of Japan as the Unit of Strength, the Degrees of Strength are:—
I.	Great Britain.	. 1,347	1. 01.	6.38
	France			2 57
	Russia.			. 1-88
	United States			. 1.65
	Germany			1134
	Italy
VII.	Japan	211	. 11	1'00 I'00
		NO. I

3,347

The writer is especially glad to point out that Great Britain possesses 100 tons of good fighting-weight to every 70 tons possessed by France and Russia combined. Even the navies of France, France, and Germany in combination furnish only 1,222,000, as against our 1,347,000 of adjusted fighting tonnage.

oler, yet s of the To prove ogian or spiritual ties, not material e system or feel riew, be t to the atholici, nviron-

to carry

ed with nich the one has uty, the hought. ansition help in e world chly to d folly, elded to nall and e offing,

ven the nsion of

ed on a s—urgently ological recessary ellectual emitting

w world

Roman uropean neeption ring the ion that fashion For the one for, , nor of ls more ked beh been, ate, and oulders modify e, when s as to faith, I

THE FUTURE OF LONDON RAILWAYS.

A PLEA FOR A CENTRAL RAILWAY STATION.

THE opening of the new Central London Railway affords Mr. G. F. Millin an interesting topic in the Contemporary Review. His proposal is nothing less than to realise, by utilising the unlimited areas which might be opened underground, the old project of a central London railway station, where all the railways which enter London, whether from the north or south, might meet.

LONDON'S WASTE OF LAND.

At the present time London contains two hundred and eleven miles of railway, or about two miles of line to every square mile. The space occupied by these lines is worth millions, and to bring all the railways together upon the surface would cost tens of millions. To bring them together underneath the surface would cost a comparatively small sum, and the value of the land which it would set free would probably be greater than the cost:—

Conceive of all the land now occupied by railways, say, within ten miles of the centre, absolutely vacant—the railways simply spirited away—and you can remodel London in almost any way you please. With this vacant land available literally all round the Metropolis and at many points in its centre, it would not only be possible by readjustment to sweep away slums and set up working-class dwellings, but it would be easy to provide gardens and open spaces within reach of every inhabitant, and in a hundred other ways to enhance the healthiness and beauty of this vast "province of houses," as somebody has called it.

HOW IT COULD BE DONE.

The invention of the vertical lift has eliminated the first difficulty in the making of deep-level railways. Depth is now of no importance. The area underground is unlimited. The problem of ventilation has also been solved. The use of the Greathead shield has solved the engineering difficulty. Mr. Millin therefore makes the proposition that all the great railways, upon entering London, should run underground to a central station, which should be on the surface, only the platforms being underneath. Here the business of all the railways should be transacted, and the problem of transport of goods and passengers across London would be at the same time solved, while the hideous Thames railway bridges could be taken down.

AN UNDERGROUND RAILWAY WORLD.

Here is Mr. Millin's picture of the future meeting of the London railways underground:—

One can imagine in the not very distant future a magic circle drawn round London-say, with a ten-mile radius from some point which shall be the railway centre for the whole Metropolis. At this circle steam locomotives—if they are still in use in the open country-are left behind. All round at this boundary trains take to themselves electric power, blaze out with electric light, and begin to flash down by easy decline towards the weird region beneath the roots of the great forest of London. A passenger by one of these trains who may have seen what has been done beneath the bed of the river, with all its shipping, at Blackwall, or under the vast station at Waterloo, with its bustling crowds and its mountains of luggage and its thousand trains a day, with their ponderous locomotives moving over-head all the while, will not be surprised to find that this subterranean region is no longer given up to darkness and silence. It has become a maze of echoing tunnels, brilliantly-illuminated stations, throngs of people and "flying carpets," in the form of electric lifts. At the heart of it all, down under the very centre of London, the ten great lines running in from the provinces meet, each having its own station consisting merely of a platform and lifts for passengers and luggage. Down here there is no issuing or taking of tickets, no claiming of luggage, no meeting of friends. There is nothing to be done but step out of the trains into the lifts and flit upwards. As there is unlimited space all around, there is no backing out of trains from a terminal station. The carriages are no sooner emptied than they run straight ahead, take a great sweep round and come in upon the down line, or pass on to another company's system.

It is a fascinating vision of the future.

The Irish the Greeks of the West.

A WRITER in Gentleman's for July, E. M. Lynch by name, endeavours to make out a number of resemblances between Greece and Ireland. The case is not quite that of Macedon and Monmouth, even though Hibernia and Hellas both begin with the same letter. It is a pithy epigram with which the paper opens—that the most striking resemblance was "the part played by barbarians in arresting the development of both Greek and Irish art, literature and architecture. Danes, Normans and English played the Turk to perfection in Ireland." Now two of the poorest nations, Greece and Ireland were once comparatively rich, and each was a centre of culture.. Yet with both peoples the love of learning has never departed. Patriotism and religion have been linked in both as the means of preserving national life and unity. In Ireland, as in Greece, patriotism is the master passion. Faith and superstition flourish in both Among other resemblances selected for mention are the carvings on ancient tombs, "quickness in the up-take," disparagement of romantic love, early marriages, low rate of illegitimacy, "politicking," resignation and fatalism, absence of the industrial gift, success in life everywhere except at home, love of law, lawgivers and litigation. This somewhat Hibernian jumble of similarities ends with the assertion-"the learned maintain now that Greeks descend from Phœnicians, who were Celts." The Irish therefore, like the French, whom Carlyle called "the Greeks of to-day," may claim kinship with the stock which produced Pericles, Pheidias and Plato.

The Pooling of Private Libraries.

In the June number of the Library there is an interesting article, by Mr. George Somes Layard, entitled "The Pooling of Private Libraries." As a reference to the pages of the "Annual Index to Periodicals" tells us, it was in the Nineteenth Century of June, 1895, under the title of "The Gentle Art of Booklending," that Mr. Layard first elaborated his proposal, and the scheme was helped no doubt by the notice of it given in the Review of Reviews of the same month (p. 567). In the Library, Mr. Layard describes the procedure of forming the Malvern Federated Library, and gives statistics of the results of three years' work. He thus concludes:—

It certainly forces itself upon one more and more that federation is a law of life, rivalry is a law of death. The one brings in its train sympathy and kindliness. The other, though to the few the "whetstone of talent," spells for the many, distrust, sorrow, and destruction.

Mr. Layard's pioneer experiment should be largely followed, especially in country communities.

A "DOMESTICS' HOME-SCHOOL," sending out its pupils as "daily girls," and managed by ladies from the local churches, with preparatory step-cleaners' brigade, is suggested by H. Danks in the July Leisure Hour as a remedy for the present scarcity of domestic servants. The writer also proposes medals and diplomas for good servants.

lon

W

mo

Sta

Mi

Au

me

the

Ar

co

me

me

Ar

des

Er

the fac

as mi

as

D

W

do

do

tru

do

th

W

re ar

PIT

th

tie

th

fu

in

al

po

th

W

but step there is of trains emptied and and ompany's

onal life in both mention in the rriages, on and is in life ers and of simimaintain to were om Carnip with Plato.

e been

e is an entitled ence to tells us, , under ,, that scheme in the in the igives le thus ore that The one though many, pupils e local ide, is r as a rvants.

COLUMBIA TRIUMPHANS!

"THE commercial ascendency of the United States has long been assured," so at least writes the Hon. G. D. Wright, United States Commissioner of Labour, in this month's Century. As an example of how the United States has managed to reach the position she now holds, Mr. Wright quotes the agricultural labourer. He says:—

An ordinary farm-hand in the United States raises as much grain as three in England, four in France, five in Germany, or six in Austria, which shows what an enormous waste of labour occurs in Europe, largely because the farmers are not possessed of the mechanical appliances used in the United States.

THE KEY TO AMERICAN ASCENDENCY.

This is a most significant example because it gives the key to the whole question of the ascendency of American goods in the markets of the world. In this connection it is worth remembering Lord Cromer's statement with reference to the purchase of American locomotives for use in the Soudan:—

"Their choice," he says, "is simply due to the fact that American firms almost invariably offer engines built on standard designs of their own at lower prices and in less time, while the English and other European makers content themselves with their old designs, not being, as a rule, in the habit of manufacturing to standard designs of their own."

THE WITNESS OF EXPORTS.

Passing to the real facts which show commercial ascendency, Mr. Wright says:—

To secure commercial ascendency, the exports of a country must be greater than the exports of any other country; for the total exports of a country indicate its true position in commerce, as they usually consist of surplus products.

A table is given showing that in the year ending December 31st, 1899, the imports of the United States were 798,845,571 dols., and the exports 1,252,903,987 dols.; those of Great Britain were 2,360,619,989 dols. and 1,289,971,039 dols.; and those of Germany 1,236,888,380 dols. and 949,957,960 dols. Mr. Wright touches upon the serious point of these statistics when he says:—

While our exports have been constantly increasing, our imports have not increased. It must be remembered that the reverse is true for other countries. The exports of British produce from the United Kingdom are no greater to-day than they were a dozen years ago, while her imports have increased.

"THE BAKERY OF THE WORLD"—AND ITS COAL CELLAR. On looking into the details of the exports we find that the totals for the export of breadstuffs and provisions were in 1890 154,925,927 dols. and 136,962,278 dols. respectively, while in 1899 they were 273,999,699 dols. and 175,508,608. Mr. Wright holds that these figures prove the United States to be "the bakery of the world." The writer does not overlook the question of coal; the United States he says possesses at least 50 per cent. of the coal area of the world. At present her coal production is something like 30 per cent. of the total world production. These statistics cause Mr. Wright to ask if the time may not be looked for when his country will—furnish not only the food for the support of armies, both industrial and military, of some of our greatest competitors, but also the fuel food by which armies, navies, industries and transportation are supported.

OBLIGING TO CUSTOMERS.

The figures given of the export trade to the new countries and markets are those which should give us the most cause for anxiety. In Australasia alone we find that the United States exported 19,624,890 dols. worth of goods in 1899 as compared with 7,818,130 dols. worth in 1893. The estimate for 1900 is 24,000,000 dols The reason for this is to seek in the fact that the American manufacturer endeavours to give his customer what he really wants, while the British merchant too often considers that as his article is most excellently made, it must satisfy everybody's wants. It is certain that in all the colonies American goods are to be seen almost everywhere in use, except in the cases where a sense of patriotic duty has conquered a desire for successful business in the heart of the colonist.

Mr. Wright's article is very instructive, and we could wish that every British manufacturer would read it and act upon the lessons it teaches.

"PRE-EMINENTLY THE PEOPLE'S OFFICE."
MR. GROVER CLEVELAND ON THE PRESIDENCY.

THE June number of the Atlantic Monthly opens with the first instalment of a study by Ex-President Cleveland on "The Independence of the Executive." He reviews the steps taken during the formative years of the American Constitution to develop the office of President. He especially rejoices in the rejection of the proposal which was very nearly adopted, that the selection of President should rest entirely with Congress. He goes on:—

In the scheme of our national government the presidency is pre-eminently the people's office. Of course, all offices created by the Constitution, and all governmental agencies existing under its sanction, must be recognised, in a sense, as the offices and agencies of the people—considered either as an aggregation constituting the national body politic, or some of its divisions. When, however, I now speak of the presidency as being pre-eminently the people's office, I mean that it is especially the office of the people as individuals, and in no general, local, or other combination, but each standing on the firm footing of manhood and American citizenship. . . Inasmuch as Senators are elected by the State legislatures, Representatives in Congress by the votes of districts or States, and judges are appointed by the President, it is only in the selection of the President that the body of the American people can by any possibility act together and directly in the equipment of their national Government.

But Mr. Cleveland does not think the present system of selection through electors perfectly meets the case. He would amend it so as to prevent the possibility, which has already become actual, of a President being chosen by a minority of all the voters in the land.

Sir Bartle Frere-Vindicated?

MR. W. B. WORSFOLD sets himself to the task of vindicating the policy and reputation of the late Sir Bartle Frere. Had only his policy, instead of being arrested and renounced by the British Government, been put into effect, there would, the writer holds, "have been no Majuba, no Bechuanaland Expedition, no Jameson Raid, and no war to-day." He points out that Frere did not, as Mr. John Morley stated, annex the Transvaal. Lord Carnarvon instructed Shepstone to annex October 5th, 1876, a week before Frere was asked to be Governor. He denies that Frere was the author of the Zulu War, arguing that, as the Zulus were preparing to invade Natal, the best defence was for him to attack them. "The Home Government betrayed Frere. They allowed him to take up a definite position, and then blamed him for not retiring, when he could only have retired at the risk of incurring dangers twofold greater than the one danger which they desired him to avoid." Mr. Worsfold puts Frere's policy into two propositions:—

(i.) British rule once established must be maintained, and (ii.) All responsibilities incurred by England by the act of annexation must be absolutely fulfilled.

SUBMARINE BOATS IN AMERICA.

THE Engineering Magazine for June contains an article by Rear-Admiral Philip Hichborn, the Chief Constructor of the U.S. Navy, entitled "The Demonstrated Success of a Submarine Boat." Admiral Hichborn begins his article by surveying the history of submarine-boats, the first of which, it is interesting to note, was made by an Englishman named Bourne over three hundred years ago. Admiral Hichborn is a believer not only in the possibility of building efficient submarine boats, but in their superiority for coast defence over other ships.

MODERN EXPERIMENTS.

Since 1880 submarine boats have been experimented with in nearly all European countries, and in France, Spain, and Italy the governments have encouraged the experiments. In France alone has there been government encouragement through a series of years; and although the development in that country has been intermittent as a favourable or unfavourable administration came into power, the progress has been so great as to call forth official estimates and requests for the building of a submarine flotilla of thirty-eight boats. The French type developed by the trials with an electric-storage motor boat, the Zedé is a very good one, deficient to be sure in some very important details, but sufficiently good for the economical and methodical French to be impressed with the great economy that submarines will bring to their mobile coast defences.

THE "HOLLAND" DESIGN.

At present there are two distinct types of practicable under-water boats, the submarine torpedo-boats like the Holland and the French boats, and bottom-workers like the Travailleur, Sous Marin, and the Argonaut. The submarine torpedo-boat is, of course, the more important type, and Admiral Hichborn takes the Holland as one of the best of the class. The theoretical radius of the Holland is 1,500 miles; the surface-speed ten knots, and submerged speed seven knots for a fifty-mile radius of action.

ITS CONTROL.

The control of the Holland is excellent, as it can be raised and lowered in the vertical plane to any required depth in a few seconds. The difficulty is in steering when submerged, as the object to be steered for cannot be seen. The ventilation system is also satisfactory. As to the field of vision Admiral Hichborn says:—

The field of vision when submerged is nil, and therefore unsatisfactory as such; but acceptable because field of vision would carry with it the loss of the perfect invisibility which so largely adds to her effectiveness in attack, and because the quick rises and dives give perfect field of vision for a few seconds with a minimum of chance of disablement from gun fire.

PROTECTION.

The protection of the Holland is perfect :-

Neither gun-fire nor torpedoes can reach her when approaching to the attack submerged, and since the chance of her suffering from gun-fire when raising her turret a few inches above the surface for a few seconds is reduced to a minimum. Sea-going qualities. Perfect, since no sea, however heavy, can affect her when in the awash condition ready to dive, and when running light she can always be dropped to the awash condition in heavy weather. Surface motive-power. Satisfactory, since it is the same that gives satisfaction in thousands of small surface craft using gas-engines. Submerged motive-power. Unsatisfactory, since it source is the heavy and curabersome storage battery. Acceptable, since it is the most available motive-power for use when air cannot be freely used, and since the supply can always be renewed (when there is communication with the air by coming to the surface or by sending up a hose when the boat is lying on the bottom) through the use of the gas-motor as long as the fuel supply holds out.

ARMAMENT.

The armament of the Holland consists of torpedoes which can be delivered with as great, if not greater, accuracy than the same weapon from other types of craft. On account of the cramped space, however, the Holland's accommodation is bad, but—

A

in ne

co

cr

m

he

Bu

de

an

pr

So

no

wh

ex

pro

ho

cal

bu

the

wh

sec

COL

am

tog

less sitt

his

not

Ho

nec

sity

and inte

on l

he c agre his

Payi

to p payi

of w

try.

F

she is sufficiently habitable to be endured for a few days at a time while lying off on picket du'y, and because her crew can always be dry and warm and not suffer from heat as do the fire-room force of most naval craft.

...

THE INCOMPARABLE BOOKSELLER.

BERNARD QUARITCH is the subject of a warm appreciation by Dean Sage in the June number of the Atlantic Monthly. The writer does not disguise his sense of the angularities and eccentricities of the late bookseller, but does not allow these to hide the real worth of the man. He thus briefly epitomises the life of Mr. Quaritch:—

He came to London from Prussia, his native country, in 1842, when twenty-three years of age, having had an apprenticeship of five years in the bookselling and publishing tusiness in Nordhausen and Berlin. In London he found employment with Mr. Bohn, the well-known publisher and bookseller, with whom he remained four years, an intervening year being passed with a bookseller in Paris. In his earlier days with Mr. Bohn, when employed as general utility man and porter at 24s. a week, his confidence in the future was so great that he once said to his employer, "Oh, Mr. Bohn, you are the first bookseller in Europe."

In 1847 Mr. Quaritch started in business for himself, settling at 16, Castle Street, Leicester Square, with a capital of £10... Thirteen years of hard work in Castle Street enabled him to remove in 1860 to 15, Piccadilly, where the rest of his laborious and useful life was spent.

The writer pronounces "his wonderful catalogues" to be his great monument. His greatest was produced in 1880. It contained the descriptions of over 28,000 books in 2,395. In prefaces to these monumental works Mr. Quaritch showed that "he knew he was the greatest living bookseller, and mentioned the fact as something patent and irrefutable. He was also perfectly sincere in stating his willingness to devote his life to gratifying the wishes of scholars and collectors, and he did it." He had no mean estimate of his powers and of his achievements:—

Another [friend] once telling him how fortunate he had been in leaving Germany and starting his career in England, was answered in perfect seriousness, "Well, if I had stayed in Prussia I might have been a von Moltke."

When the great Spencer library was sold, in 1892, to Mrs. Rylands, who gave it to the city of Manchester, Mr. Quaritch, who was authorised too late to treat for its purchase by a gentleman of New York, wrote, "My collection of books is more valuable and useful than the Spencer library, and may be had for £120,000. This is about one-half paid for the Spencer library."

From no little experience of the man, the writer

His great wisdom and the accumulations of over half a century of booklore were at the service of anybody, high or low, who would take the trouble to ask of him. Outside of his kindliness and generosity, so universally extended, as a matter of business he was content with fair profits on his bargains. Mr. Quaritch was incomparably the best informed, most munificent, and most liberal bookseller of this or any age, and it is very doubtful if the man lives who has the combination of knowledge, industry, enthusiasm, and high principles necessary to fill his place.

ng as the

orpedoes greater, types of ever, the days at a crew can as do the m appre-Atlantic se of the eller, but the man. th:— , in 1842, iceship of in Nordment with ith whom ed with a ohn, when week, his said to his kseller in Europe." f, settling f £ 10. . . . ed him to laborious gues" to duced in oo books orks Mr. greatest omething incere in fying the it." He achieve-and, was stayed in 2, to Mrs. Quaritch, a gentlés is more ay be had e Spencer

e writer er half a h or low, de of his matter of s. st munifi-, and it is nation of cessary to CRICKET IN DECAY.

THE UNVEILING OF THE SHAM AMATEUR.

"THE Parlous Condition of Cricket" is the pessimistic title of an article by Mr. H. G. Hutchinson in the National Review for July. Mr. Hutchinson deals only with first-class cricket, which he admits is not of the first importance from the sporting point of view, but which nevertheless, in the opinion of the public, is the only thing worthy of attention.

THE LONG MATCH FATAL.

It is the length of matches, resulting from improved conditions, which is bringing ruin on the game. No cricketer unless he be possessed of private means can afford to spend three days in succession several times a month away from his profession or business. Sometimes he turns avowedly professional, and if so, well and good. But in most cases he scorns to do this, and thus is developed a class of cricketers who are nominally amateurs, but who really under various pretexts, draw as much or more profit from the game than the avowed professionals.

HOW IT IS DONE.

Mr. Hutchinson gives a long list of the means by which this is done. "Expenses" are the chief pretext. Some amateurs draw their out-of-pocket expenses, and nothing more. More often, however, the amateur receives what is known as "liberal expenses," and he is paid these expenses, not in proportion to what he has spent, but in proportion to his skill in "drawing a gate." Still worse, however, than the recipient of liberal expenses are the so-called amateurs who get compensation for "loss of business" during their absence on tours. And, finally, there are amateurs who draw regular salaries for services which they do not and cannot perform. "Assistant secretaryships" and other such posts are created with considerable salaries for the purpose of supporting amateurs, who have all the profits of the professional together with the privileges of the amateur.

"AMATEUR EMPLOYÉS."

Another means of supporting sham amateurs is hardly less deplorable. This is the creation of a fictitious situation in some adjacent town, the "amateur" drawing his salary from an employer who expects him to do nothing, and who, in return, is recompensed by the club. How this is done Mr. Hutchinson explains:—

Every important cricket club has its headquarters, almost of necessity, has cortain firms of business people. It would be curious and sad if no members of any of these firms took a lively interest in the club and its cricket. This being so, one of these firms is approached with a proposition somewhat in these terms on behalf of the committee of the cricket club:—"By the bye, you know young A. B. We must have him to play for us; but he does not see how he is to manage it unless we can find a job for him. Now, he would be a very useful young fellow in your business, and if you could find him a place in it, and would agree to let him get away for all the matches, we would pay you his salary." It may be that the offer would only amount to paying a part of his salary; that, of course, is matter of detail. The principle of the thing is clear enough. The cricket club is to pay young A. B. a salary for playing cricket, but instead of paying it directly to him, it is to pass through the hands of this complaisant firm, and is to be handed on to him under the guise of wages for work that he has never done, never had an intention of doing, and probably has no ability for doing if he were to try. But the great ends are attained: he plays for the club, and he remains, in name at least, an "amateur."

TO NARROW THE BAT.

The only way to remedy these abuses, which are destroying the game, is to shorten the present abnormally long matches, so that they shall interfere less with the cricketer's profession. Mr. Hutchinson thinks the best way to effect this is to make the bat an inch narrower on each side. Widening the wickets would only have the effect of making the batsmen play more on the defensive, and as a result matches would take longer than ever. This would not be the case with a narrower bat, because a ball off the wicket would still be a ball off the wicket independently of the size of the bat, and it is possible to hit even harder with a narrow bat than a broad one. Mr. Hutchinson points out that it is a mistake to suppose that the dimensions of all cricket accessories are settled as if by a natural law:

Wickets are not the immutable things that custom leads the irreflective cricketer to suppose. During the last century there have been frequent alterations in their size, and a while ago the amateurs and professionals used to play matches with the handicap that the latter had to defend the bigger wickets.

VIVE LA FRANCE.

A MORE hopeful view of France than has been customary of late is offered by Alvan F. Sanborn in the June Atlantic Monthly. France, he says, is deeply sensible of the need of political improvements:—

The principal reforms being advocated are:—Compulsory suffrage; administrative decentralisation; a supreme court on the model of the Supreme Court of the United States; election of judges by the Cour de Cassation, and of the Cour de Cassation by the bar of France; individual resp nsibility of ministers; a single term for deputies and senators; proportional representation; withdrawal from the Chambers of the right of initiative in matters of finance; election of President by direct vote of the people; . . . limited initiative and referendum for the people.

In industry and commerce France has been sleepy and devoid of initiative; but the pressure of competition is rousing her. She is improving her technical education. She is developing her colonies. She has still the glory of a literary stage. "The supremacy of French sculpture is almost a truism." French painting makes Paris still the art school and art centre of the world. A new school of music has arisen. Here is a statement which will excite surprise:—

More books are published in France each year than in Great Britain and the United States combined: more books of a serious nature especially, since France publishes only a quarter as many novels as England, and only half as many as the United States. In pure learning and in science (in which latter, despite the deaths of the leaders of research Pusteur and Charcot, she was never more earnest than now) she is second only to Germany, and her competition with Germany is growing keener every day. . . . In a word nothing but good government and good business seem to be lacking.

A NEW argument for universal old age pensions is suggested by Mr. Charles A. Conant in the June Atlantic Monthly. Dealing with "recent economic tendencies," discusses the serious problem of the rapid accumulation of saved capital, which often creates much mischief in its quest for new outlets. He proceeds:—

Checks to the process of capitalisation or new outlets for capital must be found to maintain healthy conditions. The establishment of old age insurance, upon a scale broad enough to divest the system of any aspect of almsgiving, and make it a part of the established economic order, would tend to restore the equilibrium between production and consumption by diminishing the amount of new savings seeking investment in fields already occupied.

THE REVIEWS REVIEWED.

THE AMERICAN REVIEW OF REVIEWS.

THE struggle for the Presidency naturally occupies the most prominent place in the American Review of Reviews for July, Dr. Shaw's comments taking up no less than twelve pages in "The Progress of the World."

THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

Dr. Shaw lays stress on the significance of Governor Roosevelt's nomination for the Vice-Presidency, and thinks that so far from his nomination resulting, as is usually the case, in subsequent obscurity, he will be the best candidate for the Presidency that the Republicans can select four years hence. The result of the Kansas Convention, says Dr. Shaw, will be the entire predominance of Mr. Bryan, who, because of his defeat in 1896, has remained the idol of thousands of voters who would have become his critics in the event of success. The only time his ascendency has been threatened was 11 1898, when Mr. Croker attempted to elect Judge Van Wyck as Governor of New York upon a Conservative Democratic platform. It was Mr. Roosevelt who defeated this attempt, and now the mass of Democrats west of the Alleghanies prefer defeat under Mr. Bryan to success obtained through concession to his Eastern Democratic opponents.

Mr. W. Bryan.

THE AUSTRALIAN CONSTITUTION.

Mr. Hugh H. Lusk writes on "The New Australian Constitution." The essential difference in principle between the Australian and Canadian constitutions is that in Australia, as in the United States, it is the contracting colonies which are the substantial bases of the scheme, they giving up certain definite rights for the sake of union. In the case of Canada it is the provinces which are limited to the exercise of such powers and rights as are specifically reserved; and the march of events must therefore tend to consolidate all real power in the hands of the Dominion Government, and to the reduction of the provinces to the level of great municipalities. Such a scheme could not have been carried out in Australia, where the state populations are widely separated and strongly attached to the independent exercise of all the functions of government.

THE NATIONAL REVIEW.

THE National Review for July is an average number. I have dealt elsewhere with "A Conservative M.P.'s" article on "A Khaki Dissolution," with Mr. Horace G. Hutchinson's article on "The Parlous Condition of Cricket," and with Mr. A. M. Low's survey of the prospects of the rival candidates for the Presidency of the United States.

THE ASSUMPTIONISTS' CONSPIRACY IN FRANCE.

Mr. F. C. Conybeare describes at length the intrigues of the great Assumptionist organisation against the French Republic. No election is beyond the scope of this organisation:—

Municipal, cantonal, legislative, presidential, and even elections of Chambers of Commerce and of Agriculture—all alike are to be watched and provided for. Without such organisation, says M. Laya—and he is right—nine-tenths of the electors might at the bottom be on our side, and yet we should continue to be beaten at elections.

The duties of the Assumptionist caucus are thus defined:—It shall occupy itself with revisions of the register of voters, shall study diligently the body of electors, their wants and the currents of opinion which stir them. With every elector its members must be personally acquainted, so as to set him in one of three classes—viz., good, bad, or doubtful. The "good" electors must be reinforced, marshalled in battalions, encouraged to become apostles of the good cause. The doubtful ones and waverers must be won over. The bad ones had better be left alone, at least to begin with.

Of the means, literary, political, and domestic, by which the conspirators attain their ends Mr. Conybeare gives a detailed and very interesting account. Even a female league exists for the purpose of influencing voters through the agency of their wives.

A PLEA FOR MILITARY HISTORY.

Mr. C. Oman contributes a Plea for the Study of Military History. He thinks that the disasters of the South African War were due to the entire ignorance of elementary military history among our politicians:—

The most discomposing incident of the last autumn was not Nicholson's Nek nor Magersfontein, but that astounding message sent from London to Australia which told our willing Colonists that if they wished to supply men for the war "infantry would be preferable." That one sentence showed with a fatal clearness that the responsible persons at headquarters had not realized that the chapter in the art of war which they should be studying was the great American struggle of 1861-65. Anyone who has carefully read through the records of that contest can see that it alone among modern wars offers really useful lessons and analogies for application in the present campaign in Africa.

CUTTING THROUGH THE SUDD.

Captain M. F. Gage gives a very interesting account of a recent voyage made by him from Uganda to Khartoum with the object of examining the Sudd region of the White Nile. The passage by boat through the Sudd was only accomplished after extraordinary diffi-

cu wh

isla

the pre

bo

flo

28 un

na

arr

ba flo

ex

Sv

ch

19 sy: ph rej

he

to

TH

me

in Sw Ca tie mi

to

the spe

pe

na

the 500

Ba

ou

an ha

th

be su

sui

M

ut

ch

the

culties, and took several months. Of the manner in which the obstruction is formed Captain Gage says:—

From Shambe to 9 deg. N. Lat, the river is bordered at intervals on either bank by extensive lagoons, filled with floating islands of papyrus grass, termed "Sudd," which sail about at the will of the wind. These, during the rainy reason, are blown in large masses, by the frequent squalls which are prevalent at that period, into the river, and are carried down by the current, often wrenching fresh pieces of papyrus from that bordering the river during their course. These formidable floating islands of papyrus grass, with roots sometimes as much as ten feet in length and one foot diameter, continue their course until, either at the bend of the river or when the latter suddenly arriving from behind with the current tend still more to compress the block thus formed, until, in course of time, a formidable barrage completely blocks the course of the river. There being no solid banks in these latitudes, the huge volume of water descending from the south then swerves from its true course and flows over the surrounding marshland, thereby forming a vast expanse of inundations.

THE SWISS ARMY.

Mr. C. G. Coulton contributes a description of the Swiss Army. The Swiss Army is probably by far the cheapest in the world, taking into consideration the three points of money, length of service, and efficiency. In 1900 it will cost far less than our own imperfect Volunteer system. Every adult Swiss is liable to serve, but the physical test is so strict that nearly fifty per cent. are The rejected pay a tax of five shillings per head, with an income tax of fourpence in the pound. the first thirteen years of his service the recruit belongs to the elite, and is called out every other year for exercise. The cavalry alone is called out every year. In the intermediate years the soldier shoots forty rounds per annum. In his thirty-third year he passes into the Landwehr, and in his forty-fifth year into the Landsturm. In 1899 the Swiss Army with reserves numbered 284,000 fighting men. Captain Gage made enquiries from a number of authorities as to the physical and moral effect of the Swiss military system, and the conclusion he came to was that in every respect it was beneficial.

JUDGMENTS ON THE WAR.

The "Greater Britain" section is exclusively devoted to the war. The following is the writer's judgment:—

It will not be surprising to find at a very early date a strong recridescence of the agitation against the War Office methods in the conduct of the campaign in South Africa. Officers, correspondents, and private observers of reliability are returning from the front, and the criticisms which they are likely to make after peace has been concluded, will neither be consoling to our national pride nor reassuring to those who have the welfare of the country at heart. There is reason to believe that one day, sooner or later, it will be established that the fighting force of the Boers has never exceeded thirty-five to forty thousand men; that our commissariat has been conducted with scandalous ignorance and waste; that the transport system, from the start to finish, has been badly mismanaged. Finally, those who have been through the campaign or have watched it in any capacity, have been obliged to regretfully come to the conclusion that the proportion of British officers who have achieved any notable success or given any signal proof of good military qualities is surprisingly small.

A "Special Supplement" of thirty-six pages is devoted to a complete history of the war by Mr. H. W. Wilson. Mr. Wilson thinks that the Boers never had at the utmost more than 40,000 men in the field. His conclusions are as follows:—

In tactics the Boers all through proved themselves ahead of the British Army, and, man for man, superior to our soldiers. It was said before the war that they would never attack, though Majuba was even then an instance to the contrary. But when well led they could, and did, attack with complete success, and for example, at Spion Kop. There can now be no doubt that the force opposed to us in that battle was not one-third the strength of Buller's Army.

THE RIGHTS OF THE WEAK.

Mr. W. H. Mallock writes a somewhat casuistical article upon "The Rights of the Weak" in which he concludes to his own satisfaction that the weak have no rights at all:—

The right of the great State is guaranteed by something which is internal to itself. The right of the weak State is guaranteed by something which is external to itself. It is guaranteed by the forbearance of the great State, which guarantee rests on the dictates of the great State's conscience as to what, under the circumstances, is equitable. If, therefore, owing to a change in circumstances, the great State comes to feel that the weak State uses its rights in any unjustifiable manner, the weak State's guarantee of its independence necessarily disappears at once.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Mr. Alfred Austin reprints a paper on "Dante's Realistic Treatment of the Ideal," which was read before the Dante Society on June 13th. Mr. Arthur Galton gives his "Final Impressions of the Roman Catholic Church." "The House of Usna" is the title of a drama by Miss Fiona Macleod. It deals with the reign of Connor MacNessa, who was King of Ulster, and High King of Ireland at the beginning of the Christian era.

Blackwood.

Blackwood is distinctly optimistic this month. It allows that prophecies are rife in Paris of a war with England after the Exhibition is closed, but believes that that war will never take place. General Mercier and the thousands of unemployed left from the Exhibition may create a sensation, but it will be internal, not foreign aggression. Mr. Walter B. Harris pooh-poohs "the Morocco scare," and denies that there has been any French aggression of which we need complain. "It is a cause of congratulation" that Tuat has fallen into French hands. He is even prepared to concede that if the neutrality of the Straits of Gibraltar and a certain freedom of trade for all nations be guaranteed, "there is no possible reason why France should not possess the country."

"Distracted China" can be set right by deposing the Empress and surrounding the Emperor with reform ministers, whom the educated classes would welcome. "Our Officers" have been criticised in the light of South African reverses. Well, they are not perfect; nothing is in this world. One by one the counts against the officerclass are dealt with; their lack of professional study, their absorption in sport, their standard of extravagance: and we are warned against substituting mere professional pedants for English gentlemen. And then who can question their courage and endurance?

Perhaps not least suggestive of the new temper of our contemporary is this passage in an unsigned eulogy on the late Mr. Steevens:—

I think he had faith in Toryism as a constructive policy, and therefore was a bit of a Socialist as well. For it is, or ought to be, a commonplace that Toryism, as distinct from mere Conservatism, and Socialism, as distinct from ignorant sham Communism, have much in common.

When Mr. John Morley on one side and Blackwood on the other side begin coquetting with Socialism in this style, change must be in the air.

ls of the

Such a ustralia.

ted and f all the number. M.P.'s"

orace G.

ition of

of the dency of intrigues

nst the scope of nd even ture—all out such

e should

ned :-It

ers, shall currents members of three raged to ones and stic, by nybeare

Even a g voters

tudy of

of the

ance of

was not message

Colonists

ry would clearness ized that ying was nas care-

e that it

ons and account nda to region

igh the y diffi-

ca.

NCE.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

THE most striking feature in the Nineteenth Century for July is the announcement of a proposed association which is to watch over the administration of the affairs of the country, and impress upon the public the lessons of the South African War. I have mentioned this elsewhere. I have also dealt elsewhere with Mr. Henry Norman's article on "Our Vacillation in China," with Colonel Stopford's paper on "Soldier Settlers in South Africa," with Mr. Lyttelton Gell's demand for "Administrative Reform in the Public Services." Among the Leading Articles will also be found Colonel Lonsdale Hale's article on the "Home Generals and their Work in the Coming Autumn," Mr. Edmund Robertson's article on "The Prerogative of Dissolution," Dr. Guinness Rogers's cry for a leader, and Mrs. Barnett's amusing paper on "Town Children in the Country." There are six other articles.

IDENTIFICATION BY FINGER MARK.

Mr. Francis Galton has a very interesting article on "Identification Offices in India and Egypt," which deals with the use of thumb marks to identify natives. In India all pensioners, whether civil or military, are required to make a print with the fingers to avoid impersonation after decease. A similar use of thumb prints is made in the Law Courts, and in the Survey and Medical Departments, in order to prevent the re-employment of men who have been discharged for misconduct. Mr. Galton says that the chances against a mistake in the identification of a man by such means are a hundred millions to one:—

The Identification Office at Cairo has already produced excellent effects. False names have ceased to be a protection. Habitual criminals can no longer avail themselves of the lenient sentences passed on first offenders. Innocent men have been saved from being mistaken for guilty ones. Released criminals, still legally under police supervision, but who have escaped from it, are certain to be recognised whenever they become suspected and the Office is consulted. Lastly, the administration of prisons in Egypt being still subject to Government irregularities, it has happened that a prisoner, sentenced to a long term, has actually been set free instead of another man who bore the same name and was sentenced to a short term, and the latter has regained his rights solely owing to the intervention of the Identification Office.

THE LOSS ON THE TELEGRAPH.

Mr. Henniker Heaton, M.P., explains "Why Sixpenny Telegrams do not Pay." In the year ending March 31st, 1899, the net result of the telegraph administration was a loss of £221,000. Mr. Henniker Heaton says that in the management of the Telegraph Office business principles are persistently ignored, hence the loss in spite of the yearly increase in the gross returns. As an instance of the unbusinesslike methods of the Telegraph Department he mentions the practice of charging capital expenditure on buildings, etc., against current revenue. The concession of free "service" telegrams to the railway companies should also be done away with.

RURAL IRELAND.

Mr. Michael MacDonagh contributes a chatty article entitled "In the By-Ways of Rural Ireland." Ireland, he thinks, is as much Ireland as ever in spite of the outward assimilation of English habits. The reading of the Irish peasant is, however, becoming more and more English every day. Mr. MacDonagh says:—

I have been amazed during recent visits to Ireland at the display of London penny weekly publications, such as Tit Bits, Answers, Home Chat, Pearson's Weekly, Woman's Life, in the newsagents' shops, in even the remote towns of Ireland, while Dublin publications of a somewhat similar kind, but supplying Irish verses, stories, and historical sketches, such as The Skamrock, The Emerald and Irish Bits, were difficult to obtain. I have seen the counters of newsagents in such towns as Waterford, Limerick, Tralee, Kilkenny, Galway — each feeding large agricultural districts — piled thickly with as varied a collection of these London weekly journals as the counters of newsagents in Lambeth and Islington or any other populous district of the Metropolis in which these publications are produced.

Bo An Li

M R:

se

ha

the

to

Co

no

arı

qu

evi

an

be

be

Er

the

Fi

in

ar

th

ob

pa im air

de No Cr

tre ha

spe op wi

eve

jus

U

THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

Mr. M. H. Spielmann writes on "The National Gallery in 1900 and its Present Arrangements." He mentions a number of reforms and improvements which are being carried out. Among these is the removal of the handrail, which has, however, so far only been carried out in the Foreign Section. In regard to the question of protection from fire, Mr. Spielmann says:—

This danger of fire is very real; yet should we awake one morning to find the Gallery gutted and the collection destroyed, no blame whatever could we attach to the trustees. The whole responsibility would lie on the Treasury, which has uniformly turned a deaf ear to the repeated appeals and remonstrances of the Board. Within the past ten years no fewer than four such warnings have gone forth from Trafalgar Square, and have been treated with the same indifference as that displayed towards kindred representations in the Press.

JUVENILE CRIME.

The Rev. A. W. Drew has a paper on "Hooliganism and Juvenile Crime," in which he says that the only means of dealing with truancy in its earlier stages is to remove the culprit to a special school for dealing with such cases, and to make that school of such a character as to effectually deter any boy who has been there from ever returning to it. He says:—

The truant schools are made far too comfortable and far too jolly to be of any real use, and many boys, as they have told me, prefer to be there rather than at their ordinary day schools. Who wonders at this when a truant school is now framed on the exact mouel of one of our very best iudustrial schools, suitable indeed and necessary for such establishments, but not for the cure of truants. What the truant hates is, as has been already stated, having to do school work morning and afternoon, and yet in this the truant school plays into his hands, for there he only has to do school work for half the day, and for the other half he goes into the carpenter's, the shoemaker's, or the tailor's shops, where he enjoys himself thoroughly. I consider therefore that all industrial work of the above kind is not only out of place in a truant school, but is positively mischievous there as directly tending to defeat the object of such a school, by making many boys prefer it to an ordinary day school.

OTHER ARTICLE.

The only other article is one by Mr. R. E. Dell entitled "Mr. Wilfrid Ward's Apologetics."

GIRLS will find plenty to interest them in the GirPs Realm for July. Miss Alice Corkran gives descriptive accounts with pictures of girls and girl-life in the Royal Academy and New Gallery. Christina G. Whyte supplies a very girlish sketch of four girls at the Paris Exhibition; while a more serious element is introduced by Caroline E. Turner, in her paper on the Edinburgh School of Domestic Economy. She heads it jokingly, "How I learnt Home Rule," but ends it with the thoroughly sensible remark, that if young ladies had this actual knowledge of what domestic service is, they would as sympathetic mistresses have less trouble with servants.

THE CONTEMPORARY REVIEW.

THE Contemporary Review for July is a good average number. I have dealt elsewhere with Mr. Demetrius Boulger's article on "The Scramble for China," Mr. Arthur Sowerby's paper on "The Crisis in China," Lieutenant Bürde's "Defence of Frontal Attacks," and Mr. G. F. Millin's article on "The Future of London Railways." There are no other articles calling for separate notice.

FINLAND AND RUSSIA.

Mr. Augustine Birrell reviews Mr. Fisher's book on "Finland and the Tsars." He says that the whole trouble has arisen in obedience to the idea of Panslavism :-

We have our idea—the Anglo-Saxon idea. Russia has hers—the Pan-Slavonic idea. One Russia, one faith, one law, one the Fan-Siavoine itea. One Russia, one latin, one law, one tongue, one army. Shall a miserable Finland and her paper Constitution stand between Russia and her unity? "Are we not to be allowed"—cries the Procurator of the Holy Synod— "by suspending the privileges of Finland to unify the Russian army?" Interference, of course, is out of the army?" Interference, of course, is out of the question. Who is there to interfere? Odd things are happening everywhere. It is best not to think of what is going on in Schleswig-Holstein at the present moment in obedience to another idea, the great Germanic idea. Why be Danes?—become Germans! Why be Finns?—become Russians! Why be Dutch in South Africa?—become English! Russia, Germany, England, these are great names, they palpitate with great ideas, they have vast destinies before them, and millions of armed men in their pay, all awaiting Armageddon. How absurd to be a Finn! What is the Finnish Idea?

AGAINST MUNICIPAL TRADING.

Lord Avebury has an article on "Municipal Trading, in which he points out some of the disadvantages which are likely to accrue from the widespread adoption of the principle. The following are the heads of his

1. The enormous increase of debt which such a policy will

2. The check to industrial progress;

The demand on the time of municipal councillors, which (1.) Preclude the devotion of sufficient consideration to real municipal problems;

(2.) Prevent men who have any business or profession of their own from entering municipal life;

4. The undesirability of involving Governments and Municipalities more than can be helped in labour questions;
5. The fact that the interference with natural laws in some important cases has the effect of defeating the very object

6. The risk, not to say certainty, of loss.

THE HAUNTED CRIMEA.

Mrs. Ménie Muriel Norman has a very brilliant paper describing her travels in Southern Russia in last She has been over the battlefields of the Crimea, and here are some of her reflections :

We are not enemies now, ourselves and Russia. There was a treaty of Paris, after Sebastopol "fell," after death and victory had reduced us to the kernel of an army and—the other results benefits forgot (or were they ever received?) are difficult to specify. Many times since then the regret has been general and open that we did not let Russia sweep the Turk before her as with a flail, and scatter him over the less choice parts of Asia, even as chaff at a winnowing. Ah, but if we had, Russia would have got to Batum, to Merv, to the frontier of India; she would have established her armies, her Cossacks and her outpostsjust where she has established them !

BRITAIN AND THE HISPANO-AMERICAN WAR.

Mr. A. M. Low contributes an article entitled "An Unwritten Chapter in American Diplomacy," in which he describes how Great Britain thwarted the desire of the European Powers to interfere during the war of 1898. Mr. Low makes a series of somewhat astonishing statements, but he does not give a single fact or quote a single document to prove the accuracy of his "unwritten history." For instance, in making the following statement, one would think that a person who knew so much would give at least one instance :-

In Spain, at Gibraltar, in London, in Hong Kong, in fact wherever British diplomatic or military or naval officers were stationed, the laws of neutrality were violated a dozen times a day in the cause of friendship.

But Mr. Low does not. It is a very stupid article, and a very good specimen of that unintelligent Anglo-Saxonism which thinks that because two kindred nations ought to be good friends, they can only be so by abusing and insulting every other country.

ATHLETICISM IN SCHOOLS.

Dr. H. J. Spenser has a severely critical article on "The Athletic Master in Public Schools." He traces the career of the athletic master from his entry of the public school as pupil to his re-entry as teacher. The athletic master seldom or never takes any interest in scholastic affairs, and as a result he impresses the minds of his charges at their most impressionable age with a false idea of the relative importance of study and sport :-

Of all men he is least capable of inspiring a right attitude towards work, or of enforcing the incidents of a routine. Of professional zeal he is entirely destitute; he has no sense of the dignity of his profession, and his work is characterised by a loud voice and perfunctory manner.

RUSKIN AND CARLYLE.

Mr. R. Warwick Bond has an interesting article on "Ruskin, Man and Prophet," in which he makes the following comparison between Ruskin's style and

To rend Carlyle is like leaping from crag to crag beneath a stormy sky, amid the roar of swollen torrents and the frequent burst of thunder, with rarely a bit of heather or moss or the slender grace of a harebell to redeem the wildness of the place. The smooth, beautiful, almost euphuistic style of Ruskin leads us along more level ground, refreshed by springing fountains, shaded by graceful trees, and not uncheezed by the light of laughing flowers; but near us still rise the steep strong mountains that are like God's righteousness, and in our ears resounds, distant perhaps but ever present, the moan of the labouring, the uncomforted sea.

MUSIC HALLS.

Mr. Andrew Wilson writes pleasantly about Music Halls and their attractions. He thinks their popularity is largely due to the allowance of smoking, and to the variety of the entertainment :-

To the masses, the night spent there is a form of agreeable siesta. They can smoke, and, what is more, they may have their beer or other liquors, although in certain cases, in which licences have been refused, the music halls are apparently just as successful as where drink is sold. A second reason for the popularity of the halls is found in the fact that there is a very large proportion of the population that will not sit out a play. large proportion of the population that will not at our a play. The theatre does not appeal to them in the way in which the free and easy atmosphere of the music halls attracts. In the music hall "the man in the street" can enjoy himself without in the least taxing his brain. He is, moreover, provided with what is a highly important feature in the success of the hall, namely, constant change and variety of performances. When he is tired of comic songs, the next turn gives him a display of horizontal bar exercises; when he is satiated with the performing dogs or cockatoos, he is at once relieved by a display of magic and a disappearing lady: when he has had enough of ballads, his interest is renewed by a ballet or the biograph.

land, while supplying The Skam-

obtain, I

Waterford.

ling large

a collecounters of populous ations are al Gallery

entions a re being handrail.

ut in the rotection

wake one destroyed.

The whole uniformly trances of four such have been towards liganism

the only

ges is to ing with haracter ere from

and far

hey have ordinary

t school

ery best

ch estab-

ne truant ool work

ol plays

for half ter's, the

rk of the ol, but is efeat the

it to an

E. Dell

Girls

criptive e Royal bition ;

aroline

hool of

How I

roughly actual ould as ants.

THE FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW.

THE July number has in it plenty of solid fare for robust political appetites. As indicated elsewhere, Dr. Rarl Blind warns Britain of the perils involved in affronting the conscience of the civilised world. Mr. Edward Dicey sketches his "Policy of Peace for South Africa," Mr. Beckles Willson would lighten the burdens of the Colonial Secretary by giving each of the great self-governing federations a Secretary in the Cabinet, "Diplomaticus" pleads for the status quo and the Open Door in China, plus the reforming Emperor, Mr. Holt Schooling estimates and compares the naval strength of the seven sea Powers, and Mr. Beerbohm Tree argues for a gorgeous, as opposed to a bald, staging of Shakespeare.

"SMART SOCIETY": WHAT AND WHENCE IT IS. Mr. T. H. Escott writes "Concerning Hosts and Hostesses." He comments on the disappearance of the political hostess, on the fusion between old acres and new wealth, and on the growing costliness of fashionable London. This last factor practically excludes from the London season "whole orders" once seldom absent. But while more national, cosmopolitan and plutocratic, London Society is marked by an amount of philanthropic work of perennial as well as practical interest in the welfare of all classes, and in all efforts for national improvement, which is "but thinly veiled by the surface

The very smartest set of smart society, thanks to such influences as those of the late Duchess of Teck and of our whole royal family, while on one side it is bounded by the ladies' lawn or the racecourse, on the other stretches into the province of philanthropic reform. Smart society, to use the phrase to-day on so many lips, may, perhaps, be said to consist of good-looking and well-dressed young women, and their friends; beauty, whether in music, art, decoration, or dress and general appearance, is one of the notes by which these coteries may be recognised; so, too, are a systematic restlessness and absence of all conventionalism. Neither the thing itself, nor the expression, would have been so much heard of, but for the fashionable ascendency of late acquired by the Transatlantic element in polite life.

HOW TO FIX WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION.

His Honour Judge Parry contrasts what the workmen's compensation was intended to be-"an automatic scheme of workmen's insurance"-with what it has turned out to be-"a Chinese puzzle," "a legal chaos, exasperating to all concerned except the lawyers. He would like to take the whole machinery from the Law. Courts altogether. He says :-

What is wanted is a scheme rather than an Act of Parliament. A scheme in which, if the County Court machinery is used, it is only to be used for the purpose of fixing compensation, and then calling in the post office to aid in distributing the funds. A scheme in which the appeals, if any, are to be to some body like the Railway Commissioners, business-like as well as technical. If the working of such a scheme is left to the County Court Julges, one of their number might well preside in such a court. And it is essential that, whatever the tribunal that fixes compensation may be, it should have at its disposal the State-paid

A small committee, consisting of a colliery manager, a works manager, a trades union official, an insurance manager, and a County Court registrar, could, among them, thrash out something workable.

CHICAGO v. PARIS WORLD-FAIRS:

Mr. Heathcote Statham pronounces the French Exhibition a great achievement in a spectacular sense, and in the proof it affords of the vigour and vitality of French art. He says :-

The French edifices are all pure invention, the offspring of the alert and vivacious artistic genius of the country.

buildings of the Chicago Exhibition, with which the Paris Exhibition is inevitably compared, were more classic and more dignified in style, but they were mostly formed on antique models, whereas the French buildings of the Paris Exhibition are an outbreak of sheer originality. This spirit of artistic invention crops out in all the minor details as well as in the more prominent features of the Exhibition.

alr

in an saf

go

ecc

res

He

the

of t

bra

hin

sim

rati

left der

oug

He

bra

Bea

init

aste

in t cou of I

the Mr.

defe

call phe

phil

T

con

" T

Mai

dea

pap

shor

writ

Brit U

no s dutie Coll

grad tence

which cons

the e

who

of qu

shou

upor

shou

train

syste

comi the r

He vilifies the Eiffel Tower as a piece of ironmaster's brag, but glorifies the new bridge, the joint product of the first engineers and architects and sculptors. He deplores the frequency of these exhibitions, as tending to cut up Paris too much.

OTHER ARTICLES.

M. Wilfrid Ward selects, as text for his appreciation of John Henry Newman's philosophy, two mottoes of the Cardinal's: one, chosen when he became Cardinal, Cor ad cor loquitur (Heart speaketh to heart); and the other, chosen for his epitaph, Ex umbris et imaginibus in veritatem (From shadows and images unto truth). Professor Lewis Campbell, writing on Climax in Tragedy, divides the normal construction of an Attic tragedy into five stages: the opening, the climax (i.e., the gradual ascent), the acme (or chief crisis), the sequel and the close. He fears that the importance of the sequel is overlooked by modern impatience. Albert Vandam illustrates his thesis that poets should not be legislators by the failures of Chateaubriand, Béranger, Lamartine, Hugo, Dumas, Déroulède, and Coppée. Mr. L. D. Cooper gives interesting extracts from the letters of a young medical man who went "with lancet and rifle" on the Beira railway and was killed in the Johannesburg railway accident.

CORNHILL.

THERE is plenty of excellent reading in the July number. As noticed elsewhere, Dr. Moorhead gives a vivid description of the first battles of the war from the point of view of a Boer ambulance; Mr. Worsfold seeks to vindicate the fair fame of the late Sir Bartle Frere and his African policy; Miss A. Howarth sketches the Boer at home unsympathetically, and "Antivenene" vouches for extraordinary scenes with snake-catchers in India.

It is an amusing paper which Max Beerbohm contributes under the title of "Ermine and Motley." He propounds the question, Why are our judges jocular? and answers, Because the crowd in court always laugh at their jokes. He then pushes the question one stage further back and asks, Why do people always laugh at jokes from the Bench? The Bar may laugh to win favour with the Bench. But, the writer holds, the laughter is, as a rule, genuine and spontaneous. He finds the desired explanation in the fact that "laughter in court is mostly a kind of nervous reaction." The solemnity and awe suggested by judicial proceedings make us abnormally susceptible to a joke from the august creature who presides. The writer proposes that the judge be relieved of his functions as jester, and that a first-class humorist should be employed as jester-

An unsigned paper, entitled "Moorish Memories," gives a vivid picture of the attractiveness of Moorish life, and of the difficulties our merchants have in obtaining concessions from powerful residents in that ungoverned land.

Mr. Andrew Lang revives recollections of Mrs. Radcliffe's novels, which enjoyed an immense vogue a hundred years ago.

XUM

THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW.

THERE is not much in the July number which claims separate mention. The holiday paper on Bordighera has already been noticed.

Mr. Hugh H. L. Bellot brings his review of the problem in South Africa to a close by urging that after annexation a military dictatorship must continue until it is considered safe to introduce a fair measure of responsible self-government. The interval might be used to redress economic grievances, abolish monopolies, ascertain the respective numbers of Boers and Uitlanders, and so forth. He insists that we must trust the Boers as we have trusted the once disloyal Canadians, and must aim at the fusion of the two races

Mr. A. E. Maddock laments the popular frenzy which brands opposition to the war as disloyalty. This leads him, relying on etymology, to declare that "loyalty simply means legality, i.e., justice," and to hope that rational criticism will in time supersede the race hatreds left behind them by the old monarchies. Nora Twycross deplores the support given to militarism by women, who ought to be the greatest advocates of peace.

Art is nearly as prominent as war in this number. Henry Bishop discusses the distinctive qualities of Rembrandt, and H. M. Strong contributes a eulogy of Aubrey Beardsley's achievements. Mr. Strong declares Beardsley initiated, developed, and brought to maturity an art astoundingly new.

The single-tax panacea, which rarely escapes advocacy in the Westminster, appears now in the novel guise of a court trial. We are given a verbatim report of the case of Labour v. Landlordism, in the Court of Common-sense, the opposing counsel being Mr. Single Tax, Q.C., and Mr. Laissezfaire, Q.C. The plaintiff is John Hodge, the defendant is Lord Broadacres; and among the witnesses called are Charles I., William the Conqueror, and Adam! Mr. Oliphant Smeaton considers that Hector Macpherson has succeeded remarkably well in his endeavour to cram the results of Mr. Herbert Spencer's life and philosophy into a book of 227 pages.

THE UNITED SERVICE MAGAZINE

THE United Service Magazine for July opens with the continuation of Lieut, Col. F. N. Maude's article on "The Evolution of Cavalry." This month Colonel Maude deals with Cromwell's battle tactics. I have dealt among the war articles with Major-General Owen's paper on "The Employment of Artillery." There is a short article on "The French Army" by an anonymous writer. "An Outsider" writes on "The Staff of the British Army," his conclusions being as follows :-

Under the present system of competitive examination we have no security that all those who have genuine ability for Staff duties in the field are afforded an opportunity of joining the College; that, actually, a large number of Staff College graduates have proved the error of their selection by incompetence in the discharge of their duties; that the principles under which the recommendation of candidates is conducted admit of considerable improvement; that a competitive examination has the effect of dismissing many of more practical value than others who succeed, and that therefore a system of entrance by seniority of qualification would be preferable; that the examination itself should be strictly confined to subjects having a direct bearing upon efficiency in the field; that officers who lack private means should be assisted to improve themselves by study abroad, where training upon a large scale can be observed; that a rigorous system of rejection and selection should be practised by the commandant of the Staff College, so as to ensure that none but the most competent officers shall become graduates, and that the most suitable spheres of usefulness shall be allotted to each individual.

Sir John Colomb contributes a paper on "Marines and Coaling Stations," Major W. Baker-Brown on "The Reorganisation of the Engineers," and an anonymous writer begins a series of articles on "Our Army."

The Century.

In the July number, Mr. Morley continues his study of Oliver Cromwell, dealing in three chapters with the campaign in Scotland, from the battle of Dunbar to Worcester; and Cromwell's treatment of civil problems. With Mr. Wright's article on the Commercial Ascendency With Mr. Wright's article on the Commercial Ascendency of the United States we deal elsewhere. Mr. Richard Whiteing concludes his "Paris of To-day" series with an article dealing with "Artistic Paris." In eight pages of beautifully printed illustrations Mr. André Castaigne endeavours to give a pictorial view of the Exposition at Paris. The picture entitled "Evening at the Great Gate" is possibly the most striking. Mr. Castaigne has succeeded so well with these few pictures that it is to be hoped that he will extend his pictorial view of an Exposition which certainly affords endless opportunities to an

Dr. Weir Mitchell continues his narrative of Dr. North and his friends, and otherwise the lighter part of the magazine is well up to the average.

Mr. W. N. Sloane tells of Miss Sarah Porter and her unique educational work :-

The lesson she most thoroughly inculcated by her influence was moderation: a few studies at a time, each task well learned, and all combined into a whole, complete as far it went; pleasure sufficient for intellectual and moral recuperation; work as a vocation, and not incidental to life; piety within the bounds of personal responsibility.

Her view, therefore, of the teacher's function was that it was essentially tutelary; her researches were made on the minds of her pupils to find and supply the particular need of each. Every girl knew that her personal advantage was Miss Porter's aim. The chosen course might appear inexplicable at first, but its pursuit with concentration, regularity, and judgment soon showed its adaptability to the end, or exhibited as mandatory the modification for further advance which had been expected. Herein lies the whole philosophy of secondary education,

A portrait accompanies the article, which fully bears out all the statements made by the writer. Miss Porter's beautifully sweet strong face goes a long way towards explaining how it was that all her pupils loved and reverenced her as they did.

Feilden's Magazine.

Feilden's Magazine for June is a very technical number, and does not contain much that is susceptible of and does not contain much that is susceptible of quotation. The illustrations are excellent. The number contains five special articles. Mr. S. Cowper Coles writes on "Electro-Galvanising." Mr. Cowper-Coles thinks that aluminium will soon supersede zinc as a protective coating for steel. "The Evolution of the Portable Engine" is sketched by Mr. William Fletcher. A special commissioner of the magazine describes the Leen Valley branch of the Great Northern Railway Company. Mr. E. C. Amos writes on "Pneumatic Tools and Appliances," dealing chiefly with pneumatic drills. There is a short article describing proposed improvements in the Port of Antwerp. The Schelde, though navigable by the greatest liners, is at present in a condition which causes great anxiety as to the future of the port. Between 1894 and 1897 dredging had to be carried on continuously in order to keep open a waterway of twenty-five feet.

ne Paris nd more antique chibition artistic s in the naster's

duct of ding to

He

ation of of the nal. Cor e other. ibus in Proragedy, edy into gradual and the equel is andam

islators

nartine,

L. D.

ers of a d rifle" nesburg he July gives a om the d seeks e Frere hes the renene * chers in erbohm ar? and at their further at jokes favour ghter is, nds the n court olemnity nake us august that the nd that jestermories, Moorish obtainhat unrs. Radogue a

THE FORUM.

THE only articles in the June Forum which require separate notice are Mr. John Redmond's paper on "The Present Position of the Irish Question" and Mr. Ho Yow's upon "The Attitude of the United States towards the Chinese." There are eleven other articles.

THE PHILIPPINE QUESTION.

Mr. Charles Denby asks, "Do we Owe Independence to the Filipinos?" a question which he answers in the negative. He says :-

We so-called Imperialists desire as ardently as the anti-Imperialists to keep foreign nations from securing ownership of the islands, and in order to do so we think we ought to hold and keep them as and for our own. We are advised to "offer to the people of the Philippines our help in maintaining order until they have had a reasonable opportunity to establish a government of their own." If we to-day announce to the Filipinos that we intend to hold them for only a "reasonable" time, we shall by that announcement give the reins to anarchy. Every foreign merchant will leave the islands. He will not live under Filipino rule. Every native who is now for us will turn against us.

LABOUR IN FRANCE.

Mr. Walter B. Scaife has a paper on "Organised Labour in France." In 1884 the working men of France for the first time gained the right to organise, and since that time they have passed from the condition of a mob into that of a disciplined army. The number of French workers for wages is about 3,000,000, of whom, in 1898, 419,000 were members of unions. There are in France 2,361 syndicats, as legalised trade-unions are called, of which 414 are in or around Paris:—

The administrative officers of syndicats usually serve without pay, and any member elected to an office is expected to serve. The working head of the syndicat is generally the secretary, in whose case an exception is made. This officer is paid at a rate corresponding to the best wages a man of his trade can earn. In answer to a question regarding the character of syndicat secretaries in general, the head of the Labour Exchange at Paris assured me that mere agitators were rarely elected to this position by their fellow working men. The secretary is in most cases an earnest worker either at his trade or in advancing the interests of his syndicat. The loud-mouthed agitator is generally recognised by the working men as of less value than the quiet worker.

THE PRE-EMINENT PROFESSION.

The Rev. H. A. Stimson, writing under this title, replies to Mr. Harry More's article on "The Paradoxical Profession" in the April number of the Forum. He savs '-

There is much nonsense talked about the impossibility of any man being able properly to perform the amount of intellectual labour which is required of an ordinary pastor. Of course any congregation would have a right to be proud if it had a pastor famed throughout the land for his ability to produce highly-finished works of art for their weekly delectation. But this is not the function of the pulpit; and, without fear of serious contradiction, it may be said that it is not the demand of the pew. The minister enters his pulpit for another purpose. He sia an ambassador charged with a message; and while it is his duty to deliver that message in such a form as to be listened to and und rstood and remembered, it is not a part of his duty so to deliver it that it will be looked upon principally as a finished literary production.

CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES.

The Hon. J. Charlton, M.P., who was a member of the Anglo-American Joint High Commission, writes complaining of American fiscal policy towards Canada. He says:—

The American market is practically sealed to Canada for the products of the farm. Naturally, therefore, Canada has turned her attention to seeking new outlets; and having done so with great success, the importance of the American market to her is becoming of smaller moment year by year. A feeling is also gradually taking hold of the public mind, which, if not one of hostility, is one of intense dissatisfaction with the commercial policy of the United States toward Canada; and the day is probably not distant when practical action will be demanded, either in the shape of securing increased exports to the United States or of adopting a policy which will very sharply curtail importation from that country.

ARMENIA AND EUROPE.

Mr. C. A. P. Rohrbach writes "A Contribution to the Armenian Question," which is written from personal experience of the country. He thinks that the Armenians are destined ultimately to come under the protection of Russia. As to the massacres, he says :-

Even from a Turkish point of view the massacres were regarded as pure insanity. They depopulated and devastated an extensive territory as completely as if a war had swept over it, and contributed to reduce the revenue of whole provinces to a minimum. The actual purpose of rendering the Armenians harmless might easily and expeditiously have been effected by a general and imperative order of disarmament—more particularly as the majority of the Armenian population were without guns. Selfishness, blind rage, and silly thoughtlessless were here responsible for the heaviest blow sustained by the Turkish Government since the war of 1877.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Mr. E. G. Hill deals with "Teaching in High Schools as a Life Occupation for Men," Mr. G. Stanley Hall has a paper on "College Philosophy," and Mr. W. O. Partridge writes on "The American School of Sculpture."

Scribner's Magazine.

THIS number is a very interesting one; with Mr. Millard's article on the Boer as a soldier and Mr. Spears' on Slave Trading we have dealt elsewhere.

Mr. Richard Harding Davis contributes an excellent description of the Relief of Ladysmith. He accompanied General Buller's forces in the last and successful attempt, and was one of the first men to arrive in Ladysmith. The condition of the garrison, the starvation, and their lack of interest are vividly described. So also is the march through the town of the relieving force and the meeting of the men; the garrison weak, yet clean and tidy, and the relief column, strong, ragged, and dirty. He writes:—

One felt he had been entirely lifted out of the politics of the war, and the questions of the rights and wrongs of the Boers and Uitlanders disappeared before a simple proposition of brave men saluting brave men.

Another interesting article is that on Harvard College fifty-eight years ago, contributed by Senator Hoar of Massachusetts. Mr. French contributes an article upon "Trees," illustrated by engravings of his own. Mr. Barrie continues the story of "Tommy and Grizel." The dwellers upon the great streams of the Mississippi are described by Dexter Marshall, with illustrations by Jules Guérin.

Two features stand out in the Sunday Strand for July: the ghastly photographs of emaciated, almost fleshless, humanity which accompany Mr. George Clark's account of the Indian famine; and the computations of Mr. W. Greenwood as to the cost of the Victorian Drink Bill. He estimates the total at 6,914 million pounds sterling, which equal the United Kingdom in value, and which form besides one-tenth of the whole world's wealth.

the second TB tin

W

th

an

be

the

an

all Th

art

angra

ori

Ko

and are

the acre

arti

Pro

Am

faci

Pro

crin

and whe

peri

deca

e so with to her is ing is also not one of ommercial he day is emanded, he United on to the personal rmenians ection of ly curtail

awere reastated an pt over it, vinces to a Armeniansected by a articularly nout guns. were here

Schools
Iall has a Partridge

with Mr. r. Spears' excellent ompanied l attempt.

ompanied attempt, adysmith and their lso is the e and the clean and and dirty.

litics of the f the Boers on of brave rd College r Hoar of rticle upon own. Mr. rizel." The issippi are as by Jules Strand for ed, almost orge Clark's outations of orian Drink on pounds a value, and ole world's

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW.

THE North American Review for June is a good number, but it is, as usual, rather expository than polemical. I have dealt elsewhere with Mr. Bryan's article on "The Presidential Campaign," Mr. Edmund Barton's paper on "The Australian Federation Bill," Baron de Coubertin's "Meeting of the Olympian Games," Princess Radziwill's article on "Cecil Rhodes's Future," and the articles on Anglo-Russian relations which are grouped together under the title of "The Rival Empires." Among the articles on the war will also be found a resume of Sir Sidney Shippard's paper, "How to Treat the Vanquished Boers." There are only four other articles.

"WHAT HAS BECOME OF HELL?"

The Rev. G. W. Shinn, D.D., writing under the title of "What has become of Hell?" suggests that the pulpit has lost some of its power, owing to the decay of the practice of appealing to fear:—

It is this failure to appeal to fear which accounts in part for the decline of interest in personal religion by so many. It is the seeming willingness of so many Christian people to give up all reference to retribution that is making it difficult for some to know what course to pursue. We may talk as we will about the evanescent nature of fear, and we may talk about its being an inferior motive, but in all other things in life it is appealed to. Take it out of life, and chaos comes in ordinary matters. Because it has been taken out of religion—out of religion of our time—there has been the weakening of the force of religion. If we had perfectly normal beings to deal with—and that is a modern way of saying if we were all without sin—then might there be no reference to fear, but an appeal to everything high and holy within us.

MODERN PERSIAN LITERATURE.

Professor Denison Ross writes on "Modern Persian Literature." The actual state of Persian literature cannot be called flourishing:—

Its latest development is in the direction of popular plays, chiefly comedies; but, though they offer interesting specimens of modern colloquial Persian, they are merely translations from the Turkish of Trans-Caucasia, and do not, therefore, represent any literary activity in Persia.

Printing from movable types is not practised in Persia, all publications being done by means of lithography. The straightness of printed lines offends a Persian artistic sense, whereas lithography preserves a certain amount of the character of the original writing, and caligraphy in Persia is held in almost as great respect as original composition:—

The ordinary Persian family library consists of a copy of the Koran, in Arabic, the works of one or two poets, a dictionary and a book of general history. Large libraries are rare. Books are not kept, as with us, in an upright position, but lying on their sides, one above the other, with their backs to the wall, while the title of the book, when indicated at all, is written across the front edge.

EDUCATION AND DEGENERACY.

Professor J. R. Stratton has an extremely interesting article entitled, "Will Education Solve the Race Problem," in which he combats the belief that the American negroes are being morally raised by improved facilities for education. So far from this being so, Professor Stratton brings statistics to prove that negro criminality has increased rapidly since the emancipation, and that it has increased most in the Northern States where negro education has been prevalent for the longest period. He thinks that the African negroes must be numbered among the races to whom civilisation means decay. As to the real solution of the problem he says:—

No plan for picking up the negro race an masse and moving them from the country, or to some isolated portion of it, is practicable. But by establishing conditions elsewhere which would invite the negro there, and then assisting him to go, the problem might be solved. As many foreigners as there are members in the coloured race have come to this country within the past few decades, on account of the inviting conditions hare. It is possible, therefore, for the negroes to go elsewhere if conditions invited them there. All of the negroes would not go, nor is it needful that they should do so. The old negroes are rapidly passing over to a country which lies much nearer our shores than Africa or the islands at our Southern doors. But by granting any government assistance on the age-limit plan, a sufficient number of the negroes could and would go to ease the present strain in this country on the one hand, and to insure them a racial future on the other.

OTHER ARTICLE.

The only other article in the North American is a short paper by Mr. B. S. Coler entitled "The Charter Needs of Great Cities."

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

THE two articles dealing with the South African War are noticed elsewhere, as are also Captain Wellby's on "The Court of King Menelik" and J. D. Quackenbos's on the "Educational Use of Hypnotism." There are further instalments of the stories by Mrs. Humphry Ward and Mr. Zangwill. In the Whilomville Stories appears a story entitled "The City Urchin and the Chaste Villagers," by the late Mr. Stephen Crane. Dr. H. Smith Williams deals in an exhaustive article with Professor Ernst Haeckel of Jena and the New Zoology, this being the second article of the series "To-day's Science in Europe." Mr. Bingham's article upon the negro question in the United States is most interesting. The writer is an ex-slaveholder, and gives the following account of the standpoint from which he regards the question:—

I love the negro. I think that it may be said truly that therenever were as kindly relations existing between two races on the same soil as between the slave-owner and the slave in the South before the war.

That the negro question is a most serious one may be understood from the following conclusions of Dr. George T. Winston, born in North Carolina, then President of the University of Texas, as expressed in an address delivered in 1897:—

(1) The negro element is much the most criminal of our population. (2) The negro is much more criminal as a free man than he was as a slave. (3) The negro is increasing in criminality with fearful rapidity, being one-third more criminal in 1890 than in 1880. (4) The negroes who can read and write are more criminal than the illiterate, which is true of no other element of our population. (5) The negro is nearly three times as criminal in the north-east, where he has not been a slave for a hundred years, and three and a-half times as criminal in the north-west, where he has never been a slave, as in the south, where he was a slave till 1865. (6) The negro is three times as criminal as the native white, and once and a-half times as criminal as the foreign white, consisting in many cases of the scum of Europe. (7) More than seven-tenths of the negro criminals are under thirty years of age

THERE is a sketch of the new bishop of Liverpool in the Sunday Magazine, from which it appears that he has been a total abstainer for nearly thirty years. He is also an active member of the Christian Social Union. Descended from a line of French Catholics, he is yet a man after Bishop Ryle's own heart.

THE REVUE DES REVUES.

THE Revue des Revues for June contains an interesting article on the Language of Birds by M. Michel Bréal of the Institute. It is written in response to the appeal of M. Mag aud d'Aubusson's remarkable study of the subject published in a previous number of the Revue. He says that the study of the language of birds and animals is valuable for the science of philology. Being more conservative than men they reveal the initial stage, and afford us many useful suggestions as to the origin and development of speech. M. Jules Bidault writes with much good sense and restrained enthusiasm upon the French language and the French in Canada. He bears tribute to the double loyalty of the French Canadians, who are faithful both to the British Empire and to the French language, but exhorts the French to exercise unceasing vigilance in preserving the purity of their tongue. Another article of considerable interest to English readers is Mr. Albert Schinz's article on Omar Khayyam and the Khayyamese cult in Britain and the United States. In the section of the Revue devoted to notices of other periodicals there is an account of a noteworthy symposium published by La Patrie Française on the rôle of Protestantism in France. The symposium contains contributions from M. Paul Bourget, M. de Vogué, M. Maurice Barrès, M. Jean le Bonneson, M. Drumont, and others. The tendency of most of the contributors is decidedly hostile to Protestantism. There is not enough religion in France to serve for two forms of Christianity. Catholics they know, and Freethinkers, but Protestants—who are they? Protestantism, like the Jew, is the enemy of France.

The Engineering Magazine.

THE most interesting article in the June Engineering magazine is that of Admiral Hichborn on Submarine Boats. I have dealt with this paper among the Leading Articles. Another very interesting article is entitled "Russia's Field for Anglo-Saxon Enterprise in Asia," which is written by Mr. A. H. Ford and is illustrated with some excellent photographs. Mr. Ford states that Japan is already beginning to undersell other nations in supplying material for the Siberian railway. Mr. Edmund Mitchell has a well illustrated paper in "The Paris Exhibition as a Mechanical Achievement." Electricity he regards as the dominant feature of the Exhibition. Captain G. H. Powell describes "Disappearing Gun-Carriages" as used in the United States. Mr. James O'Connell has an article to prove that piecework does not give the best result in machine shops. Mr. J. Esdaile Florence writes on "Dutch Guiana from a Mining Standpoint." He says that in almost all reports of gold placers in Dutch Guiana the wealth of the deposits is vastly exaggerated; but he thinks rich lodes will sooner or later be discovered nearer the mountains.

"My FIRST CENTURY" is the heading which Mr. Randal Roberts gives to the autobiographic letters of eminent cricketers and contributes to the Windsor. Dr. W. G. Grace made his first century in a match between the Gentlemen of Sussex and the South Wales Club in July, 1864, a few days before his sixteenth birthday. His record on that occasion was 170 and 56 not out. "And in 1900 he is still holding his own with the best in first-class cricket," exclaims Mr. Roberts.

Cassier's Magazine.

Cassier's Magasine for June opens with a very optimistic article by Mr. Edgar Mels on "Trade Possibilities in South Africa." He thinks that the day of the politician and the financier will have passed away when the war is over, and that it will be followed by an immense increase of business. At present the chief industry in South Africa, after gold and diamond mining, is the manufacture of waggons, to which nearly five hundred establishments are devoted. Mr. George Beard has an article entitled "Sixty years in British Ironworks." The article deals largely with technical questions; but it also throws a good deal of light on the general cause of trade. In 1854 Great Britain produced as much crude iron as all the other countries in the world. At the present day, however, America annually produces 4,500,000 tons more, and Germany nearly as much. Mr. W. H. Smyth has an article on "Practical Inventing," in which he gives a number of suggestions for systematising inventive effort. Mr. William Forsyth writes on "The Increasing Size of American Locomotives." Surgeon-General Tryon, U.S.A., contributes an article on "Naval Architecture and Sanitation." He thinks that the tradition of placing the sick on the bows of ships does a lot towards increasing the mortality.

McClure's Magazine.

THERE are many articles of interest in this number, notably Mr. Wm. J. Lampton's description of the Cape Nome Gold Fields, which is illustrated with interesting photographs. Adachi Kinnosake tells a vivid story of the experience of a cadet at the Battle of the Yalu. "Experiments in Flying" are dealt with by O. Chaunte, with photographs showing his own invention, which is an attempt to imitate the sparrow. The inventor says of the delights of gliding through the air:

There is no more delightful sensation than that of gliding through the air. All the faculties are on the alert, and the motion is astonishingly smooth and elastic. The machine responds instantly to the slightest movement of the operator; the air rushes by one's ears; the trees and bushes flit away underneath, and the landing comes all too quickly.

The illustrations in colour in the instalment of the "Life of Christ," by Dr. Watson, compare very unfavourably with the black-and-white drawings. Unless the greatest care is taken in the work, colour-illustrating must be disappointing. The number is well provided with light reading and is, as usual, well illustrated.

The Cosmopolitan.

MR. JOHN G. SPEED'S article upon "The Modern Chariot" affords an opportunity for the introduction of many interesting photographs of decorated motor-cars, possibly in the hopes of inducing the public to believe that an automobile is a thing of beauty. The writer concludes by stating that

The horseless carriage does not make a horseless age, but it will contribute to the betterment of the horse while adding greatly to the comfort and the convenience of men.

There is a short historical sketch of the great Boer Trek by the late Stephen Crane, and M. Camille Flammarion deals with the progress of astronomical instruments in the year 1900. Special descriptions are given of the huge telescope at the Paris Exhibition.

Under the title "What Kind of a Sovereign is Queen Victoria?" Mr. W. T. Stead deals with the question of the influence and power of the Queen as a ruler.

THE REVUE DES DEUX MONDES.

WE have noticed elsewhere M. Leclercq's article on "The Origins of the South African Republics." As regards the rest of the Revue des Deux Mondes for June, it must be admitted that the usual high standard has not for once, been altogether maintained.

ARTIFICIAL COLOURING MATTER.

M. Dastre contributes to the first June number an extremely learned and technical article on the chemical industry of artificial colouring matters. The general character of the changes which this industry has undergone may be briefly explained: it has been the substitution, sometimes slow and gradual, at other times sudden, of artificial products for natural ones. This process has been effected in most cases at the cost of the agricultural industry. Colours borrowed from vegetable or animal sources are suddenly, one fine day, produced artificially in the laboratory, and lo! all of a sudden a flourishing industry is menaced, declines, and disappears. A remarkable example is to be found in the fact that at the end of the eighteenth century Spain used to supply France with large quantities of soda, derived from sea weed of various kinds; but this industry was destroyed in a moment by the discovery and adoption of the Leblanc process, which rendered France independent of Spain in this respect. So too with the discovery of aniline dyes, which wrought an absolute revolution in the dyeing trade. But it is mainly on the future that M. Dastre fixes his eyes; he sees in this industry an unlimited field for discoveries of importance, and he attributes the supremacy of Germany in this field to the fact that she has known how to enlist the highest science in the service of industry.

THE OLD EMPEROR WILLIAM.

To the second June number M. Emile Ollivier contributes a long and historically interesting paper on the old Emperor, King William of Prussia. No prince, he says, better understood and fulfilled the duties of royalty. His education was entirely military, and he was forty-four years old before he was initiated into State affairs. But he was too conscientious to remain a simple figure-head, and with infinite labour he acquainted himself with the details of government, and even with the principles of jurisprudence. He worked from morning till night without any recreation except the theatre, and even there he was always accessible to deal with important business. "I have not the time to be tired," he said to those who were astonished at his enormous labours. He had the royal gift of choosing his assistants well, and of attaching them to him by delicate attentions. In his private life he was kind, polite to ladies, devoid of vindictiveness, of a placid, gentle humour, fond of obliging people, and, while strikingly economical, yet ready if occasion demanded to dispense royal splendour. youth he was of a romantic disposition, and if it had not been for the formal veto of his father he would have married to please himself; as it was, he married, by order, the Princess Augusta of Saxe-Weimar, the bent of whose mind rendered her scarcely a suitable wife for him. Her poetic, literary, and artistic culture was too exceptional, and though she was not without influence over him, yet their relations were often strained. He was first and foremost a King of Prussia—a man of conquest, ready to take what he could get without scruple, and believing what was profitable to be lawful. War was ever in his thoughts, and it seemed to him a necessary refreshment for nations. His mission seemed to him less that of making some millions of men happy than that of conquering Germany: in fact, he found quite natural, and even holy, forms of deceit from which his soul would have shrunk if they had been concerned merely with his own private affairs.

MADAGASCAR.

M. Lebon continues his series of papers on Madagascar by dealing this time with the process of pacification after the annexation. M. Lebon considers that Madagascar has been badly treated in regard to finance, the home Government being unwilling as a rule to spend enough. As regards the economic development of the island, for which means of communication are the most essential requirement, he considers that France has repeated in Madagascar the same error which has affected the whole of her colonial history: she has not known how to follow up rapidly great military sacrifices with corresponding expenditure on public works. M. Lebon contrasts the energy displayed by England in constructing the Uganda railway, as well as the military line which owed its origin to Lord Kitchener in the Soudan campaign.

THE NOUVELLE REVUE.

THERE is no lack of interesting papers in the Nouvelle Revue, although it no longer has the advantage of the editorial direction of Madame Juliette Adam.

PÈRE DIDON.

An article signed only by the initials "E. M." gives an interesting picture of Père Didon. Obituary notices have sufficiently expressed the grief which the news of Père Didon's death aroused among his numerous friends in England; there is, therefore, no need to follow the writer in his sketch of Père Didon's life. The part of educator, which filled the last portion of his life after his reconciliation with the Vatican, is probably what Pere Didon will be remembered for by posterity. At the school of Arcueil he showed his great powers of organisation, as well as the sweetness and charm of his personal nature; he believed in spreading sunshine and light around him, and all sadness was banished. He had a splendid appetite, and a great love of manly sports, in which he brought up his pupils. At table Père Didon's gaiety was irresistible. Never did modern monk penetrate more intelligently the spirit and manners of our time; he set his watch by the hour of the century. Essentially a Liberal and Democrat, he seemed to bring to the solution of modern problems that sympathy and forgetfulness of self which distinguished some of the greatest names in the history of monasticism. He was once foolishly called the Coquelin of the Church, but Père Didon was anything but an actor; and if he was not exactly a monk to the very marrow of his bones, he was certainly a believer.

THE WAR.

Captain Gilbert continues in the second June number a description of the military operations in South Africa, in which he takes us down to the 15th of November. Captain Gilbert's papers are worthy of attention as being the work of a professional soldier who seems to be on the whole uninfluenced by political or national prejudice on either side, and is therefore able to discuss the military problems involved in the war in the dry light of reason.

THE only two essentials in the culture of the rose, writes Mr. William Pigott in the July Longman's, are pruning and disbudding. Given these, there is, he says, probably no flower which requires less trouble and skill to gain good results.

Possi-

of the

when mense

stry in

is the undred

nas an

it also trade.

as all

t day,

more,

th has gives a effort.

Size of

J.S.A., I Sani-

ne sick

ng the umber.

Cape

resting

tory of

Yalu.

aunte.

h is an

of the gliding

and the nachine

erator;

t away

of the

ry un-

Unless

trating

ovided

fodern

tion of

r-cars, believe

er con-

it will eatly to

t Boer

amille

omical

ns are

Queen

tion of

XUM

THE ITALIAN REVIEWS.

THE political situation in Italy and the recent elections naturally excite the attention of all the serious reviews, and pessimistic views concerning the future appear to prevail in most quarters. The Rassegna Nazionale (Liberal Catholic) tries to make the best of what it clearly regards as a bad business, and blames the Osservatore Cattolico for indirectly, at least, supporting the extreme Left in opposition to the ministerial can-didates. The Civiltà Cattolica (Jesuit) congratulates the Church on the continued abstention of Catholics from the poll, while complacently noting the increasing corruption and disorder of political life in Italy. The weighty Nuova Antologia devotes no less than three articles, two by Senators and one by a Deputy, to various aspects of the situation. The most noteworthy contribution is that of F. Nobili-Vitelleschi, who, in an article entitled "A New Cry of Pain," declares roundly that it would not be easy to find any country that had been so badly governed as Italy during the last twenty-five years. "The confusion of parties, their self-seeking, the mutability of policy, the turbulent proceedings in Parliament, the frequent changes of Ministries and prorogations of the Chamber, the constant dissolutions, the method of nominating to the Upper Chamber, are very far from being proofs of good government."

Discussing the eternal question of Catholic abstention from the poll, he remarks incidentally that English Catholics have shown how to be patriotic without ceasing to be loyal to the Church.

Apart from home politics, the most topical articles in the Nuova Antologia are two which form part of a series describing the travels of an Italian engineer through the interior of China, and illustrated by a number of excellent kodak views. The journey, which was undertaken in connection with the laying down of a new railway, only dates from last year, and, in the light of current events, it is interesting to note that it was accomplished without any difficulties, although here and there the author refers to the antagonistic humour of the Chinese

The Civiltà Cattolica (June 16th) points out that the assumption universally adopted by the Italian non-Catholic press earlier in the year, that the Anno Santo would prove a failure, is fast giving way before the undeniable facts of the case. As a proof of the crowds of foreigners who have thronged the Eternal City, the writer asserts that the receipts of the Roman Tramway Company during the eight weeks from mid-March to mid-May equalled in amount the whole of the receipts for the year 1899. There is an article condemning the moral tone of Sienkiewicz's two novels, "Quo Vadis" and "Without Dogma," which are enjoying an enormous popularity in Italy just now. Apparently, "Quo Vadis" is only ecclesiastically sanctioned in an expurgated edition.

The Rassegna Nazionale publishes a lecture on "The Delineation of Sorrow in Art," by the veteran novelist A. Fogazzaro, which has attracted considerable attention of late among Italian critics.

The Rivista Politica e Letteraria publishes an enthusiastic review of Cassandra Vivaria's novel, "Via Lucis," which is to appear in translated form as a serial in its pages.

The Rivista Popolare, a small fortnightly publication, edited for the people by the well-known deputy, N. Colajanni, prints (June 15) a very bitter letter by Ouida against England, in which she prophesies that when we have swallowed the Transvaal we shall turn our attention to Mozambique. The previous number (May 31st) re-printed Mr. Stead's definition of "True Imperialism" from the May REVIEW OF REVIEWS.

THE REVUE DE PARIS.

WE have had occasion to note before the considerable improvement which had been effected in the Revue de Paris, and this improvement is fully maintained in the June number.

SPORTS IN OLD FRANCE,

upo

the

Asi

En the

pro

ma eve

In

ign

Chi

whe

from ach

St.

and unf one

tha

can

Am

bet

opi

An

sha

slo

var

En sec

the

col

a g

clos

wri

stil

this

ma

nar

fort fan

mo

upo

Eu of t

to S is I rea

den

dar froi

det

ma the

adv

con

inte

of I lan

Ma

I

1

Modern France, in spite of Père Didon, is not supposed to be much addicted to athletics, and perhaps it is with a view of remedying this that M. Jusserand writes on the subject of sports in old France in the first June number, in continuation of the series which he began in May. He begins with the jousts and tourneys in the time of René of Anjou. In the joust there were different prizes given to the man who should make the finest lance thrust, to the man who broke most lances, and so on; curiously parallel to the methods of an athletic meeting of to-day. The joust was an imitation of the single combat or duel to the death, just as the tourney was an imitation of a regular battle. The sixteenth century was the golden age of individual prowess in arms; distance and difference of nationality were no bar, but the chivalry of every country of Europe met at great trials of strength and

"L'AIGLON" AND THE COUNTESS CAMERATA.

The recent production of M. Rostand's play, "L'Aiglon," lends interest to a short paper by M. Frédéric Masson on the part played by the Countess Camerata at Vienna. Last April, M. Masson had said in the Revue de Paris that the Countess could not come to Vienna in 1830 to be near the Duke of Reichstadt. M. Masson, however, has been furnished with letters by a very high authority which tend to modify, if not to disprove, his previous statement.

M. SPULLER AND M. GAMBETTA.

M. Depasse presents five interesting letters from M. Spuller to Gambetta, written on the morrow of the war of 1870, during and after the Commune. M. Spuller was the most faithful and most disinterested of Gambetta's friends, and his moral and political influence has been too little recognised by historians of the French Republican Party. The letters show for the first time the great part which M. Spuller played in the Gambettist-Opportunist politics.

OTHER ARTICLES.

We have noticed elsewhere M. Mille's article on the Boers, and among others which should be mentioned are an anonymous historical paper on the assassination of two plenipotentiaries of France at the gates of Rastatt in 1799; a description of the picturesque customs of the Amsterdam Stock Exchange in the seventeenth century : a selection of letters written to General Mathieu Dumas during the campaign of Marengo by General Dampierre; and a lively description, in the form of extracts from letters, of the Cape Nome goldfields, to which is added an excellent map showing the position of the fields in relation to the Klondyke district on the one side, and Siberia on the other.

The Revue de l'Art.

IN the June number of the Revue de l'Art Ancien et Moderne, Léopold Delisle concludes his study of the Montmorency Book of Hours in the Condé Museum: Henri Bouchout has an interesting article on Jan van Eyck's Portrait of His Wife in the Brüges Academy, and the remaining space is devoted to a series of articles on the French Art at the Paris Exhibition.

GERMAN MAGAZINES.

The Deutsche Revue.

In the June number M. von Brandt contributes a paper on "Asiatic Shadows." The Russophobes will pounce upon it with triumph, as it bears out almost everything they have ever contended concerning Russia's policy in Asia. The "shadows" in question are those thrown upon English prestige and English influence in every part of the great Eastern Continent. The writer points to the progress in colonisation, in conquest, and in influence made by Russia on the one hand, and the stationary or even retrograde movement of Great Britain on the other. In order to make this more marked, M. von Brandt has ignored any advance that has been made by England in China and elsewhere, and only mentions Ranjut and Chitral. He says that Russian enterprise has been everywhere triumphant—in Persia, in China, on the Indian frontier, in Afghanistan. Only in Corea it has not frontier, in Afghanistan. Only in Corea it has not achieved that success wished for by the statesmen at St. Petersburg. The result of this is that the Chinese and Japanese, seeing the English policy which has been unfolded before their eyes since 1895, can only come to one conclusion—namely, that England is afraid of Russia, that her policy is but a broken reed, and that her hand can give no support to any who may wish to lean on her.

M. von Brandt mentions the anti-English feeling in America, and even foresees the probability of a war between the two great English-speaking nations. In his opinion all that we have left is the command of the sea. And upon that even now shadows are being thrownshadows which have real forms behind them, which grow slowly yet surely. He quotes the trade returns of the various nations with China and Japan to show that England is falling behind in the race, having to take second place to America and Russia. Were it not that the French have demonstrated their incapacity for colonisation, their presence in Southern China would be a great menace to England. One turns with relief to the closing paragraph of this lugubrious article. Here the writer sets forth the fact that the wealth of England is still the great source of her strength; but even more than this the great element of her power is found in the remark made by Graf von Schwerin when he visited Englandnamely, that in England the great families always stood forth in the cause of freedom, whilst in Germany the old families only tried to see whether it were possible to get more privileges for themselves.

Dr. Hans Kleser writes a very long historical article upon the position and significance of Roumania amongst European States. He opens his article with a description of the journey of King Karl of Roumania through Russia to St. Petersburg last year. The significance of this visit is much greater than has been generally recognised. It really marks the recognition of Roumania as an independent sovereign State whose future is assured. The chief dangers that the little kingdom has now to fear will arise from internal troubles. Dr. Kleser goes minutely into the details of Roumanian history, and touches upon the march of Russian enterprise towards the West in much the same way as M. von Brandt refers to her Eastern

The article, "Personal Reminiscences of Garibaldi," contains very little about Garibaldi himself. It is interesting because it is an account of the stirring times of 1860 told by an eye-witness. The author, D. Baratieri, landed with Garibaldi and his thousand at Marsala on May 11th, 1860, and went through the whole campaign with him, beginning as a corporal and ending as a colonel. Most of the article is taken up by a description of the battle of Calatasimi.

There are several other interesting papers in the Revue, which is a most readable number.

Deutsche Rundschan.

The widespread feeling in Germany that it would be a good thing to acquire a few more colonies and greatly develop those they already have, finds expression in many articles in the magazines upon the present German possessions and those States in which there is a strong German influence. Among the latter is Morocco, and in the June number of the Kundschau we find a most interesting article called "Impressions of Journeys in Morocco," by Theobald Fischer. Mr. Fischer has travelled a great deal in Morocco, a country in which he says there are important German interests. He describes some of his journeys, from which it would appear that he had to rough it pretty considerably. The difficulties of travel in this part of Africa are many. He says that at present there is no artificially built road in the whole of Morocco, and that bridges are almost unknown. All the larger streams are crossed by means of ferries, a method which causes great delays, especially when the ferrymen refuse to perform their duty. He also seems to have suffered great inconvenience owing to the gates of all towns being shut at sunset, in which case the caravan has to camp without the walls. Not only are the gates of the town closed, but the gates of the different divisions of the town are also kept shut after dark, a custom which renders visiting after sunset practically impossible.

He mentions incidentally that the European residents of Tangiers go in largely for the sport of pig-sticking, dwelling in tents whilst the hunting lasts. As this is during the rainy season, they need to be enthusiastic hunters indeed. He gives a great deal of useful information about Morocco customs. Tea is the national beverage, and is used in the same way as is coffee in Turkey; that is to say, no visitor can escape it, no business be done without it. The water is bad, and in consequence, Mr. Fischer, a tectotaler, never drank anything except tea, even when parched with thirst with any amount of water at hand. He says that no European can travel in Morocco, or even live there, unless he is under the direct protection of one of the Great Powers.

His general impression of Morocco is that it is a land which has been richly endowed by Nature, and with a position which gives it great superiority, but which at the same time is devastated and depopulated by a horrible arbitrary power. No man can be sure of his life or his property. The village sheik skins his peasants in order to enrich himself. He in turn loses his position, his wealth, and possibly his life, if he fails to give the Sultan and his entourage the customary yearly presents, or if another man offers more for his place. The Sultans themselves generally end by means of poison. Only the man who has absolutely nothing is moderately safe. Speaking of the crushing out of a rebellion which took place some time ago, he says that at first every soldier in the Sultan's army was paid five francs for each head that he brought in. The natural result was that the soldiers killed everybody that they could-camel drivers and the like. So many heads came in that this bonus was taken off, in consequence of which innumerable desertions took place, as the soldiers found it quite impossible to live upon their pay, which amounted to 5d. a day. He tells some gruesome stories of the tortures employed, and concludes: "Rotten through and through as it is, this State, onsiderable e Revue de ined in the ot supposed os it is with rites on the ne number, in in May. he time of rent prizes nce thrust, ; curiously of to-day. bat or duel ation of a the golden difference of every ength and RATA. L'Aiglon," Masson on it Vienna. de Paris in 1830 to , however, authority previous ters from ow of the M. Spuller ambetta's has been Republitime the ambettistle on the ioned are ination of Rastatt in ns of the century; u Dumas mpierre ; cts from is added fields in ide, and Ancien et Auseum : Jan van emy, and rticles on whose existence is a disgrace to Christian Europe, would succumb to the first blow from outside. The jealousy of the Powers is responsible for the fact that this blow has not already been delivered."

There are several other articles, of which the most interesting are Dr. Dessau's "Telegraphy Without Wires," and an able review of Tolstoi's last novel, which has just been translated into German.

Nord und Süd.

I. Nover, a citizen of Mainz, makes the occasion of the celebration of the 500th birthday of Gutenberg by that city the text of a very long article upon the history of printing and Gutenberg's life. The article is somewhat long drawn out, going into rather minute details concerning the great inventor's private life. The whole tone of the essay is summed up in the words: Columbus opened to us a new part of the earth; Gutenberg unlocked th: whole world.

"An Optimist" continues and brings to an end the article entitled "To-day." He makes much of the unity of Europe, and, speaking of the Americans, he gives his opinion—which they will hardly relish—namely, that the Yankees really belong to the same family (the European); they simply play the part of younger sons, who are called upon to send the treasures which are discovered over there to the Motherland.

Monatsschrift für Stadt und Land.

For English readers the most instructive article in the June number is that by the editor, Ulrich von Hassell. In it he tells of German interests over seas, and advocates the building of a strong fleet—in fact, at the present moment the acquisition of a powerful fleet is probably the most popular movement in Germany. They have lately formed a Navy League there, which is already beginning to make itself felt. Von Hassell gives many statistical details concerning the emigration to German colonies and to other lands. It appears, however, that just now, although the population of Germany is increasing at the rate of 800,000 a year, the emigrants only numbered 24,000 in 1897, as against 166,000 in 1885 and previous years. It is logical to assume, he says, that when the conditions over sea are better the flow will rapidly increase. Greater Germany is no longer a dream—it is a reality—and to bind it together and to make it one great Empire a strong fleet is imperative. Never must the emigrants be allowed to follow the example of their fifteen smillion predecessors in the United States, who have lost their language, their nationality, and severed all connection with the mother state. No; these future emigrants must retain their language, their Bible, and their culture, not to mention their connection with the Fatherland. Not only this, but any machinery or materials that they themselves cannot make or supply must be obtained from Germany. The colonies at present possessed are not yet great, but will be so in time. Of the various statistics given those relating to German trade in Africa will be the most surprising to Englishmen. It appears that in Morocco there are no fewer than sixteen German merchant houses established, one bank, two factories, and several grape fields. In Tunis the numbers are fewer, but still considerable. At the Cape the Germans have followed the example of their compatriots in America, and become naturalised subjects of the ruling Power. In the Transvaal, however, German interests are large. The French capital sunk in the mines is about 1,500,000,000 marks, the German 730,000,000 marks, and the English only 600,000,000 marks. This fact was probably more responsible for the safety of the Johannesburg mines than anything else. The other figures are most interesting and instructive.

Ueber Land und Meer.

B. Rauchenegger writes on the Ober Ammergan Passion play, but he does not give any information as to the way in which the drama is acted this year. Most of the article is taken up with an account of the origin of the play, and with short descriptions of the players. From the way in which he writes on the subject, it would not appear that Mr. Rauchenegger has been at any of the performances this year. The article is chiefly interesting because of the photographs which it contains. Several of these are of the new players, and especially good is that representing Christus lying in the arms of Mary after the descent from the Cross. There are some very clever photographs of the aquarium at Neapel, accompanying an article by Dr. J. Soboota. A short mention is made of the fact that the mails are now to be conveyed through the towns in automobiles, and a photograph of the exceedingly neat conveyance used is given.

The Paris Exhibition is dealt with at some length in two articles. Dr. Stekan Epstein continues his papers on the subject, treating this time with the exhibits in the Palais des Beaux Arts and the Asiatic Russian section. These articles were evidently written before the Great Palais was open to the public, and deals almost entirely with the German works of art, many good reproductions of sculpture and statuary being given. In his second article he gives an account of the exhibits in the Siberian building, and illustrates it with many excellent photographs of that striking building and its contents. The second article is by Albert Pfister, and gives an account of the naval exhibit of Germany. This exhibit is so large that an ignorant stranger would imagine that Germany was the greatest sea power in Europe. Some of the models are reproduced. These, together with the usual notes and novelettes, make up a very bright number.

Die Grenzboten.

The first place in the June number is given to an article by Eberhard Kraus, entitled "Balten, Finnlander, Buren." It is a political comparison between the inhabitants of the Baltic provinces, the Finns and the Boers. The author is evidently a strong anti-Russian, but his sympathies cannot be said to lie with the Government of Great Britain. Speaking of India, he says that those who so earnestly desire to see Russia supplant England in that country are ill advised, as they are simply praying for Beelzebub to turn out the Devil! He says, however, that the treatment of the Boers by the English is quite mild and "Quakerish" compared to the "justice" meted out to the Finns and the Baltic States. Of the Boers he does not say much, but mentions that should the Chamberlain policy win and the Republics lose their independence on the excuse of their having declared war, they do not need to despair of regaining their freedom. Once before they have thrown off the British yoke, and their nationality stretches strong, deeply-buried roots all over South Africa. At any rate he says their beliefs and. their language cannot be taken away from them.

"THE Tyranny of the Drink Traffic" forms the subject of a series of papers by notable temperance persons and others which begins in the July Young Man. Mr. Joha A. Steuart, author of "Wine on the Lees," urges temperance people to adopt the tactics of their opponents and make themselves powerful at the polls.

Some Notable Books of the Month.

LUKE'S LIFE OF SIR WILFRID LAWSON.*

THIS book is a pleasantly written record of the life of the most genial, witty, and consistent politician in

Sir Parliament. Wilfrid Lawson has found in Mr. Luke a biographer who is in hearty sympathy with the author of the Permissive Bill, but who is not, I regret to say, in sympathy with Sir Wilfrid Lawson's hatred of the present war. Mr. Luke does violence to his own anti - Boer prejudices in order not to injure his hero. But the cloven foot peeps out despite Luke, in the next edition, will do well to correct the mistake which he makes when credits or debits Sir Owen Lanyon with the annexation of the Transvaal. It was Sir Owen Lanyon who lost the Transvaal. It was Sir Theophilus Shepstone who annexed it.

obably more

sburg mines st interesting

Ammergan

mation as to

ar. Most of the origin of the players, ject, it would en at any of s chiefly init contains.

nd especially the arms of ere are some

at . Neapel, a. A short re now to be and a photo-

ed is given.

me length in nis papers on hibits in the

sian section.

e the Great nost entirely eproductions

his second

the Siberian

photographs

The second count of the so large that ermany was

f the models

al notes and to an article nder, Buren."

habitants of

Boers. The

Government s that those ant England

nply praying

ys, however,

glish is quite

stice" meted

he Boers he

the Cham-

their indeeclared war,

eir freedom.

h yoke, and ried roots all

r beliefs and.

s the subject

persons and

. Mr. John

rges temperponents and em.

the way. son has been so conspicuous in Parliament and on the platform for the last forty years that it is almost impossible for Mr. Luke to tell the public anything it did not know about the indomitable champion of the United Kingdom Alliance. These chapters revive memories familiar to most of

This, however, by us. In the opening pages of the book, however, he tells us some interesting things not generally known about Sir Wilfrid's ancestry. There was, it seems, a Sir Wilfrid Lawson, whose son was a groom of the bedchamber to George I., and who was a man of "a niceness of conscience not often to be met with." He proved this by leaving £600 to the Government in his will to make up for the undertaxing of his estate. He also gave up his unappropriated tithes, which he thought he ought not to withhold. from the Church. The present Sir Wilfrid, although not in the line of direct descent, is a man of the same niceness. Mr. Luke tells us that on one occasion his steward reported the renewal of a farmer's lease for ten years at an increase of £80 per annum in the rental. "How comes it that the farm is worth more?" asked Sir Wilfrid. "The tenant," said his steward, "has improved his holding so much that it is well worth the extra rent." "Then," said Sir Wilfrid, "if the improvement is due to his industry, I have no right to the increased rent." And there and then the extra £80 per annum was handed over to the farmer.

When the Lawson estates passed to the Wyberghs at the beginning of this century, the new owner appears to have taken over not only the name, but the character of the Lawsons. The first Wybergh Lawson was noted for his gaiety of heart, which nothing could subdue. He was also a stout Radical, and an ardent champion of Queen Caroline. His son, the present Sir Wilfrid's father, was one of the first teetotalers in England. At a time when employers occasionally dismissed their [W. Reed, 443, Strand.

Photo by]

A New Portrait of Sir Wilfrid Lawson.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson. By W. B. Luk:. Simpkin, Marshall and Co.

XUM

workmen for being teetotal—for a teetotaler was an enemy of his country—Sir Wilfrid Lawson poured all the strong drink in his cellar into a pond. He was a Radical of the strong anti-monarchical breed. In Whitehaven, in 1830, at a public dinner at which his brother-in-law, Sir Jämes Graham, was present, he actually proposed as a toast, "May the heads of Don Miguel, King Ferdinand and Charles Capet be severed from their bodies and rolled in the dust, and the sooner the better."

Despite these truculent sentiments, Sir Wilfrid, senior, was a pious member of the Evangelical Union, the proprietor of the Christian News, the employer of a band of travelling evangelists, and he was buried at his death in 1867 in the Congregational Cemetery at Aspatria.

The present Sir Wilfrid was not sent to a public school.

The present Sir Wilfrid was not sent to a public school. His parents were more anxious that their children should be happy and good than that they should be learned or great. Mixing chiefly with the robust peasantry of Cumberland, he developed a strong, ardent and original character, completely emancipated from the social, political and religious prejudices of the class to which he belonged. Sir Wilfrid is fond of the Greek and Latin classics, and delights in pecry of all kinds. He was for many years master of a pack of fox hounds, and never forgot the lessons in the hunting field in the political arena. His one great mistake, however, was to imagine that the liquor traffic was a fox to be hunted by the temperance pack. He might as well have led a pack of beagles against a great grey grizzly bear of the Rocky Mountains.

Mr. Luke's book, although dealing with Sir Wilfrid Lawson chiefly, if not exclusively, as a public man, will find many readers. Those who know all he has to tell them will welcome so bright and pleasant a reminder of things they have seen and heard. Those to whom they are new cannot fail to profit by being told the story of the political career of one of the most upright, enthusiastic, and public-spirited men in English politics.

Empire-Building.

MR. H. C. MACILWAINE'S new novel "Fate the Fiddler" (Constable, 6s.) is a clever study of the men who have laid the foundations of our Empire in the lands beyond the sea. The scene of the story is the up-country districts of Australia, where the adventurous pioneer contends single-handed and unaided with the uncontrolled forces of Nature. Mr. MacIlwaine handles his subject with power and insight, but he would have improved his story and added to its popularity if he had reduced its bulk. He sketches the characters and careers of two men, each of whom spends his life in exploiting the latent resources of the Empire. They begin life together on the outskirts of civilisation. Their farm at Strathfield is one of those innumerable pickets pushed out in advance of the army of nineteenth century civilisation. The men, one practical, the other emotional in the Anglo-Saxon meaning of the term, separate and each pursue their own road to fortune. The practical man, of large ideas and determined will, uses gold as his instrument. He is a modified Australian Cecil Rhodes. The other prefers the hand-to-hand fight with Nature, the reclaiming of the waste lands. How these two men, types as they are of two sets of ideas working out to the same end, clash and co-operate forms the subject of the narrative. It is a story well worth reading by those who wish to discover how, in spite of natural and governmental obstacles, the British Empire has continued to expand and has reared states on the foundations laid by the early pioneers.

THE NEW WORLD ROUTE TO THE EAST

in

ai

at

fa or S T

pi

co

h

of th li

rı

in

to

in

tr

with continue of the continue d on ob ol

AND THE EL DORADO OF THE FUTURE.

No crisis in the Far East would be complete without a book from Mr. A. R. Colquboun. When last the affairs of China were occupying the attention of mankind he published "China in Transformation," and now that the Far East is once more an absorbing topic, we have his "The Overland to China" (Harper, 16s.). In this bulky volume he describes his journey across Siberia to Pekin, up the Yang-tse valley and southward to Tonkin. There is also a good deal of additional matter in the nature of historical retrospect. But the importance of the book is due to its emphasis of the manner in which the Siberian railway, when completed, will revolutionise the whole of our ideas concerning the Far East. At present China is regarded by most Europeans as a remote country on the confines of the earth. The immediate effect of the railway will be to make China our next-door neighbour, and this closeness will again compel us to seriously occupy our thoughts with the yellow problem.

LINKING BALTIC TO PACIFIC.

Since the discovery of the Cape route to the Indies by Vasco da Gama, almost since the discovery of America by Columbus, no human achievement has been so pregnant with consequences to mankind at large, Mr. Colquhoun declares, as the building of the great Siberian railway. It will be the future world route to the East, and it will open up the huge mineral wealth of Siberia, which promises to be the El Dorado of the next century. Already the railway is nearing completion, and 1902 will see the Baltic linked with the Pacific by a single line of steel rails. The Russian engineers have declared that in 1902 the last section of the railway, that connecting Port Arthur with Siberia, would be completed, and as their estimates have in no instance been exceeded, we may reasonably expect that they will not be so in this case. Immense exertions are being made to push forward the construction of the line. 150,000 labourers are employed, whose steady dogged endurance has made it possible to build 2,800 miles of railway in less than eight years, despite the fact that they have only been able to work six months out of the twelve. The Siberian railway will be over 4,000 miles, which is almost double the length of the Trans-American Continental Railway. But it has, on the other hand, been an extremely easy line to build. The maximum altitude to be overcome is only 3,608 feet, and this has been done by very gentle gradients. As far as Irkutsk no tunnel occurs, no gradient is steeper than 17½ in 1,000, no curve sharper than 270 yards radius. Bridges have been the chief difficulty, for Siberian waterways generally run from south to north. One spans the Obi at a height of 50 feet above the river at times of flood. It is 930 yards long, and there are two others each about 1,700 yards in length. The 1,429 existing wooden bridges are about to be replaced by stone and iron ones. The real difficulties in railway construction are now being grappled with in the section east of Lake Baikal, and these will test the skill of the Russian engineers, for the line is "a Russian railway, made by Russian engineers for Russia," and little foreign aid has been sought or accepted.

TO CHINA IN ELEVEN DAYS.

When the line is open the journey to China will be reduced by half. At the outset an average speed of only sixteen miles an hour is expected. But even at this rate a traveller from London to Port Arthur will be able to accomplish his journey within fifteen days. At prescat it occupies more than double that time. When the EAST URE. lete without en last the on of man-" and now g topic, we , 16s.). oss Siberia thward to onal matter importance er in which evolutionise as a remote immediate next-door npel us to problem.

Indies by of America been so large, Mr. it Siberian the East, of Siberia, xt century. d 1902 will igle line of red that in cting Port d as their l, we may this case. rward the are emmade it less than only been Siberian ost double mely easy ercome is ery gentle gradient rper than difficulty, to north. the river he 1,429 n railway a will be this rate t present Vhen the e section kill of the railway, le foreign

railway has settled down and the ballasting has been improved, trains will be able to run at twenty-five miles an hour. The journey from Paris to the Pacific coast will then only occupy eleven days, and to Shanghai, at most fifteen. At present these places cannot be reached in less than a month and a half. The expense also will be greatly reduced. The first-class fare by mail steamer to Shanghai is over £70. The overland journey from London to Shanghai, vid the Siberian railway, inclusive of food, will only cost £32 10s.

The mails and lighter articles of merchandise will probably also prefer this route to that by sea. It is doubtful, however, whether the railway will be able to compete successfully with the steamer as regards goods traffic. The present average rate is 32s, a ton, which is half the actual rates charged on the cheapest lines in the world for such a distance. Already a large portion of the line is being used for passenger traffic. As far as the junction for Tomsk, a train de luxe is run with libraries, gymnasium, bath rooms, lavatories and even a piano. From thence to Irkutsk ordinary trains are run. In 1893, 400,000 passengers travelled by the line, in addition to 200,000 Russian immigrants on their way to settle in the new land of promise. The cost of this immense undertaking is conjectural, but it is certain to exceed the estimated £38,000,000.

SIBERIA THE GOLDEN.

Mr. Colquhoun confirms the assertions which have been made that Siberia is destined to be the future treasure-house of the world. Politically and economically Siberia is the country of the future :-

All authorities agree as to the vast riches of the country, which, although at present chiefly potential, are in no wise chimerical. Siberia could without doubt achieve high commercial status as a corn-growing country alone, or as a cattle-raising land. Or, again, she might rely on her vast wealth in timber, on which future generations, in view of the rapid exhaustion of forest in other quarters of the globe, will be compelled to draw. As a gold-producing region, Siberia, in compelled to draw. As a gold-producing region, Siberia, in spite of ridiculously antiquated and ineff-ctive methods, already holds the fourth place in the world's production, while her stores of iron, coal, and copper would prove a no less valid title to a high place in the world's market. Any one of these resources would suffice. Siberia possesses them all. The treasury is there, and but awaits the golden key. This key is good communications. These cover all obstacles to Siberian progress that have ever been adduced-difficulties of transport, prohibitive that have ever been adduced—directules of transport, promotive wages, unscientific methods, deficient capital and organisation, official maladministration. With the iron road Siberia will be indeed conquered, and, with a steel yoke about her neck, compelled to yield her all—of grain and cattle, fus, fish and timber, porphyry and gold, coal, lead and mercury, silver, copper and iron—all the wealth she has—under guard of eternal snow and ice, so long held in trust for future centuries.

THE CITY OF THE PAST.

But of more immediate interest is Mr. Colquhoun's description of Pekin and the present condition of China. One's first view of the capital is, he says, the sight which most deeply impresses the mind of the visitor to the Celestial Kingdom. In its city walls, still guarded by bow and arrow and painted cannon, the Past itself confronts you. This is his description of his first view of Pekin :-

Before us, springing straight from the :and, tower the monuments of the conquering Manchu, so long that men are dwarfed by them to pygmies, so bread that three chariots might race abreast along their jungle-covered tops, and solid as the walls of Jericho before the trumpet-biast. In that pure air the crenelated paraperts sized out char-cut, distance in practically semiliained, and the cye can follow bastion after bastion, stretching away in a long line from which, like giant sentinels, the many-atoreyed towers, marking the nine great gates, look out across the plain. The walls themselves are of earth faced with huge bricks, and are built in an inverted slope from base to arapet. To the interstices cling many a bush and even trees, while from the gate towers frown tier upon tier of painted repre-sentations of cannon. As our cart clatters under the echoing arch of the vast gateway the sun sets, and in a dusty stream of camels, horsemen, and strange vehicles we enter the Middle Ages.

The following bird's-eye view of Pekin will give the reader some idea of the construction of the city towards which the eyes of the civilised world are at present

Once inside the gates we find ourselves in a Tartar camp, with a wilderness of mushroom houses for tents. The city occupies a square, facing the cardinal points. Each wall is three miles squire, facing the cardinal points. Each wall is three miles long, and contains two gates a mile from each corner, and consequently from each other. In the south wall a third gate in the very centre corresponds to the main gate of the imperial palace within. From each gate-tower a vast thoroughfare runs straight through the city to the opposite gate, making four main thoroughfares in all—running east and west, north and south. The city is thus divided into nine squares, each facing the cardinal points—an arrangement which much facilitates the finding of one's gate. Reachly narallel with these main arteries run roads of way. Roughly parallel with these main arteries run roads of lesser dimensions, the intervals being filled up by houses, rubbish heaps, and an infinity of tortuous lanes and alleys. Attached to the south side of the city proper, or "Tartar City," is the "Chinese City," a large walled in suburb, in which are situated most of the shops, restaurants, and theatres.

Mr. Colquhoun again urges the British Government to act with energy. He dismisses the paper guarantees in regard to the Yang-tze Valley as so much waste paper, unless made good by action, perhaps by force. Mr. Colquhoun is no believer in the Open-Door policy, and is all in favour of concentrating our attention and energies upon the preservation of the Valley of the Yang-tze. To worry the central government, he believes to be useless and simply a waste of time and opportunity, which had much better be expended in making friends of the great viceroys of the valley provinces. His policy is sum-marised in the following sentence: "Britain would find marised in the following scattence: "Britain would find it better to have an open door to fifty millions of prosperous people than to four hundred millions of beggars clothed in sackcloth." But, we lament, Britain is the only great Power without a definite policy in the Far East. The key of the Yang-tze basin is not in China but in London. He warns us that unless something is done, and that speedily, we may find ourselves squeezed out by the pressure of Russia from the north and of France from the south. France, unlike Lord Salisbury, regards missionaries, not as a nuisance, but as a most valuable assistance in her Chinese policy:

The blood of the martyrs is in China the seed of French aggrandisement. France uses the missionaries and the native aggrandisement. France uses the missionaries and the native Christians as agents-provocateurs, and outrages and martyrdoms are her political harvest. A. If we realise the fact that France claims jurisdiction over more than one hundred thousand converts in the province of Szechuan alone, besides large numbers in Hunan, Houan, Hupeh, and in other of the Yangtze provinces—every individual amount being as the grain of an explosive which is able under skilful handling to burst China in pieces—if we realise this, we shall see that the peaceful development of this great central zone of China will never be accomplished by a merely lukewarm policy on the part of Grant Heitzin.

Mr. Colquhoun's book is a valuable addition to existing literature on the Far Eastern Question. His deductions from the facts he records may not always be correct-his fears sometimes warp his judgment—but at any rate he does add to our knowledge of the essential facts of the whose existence is a disgrace to Christian Europe, would succumb to the first blow from outside. The jealousy of the Powers is responsible for the fact that this blow has not already been delivered."

There are several other articles, of which the most interesting are Dr. Dessau's "Telegraphy Without Wires," and an able review of Tolstoi's last novel, which has just been translated into German.

Nord und Süd.

I. Nover, a citizen of Mainz, makes the occasion of the celebration of the 500th birthday of Gutenberg by that city the text of a very long article upon the history of printing and Gutenberg's life. The article is somewhat long drawn out, going into rather minute details concerning the great inventor's private life. The whole tone of the essay is summed up in the words: Columbus opened to us a new part of the earth; Gutenberg unlocked the whole world.

th: whole world.

"An Optimist" continues and brings to an end the article entitled "To-day." He makes much of the unity of Europe, and, speaking of the Americans, he gives his opinion—which they will hardly relish—namely, that the Yankees really belong to the same family (the European); they simply play the part of younger sons, who are called upon to send the treasures which are discovered over there to the Motherland.

Monatsschrift für Stadt und Land.

For English readers the most instructive article in the June number is that by the editor, Ulrich von Hassell. In it he tells of German interests over seas, and advocates the building of a strong fleet-in fact, at the present moment the acquisition of a powerful fleet is probably the most popular movement in Germany. They have lately formed a Navy League there, which is already beginning to make itself felt. Von Hassell gives many statistical details concerning the emigration to German colonies and to other lands. It appears, however, that just now, although the population of Germany is increasing at the rate of 800,000 a year, the emigrants only numbered 24,000 in 1897, as against 166,000 in 1885 and previous years. It is logical to assume, he says, that when the conditions over sea are better the flow will rapidly increase. Greater Germany is no longer a dream-it is a reality-and to bind it together and to make it one great Empire a strong fleet is imperative. Never must the emigrants be allowed to follow the example of their fifteen million predecessors in the United States, who have lost their language, their nationality, and severed all connection with the mother state. No; these future emigrants must retain their language, their Bible, and their culture, not to mention their connection with the Fatherland. Not only this, but any machinery or materials that they themselves cannot make or supply must be obtained from Germany. The colonies at present possessed are not yet great, but will be so in time. Of the various statistics given those relating to German trade in Africa will be the most surprising to Englishmen. It appears that in Morocco there are no fewer than sixteen German merchant houses established, one bank, two factories, and several grape fields. In Tunis the numbers are fewer, but still consider-At the Cape the Germans have followed the example of their compatriots in America, and become naturalised subjects of the ruling Power. In the Transvaal, however, German interests are large. The French capital sunk in the mines is about 1,500,000,000 marks, the German 730,000,000 marks, and the English only 600,000,000 marks. This fact was probably more responsible for the safety of the Johannesburg mines than anything else. The other figures are most interesting and instructive.

Ueber Land und Meer.

Pa

fou

a

is pal

aut

mi

wh

to :

wit

the

Mr

len

ant

dic

to

Bu

pee

Lul

edi

to tal

ma

Cre

with tion

vaa

Ow

lost

It

phil

who

Thi

the

4 S

son

COL

Par

the last

it is sible

to 1

any kno

indo pion King

The

rev

fami

us.

page

thing The

* Si

B. Rauchenegger writes on the Ober Ammergan Passion play, but he does not give any information as to the way in which the drama is acted this year. Most of the article is taken up with an account of the origin of the play, and with short descriptions of the players. From the way in which he writes on the subject, it would not appear that Mr. Rauchenegger has been at any of the performances this year. The article is chiefly interesting because of the photographs which it contains. Several of these are of the new players, and especially good is that representing Christus lying in the arms of Mary after the descent from the Cross. There are some very clever photographs of the aquarium at Neapel, accompanying an article by Dr. J. Soboota. A short mention is made of the fact that the mails are now to be conveyed through the towns in automobiles, and a photograph of the exceedingly neat conveyance used is given.

graph of the exceedingly neat conveyance used is given.

The Paris Exhibition is dealt with at some length in two articles. Dr. Stekan Epstein continues his papers on the subject, treating this time with the exhibits in the Palais des Beaux Arts and the Asiatic Russian section. These articles were evidently written before the Great Palais was open to the public, and deals almost entirely with the German works of art, many good reproductions of sculpture and statuary being given. In his second article he gives an account of the exhibits in the Siberian building, and illustrates it with many excellent photographs of that striking building and its contents. The second article is by Albert Pfister, and gives an account of the naval exhibit of Germany. This exhibit is so large that an ignorant stranger would imagine that Germany was the greatest sea power in Europe. Some of the models are reproduced. These, together with the usual notes and novelettes, make up a very bright number.

Die Grenzboten.

The first place in the June number is given to an article by Eberhard Kraus, entitled "Balten, Finnlander, Buren." It is a political comparison between the inhabitants of the Baltic provinces, the Finns and the Boers. The author is evidently a strong anti-Russian, but his sympathies cannot be said to lie with the Government of Great Britain. Speaking of India, he says that those who so earnestly desire to see Russia supplant England in that country are ill advised, as they are simply praying for Beelzebub to turn out the Devil! He says, however, that the treatment of the Boers by the English is quite mild and "Quakerish" compared to the "justice" meted out to the Finns and the Baltic States. Of the Boers he does not say much, but mentions that should the Chamberlain policy win and the Republics lose their independence on the excuse of their having declared war, they do not need to despair of regaining their freedom. Once before they have thrown off the British yoke, and their nationality stretches strong, deeply-buried roots all over South Africa. At any rate he says their beliefs and. their language cannot be taken away from them.

"THE Tyranny of the Drink Traffic" forms the subject of a series of papers by notable temperance persons and others which begins in the July Young Man. Mr. Joha A. Steuart, author of "Wine on the Lees," urges temperance people to adopt the tactics of their opponents and make themselves powerful at the polls.

Some Notable Books of the Month.

LUKE'S LIFE OF SIR WILFRID LAWSON.

THIS book is a pleasantly written record of the life of the most genial, witty, and consistent politician in Parliament. Wilfrid Lawson has found in Mr. Luke a biographer who is in hearty sympathy with the author of the Permissive Bill, but who is not, I regret to say, in sympathy with Sir Wilfrid Lawson's hatred of the present war. Mr. Luke does violence to his own anti - Boer prejudices in order not to injure his hero. But the cloven foot peeps out despite his efforts. Mr. Luke, in the next edition, will do well to correct the mistake which he makes when he credits or debits Sir Owen Lanyon with the annexation of the Transvaal. It was Sir Owen Lanyon who lost the Transvaal. It was Sir Theophilus Shepstone who annexed it. This, however, by the way.

bly more

urg mines interesting

Ammergau

ation as to e origin of e players.

t, it would

at any of chiefly in-contains.

especially

e arms of

are some

Neapel, A short

now to be d a photo-

is given.

length in papers on its in the n section.

the Great

t entirely oductions

is second.

Siberian

otographs

ne second

int of the large that nany was

e models

notes and an article

r, Buren." bitants of

ers. The but his vernment

hat those England

y praying

however,

h is quite

e" meted

Boers he

ne Cham-

eir indeered war,

freedom.

oke, and roots all

e subject

sons and

Mr. John

s temper-

ents and eliefs and.

Most of

Sir Wilfrid Lawson has been so conspicuous in Parliament and on the platform for the last forty years that it is almost impossible for Mr. Luke to tell the public anything it did not know about the indomitable champion of the United Kingdom Alliance. These chapters revive memories familiar to most of us. In the opening pages of the book, however, he tells us some interesting things not generally known about Sir Wilfrid's ancestry. There was, it seems, a Sir Wilfrid Lawson, whose son was a groom of the bedchamber to George I., and who was a man of "a niceness of conscience not often to be met with." He proved this by leaving £600 to the Government in his will to make up for the undertaxing of his estate. He also gave up his unappropriated tithes, which he thought he ought not to withhold from the Church. The present Sir Wilfrid, although not in the line of direct descent, is a man of the same niceness. Mr. Luke tells us that on one occasion his steward reported the renewal of a farmer's lease for ten years at an increase of £80 per annum in the rental. "How comes it that the farm is worth more?" asked Sir Wilfrid. "The tenant," said his steward, "has improved his holding so much that it is well worth the extra rent." "Then," said Sir Wilfrid, "if the improvement is dueto his industry, I have no right to the increased rent." And there and then the extra £80 per annum was handed over to the farmer.

When the Lawson estates passed to the Wyberghs at the beginning of this century, the new owner appearsto have taken over not only the name, but the character of the Lawsons.
The first Wybergh
Lawson was noted for his gaiety of heart, which nothing could subdue. He was also a stout Radical, and an ardent champion of Queen Caroline. His son, the present Sir Wilfrid's father, was one of the first teetotalers in England. At a time when employers occasionally dismissed their

W. Reed, 443, Strand.

Hilfrid Lawson

Photo by]

A New Portrait of Sir Wilfrid Lawson.

* Sir Wilfrid Lawson. By W. B. Luk:. Simpkin, Marshall and Co.

workmen for being teetotal—for a teetotaler was an enemy of his country—Sir Wilfrid Lawson poured all the strong drink in his cellar into a pond. He was a Radical of the strong anti-monarchical breed. In Whitehaven, in 1830, at a public dinner at which his brother-in-law, Sir James Graham, was present, he actually proposed as a toast, "May the heads of Don Miguel, King Ferdinand and Charles Capet be severed from their bodies and rolled in the dust, and the sooner the better."

Despite these truculent sentiments, Sir Wilfrid, senior, was a pious member of the Evangelical Union, the proprietor of the Christian News, the employer of a band of travelling evangelists, and he was buried at his death in 1867 in the Congregational Cemetery at Aspatria.

The present Sir Wilfrid was not sent to a public school. His parents were more anxious that their children should be happy and good than that they should be learned or great. Mixing chiefly with the robust peasantry of Cumberland, he developed a strong, ardent and original character, completely emancipated from the social, political and religious prejudices of the class to which he belonged. Sir Wilfrid is fond of the Greek and Latin classics, and delights in peerry of all kinds. He was for many years master of a pack of fox hounds, and never forgot the lessons in the hunting field in the political arena. His one great mistake, however, was to imagine that the liquor traffic was a fox to be hunted by the temperance pack. He might as well have led a pack of beagles against a great grey grizzly bear of the Rocky Mountains.

Mr. Luke's book, although dealing with Sir Wilfrid Lawson chiefly, if not exclusively, as a public man, will find many readers. Those who know all he has to tell them will welcome so bright and pleasant a reminder of things they have seen and heard. Those to whom they are new cannot fail to profit by being told the story of the political career of one of the most upright, enthusiastic, and public-spirited men in English politics.

Empire-Building.

MR. H. C. MACILWAINE'S new novel "Fate the Fiddler" (Constable, 6s.) is a clever study of the men who have laid the foundations of our Empire in the lands beyond the sea. The scene of the story is the up-country districts of Australia, where the adventurous pioneer contends single-handed and unaided with the uncontrolled forces of Nature. Mr. MacIlwaine handles his subject with power and insight, but he would have improved his story and added to its popularity if he had reduced its bulk. He sketches the characters and careers of two men, each of whom spends his life in exploiting the latent resources of the Empire. They begin life together on the outskirts of civilisation. Their farm at Strathfield is one of those innumerable pickets pushed out in advance of the army of nineteenth century civilisation. one practical, the other emotional in the Anglo-Saxon meaning of the term, separate and each pursue their own road to fortune. The practical man, of large ideas and determined will, uses gold as his instrument. He is a modified Australian Cecil Rhodes. The other prefers the hand-to-hand fight with Nature, the reclaiming of the waste lands. How these two men, types as they are of two sets of ideas working out to the same end, clash and co-operate forms the subject of the narrative. It is a story well worth reading by those who wish to discover how, in spite of natural and governmental obstacles, the British Empire has continued to expand and has reared states on the foundations laid by the early pioneers.

THE NEW WORLD ROUTE TO THE EAST AND THE EL DORADO OF THE FUTURE.

No crisis in the Far East would be complete without a book from Mr. A. R. Colquboun. When last the affairs of China were occupying the attention of mankind he published "China in Transformation," and now that the Far East is once more an absorbing topic, we have his "The Overland to China" (Harper, 16s.). In this bulky volume he describes his journey across Siberia to Pekin, up the Yang-tse valley and southward to Tonkin. There is also a good deal of additional matter in the nature of historical retrospect. But the importance of the book is due to its emphasis of the manner in which the Siberian railway, when completed, will revolutionise the whole of our ideas concerning the Far East. At present China is regarded by most Europeans as a remote country on the confines of the earth. The immediate effect of the railway will be to make China our next-door neighbour, and this closeness will again compel us to seriously occupy our thoughts with the yellow problem.

LINKING BALTIC TO PACIFIC.

Since the discovery of the Cape route to the Indies by Vasco da Gama, almost since the discovery of America by Columbus, no human achievement has been so pregnant with consequences to mankind at large, Mr. Colquhoun declares, as the building of the great Siberian railway. It will be the future world route to the East, and it will open up the huge mineral wealth of Siberia, which promises to be the El Dorado of the next century. Already the railway is nearing completion, and 1902 will see the Baltic linked with the Pacific by a single line of steel rails. The Russian engineers have declared that in 1902 the last section of the railway, that connecting Port Arthur with Siberia, would be completed, and as their estimates have in no instance been exceeded, we may reasonably expect that they will not be so in this case. Immense exertions are being made to push forward the construction of the line. 150,000 labourers are employed, whose steady dogged endurance has made it possible to build 2,800 miles of railway in less than eight years, despite the fact that they have only been able to work six months out of the twelve. The Siberian railway will be over 4,000 miles, which is almost double the length of the Trans-American Continental Railway. But it has, on the other hand, been an extremely easy line to build. The maximum altitude to be overcome is only 3,608 feet, and this has been done by very gentle gradients. As far as Irkutsk no tunnel occurs, no gradient is steeper than 17½ in 1,000, no curve sharper than 270 yards radius. Bridges have been the chief difficulty, for Siberian waterways generally run from south to north. One spans the Obi at a height of 50 feet above the river at times of flood. It is 930 yards long, and there are two others each about 1,700 yards in length. The 1,429 existing wooden bridges are about to be replaced by stone and iron ones. The real difficulties in railway construction are now being grappled with in the section east of Lake Baikal, and these will test the skill of the Russian engineers, for the line is "a Russian railway, made by Russian engineers for Russia," and little foreign aid has been sought or accepted.

TO CHINA IN ELEVEN DAYS.

When the line is open the journey to China will be reduced by half. At the outset an average speed of only sixteen miles an hour is expected. But even at this rate a traveller from London to Port Arthur will be able to accomplish his journey within fifteen days. At present it occupies more than double that time. When the railway improv an hou will th at mos reache expens fare by overlar Siberia The n probab doubtfu compet traffic. half th the wo of the l the jus librarie a pian run. 1 in add

> Mr. been r treasur Siberia to settl

immen

exceed

which, chimeri commer cattle-ra wealth rapid ex compell spite of holds th of iron. high pl would there, commu that hav wages, official 1 indeed compell timber, and iro and ice,

But description of the descripti monume dwarfed race ab walls of crenelat annihila

railway has settled down and the ballasting has been improved, trains will be able to run at twenty-five miles an hour. The journey from Paris to the Pacific coast without will then only occupy eleven days, and to Shanghai, ast the at most fifteen. At present these places cannot be reached in less than a month and a half. The expense also will be greatly reduced. The first-class f mannd now pic, we fare by mail steamer to Shanghai is over £70. The overland journey from London to Shanghai, vid the Siberia Siberian railway, inclusive of food, will only cost £32 10s. ard to The mails and lighter articles of merchandise will matter probably also prefer this route to that by sea. It is ortance doubtful, however, whether the railway will be able to which compete successfully with the steamer as regards goods tionise traffic. The present average rate is 32s. a ton, which is st. At half the actual rates charged on the cheapest lines in the world for such a distance. Already a large portion remote nediate of the line is being used for passenger traffic. As far as ct-door the junction for Tomsk, a train de luxe is run with us to libraries, gymnasium, bath rooms, lavatories and even a piano. From thence to Irkutsk ordinary trains are run. In 1899, 400,000 passengers travelled by the line, in addition to 200,000 Russian immigrants on their way to settle in the new land of promise. The cost of this lies by merica immense undertaking is conjectural, but it is certain to exceed the estimated £38,000,000.

ST

lem.

en so

e, Mr.

berian

East,

iberia,

entury

02 will line of that in g Port

their

e may case.

ard the e em-ade it than

been

berian

double

ilway.

y easy

ome is gentle adient

than iculty,

north.

e river

re two

ed by ailway

ection

of the

ilway,

oreign

rill be

f only

s rate

ble to resent

n the

SIBERIA THE GOLDEN.

Mr. Colquhoun confirms the assertions which have been made that Siberia is destined to be the future treasure-house of the world. Politically and economically Siberia is the country of the future :-

All authorities agree as to the vast riches of the country, which, although at present chiefly potential, are in no wise chimerical. Siberia could without doubt achieve high commercial status as a corn-growing country alone, or as a cattle-raising land. Or, again, she might rely on her vast wealth in timber, on which future generations, in view of the rapid exhaustion of forest in other quarters of the globe, will be compelled to draw. As a gold-producing region, Siberia, in spite of ridiculously antiquated and ineffective methods, already holds the fourth place in the world's production, while her stores of iron, coal, and copper would prove a no less valid title to a high place in the world's market. Any one of these resources would suffice. Siberia possesses them all. The treasury is there, and but awaits the golden key. This key is good communications. These cover all obstacles to Siberian progress. that have ever been adduced-difficulties of transport, prohibitive wages, unscientific methods, deficient capital and organisation, official maladministration. With the iron road Siberia will be indeed conquered, and, with a steel yoke about her neck, compelled to yield her all—of grain and cattle, furs, fish and the beauty of the property of the prop timber, porphyry and gold, coal, lead and mercury, silver, copper and iron—all the wealth she has—under guard of eternal snow and ice, so long held in trust for future centuries.

THE CITY OF THE PAST.

But of more immediate interest is Mr. Colquhoun's description of Pekin and the present condition of China. One's first view of the capital is, he says, the sight which most deeply impresses the mind of the visitor to the Celestial Kingdom. In its city walls, still guarded by bow and arrow and painted cannon, the Past itself confronts you. This is his description of his first view of

Before us, springing straight from the sand, tower the monuments of the conquering Manchu, so lofty that men are dwarfed by them to pygmies, so broad that three chariots might race abreast along their jungle-covered tops, and solid as the walls of Jericho before the trumpet-blast. In that pure air the crenelated parapets stand out clear-cut, distance is practically annihilated, and the eye can follow bastion after bastion, stretching away in a long line from which, like giant sentinels, the many-storeyed towers, marking the nine great gates, look out across the plain. The walls themselves are of earth faced with huge bricks, and are built in an inverted slope from base to parapet. To the interstices cling many a bush and even trees, while from the gate towers frown tier upon tier of painted representations of cannon. As our cart clatters under the echoing arch of the vast gateway the sun sets, and in a dusty stream of camels, horsemen, and strange vehicles we enter the Middle Ages.

The following bird's-eye view of Pekin will give the reader some idea of the construction of the city towards which the eyes of the civilised world are at present

Once inside the gates we find ourselves in a Tartar camp, with a wilderness of mushroom houses for tents. The city occupies a square, facing the cardinal points. Each wall is three miles long, and contains two gates a mile from each corner, and consequently from each other. In the south wall a third gate in the very centre corresponds to the main gate of the imperial palace within. From each gate-tower a vast thoroughfare runs straight through the city to the opposite gate, making four main thorough-fares in all-running east and west, north and south. The city is thus divided into nine squares, each facing the cardinal points—an arrangement which much facilitates the finding of one's way. Roughly parallel with these main arteries run roads of lesser dimensions, the intervals being filled up by houses, rubbish heaps, and an infinity of tortuous lanes and alleys. Attached to the south side of the city proper, or "Tartar City," is the "Chinese City," a large walled-in suburb, in which are situated most of the shops, restaurants, and theatres.

Mr. Colquhoun again urges the British Government to act with energy. He dismisses the paper guarantees in regard to the Yang-tze Valley as so much waste paper, unless made good by action, perhaps by force. Mr. Colquhoun is no believer in the Open-Door policy, and is all in favour of concentrating our attention and energies upon the preservation of the Valley of the Yang-tze. To worry the central government, he believes to be useless, and simply a waste of time and opportunity, which had much better be expended in making friends of the great viceroys of the valley provinces. His policy is summarised in the following sentence: "Britain would find it better to have an open door to fifty millions of prosperous people than to four hundred millions of beggars clothed in sackcloth." But, we lament, Britain is the only great Power without a definite policy in the Far East. The key of the Yang-tze basin is not in China but in London. He warns us that unless something is done, and that speedily, we may find ourselves squeezed out by the pressure of Russia from the north and of France from the south. France, unlike Lord Salisbury, regards missionaries, not as a nuisance, but as a most valuable assistance in her Chinese policy :-

The blood of the martyrs is in China the seed of French grandisement. France uses the missionaries and the native Christians as agents-provocateurs, and outrages and martyrdoms are her political harvest. . . . If we realise the fact that France claims jurisdiction over more than one hundred thousand converts in the province of Szachuan alone, besides large numbers in Hunan, Houan, Hupeh, and in other of the Yangtze provinces—every individual amount being as the grain of an explosive which is able under skilful handling to burst China in pieces-if we realise this, we shall see that the peaceful development of this great central zone of China will never be accomplished by a merely lukewarm policy on the part of Great

Mr. Colquhoun's book is a valuable addition to existing literature on the Far Eastern Question. His deductions from the facts he records may not always be correcthis fears sometimes warp his judgment-but at any rate he does add to our knowledge of the essential facts of the present situation.

WHY WE ARE A PREDOMINANT RACE.

THE PROBLEM OF THE ANGLO-SAXON.

MR. ALINE GORREN attempts, in a thoughtful little volume entitled "Anglo-Saxons and Others" (David Nutt), to solve the problem of Anglo-Saxon predominance. What is the explanation of the enviable position which the English-speaking peoples at the present moment occupy? Mr. Gorren's answer, in brief, is that the Anglo-Saxon is, both in the main motive of his economic life and in the various ways in which he attains its fulfilment, the representative of the strongest present drift of the world:—

The Anglo-Saxons are the only peoples who can be said to give every proof of a perfect accord with the characteristic conditions of modern life. They are in absolute harmony with their environment as it is constituted by these conditions. . . . The democratic organisation of modern society fits, when applied to the Anglo-Saxon, like a garment made to order. It often sits elsewhere, like ready-made clothing which has no reference to the contour of the man inside.

The English-speaking peoples, Mr. Gorren believes, are now precisely in the mood in which all the great people of the past have found themselves when they pressed triumphantly the imprint of their thoughts, their customs, their ideals, on the rest of civilisation, and changed the political surface of the globe. The Anglo-Saxons have become conscious of the fact that they are a great people. And they believe they are a great people because they are under a special Dispensation. They believe they have a covenant with the Deity, and all the privileges, and also all the obligations that go with the position; all this favour having come to them through their merits of good principle and acceptable conduct. Mr. Gorren does not accept this explanation. But he points out that the illusion constitutes an immense reservoir of force, and that the very exaggeration of the part that the English-speaking peoples are destined to play in the world aids them to fulfil their rôle.

THE STANDARD OF COMFORT.

The secret of our success as a people, from Mr. Gorren's point of view, is not moral but material. "The original factor in our ascent to a predominant position in the world," he says, "has been that keen and immediate feeling for physical comfort which results in what Professor Marshall calls a 'Standard of Comfort." It is bodily comfort, not mental culture, which has been the driving force that has forced the Anglo-Saxon peoples to the forefront of civilisation. At the same time we are in the best position to supply the demand which the object lesson of our national prosperity has created. For the Anglo-Saxons are not creators of luxuries, by special aptitude, for the fastidious tastes of the few; they are purveyors of common articles for the many. It is in this fashion that Mr. Gorren arrives at his solution of the problem of the Anglo-Saxon:—

In the intentness of high and low, rich and poor, educated and uneducated, on physical interests and material possessions, the Anglo-Saxon has come by his opportunity. And in the consequent fight for the markets of the world he is apt to be triumphant because he has supreme gifts as an inventor of material things which appeal to the average man of democracy, and because he produces a great number of great men of the economic type.

UNCONSCIOUS HYPOCRITES.

The moral make-up of the Anglo-Saxon is undoubtedly one of the most potent elements which contribute to his success, but at the same time it is the despair of the foreigner. The success with which we drive our selfinterest and our ethical standards in double harness, Mr. Gorren remarks, is one of the things which mark us off from our kind. But the Anglo-Saxon is supremely unconscious of this duality in his nature. The difference between his professions and his actions which shocks outsiders is invisible to him. He does not follow the movements of his mind and conduct very closely, nor is he ever very clear about them:—

The just conclusion is that there is a psychological difference between English-speaking men and others, which makes that which would be hypocrisy in others not hypocrisy in them. They are sentimentalists, and, as sentimentalists, not the best analysts of their motives and impulses.

OUR RELIGIOUS-COMMERCIAL INSTINCT.

The Anglo-Saxon is endowed with the religious-commercial instinct. He not only wishes to have the reputation of being good, but is also determined to have the best of a bargain. An Anglo-Saxon is a missionary with half his breath and an excellent commercial specu-lator with the other half. He is a practical man and a sentimentalist in one. He has a perfect genius for making facts of physical and material significance look as if they were facts of spiritual import. But even Mr. Gorren, whose principal aim in writing this treatise is to demonstrate the essentially material foundation of Anglo-Saxon greatness, is compelled to admit that the Anglo-Saxon is able to arrive at moral acquisitions by steadily following his material impulses. In working for the Standard of Comfort, men, by a round-about road, become altruists, and by a whole-hearted belief in the Gospel of Action they become fearless, self-reliant and truthful. Even an Anglo-Saxon's defects add to his strength. A Frenchman doubts and is lost. An Anglo-Saxon does not debate, is by no means doubtful of his own virtue, and never philosophises, not finding it easy work. He is invulnerable, and everything goes down before him. He has little critical faculty, his brain is usually in a fog, but he works and he fights without ceasing, and he succeeds. He succeeds because he never questions that he is right all through, and he takes most of his proof on faith:

That trait of his which is called hypocrisy, but which is not hypocrisy, only a confusion of ideas and feelings, is the direct cause of one-half of his impressiveness. The day on which he loses it will be the day of disaster, however much the loss may raise him in the estimation of philosophers.

SAXON v. LATIN CIVILISATION.

The most momentous question which confronts the world to-day is whether Latin or Saxon civilisation will eventually predominate. Latin civilisation, Mr. Gorren points out, seeks to secure mental ease; Saxon, comfort for the body. The attempt to graft Anglo-Saxon upon Latin civilisation has so far only produced internal cataclysms. Something of the same demoralisation is perceptible in the Latin countries as that which disintegrates a savage people in contact with a civilised one. But Mr. Gorren is not one who believes that the last word has been spoken in the evolution of the Anglo-Saxon. What he has achieved up to the present is not the higher civilisation as we have always understood the higher civilisation. The Anglo-Saxon is young; and it is impossible to predict what his future will be. Will he is impossible to predict what his future will be. remain a fixed type, will he develop, as older peoples have done, his mental activity at the expense of his physical, or will he found a new and higher civilisation such as the world has never yet seen? Mr. Gorren does not answer these questions, although he apparently inclines to the second alternative.

MR. a delig and ha For m bird-n metroj novel advantall bo photog the ha the les photog

both o

Son

graph

to to

Judgi

succe

the ur

hours

sitter

for in obtain hen. moor comfo expos After gettir after bird. steps nest Mr. piece an o forwa utmo only was exha indig

good away, or eve enoug either with t

-chara

is a show

W

It is eggs, feather important appropriately return

arness, Mr. nark us off supremely difference ch shocks follow the difference makes that y in them. ot the best ely, nor is religioushave the d to have nissionary al specuan and a enius for nce look even Mr. tise is to ation of mit that uisitions working nd-about ed belief lf-reliant add to ost. An doubtful inding it ng goes is brain without he never ich is not ne direct which he loss may es most

nts the ion will Gorren comfort n upon nternal ation is ch dised one. he last

Anglot is not ood the and it Vill he s have ysical,

s have ysical, as the inswer to the THE ART OF BIRD-NESTING

WITH FIELD GLASS AND CAMERA.

MR. OLIVER G. PIKE'S "In Birdland" (F. Unwin) is a delightful little book which introduces us to the homes and haunts of the feathered inhabitants of the countryside. For many years Mr. Pike has been diligently engaged in bird-nesting in the immediate neighbourhood of the metropolis. His bird-nesting, however, is of a new and novel description, and possesses many and obvious advantages over the older and cruder form with which all boys are familiar. Mr. Pike does not rob nests, he photographs them. He thus obtains a faithful record of the habits of his feathered friends while putting them to the least possible inconvenience. There are eighty-three photographs from nature in the volume, showing nests both crude and dainty, curious and delicate.

PATIENCE, PATIENCE, PATIENCE.

Some birds have a great repugnance to being photographed, and many ingenious dodges have to be resorted to to obtain a snap-shot. The first requisite is patience. Judging from Mr. Pike's experience the man who would succeed as a photographer of birds must be possessed of the unfailing patience of the patriarch Job. We read of the unfailing patience of the patriarch Job. hours of silent waiting for the return of the hoped-for sitter to its cleverly-concealed nest. On one occasion, for instance, Mr. Pike waited eight hours in hopes of obtaining a photograph of that cautious bird, the moorhen. Even then he was doomed to disappointment. The moor-hen eventually returned, it is true, and settled comfortably on her nest, but just at the moment of exposure she rose and of course the picture was useless. After eight or ten vain attempts Mr. Pike did succeed in getting a snap-shot at a moor-hen in the act of swimming after very cautiously stalking to within three yards of the bird. Another bird of the same species took drastic steps to prevent prying into her domestic affairs. The nest began to get visibly smaller every evening, and Mr. Pike found that it was being transferred piece by piece across the stream to an inaccessible niche beneath an overhanging branch. The sparrow is so bold and forward a bird that it is surprising to hear that he has the utmost objection to having his photograph taken. It was only after a long chase of half an hour that Mr. Pike was able to get a snap-shot. The young bird was too exhausted to fly further, but even then he voiced his indignation by violent twittering.

The following hints on the photographing of shy birds show the devices it is necessary to resort to in this branch of photography :-

When desiring to photograph a shy bird in its nest, it is a good plan to place a heap of dried grass or rubbish some distance away, and then to move this nearer at intervals of several hours, or even days in the case of some birds, and then, when near enough, to hide the camera underneath, the operator being either concealed with the camera or remaining some distance off with the pneumatic-tube connection.

SCENES FROM BIRD-LIFE.

Mr. Pike, in the course of his rambles, has collected much interesting information as to the habits and characteristics of all sorts and conditions of birds. This is a glimpse into the wood-pigeon's nest:—

It is a pleasant sight to watch the hen sitting on the two white eggs, with her mate on a branch close at hand, erecting his feathers and puffing himself out as though he were the most important personage in Bird-land. Every now and then he approaches the nest, bows many times to his mate, then uxoriously rubs his little head on her wings and back. The fond hen returns this sweet affection by shaking her wings and tail, bending her head low and cooing softly, coo-coo-coo, coo-coo, coo-coo, coo-coo; then her mate answers, beginning in a slightly higher pitch, and continuing bowing to her; and so this charmingly suggestive little love scene goes on until the hen leaves the nest and her mate takes his place on her eggs in her absence.

The carrion-crow, despite its popular reputation and appearance, is the possessor of many virtues. Mr. Pike records a remarkable instance of devotion. A labourer had shot one of two crows and hung up the body above his garden as a warning to all offenders:—

The one remaining seemed very much distressed at seeing her mate thus hung up, and she sat on one of the neighbouring trees, ever and anon giving out a dismal kaarr; after a day or two had passed she disappeared, and while walking in the fields I saw her lying dead under the tree on which she had mourned the loss of her mate! There was not a mark on her body of any violence; the poor bird in her sorrow had evidently refused to eat. On her gizzard being opened and examined, there was not a grain of food to be seen, nor did it look as if there had been for some time.

Bird-life is by no means without its tragedies, but they are not all due to man's inhumanity. The following is a pathetic little incident of which Mr. Pike was an eyewitness:—

A tragedy occurred to a family of garden-warblers last spring. They had as usual, built in a gooseberry bush; the five eggs were laid, they were successfully hatched, and the young birds became clothed in feathers. One Sunday morning the mother, while chasing an insect among the thorns of the trees, had one of these pierce her throat. This faithful little parent just managed to get back to her nest to give her young the food collected at the cost of life, and then she fell dead and lay on the gooseberry branches beneath.

THE SEAMY SIDE OF BIRD-LAND.

In Birdland appearances are by no means always an accurate gauge of character. The little blue titmouse looks inoffensive enough, but close observation reveals some exceedingly disagreeable traits in his character:—

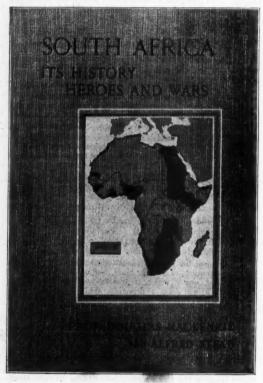

In a tree near our garden someone once set a trap baited with fat for the purpose of catching birds, and in due time two blue titmice came, one of which at once flew to the bait, with the result that it was soon a prisoner. While this captive was struggling to get free the other titmouse uttered a cry, not of grief but of exultation; it then pounced on to its companion and vigorously pecked at his head until it was actually able to eat the brains of the trapped bird; and then, as though that were not enough, it also ate the fat which was the cause of the other's disaster. The trap having already closed, this little criminal or bird-murderer went off free.

Nor is this a solitary instance, as the skeletons of birds found lying in the fields with a hole drilled in their skulls afford ample evidence. Robins, too, are of a most pugnacious disposition. They fiercely resent the intrusion of any of their own species into the garden which they have selected as their peculiar sphere of influence. As a rule one robin will have the "run" of six suburban gardens. Any invasion is promptly followed by a battle-royal, and so persistently do they fight that sometimes the victor will not leave until the other is dead. The song of the thrush, Mr. Pike considers to be equal, or nearly equal, to that of the nightingale. He also mentions the fact that during very dry summers, when their usual food, such as worms and snails, is hard to find, thrushes will eat an immense amount of fruit, principally gooseberries and currants. The former they pierce with their beaks and then suck out the contents, leaving the empty skin hanging on the bush. So voracious is their appetite that whole bushes are sometimes robbed of their

SOUTH AFRICA:

ITS HISTORY, HEROES, AND WARS.*

In our May number we gave a notice of the American edition of this work. It has now been published in England with a most striking cover—a reduced facsimile of which we are enabled to give here. The book has been enlarged by the addition of a short chapter bringing the history of the war up to the occupation of Pretoria. An index has also been added, which very much increases the value of the book.

In its English form the book should command a ready sale—in America it has already reached a sale of 50,000 copies. It is essentially a readable book, giving all the facts in a form as palatable as fiction. And with it all, it is remarkable for the clear, well-balanced manner in which the causes of the present war are treated.

One of the most pleasing features of the book is that it gives to the missionaries their rightful place in connection with the development and making of South Africa. The general tendency of books dealing with South Africa has been to minimise the work done by the missionaries in order to enlarge upon that of the administrators..

This book may be recommended as one which should be bought, read, and kept handy for reference; a most useful book.

THE BIOGRAPHY OF A REBEL.

MR. GRANT ALLEN was a born rebel. In his veins ran the blood of rebel ancestors. His sympathies ever went out to those whose voice was raised in protest. The garment of latter-day beliefs and conventions sat uneasily upon him; it fretted him, and he did not hesitate to let the world know of his irritation. He was a Celt first and an evolutionist afterwards-not a combination from which much practical progress can result. Mr. Grant Allen at one time declared, "I have never believed in fighting; I believe in permeation." Theoretically, no doubt, he did; but on several occasions his impatience of education by "slow half-hints" found vigorous expression in print. It was on these occasions that he felt he had spoken the message that was in him. But it was precisely on these occasions that he ceased to be the evolutionist and became the idealist to whom time and space are negligible quantities. Mr. Clodd's life of his friend is the biography of a man who failed, and who was conscious of the fact. It is this realisation of failure which makes the story of Grant Allen's life a pathetic one. Curiosity, devoid of faith or hope, may be said to have been the keynote of his career. Mr. Clodd says:—

He spoke of never having felt awe or reverence in contemplating phenomena that move the multitude to sacrifice or prayer. He had a full share of the wonder that accompanies boundless curiosity. This was not, however, because he felt himself in the presence of an inscrutable Power, but because what he had learned concerning the inter-action and inter-relation of things spurred him to more eager effort to discover secrets which would bring further revelation of the unbroken unity of phenomena. This was all that he cared about.

Grant Allen himself in a letter condensed his gospel within the limits of a paragraph :—

To me the first religious duty of man consists in the obligation to form a distinct conception for himself of the universe in which he lives and of his own relation to it. He ought to satisfy himself what he is, whence he comes, and whither he goeth. In matters of such fundamental importance he ought not to rest content with any second-hand or hearsay evidence. He ought not to believe whatever he is told, but to search the universe, in order to see whether these things are so. Many years of study—historical, anthropological, scientific and philosophical—have convinced me that the system of the universe which you (the Christian) accept as true is baseless and untenable. I firmly and earnestly believe that I am in possession of truths of the deepest importance to humanity, and that I am working for the establishment of a higher, nobler, and purer society than any yet contemplated upon earth. In this beitef I may be mistaken, but I conceive it to be correct, and, therefore, I feel myself justified in acting upon it.

It is to be regretted that Mr. Clodd has not produced a life of Mr. Grant Allen which would have been of more than ephemeral interest. The memoir is published by Mr. Grant Richards.

Index to the Periodicals of 1899.

OUR readers will be glad to learn that the tenth volume of the "Annual Index to Periodicals" was duly published in June. To journalists and all interested in contemporary history the Index ought to be indispensable as a book of reference to the articles which have appeared in the English and American periodicals in 1899. Similarly, the earlier volumes, which date as far back as the Review of Reviews, give references to the articles on every subject published in magazinedom since 1890. Vol. III. (1892) is now out of print, but Vols. I., II., IV., and V. (1896, 1891, 1893, and 1894) may still be had at 5s. each net, or 5s. 6d. post free, and Vols. VI.—X. (1895—1899) are issued at 10s. each net.

Parlibeing action retiriunite from the sand sions ever

foun

sma Volu Rep whill whice Must craf T any add

neci

with

Uni

Sta num P" W bra Pris trea tori the doi: des soc tem tect and Mr her Mr Lac dar

the

Lor Soc Lac Ho Wor

sub ser Mr Mis Th

July 7 vo

^{*} Horace Marshall and Son, Temple House, E.C. 6s. net. 675 pp. roy. 8vo.

A WOMAN'S PARLIAMENT AND ITS HANSARD.*

THE Hansard of the Women's Parliament held in London last summer is now published. Unlike other Parliaments, it is held only once in five years, this being its second meeting. The Reports of its transactions have been well edited and arranged by the retiring President, Lady Aberdeen. Its aim was to unite as many able and representative women as possible from all parts of the world, and ascertain their views on the status of women in general in their various countries, and on the prospects afforded to women in the professions open to them. The latest information about almost every profession in which women have engaged will be found in Lady Aberdeen's well-classified volumes.

The Reports of the Congress fill six volumes, the smallest of which deals with "Women in Politics." Volumes of twice the thickness are needed to contain the Reports on "Women in Education and Social Life," while two yet thicker volumes describe the success with which women have entered the following professions: Medicine, Art, Factory and Sanitary Inspection, etc., Literature, Science, the Drama, Nursing, Journalism, Music, Clerical work, Agriculture, Horticulture, Handicrafts, and Library work.

The discussions on the prospects offered to women by any particular profession were usually opened by an address from one of the most noteworthy women connected with that profession nected with that profession.

The volume on "Women in Education" is concerned with women's part in education from the cradle to the University.

In the discussions, Lady Aberdeen, the Hon. Maud Stanley, and Professor Geddes took part, besides a number of delegates from foreign universities.

Probably the most interesting volume is that on "Women in Social Life," dealing with the following branches of philanthropic work undertaken by women:—Prisons and Reformatories, with special reference to the treatment of women in prisons and children in reformatories; preventive work in Europe, Great Britain, and the United States; rescue work, and the methods of doing it inside homes and outside; the treatment of the destitute classes; women's and girls' clubs, especially social clubs; social settlements; an equal moral standard for men and women; amusements, their ethics and the way in which they should be publicly controlled; temperance; provident schemes; emigration; the protection of young travellers; and the protection of bird and animal life.

Among the speakers were the Duchess of Bedford, Mrs. Percy Bunting, Mrs. Bramwell Booth, who gave her experience of rescue work; Mrs. Sheldon Amos; Mrs. Barnett (wife of Canon Barnett of Toynbee Hall); Lady Battersea; Mrs. Creighton, wife of the Bishop of London; Mrs. Ormiston Chant; Mr. Pease, of the Fabian Society; the Earl of Aberdeen; Sir Edward Grey, M.P.; Lady Laura Ridding, the Hon. Emily Kinnaird, and the Hon. W. P. Reeves, Agent-General for New Zealand.

There is also the less explored side of women's work—her duties in political life. The speakers on this subject were several women who have done valuable service in public life, such as Miss Florence Balgarnie, Mrs. Bridge-Adams, and the Hon. Mrs. Lyttelton; and Miss Susan B. Anthony, representing the United States. The debates turned on the responsibilities and duties of women in public life, their status in local government, and their work in administering the Poor Law and other forms of State relief. Reference was also made to their work on urban and rural governing bodies. Lastly, there was a discussion on the political enfranchisement of women, in which Mr. Reeves, Mr. Faithful Begg, M.P., Lady Henry Somerset, and Miss Susan B. Anthony took part. The work of women in connection with State relief was discussed by representatives from seven different parts of the world—Scotland, Germany, France, New South Wales, New Zealand, Ireland and Poland. Women in politics found advocates in Miss Honnor Morten, Lady Knightley, Mrs. Fenwick Miller, Lady Frances Balfour, and many other women whose names are connected with various public movements. As a dictionary of women's work, and a record of their economic position at the close of the nineteenth century, this book is not only of interest but of considerable value.

"Village Life in China."

THIS "Study in Sociology," by A. H. Smith, D.D. (Oliphant), is a somewhat disappointing book on a subject of supreme interest at the present moment. Dr. Smith has lived in China, he knows the Chinese, and he describes the life of the Chinese village as he has seen it, with painstaking detail. One new thing in the book is the remark which he makes as to the resemblance between Chinese secret societies and English sects. He says:—

The countless secret sects of China are all of them examples of the Chinese talent for co-operation in the alleged "practice of virtue." The general plan of procedure does not differ externally from that of a religious denomination in any Western land, except that there is an element of cloudiness about the basis upon which the whole superstructure rests, and great secrecy in the actual assembling at night. Masters and pupils, each in a graduated series, manuscript books containing doctrines, hymns which are recited or even composed to order, prayers, offerings, and ascetic observances are traits which many of these sects share in common with other forms of religion elsewhere.

The "element of cloudiness" is not altogether absent even from our religious denominations. The secret society also resembles our Nonconformists in being very punctual in taking collections. The Chinese share John Wesley's opinion as to the principle of the penny a week and shilling a quarter being the binding mortar of the whole organisation. The Chinese have, he tells us, a great gift for co-operation, but in another place he says:—

If the millions of China were not satisfied with the existing rule, nothing would be easier than for them to unite and overthrow it. But the security of the Government is based upon the well understood and well ascertained fact that, with the Chinese, effective combination is an exceedingly difficult matter.—P. 221.

Dr. Smith writes intelligently always, and there is great store of information in his book. But when he bids us hope that in fifty years from 1860 Christianity will be found to have made a good beginning in sanctifying childhood, ennobling motherhood, dignifying manhood, and in purifying every social condition in China, he fails to carry conviction. Have we made a good beginning in these matters even in England, where Christianity has been at work much longer than fifty years?

"THE Midday Moon, or the Midnight Sun," is the rather fantastic title of a travel paper in the Gentleman's for July, wherein H. Schütz Wilson gives a sketch quite above the average of a coasting tour in Norwegian fjords.

~~~~~~

is veins ran ever went test. The

at uneasily

tate to let lt first and rom which nt Allen at ighting ; I t, he did :

cation by

print. It

ooken the cisely on volutionist space are end is the conscious ch makes

Curiosity,

been the n contem-acrifice or companies

se he felt it because er-relation er secrets

n unity of s gospel

is in the

If of the

it. He

mes, and portance

r hearsay

d, but to s are so.

tific and universe

d untenession of

at I am nd purer beilef I herefore,

oduced

of more hed by volume

blished

ontem-

e as a red in nilarly,

as the

cles on

1890. I., IV.,

nad at

I.—X.

* Proceedings of the International Congress of Women, held in London, July, 1899. Edited by the Countess of Aberdeen. T. Fisher Unwin. 7 vols.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

BIOGRAPHY.

NEW EDITIONS.

example of the maps which appear regularly in Commercial Intelligence. This excellent paper costs only one penny weekly, and its offices are at 168, Fleet Street.

Bishop, Gilbert. The Beachcombers. Illustrated. cr. 8vo. 307 pp. (Ward, Lock)

| Dickory Chan A T-la of Two Cities Barrer (Ward, Lock) 1/6                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Dickens, Chas. A Tale of Two Cities. Paper. 148 pp(Chapman and Hall) 0/6                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
| Dickens, Chas. Barnaby Rudge 658 pp. cap 8vo. Dombey and Son. 933 pp. cap 8vo. (On India paper.) New Century Library.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
| (I Nelson) each net 2/o                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| Higg, Victor. Les Miserables: Jean Valjean. 2 vols. cr. 8vo.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| 303 pp. and 23t pp (J. M. Dent) per vol., net 2/6 Molière, J. B. Poquelin, Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme. With Notes                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| and Glossary. 140 pp(Dent.) net 1/6                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| RELIGIOUS.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| Bannister, A. T. Lost Labour. cr. 8vo. 63 pp(Sonnenschein)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| Marchant, James. Theories of the Resurrection of Jesus Christ.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| Cr. 8vo. 122 pp(Williams and Norgate) Webb-Peploe, H. W. Calls to Holiness. Cr. 8vo. 251 pp.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| (Marshall Bros.) 3/6                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
| Wynne, May. In the Shadows; or Thoughts for Mourners(Marshall Bros.) 0/6                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| SOCIAL.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| Deway, John. The School of Society. cr. 8vo. 130 pp. (P. S. King) 3/0Leonard, E. M. The Early History of English Poor Relief. med. 8vo.397 pp(Cambridge University Press) net 7/6                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| 397 pp                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
| (Macmillan)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| Hopkins, Albert B. The Boroughs of the Metropolis. med. 8vo.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| 347 pp                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
| 360 pp(Oliphant, Anderson and Co.) 7/6                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
| COUTH APPLCA                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| SOUTH AFRICA.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| Kuyper, Prof. A. The South African Crisis. Translated by A. E.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| Fletcher. Paper. 88 pp(Stop the War Committee) o/3Yesterday and To-day in Kruger's Land. cr. 8vo. 88 pp                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| (Stock) net 1/o                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| ***************************************                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| "Commercial Intelligence."                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| "OUR country's welfare is our first concern," is the                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
| motto of this most enterprising weekly newspaper founded                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
| by Mr. Henry Sell last year. The founder had recognised                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| the fact that if foreign competition is to be met it is                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| necessary to be informed of its methods, not after a                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
| market is lost, but when it is threatened and on the first                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| signs of its appearance; and he at once set to work to                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
| provide the necessary information to save the markets                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
| for British Trade.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
| We cannot do better than quote the following state-                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| ment as to the aims of this paper:—                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| What Commercial Intelligence aims at and accomplishes, bythe publication of timely intelligence and useful information, is                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| to help the British trader to swell the trade statistics published                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
| by others. To this end we survey the world's markets, new and                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| old, at home and abroad, with a single eye to the defence and                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| practical development of British commercial interests. By                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| careful scrutiny of the official reports of our own, and of foreign                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| consuls and diplomatic agents; by a study of references to trade developments in the colonial and foreign press; by the careful                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| developments in the colonial and loteign press; by the careful                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| watching of our special correspondents for signs of inroads on                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| watching of our special correspondents for signs of inroads onmarkets where we grow too confident of supremacy, and for new                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| watching of our special correspondents for signs of inroads onmarkets where we grow too confident of supremacy, and for newopportunities of development which our competitors have been                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| markets where we grow too confident of supremacy, and for newopportunities of development which our competitors have beenquicker to realise, we aim to render useful service alike to the                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
| markets where we grow too confident of supremacy, and for newopportunities of development which our competitors have beenquicker to realise, we aim to render useful service alike to theindividual interests of British merchants and manufacturers, and                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
| markets where we grow too confident of supremacy, and for new opportunities of development which our competitors have been quicker to realise, we aim to render useful service alike to the individual interests of British merchants and manufacturers, and to the total volume of our national prosperity.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| markets where we grow too confident of supremacy, and for new opportunities of development which our competitors have been quicker to realise, we aim to render useful service alike to the individual interests of British merchants and manufacturers, and to the total volume of our national prosperity.  One of the most useful features of the paper is its                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
| markets where we grow too confident of supremacy, and for new opportunities of development which our competitors have been quicker to realise, we aim to render useful service alike to the individual interests of British merchants and manufacturers, and to the total volume of our national prosperity.  One of the most useful features of the paper is its series of splendid maps illustrating much more clearly                                                                                                                                                                      |
| markets where we grow too confident of supremacy, and for new opportunities of development which our competitors have been quicker to realise, we aim to render useful service alike to the individual interests of British merchants and manufacturers, and to the total volume of our national prosperity.  One of the most useful features of the paper is its series of splendid maps illustrating much more clearly than many articles the exact situation and state of trade                                                                                                            |
| markets where we grow too confident of supremacy, and for new opportunities of development which our competitors have been quicker to realise, we aim to render useful service alike to the individual interests of British merchants and manufacturers, and to the total volume of our national prosperity.  One of the most useful features of the paper is its series of splendid maps illustrating much more clearly than many articles the exact situation and state of trade at any given place. We are indebted to Mr. Sell for                                                        |
| markets where we grow too confident of supremacy, and for new opportunities of development which our competitors have been quicker to realise, we aim to render useful service alike to the individual interests of British merchants and manufacturers, and to the total volume of our national prosperity.  One of the most useful features of the paper is its series of splendid maps illustrating much more clearly than many articles the exact situation and state of trade at any given place. We are indebted to Mr. Sell for the map of China, reproduced on p. 34, which is a good |
| markets where we grow too confident of supremacy, and for new opportunities of development which our competitors have been quicker to realise, we aim to render useful service alike to the individual interests of British merchants and manufacturers, and to the total volume of our national prosperity.  One of the most useful features of the paper is its series of splendid maps illustrating much more clearly than many articles the exact situation and state of trade at any given place. We are indebted to Mr. Sell for                                                        |
|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |

LI

out t speal matt payn Engl like " Ho was, lute chan tell : to a need with > know Engl

techi Engl appa for a anot estal busin of a to ar a Fr exan tice f must mun

busin

forei is qu

possi

tech

way

be g

help Pr inter The those gath want and lectu advi learn more

Lone

TI this is no be re Tour later On 6 these not l

Tead

(Gal! and Inglis)

LEARNING LANGUAGES BY LETTER-WRITING

FEW days ago a bright young Frenchman came into the REVIEW OF REVIEWS office with a letter of introduction. In the course of conversation it came out that he was in London for the purpose of learning to speak English and getting an insight into business matters. He was in an office, but of course not receiving In view of the fact that so many young Englishmen would be glad of an opportunity to do the like in France or Germany, the natural question was, "How did you get such an appointment?" The reply was, "Oh, it is a French house;" as if it were an absolute matter of course that such a house should give chances to young Frenchmen. Can any of our readers tell me whether it is usual with English houses abroad to act in the same patriotic fashion? At the Hague, needing some article of English make, I turned one day with glad relief into a shop bearing the name of a wellknown English firm. Here, of course, I should find one English attendant at least to whom I might explain technical intricacies. But no! The shop bore an English name, the goods were English goods; but apparently no one had thought that here was a chance for a young Englishman to learn the ways of business of another country. I am told that Frenchmen have established a society for the purpose of helping young business men in this way. Do any of our readers know of a similar society for Englishmen? Is it not possible to arrange some international scheme by means of which a Frenchman in Lyons, or a merchant in Hamburg, for example, willing to take a young Englishman as apprentice for a year, could make known his willingness? There must be reciprocity, of course. The medium of communication must be willing to receive names of English business men willing to receive foreigners, as well as of foreign business men willing to receive Englishmen. It is quite obvious that no private person can do this; but possibly the various chambers of commerce, or the polytechnics and their foreign equivalents might see their way to do so, if the idea were put before them. I should be glad to hear from any able to give information, or to help in doing this.

THE INTERNATIONAL ASSEMBLY.

Professor Geddes announces that there will be no international summer meeting this year in Edinburgh. The work doing in Paris will absorb all the energies of those who usually concern themselves in this holiday gathering, for the International Assembly, or Exhibition School, reaches out long arms and provides for every want except the want of money. It arranges a home and meetings with friends, issues social invitations, gives lectures, and provides guides, amusements, and that advice so very necessary when one desires to see and learn much in a little time. The committee numbers more than a hundred names of the highest distinction. London office: 5, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden.

HOLIDAY COURSES.

The Teachers' Guild has arranged for three in France this summer, as the numbers who attend increase, and it is not found desirable that more than eighty-four should be received at any centre. The courses at Lisieux and Tours commence on August 3rd, that at Elbeuf a little later. Examinations will be held at Elbeuf and Lisieux. On every hand one hears of the benefits resulting from these courses, pleasure and intellectual companionship not being small items. For full information apply to the Teachers Guild, 74, Gower Street.

The School World announces a holiday course at Geneva, which begins on July 17th, but may be joined

The "Alliance Française" will hold its courses in Paris during July and August. One of the original founders of the "Alliance" died very lately at the early age of fifty-eight. I refer to M. Armand Colin, the head of that great publishing house, which, by means of the Revue Universitaire, organised with us the scheme of international correspondence, from which so many have found help and pleasure.

LETTERS FROM GERMANY.

Nearly every one of the welcome reports which reach me from time to time contain extracts from, or reference to, letters from France. It cannot be that the German correspondence has not given equal pleasure and good results; so I call for communications from those who have friends there. I am curious to know, also, whether the greater care in pairing our scholars, upon which Professor Hartmann insists, has resulted in a more lasting alliance. . But this, I fear, one cannot know from the nature of things.

NOTICES.

The Practical Teacher for June contains a most interesting account of Abbotsholme, in Derbyshire, one of the two schools which are thought to have been taken by M. Demolins as models for l'Ecole des Roches; but it also contains a notice to which I direct the attention of our readers: "As the Board of Education requires no set books for its French, students for its certificates and for London matriculation could not do better than attempt, month by month, our French prize competition. A competitor who does not gain a prize will derive considerable benefit from the exercise. The study of the considerable benefit from the exercise. successful competitor's translation and of our remarks will help him to see where he might have done better. If desired, his paper can be returned, fully corrected, by enclosing six stamps.

The Swiss holiday home for children has again been started this year. Pastor and Mme. Bieler d'Aubigné may be inquired of at La Maison Blanche, Pindoux, Vaud. To prevent disappointment, I had better mention that the cost amounts to about £8 a month.

A Portuguese teacher would like to correspond with an Englishman.

An English girl can be received au pair in a German home.

A Danish gentleman would like to correspond with a German (will foreign readers notice?), and another needs. an English correspondent.

An English lady would be glad to know of a well-bred French girl, willing to come to her au pair in September.

The holiday season will have commenced by now; will our readers therefore notice that there will necessarily be a longer delay in finding correspondents until the holidays are over. The Revue Universitaire is not issued during August and September, so the scholars cannot be arranged for, whilst our co-workers being mostly teachers, it is almost as difficult to arrange for All communications should be endorsed: adults. "Secretary for International Correspondence," applications from adults should contain one shilling towards expense of search, and particulars as to age,

M. Vaché, of Nontron, will be able to take two more boys after September.

pp.

net 2/0 8vo.

net 2/6

net 1/6

pp. os.) 3/6

os.) o/6

ng) 3/o

net 7/6

vo. net 7/6 ed.

0.) 7/6

ea) o/3

net 1/0

is the

unded

nised it is fter a

e first

ork to irkets

state-es, by on, is lished

w and

e and B7

reign

trade

areful ds on

r new

been

o the

, and

s its early rade

l for good merone ein)

ite)

0/6

[all)

THE DECAY OF A MEDICO-MILITARY SUPERSTITION.

AN INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON "REGULATION."

THE present war, which is teaching us many new lessons, is reminding us of many old ones. scandal with which the world has been ringing is an excellent illustration of the ways of medico-militarism. Instead of making the necessary provision for shelter, cleanliness and nursing, our Army doctors relied upon inoculation. Our unlucky soldiers were induced, with few exceptions, to submit to inoculation against typhoid. The inoculation, they were assured, would safeguard them against enteric fever. So they submitted. The inoculation made them very uncomfortable, and some of them horribly ill, but they bore it, believing that it insured them against the dreaded The result proved that inoculation against enteric fever was about as beneficial as any of the rubbishy nostrums which have been used to charm away disease in the Dark Ages. Our soldiers fell ill by the thousand and died by the hundred, and as no rational provision had been made for their treatment, the mortality was very heavy.

THE OLD C.D. ACTS IMPOSTURE.

This is typical of the way they have in the army. The army medico is always running after some semi-scientific quack nostrum by which the soldier is to be rendered immune. The stock illustration of this inveterate superstition is the implicit reliance which the regular military medico places in regulation and inspection as a remedy for the vice-engendered disease which is never absent from camps. The victory which Mrs. Butler and her allies achieved when the C.D. Acts were repealed was not won by the conversion of the army doctors.

Repeal was insisted upon by the aroused moral sense of the nation, which overruled the doctors—with this result. Ever since the Acts were repealed the percentage of disease in the home army has steadily diminished, as their own statistics prove. But notwithstanding this conclusive demonstration of the worse than uselessness of their favourite nostrum, there still exists among many military medicos an undisguised hankering after the old exploded "remedy." If we are to have a great increase of militarism as the result of this war, we may confidently expect an outbreak of the agitation for the re-enactment of the C.D. Acts.

THE INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE AT BRUSSELS.

I was, therefore, very glad to receive the report from one who was there, of a highly important International Conference of medical experts, held to discuss this very question, at Brussels last September. The reporter says:—

The Conference was specialist and authoritative in the highest degree. Roughly speaking, it numbered some 360 members, of 33 nationalities. Of these 107 were Government delegates, representing 29 different countries, mostly European, but including the United States, Persia and Japan. Our own War Office and India Office were represented, together with the Royal College of Surgeons, the Irish College of Surgeons, and the British Medical Association. Out of the entire 360 members 295 were doctors, and a large number of these held public posts as professors or health officers.

The object of the Conference was to discuss what measures should be adopted to prevent the spread of vice-engendered disease. Its deliberations lasted five days.

THE FAILURE OF REGULATION.

On

A

Sup

The

Dec

Chr

Sup

day j years Acad of Sp

Mr.

The

Desi

Le I

The

The

Rep

The Girl

The

The

Albe

Some

Fron

The

The !

The

what vintrodi

Not a single medical authority, even from those countries where Regulation has had full swing, ventured to assert that its results were satisfactory. Indeed, the advocates for Regulation threw overboard all argument from statistics, and admitted that they had not achieved the results they wished for, but argued from "common sense" that the disease must become worse if Regulation were done The answer to this was decisive. cities where no Regulation exists have not any worse bill of health than those where it is enforced most drastically. Professor Fournier's description of the hopeless condition of Paris after a hundred years of Regulation filled the Regulationists with dismay. At the end of the discussion it was found that opinion was so hopelessly divided that no attempt was made to formulate a resolution on the subject. It was agreed on all hands that, as Professor Fournier put it, "a long experience has fully demonstrated the inadequency of the whole system of administrative measures which constitute at present our only means of defence.'

THE RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE CONFERENCE.

The Conference was, however, not without positive result. The following eight resolutions were unanimously agreed to:—

I. That the Governments should use their utmost powers to suppress the prostitution of girls under age.

2. That the utmost rigour of the law should be enforced against souteneurs.

3. That the Governments should find means to warn the public, and especially young persons, of the dangers attending an immoral life.

4. That guardians of orphans and others charged with the education of the young should use every effort to promote their moral development, and to teach them temperance and respect for women of all classes. (This was a Russian proposal.)

5. That, in order to ensure the training of competent practitioners, complete and compulsory courses of instruction in the subject should be instituted in the Universities of all medical students.

6. That the Governments should appoint in each country a Commission charged to ascertain the amount of these diseases among the civil population, apart from temporary fluctuations, to inquire into the existing means of treatment, the distribution of hospitals in various localities, etc., and to collect opinions and formulate proposals as to the best means of preventing the dissemination of the malady. (This was a British suggestion.)

7. That a permanent International Society for Social and Moral Prophylaxis should be constituted, having its headquarters in Brussels, issuing a quarterly journal in French, English, and German, and holding Congresses from time to time; the first Congress to meet at Brussels in 1902.

8. That the statistics of the disease in all countries should be drawn up on a common basis.

Taking these resolutions simply as points of agreement, it is interesting to notice that none of them recommends any form of administrative coercion as applied directly to the communication of disease; and that four of them aim at the prevention of vice, as the root of the whole evil, while the other four seek to increase the efficiency and accessibility of medical aid, and to apply a stimulus to research and bring all results to a common fund.

I shall be very glad to forward to any reader who wishes for more information on the subject a copy of this pamphlet on receiving his or her name and address.

96

countries

to assert dvocates

m statis-

e results se" that ere done

e. The y worse

ost dras-

hopeless

egulation

d of the opelessly

a resods that, has fully ystem of esent our positive

nimously

owers to enforced

warn the attending

with the note their nd respect

ent pracon in the l medical country a

e diseases

ations, to bution of nions and nting the dquarters

glish, and the first should be of agree-

of them

cion as se; and the root ease the apply a non fund.

der who y of this ess.

estion.) ocial and

1.)

NCE.

ART IN THE MAGAZINES.

Antiquary .- July.

On a "Trinita" in Old Painted Glass in Rodmell Church. Illustrated. W. H. Legge.

Architectural Review.—Effingham House, Arundel Street, Strand. 15. June.

Supplement:—"Booksellers' Row," by F. L. Emanuel. Men Who worked in Pewter. H. J. L. J. Massé. The Royal Academy; a Candid Criticism. X. Y. Z. Decorative Crafts in Poetry. Ethel Wheeler.

Argosy.-July.

Chris Hammond, Illustrated. A. Forman

Art Journal.-H. VIRTUE. 15. 6d. July. Supplement :- "The Piano," after J. Mc.N. Whistler.

"One of Mr. Whistler's earlier pictures. It became known to the present-day public on its being exhibited at the first Knightsbridge Exhibition two years ago. It is one of the few pictures Mr. Whistler sent to the Royal Academy, where it was exhibited in 1860. John Phillip, R.A., the painter of Spanish pictures, bought it in the Exhibition, and thus showed his hearty appreciation of the young painter." The picture is now in the collection of Mr. Edmund Davis.

Mr. and Mrs. Adrian Stokes. Illustrated. Wilfrid Meynell. The Story of the Jewel Tower, Westminster. Illustrated. S. Fisher.

Fra Angelico in Rome. Illustrated. Addison McLeod. Designs for Lace in 1899. Illustrated. Mrs. Bruce Clarke. Le Musée Rodin. Illustrated. C. Quentin.

Bookman.-June.

The Literary Pictures of the Year. Illustrated. G. K. Chesterton and J. E. Hodder Williams.

Bookman .- (AMERICA.) June.

The New Leaders of American Illustration. Illustrated. Continued. Miss Regina Armstrong.

Critic,-May.

Representative American Women Illustrators; the Child Interpreters. Illustrated. Miss Regina Armstrong.

Forum.-June.

The American School of Sculpture. W. O. Partridge.

Girl's Realm .- July.

Girls and Girl-Life in the Royal Academy and New Gallery. Illustrated. Miss Alice Corkran.

Harvard Graduates' Magazine.-June.

The Harvard Meleager. Illustrated. R. Norton.

House .- " QUEEN " OFFICE. 6d. July. The Home Arts and Industries Exhibition. Illustrated.

Ladies' Home Journal.-July.

Albert Lynch; a Painter of Fair Women. Illustrated.

Lady's Realm.-July.

Some Lady's Realm Artists and Their Work. Illustrated.

Magazine of Art.-Cassell, 18. 4d. July.

Frontispiece :- "The Ploughboy," after H. H. La Thangue. The Royal Academy. Continued. Illustrated.
The New Gallery. Illustrated. B.
The Portraits of Geoffrey Chaucer. Illustrated. M. H.

Spielmann.

"The best likeness that is presented to us of Chaucer is the limning, or what we would nowadays call 'water-colour drawing,' which he (Occleve) introduced into his book 'De Regimine Principis.' In that part of it entitled 'De Consilio habendo in omnibus factis,' he has executed, or caused to be executed, a fine marginal painting in colours."

Some Unpublished Letters by J. M. W. Turner. Cosmo Monkhouse.

The Waddesdon Bequest to the British Museum. Illustrated. Continued. W. Roberts.
Alexandre Falguière. Illustrated. H. Frantz.
Aïvazowski. Illustrated. Prince B. Karageorgevitch.

Michael Munkacsy, Illustrated, A. F.
The Salon of the "Libre Esthétique," Illustrated. Octave Maus.

The Paris Salon, 1900. Illustrated. H. F.

New England Magazine.-June.

William Ordway Partridge, Sculptor. Illustrated. W. C. Langdon.

Nineteenth Century .- July.

The National Gallery in 1900, and Its Present Arrangements. With Plan. M. H. Spielmann.

Pall Mall Magazine.-July.

Thomas Carlyle, after J. McNeill Whistler.

Parents' Review .- June.

Dulwich Gallery; a Minor Gallery. Miss S. Armitt.

Pearson's Magazine.-July.

The Art of the Age. Illustrated. Continued.

Primitive Methodist Quarterly Review.-July.

Ruskin and the Religion of Beauty. J. Ritson.

Puritan.-July.

The Life and Work of George Tinworth; an Evangelist in Clay. Illustrated. J. F. Chapter.

Royal Magazine.-July.

The Queen and Her Family as Artists. Illustrated. Margaret Collinson.

Strand Magazine.-July.

George Henry Boughton; Interview. Illustrated. R. de Cot

Studio. -5, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN. 18. June.

The Art of 1900. Illustrated. A. L. Baldry.

"Altogether there is good reason to be satisfied with the art of the year. The prophets who a few mouths ago were foretelling disaster, and wert warming the world at large to expect little in the way of a harvest, have been proved blind guides. Their forecasts have, happily, failed to come true, and things have gone better than, according to them, could by any possibility have been expected. That this should be so is a matter for rejoicing, for it would, indeed, have been a pity if an unseasonable frost should have come to mar the summer of our school. Years of striving with adverse influences have brought us at last to sturdy maturity, and every one who wishes well to British art would be glad to see it reap now the fruits of its dogged perseverance in the past. It has been honest in its effort, and has certainly earned the right to encouragement."

Suggestions for the Improvement of Sporting Cups and Trophies.

Illustrated. Continued.
Supplements:-"The Bath of Aphrodite," after A. Fisher; Crayon Sketch, after Frank Brangwyn.

Sunday Strand.-July.

Religious Pictures of the Year. Illustrated. A. T. Story.

Temple Magazine. - July.

Modern Religious Art. Illustrated. E. Browning Triscott.

Wesleyan Methodist Magazine.-June.

The Story of a Pompeian House. Illustrated. Rev. F. G. Smith.

Westminster Review.-July.

The Art of Rembrandt. Henry Bishop. Aubrey Beardsley. H. M. Strong.

XUM

LIST OF THE LEADING CONTENTS OF CURRENT PERIODICALS.

BRITISH AND AMERICAN.

Anglo-American Magazine. - International News Company. is. Jun

The Case of Mrs. Maybrick. A Member of the New York Bar. United States Relations with Turkey. The Editor. Modern Fiction. Continued. E. Ridley. Ti-ra-wa-hut—the Gods Aboriginal. H. E. Burgess. Science—Religion. G. Donaldson. Science—Relations in South Africa. James Henry Lane. British-Boer Relations in South Africa. British-Boer Relations in South Africa, James Henry Lane.
African Uitlanders and American Outlanders. A Disciple of Carlyle.

Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science.—P. S. King. r dol. May.

Science.—F. S. King. 1 dol. May.

The Government of a Typical Prussian City.—Halle a/S. Edmund J. James.

Tendencies in the Taxation of Transportation Companies in the United States. R. C. McCres.

Proportional Representation and the Debates upon the Electoral Question in Belgium. E. Mahaim.

Representation in the Legislatures of the North Central States. C. H. Haynes.

Supplement: - Corporations and Public Welfare.

Antiquary.—Elliot Stock. 6d. July.
Curious Ancient Customs and Traditions still lingering in Italy. Miss E. C. Vansittart.

Diary of Journeys to London from the South of Ireland, made by Mr. George Bowles in 1761 and 1762.

An Old Wooden Chest at St. Oswald's, Hooe, Battle, Sussex. Illustrated.

J. J. Newport.

Farther Contributions toward a History of Earlier Education in Great Britain. Continued. W. Carew Hazlitt.

Architectural Review,—Effingham House, Arundel Street, Strand. 18. June.
William Butterfield. Illustrated. H. Ricardo.
The Town Hall and New Municipal Buildings, Chatham. Illustrated. Robert Adam. Continued. Illustrated. P. Fitzgerald.
The Town and Castle of Annecy. Illustrated. J. P. Cooper.

Argosy.-George Allen. 18. July.

An Italian Vintage. L. Housman.
Letters from the North. Illustrated. Continued. C. W. Wood.
Some Unfinished Writings. H. A. Spurr.
The Passion-Play of Oberammergau. A. J. C. Hare.
Trinity College, Oxford. Illustrated. Rev. I. G. Smith.

Atlantic Monthly .- GAY AND BIRD. 18. June. Atlantic Monthly,—GAV AND BIRD. IS. Just Interpreted the Executive. Grover Cleveland, Recent Economic Tendencies. Charles A. Conant. The Poetry of a Machine Age. Gerald Stanley Lee. An Archer on the Kankakee. Maurice Thompson. Gentleman and Scholar. Ephraim Emerton. In an Alpine Posting-Inn. Edith Wharton. A Letter from France. Alvan F. Sanborn. German; a Substitute for Greek. William Crans on Lawton. My Autobiography. Continued William James Stillman. Dante's Message. Charles A. Dinsore. Edwin Burritt Sm Realism on the Ghetto Stage. Hutchins Hapgood. Bernard Quaritch. Dean Sage. Edwin Burritt Smith.

Author.—HORACE Cox. 6d. June. The Copyright Act and the Five Presentation Copies.

Badminton Magazine.-Wm. Heinemann. is. July.

Pages from a Country Diary. Illustrated. F. S. Wilson. Free-Wheeling over Swiss Passes. Illustrated. Isabel Marks. Fielding. H. D. Leveson-Gower. Trouting from a Coracle. Illustrated. A. G. Bradley. Gentlemen e. Players. Home Gordon. A Review of Ladies' Golf. Illustrated. L. Mackern and E. M. Boys.

Bankors' Magazine,—WATERLOW, 15. 6d. July.
Variations in the Rate charged by the Bank of England, 1844–1899.
Token Money of the Bank of England. Illustrated. Maberly Phillips.
Societies and Institutes.

Blackwood's Magazine, -BLACKWOOD. 28. 6d. July. The Morocco Scare. W. B. Harris. Our Officers. Our Officers.

Le Bourgneuf; a Village in the Val d'Or. Mrs. P. G. Hamerton.

G. W. Steevens.

The Mai Darkt of the Malay Peninsula; Primitive Socialists. E. A. Ilving.

Mid the Haunts of the Moose.

Mil the Figures of the Mouse of Kajar. Continued.

Musings without Method.

Some Events and an Armistice. Linesman.

The War Operations in South Africa. Continued, Military Contributor.

Distracted China.

Bookman.-Hodder and Stoughton. 6d. June.

Swinburne as a Metrist. With Portraits. J. Douglas. The Forgetting of Books. Y. Y. A Generation of Scottish Literature and Journalism. Delta.

Bookman .- (AMERICA.) DODD, MEAD AND CO., NEW YORK. 25 cents.

June.
Jeanne Marni. Illustrated. F. Loliée.
Italian Newspapers. Illustrated. F. T. Cooper.
The Yiddish Theatre in New York. Illustrated. H. Hapgood.
The War in South Africa and the American Civil War. Spenser Wilkinson.
The Later Work of Tolstoy. A. Maude.

Canadian Magazine. - ONTARIO PUBLISHING CO., TORONTO. 25 cents. June 25 cents. June.
Edmonton: the City on the Saskatchewan. Illustrated. B. Cameron.
The Chinaman in the Household. W. C. Nichol.
The West Indian Negro of To-day. H. G. De Lisser.
Twenty Years on the War Path. Continued. F. Villiers,
A Trip to Mexico. Illustrated. Laura M. Boulton.
A Trip to Mexico. Illustrated. Laura M. Boulton.
Arthur J. Stringer. With Portraits. H. A. Bruce.
Stephen Phillips and "Paolo and Francesca"; a New Poet and a New Play. E. R. Peacock.
The Functions of a Governor-General. A Political Onlooker, Robert Barr and Literature in Canada. W. J. Brown.

Captain.-George Newnes. 6d. July. Kodak Photography in Peace and War. Illustrated. C. G. Paul. How Railway Signals are worked. Illustrated. J. A. Kay. The Free Wheel. Illustrated. H. Perry.

Cassell's Magazine.—Cassell. 6d. July. Her Majesty's Ambassadors. Illustrated. R. Machray.
The Central London Railway. Illustrated. A. J. Knowles.
A French Court of Justice. Illustrated. R. Murray.
Prisoners of War. Illustrated.
The National Defence. Illustrated. D. T. Timins.

Cassier's Magazine .- 33, Bedford Street, Strand. is. June. Cassier's magazine.—33, BEDFORD STREET, STRAND. 18. June. Trade Possibilities in South Africa. Illustrated. Edgar Mels. Three Systems of Selling Pig Iron; the German, British and American Methods. George H. Hull.

Sixty Years in British Iron Works. Illustrated. George Beard. Practical Inventing. Illustrated. W. H. Smyth. Naval Architecture and Sanitation. J. R. Tryon. The Increasing Size of American Locomotives. Illustrated. William Forsyth. Engineering Graduates from Universities. George W. Dickie. The Cost of Machine Work. Francis H. Richards.

Catholic World .- 22, PATERNOSTER Row. 15. June. Religious Customs among the Armenians. Illustrated. Rev. P. Terzian. Montalembert and His Visit to O'Connell. With Portrait. Rev. J. G. Daley.
In the Footsteps of Texas Missionaries. With Portraits. T. O'Hagan.
Dr. Mivar's Last Utterance. Rev. G. M. Searle.
The Elective System of Studies. Rev. J. A. Burns.
A Plan in the History of Nature. W. Seton.
The Catholic Layman in Higher Education. T. P. Kernan.
Chair of Philosophy in Trinity College, Washington. Rev. G. McDermot.

Century Magazine,—MacMillan, 18, 4d. July.
Sarah Porter. With Portrait. W. M. Sloane.
A Pictorial View of the Paris Exposition. Illustrated. A. Castaigne.
How to safeguard One's Sanity. Dr. J. M. Buckley.
Oliver Cromwell. Continued. Illustrated. John Morley.
Artistic Paris. Illustrated. Richard Whiteing.
The Commercial Ascendency of the United States. C. D. Wright.
Memories of a Musical Life. Illustrated. W. Mason.
Civic Festivals and Processions:— Elements of a Successful Parade. Barr Ferree.
Some Practical Suggestions. C. R. Lame.

Champers's Journal .- 47, PATERNOSTER Row. 8d. July. The Gold Mines of British Columbia.
The Boers and "Poor Whites."
The Diary of a Busaco Monk. Chas. Edwardes.
A Visit to Magersfontein Battlefield. W. S. Fletcher.
Tropical Diseases and Cures. T. P. Porter.
The British West Indies; Some Bulwarks of Empire.
Onions or Kitchen-Lilles.

Charing Cross Magazine.-434, STRAND. 3d. June. Your Boots and Shoes, Illustrated, D. McEwan, Archbishop Temple, Illustrated, E. D'Albiac,

The Red

Chaut

Around I The Inne Church

Zenodotu The Tex Cæsa C The Scra

Finland :

Municipa In the H The Soc Alexa Peter Ily An Unwi A Reform The Future The Athl Ruskin, Music Ha The War

With a B Mrs. Rac Ermine a Moorish The Boer C On the R Beauties

The Auto The Grea The Scient How Pre What Kin Crit E. I. Pho Di

Theory a The Com

Internal I Federal I The Incid Some Eco Note on The Unit The Gold The Berl Municipal Factories Educ

The Cam Boys and School N Educ Alcohol I

The Cali Better Ci The Rep Secondar

The Den P. F Commerce The Foll OF

K. 25 cents.

Wilkinson. ONTO.

and a New

ıl.

. June. American

n Forsyth.

Ferzian. Rev. J. G. lagan.

Dermot.

zne.

ly.

meron.

Secondary Inspection. Dr. R. P. Scott. Engineering Magazine. -222, STRAND. 18. June.

The Demonstrated Success of the Submarine Boat. Illustrated. Admiral P. Hichborn. Commercial Organisation of the Machine Shop. H. Diemer.
The Follies of Some American Exporters. A Continental Salesman.
Russia's Opening for Anglo-Saxon Enterprise in Asia. Illustrated. A. H.

Chautauquan .- CHAUTAUQUA PRESS, CLEVELAND, OHIO. 20 cents. June.

Forgotten Candidates for President. With Portraits. F. N. Thorpe. The Expansion of the American People. Illustrated. Continued. Prof. E. E. Sparks. Around Britany. Illustrated. I. Prime-Stevenson. The Inner Life of James Dwight Dana. D. C. Gilman.

Church Missionary Intelligencer.—Church Missionary Society.

6d. July.

The Redemption of Africa.

H. E. F.

A Review of the Century.

E. Stock.

Classical Review.—DAVID NUTT. 18. 6d. June.
Zenodotus, Aristophanes, and the Modern Homeric Text. T. W. Allen.
The Textual Criticism of Cicero's Philippics, and of the Orations before Cæsar. A. C. Clark.

Contemporary Review. - COLUMBUS Co. 28. 6d. July. The Scramble for China. Demetrius C. Boulger.
The Crisis in China. Arthur Sowerby.
Finland and Russia. Augustine Birell.
Municipal Trading. Lord Avebury.
In the Haunted Crimea. Menie Muriel Norman.
The Social and Economic Revolution in the Southern States. Philip Alexander Bruce.

Peter Ilvitch Tshäikovski. A. E. Keeton. Peter Hyitch Tshāikovski. A. E. Keeton.
An Unwritten Chapter in American Diplomacy. A. Maurice Low.
A Reformed College of Arms. A. W. Hutton.
The Future of London Railways. G. F. Millin.
The Athletic Master in Public Schools. H. J. Spenser.
Ruskin, Man and Prophet. R. Warwick Bond.
Music Halls. Andrew Wilson.
The War and Modern Tactics. With Map of the Battle of Colenso. J. Bürde.

Cornhill Magazine.-Smith, Elder. 18. July. With a Boer Ambulance in Natal. G. O. Moorhead.
Mrs. Radcliffe's Novels. Andrew Lang.
The South African Policy of Sir Bartle Frere. W. Basil Worsfold.
Ermine and Motley. Max Beerbohm.

Moorish Memories. Venomous Snakes; How they are caught and handled. Antivenene. The Boer at Home. Miss Anna Howarth.

Cosmopolitan.-International News Co. 6d. June. COSMOPOLITAN,—INTERNATIONAL News Co. 6d. June. On the Road with the "Big Show." Illustrated. C. T. Murray. Beauties of Blood Royal. With Portraits. Marquis de Fontenoy. The Automobile: the Modern Charlot. Illustrated. J. G. Sp.ed. The Great Boer Trek in 1834. S. Crane. The Science of Astronomy in the Year 1900. Illustrated. C. Flammarion. How Presidents are nominated. Illustrated. What Kind of a Sovereign is Queen Victoria? Illustrated. W. T. Stead.

Critic .- G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, NEW YORK. 20 cents. May. E. J. Phelps as seen in His Letters. Ellen Burns Sherman. Alexander Petöfi; the Hungarian Byron. Illustrated. A. Hegedus, Jr.

Dial .- 315, WABASH AVENUE, CHICAGO. 10 cents. June 1. Theory and Practice.

July 16.

The Commencement Season. Economic Journal.-MACMILLAN. 58. June. Economic Journal.—MACMILLAN. 58. June.
Internal Migration in England and Wales, 1881—J. Prof. A. W. Flux.
Federal Regulation of Railways in the United States. Prof. S. J. McL
The Incidence of Urban Rates. Prof. F. Y. Edg-worth.
Some Economic Aspects of the War. Sir R. Giffen.
Note on the Budget of r.yoo. Prof. C. F. Bastable.
The United States Currency Act of 1900. Prof. F. W. Taussig.
The Gold Standard in Japan. E. Foxwell.
The Berlin Produce Exchange. Prof. A. W. Flux
Municipal Trading. J. Harrison.
Factories and Workshops Bill. S. N. Fox.

Educational Review .-- 2, EXETER STREET, STRAND. 4d. June. The Cambridge Junior Local Syllabus; Latin. Rev. W. H. Flecker. Bys and Newspapers. J. L. Paton.
Cramming. Examiner. School Natural History Societies. C. L. Laurie.

Educational Review .- (AMERICA.) J. M. DENT. 18. 8d. June. Alcohol Physiology and School Superintendence. W. O. Atwater.
The Ethics of getting Teachers and of getting Positions. A. S. Draper,
The California State Text-Book System. R. D. Faulkner.
Better City School Administration. T. A. De Weese,
The Report on Normal Schools. J. M. Green,
The Quincy Movement. N. M. Butler.

Educational Times. -89, Farrington Street. 6d. July.

New Shop Methods a Corollary of Modern Machinery. Editor. Piece-Work not essential to Best Results in the Machine Shop. J. O'Counell. The Power Equipment in the Tall Office Building. Illustrated. R. P. Dutch Guiana from a Gold-Mining Standpoint. Illustrated. J. E. The Paris Exposition as a Mechanical Achievement. E. Mitchell. Disappearing Gun Carriages in the United States. Illustrated. C. H. Powell.

Engineering Times.-P. S. KING. 6d. June. Cold Expansion of Metals. Illustrated. L. Lodian.
The Disposal of Sewage. Illustrated. Continued. Dr. A. W. Blyth.
Technical Education—an Economic Necessity. Prof. V. C. Alderson.
The History and Development of Motor Cars. Illustrated. Continued.
W. Fletcher.
Modern Methods of Saving Labour in Gasworks. Illustrated. Continued. C. E. Brackenbury.

The Comparative Values of Belt Pulleys. Illustrated. G. H. Firth.

Types of Pneumatic Rock Drills. Illustrated. English Illustrated Magazine,-198, STRAND. 6d. July. The Cockney John Chinaman. Illustrated. G. A. Wade.
Nothing New under the Sun. Illustrated. F. Dolman.
Resuscitation of a Sea-Monster. Illustrated. F. Dolman.
Resuscitation of a Sea-Monster. Illustrated, Helen C. Gordon.
The Cult of Brahma. Illustrated, D. Major.
Distinguished Colonial Soldiers. With Portraits. C. de Thierry.
Princetown; a Great Convict Settlement. Illustrated. B. F.

Etude. - T. PRESSER, PHILADELPHIA. 15 cents. June. Child-Study. Frances C. Robinson The Educational Value of Concerts. Emma S. Dymond.

Expositor.—Hodder and Stoughton. 18. July. Expositor.—Hodder and Stoughton. 18. July.

Professor Ramsay on the Incidence of Passover, and the Use of German Authorities. Prof. B. W. Bacon.

A Point in the Christology of First Corinthians. Rev. N. J. D. White. The Unity of Job. Prof. D. S. Margolibuth.

The Holy Ministry. Rev. J. Watson.

Pilate. Rev. W. M. Macgregor.

On the Lucan Interpretation of Christ's Death. Rev. G. Milligan.

The Royal Ancestry of Zephaniah. Rev. G. Buchanan Gray. Expository Times .- SIMPKIN, MARSHALL. 6d. July.

Amos. Rev. J. M. Danson.
The Missionary Methods of the Apostles. Continued. Rev. John Reid.
The Sefer Ha-Galuy of Saadya. Prof. W. Bacher. Feilden's Magazine. TEMPLE CHAMBERS. 15. June.

Electro-Galvanising. Illustrated. S. Cowper-Coles.
The Evolution of the Portable Engine. Illustrated. W. Fletcher.
The Leen Valley Branch of the Great Northern Railway Company. Illus-Pneumatic Tools and Appliances. Illustrated, Continued, E. C. Amos.

Fireside.—7, PATERNOSTER SQUARE. 6d. July. Paris and the Exhibition. Illustrated. Bon Voyage. The History of Carrots. G. L. Apperson. Florence Nightingale.

Fortnightly Review .- CHAPMAN AND HALL. 25. 6d. July. Fortnightly Review.—CHAPMAN AND HALL. 2s. 6d. Ju
The Policy of Peace. Edward Dicey.
An Overworked Minister and—a Remedy. Beckles Willson.
France, Russia, and the Peace of the World. Dr. Karl Blind,
Two Mottoes of Cardinal Newman. Wilfrid Ward.
The Staging of Shakespeare. H. Beerbohm Tree.
The Workmen's Compensation Act. Judge Parry.
Concerning Hosts and Hostesses. T. H. S. Escott.
On Climax in Tragedy. Prof. Lewis Campbell.
With Lancet and Rifle on the Beira Railway. L. Orman Cooper.
The Naval Strength of the Seven Sea-Powers. J. Holt Schooling.
Poets as Legislators. Albert D. Vandam.
The Paris Exhibition. H. Heuthcote Statham.
The Crisis in the Far East. Diplomaticus.
The March to Pretoria. With Maps.

The March to Pretoria. With Maps.

Forum.—GAV AND BIRD. 15. 6d. June.

The Attitude of the United States towards the Chinese. Ho Yow.
The Present Position of the Irish Question. J. E. Redmond.
Do We owe Independence to the Filipinos? Charles Denby.
College Philosophy. G. Stanley Hall.
An Unwritten Chapter in Recent Tariff History. J. Schoenhof.
Teaching in High Schools as a Lift. Occupation for Men. E. E. Hill.
The U. K., the U. S., and the Ship Canal. Sir Charles W. Dilke.
Organized Labour in France. W. B. Scaife.
The Ministry: the Pre-eminent Profession. Rev. H. A. Stimson.
American and Canadian Trade Relations. J. Charlton.
A Contribution to the Armenian Question. C. A. P. Rohrbach.
Southern Literature of the Year. B. W. Wells. A Contribution to the Armenian Question. C. Southern Literature of the Year. B. W. Wells.

Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly .- 141, FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK. The President's War. Illustrated. D. B. R. Keim.
A Metropolitan Night. Illustrated. S. H. Adams.
Juana la Loca; the Greatest Passion in History. Illustrated. Blanche Z. Baralt.
At the Ends of the British Empire. Illustrated. R. E. Speer.
Some Tame Animals I thought I knew. Illustrated. Martha M. Williams.
Women as Architects. Illustrated. J. D. Miller.

XUM

Genealogical Magazine, -ELLIOT STOCK. IS. July.

Lyon's New Book. Illustrated.
"A Record of the Redes." Illustrated.
Arms of the Burgh of Arbroath.
Names derived from Egypt. "Crux."

Gentleman's Magazine,-Chatto and Windus, is, July, The Sedan Chair. A. M. Stevens. Marguerite d'Angoulème as Princess and Poetess. Katherine W. Elwes. Greece and Ireland. Mrs. E. M. Lynch. Candid Opinions of Contemporaries. F. G. Walters. Folk-Rhymes of Places. A. L. Salmon. The Herschels and the Nebulæ. J. E. Gore. The Midday Moon and the Midnight Sun. H. Schütz Wilson.

Geographical Journal.-Edward Stanford. 2s. June. Twelve Years' Work of the Ordnance Survey, 1887-1899. With Maps. Col. Sir J. Farquharson. Exploration of the Bermejo River and Its Affluents, Argentine Republic. Exploration of the Bermejo River and Its Affluents, Argentine Republic.

With Map.

Notes on the Country between Lake Chinta and the River Luli, Central Africa. With Maps. Illustrated. Captain F. B. Pearce.

Some Unpublished Spitzbergen MSS. Illustrated. Sir Martin Conway.

Geological Magazine. - DULAU. 18. 6d. June. Bala Lake and the River System of North Wales. With Map. Philip Lake. Bala Lake and the River System of North Wales. With Shape, a hind Lake. The Parent-Rock of the Diamond, Prof. T. G., Bonney, On the Genus Conocoryphe, F. R. C. Reed. Tortoise from the Wealden of the 1sle of Wight. Illustrated, R. W. Hooley, A Geological Examination of Snowdon, Illustrated, J. R. Dakyns.

Girl's Own Paper .- 56, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. How to grow Apples and Pears. Illustrated. Continued. B. Wells. Characteristic Church Towers of Lancashire. Illustrated. H. W. Brewer. The Princess of Wals's Dogs. Illustrated. E. M. Jessop. Frederick the Great; a Royal Musician. Illustrated. Miss Eleonore d'Esterre-Keeling.

Girl's Realm .- 10, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND. 6d. July. Four Girls at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. Christina G. Whyte. The Edinburgh School of Domestic Economy; How I learnt Home Rule. Illustrated. Caroline E. Turner.

Good Words.-ISBISTER. 6d. July.

Cognominal Puzzles. E. Whitaker.
The Tsar. Illustrated. Dr. E. J. Dillon.
A Tramp through the Forest of Fontainebleau. Illustrated. Hannah At the Siege of Kimberley. A Sergeant in the Town Guard. Ruskin and Venice. Rev. A. Robertson. How Wild Creatures feed. Illustrated. F. G. Aflalo.

Great Thoughts .- 28, HUTTON STREET, FLEET STREET. 6d. July. Eversley and Charles Kingsley. Illustrated. Margaret Bradley. The Evil Influence of Smart Society; Interview with Arnold White. Portrait. R. Blathwayt.

Alfred Deakin; an Australi in Federalist. With Portrait. E. St. John Hare.

Andrew Marvell. With Portrait. Rsv. R. P. Downes.

Popular Music; Interview with August Manns. With Portrait. R. Blathwayt, Gutenberg; the Inventor of Printing. With Portrait. Rev. R. P. Downes.

Harmsworth Magazine.-HARMSWORTH. 3td. June. Harmsworth Magazine,—Harmsworth. 34d. June. Why not ent Insects? Illustrated. Rev. T. Wood. The Last of the Red Indians. Illustrated. W. S. Harwood. Some Famous Newsp.per Scoops; Stories of Journalistic Enterprise. Illustrated. F. A. Talbot. What to see at the Paris Exposition. Illustrated. J. E. Woodacott. Greater Britain. Illustrated. R. Machray. St. Helena; the Prison of Napoleon and Cronje. Illustrated. W. Kilmurray. Masonic Mysteriss. Illustrated. W. J. Wintle. Men Who have risen from the Ranks. With Portraits. A. Birnage.

Harper's Monthly Magazine .- 45, ALBEMARLE STREET. 18. July. Harper's Monthly Magazine.—45, Albemarke Street. 18. July.
Inside the Boer Lines. Illustrated. Continued. E. E. Easton.
An Ex-Slaveholder's View. R. Bingham.
Non-Hygienic Gymnastics. J. Buckham.
English War-Correspondents in South Africa. Illustrated. F. A. McKenzie, A Journey to the Abyssinian Capital. Illustrated. Continued. Capt.
M. S. Wellby.
Educational Use of Hypnotism. J. D. Quackenbos.
Professor Ernst Hackel and the New Zoology. Illustrated. Dr. H. S.
Williams.

Harvard Graduates' Magazine .- 5, Beacon Street, Boston. Charles Franklin Dunbar. With Portrait. C. W. Eliot. The Harvard Law Clubs. J. P. Cotton, Jr. What the Associated Clubs have done. F. H. Gade. The Coming of the Cuban Teachers.

Home Magazine.—NASSAU STRRET, NEW YORK CITY. 10 cents. June.
Counting the Nation by Electricity. Illustrated. C. S. Wilbur.
The Strange Story of the Chinese Emperor. With Portraits. R. van Bergen.
Microbes and Microbe-Farming. Illustrated. W. G. Bowdoin.
Tibet; the Land of Mag.c. Illustrated. Dr. Henry Liddell.

Homiletic Review .- 44, FLEET STREET. 18. 2d. June. Practical Results of the Scientific Discoveries of the Nineteenth Century. Dr. G. F. Wright. Dr. G. r. Wright.
One of Arthur Manning's Experiments. Bishop J. H. Vincent.
The New Hebrides; an Object Lesson in Missions. Dr. J. G. Paton.
God's Work in Our Work in Sanctification. Dr. A. Kuyper.
Recent Developments in Biblical Criticism. Dr. W. J. Beecher.

Humanitarian-Duckworth. 6d. July.

The Faiths of Ancient India. Prof. R. Dutt.
A Kirghiz Home in Siberia. Dr. H. Turner.
The Food Value of Alcohol. Prof. J. Madden.
The Economic Position of Women:—
In Trades and Manufactures. Madeleine Greenwood.
In Journalism. A Woman Journalist.
In Domestic Service. Dora M. Jones.
In America. Collapsia.

In America. Columbia. The Philosophy of War. E. W. Moody. Sound Waves in Stringed Instruments. E. Van der Straeten.

Ideal Review.-GAY AND BIRD. IS. 3d. June. The Making and Decaying of the Creed. Rev. H. Frank. The Symbols of the Bible. Continued. F. Hartmann. The Music of India. Mrs. A. Smith. Percy Bysshe Shelley. C. H. A. B.

International .- A. T. H. BROWER, CHICAGO. 10 cents. June. A Mine Hunt in Old Mexico. Illustrated. D. Furness. Beneath the Yew Tree's Shade at Stoke Poges. Illustrated. K. E. Harriman.

Dewey Day in Chicago. Illustrated. L. M. Scott. Nathaniel Hawthorne. F. B. Embree.

Mannix.

International Monthly, -MACMILLAN. 18. June. Relation between Early Religion and Morality. E. Buckley. Political Parties and City Government. F. J. Goodnow. Recent Advance in Medical Science. R. W. Wilcox. The Nature of the Creative Imagination. T. Ribot. High Explosives. Capt. E. L. Zalinski.

Irish Ecclesiastical Record .- 24, NASSAU St., DUBLIN. 18. June. "De Custodia Eucharistiae." Rev. J. Magnier.
Alleluia's Thought Sequence Rev. T. J. O'Mahony.
Dr. W. Walsh; a Champion of God's Ark in Penal Days. Rev. E. Nagle.
Primary Education in Rome. Rev. J. O'Connell.
Notes on the Canonical Aspects of a Plenary or National Synod. Rev. D.

Irish Monthly .- M. H. Gill, Dublin. 6d. July. From Dublin to Constantinople; a Dash across Europe. C. T. Wate The Non-Sequaciousness of Ralph Waldo Emerson. Rev. P. Dillon.

Irish Rosary .- 47, LITTLE BRITAIN. 3d. July. The Trappists in South Africa. Illustrated. A Refugee.

Journal of the Board of Agriculture.-LAUGHTON. 18. June. Some Local Conditions of Forestry in England. Fungoid Diseases of Roots of Fruit-Trees. Illustrated. Favus in Poultry. F. V. Theobald. Consumption of Maize. Manuring of Potatoe Experiments in Pig-Feeding. American Farmers' Institutes.

Journal of Geology.-Luzac. 50 cents. May. Edward Orton. J. J. Stevenson. Granitic Rocks of the Pikes Peak Quadrangle. E. B. Mathews. A North American Epicontinental Sea of Jurassic Age. W. N. Logan.

Journal of the Royal United Service Institution.-J. J. Keliher.

Personal Observations and Impressions of the Forces and Military Establishments now in South Africa. Sir Howard Vincent.
Firing on Coast D.fences. Lieut. Myakish.f.

Knowledge.—326, High Holborn. 6d. July.
The Total Solar Eclips: of May 28, 1900. Illustrated. E. Walter Maunder.
The Great Indian Earthqu & of 1837. Illustrated. C. Davison.
American Indians. Illustrated. R. Lydekker.
Some Early Theories on Fermentation. W. Stanley Smith.
Plants and Their Food. Illustrated. H. H. W. Pearson.
Fish-Bears and their Kindred. Illustrated. Rev. T. R. R. Stebbing.

Ladies' Home Journal.-Curtis, Philadelphia. 10 cents. July. Fashionable Summer Resorts of the Century. Illustrated. W. Perrine. Deborah Gannett; the Girl Who fought in the Revolution. Mabel Percy Haskell.

Lady's Realm.—HUTCHINSON. 6d. July. Atelier Lafayette. Illustrated.
Places Sacred to Lovers. Illustrated.
Society at Lord's. Illustrated. Mrs. S. Rawson.
Some Royal Love-Stories. Illustrated. Minka von Drachenfels.
Fancy Fêtes. Illustrated. G. A. Wade.
The Queen's Pet Dogs. Illustrated.
The Queen's Pet Dogs. Illustrated.
The Season at the Opera. Illustrated. J. Rawson.
The Season at the Opera. Illustrated. J. Rawson.
The Season at the Opera. Illustrated. J. Rawson.

A Wa Pastur Creose Practi Lady Acqui

Fictio Salmo Lyon Camp A Rui Glean Old F Unive Herba The The M

The F How Pamp Engli The (How Archi Li Wome

Classi

Local

The C Lipp The I Elizal The

Egyp The l Behir West Engla Gilba Mad

The I Prost Leger The John The The l Sex C

Poste Medi The Mis Addr Uniq Asia The

An O A Kh The C Dant Right Parlo Amer A Ple June. enth Century.

. Paton.

er.

June.

N. IS.

E. Nagle.

. Rev. D.

Vaters.

June.

ogan. KELIHER. Establish-

Maunder.

ng. July. rrine. el Percy oley.

lon.

d. K. F.

A War-Horse Society. M. Peacock.
Pastures Old and New. J. Perkins.
Technical Evidence. H. Bushell.
Creosoting Timber for Estate Purposes. J. Pearson.
Practical Note on Tuberculosis. Sir J. Sawyer.
Lady Gardeners. J. M. Dugdale.
Acquisition of Woodland Area in the Forest of Dean. W. R. Fisher.

Land Magazine .- 149, STRAND. 18. June.

Leisure Hour .- 56, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. July. Leisure Hour,—56. PATERNOSTER ROW. Od. July. Fiction, New and Old. Lily Watson. Salmon. Illustrated. W. J. Gordon. Lyon Playfair. With Portrait. Camp Life in British New Guinea. C. Ross-Johnson. A Run through St. Helena. J. Walker. Gleanings from Some Eighteenth-Century Newspapers. Old Highland Days. Illustrated. Continued. Dr. J. Kennedy. University Education and What It costs. Illustrated.

Library.-KEGAN PAUL. 3s. June.

Herbert Putnam. With Portrait.
The "Pooling" of Private Libraries. G. S. Layard.
The Morisons of Perth; a Notable Publishing House.
The British Museum Revised Rules for Cataloguing.
The Reputed First Circulating Subscription Liwray in London. A. Clarke.
How Things are done in St. Louis Public Library.

Continued. F. M.

Crunden.

Pamphlets and the Pamphlet Duty of 1712. J. Macfarlane. English Royal Collectors. W. Y. Flercher, The Children's Books That have lived. C. Welsh. How to open a New Book. Illustrated. C. Chivers. Architecture for Libraries. Illustrated. B. Pite.

Library Association Record, -HORACE MARSHALL. 18. June. Women Librarians and Their Future Prospects. Miss M. S. R. James. Librarian and Reader. J. E. Pythian. Classified versus Dictionary Catalogues. H. Bond.

Library World .- 4, AVE MARIA LANE. 6d. June.

Local Records; Symposium.
The Censor in the Public Library.
The Librarian's Library.
Sequel Stories. T. Aldred.

Lippincott's Monthly Magazine. - Lippincott, Philadelphia. 18. June.

The Battle of Bunker Hill, 1775. S. Crane. Elizabeth Patterson (Madame Jerome Bonaparte). Virginia T. Peacock. The Swiss Passion Play at Selzach, Illustrated. Christine T. Herrick.

Longman's Magazine.-Longmans. 6d. July. Egypt in the Middle Ages. Prof. Stanley Lane Poole, The Real Rose. W. Pigott.

Macmillan's Magazine. - MACMILLAN. 18. July, Conversations with Gounod. Baroness Martinengo-Cesaresco. On Irish Greens. E. E. Behind the Purdah. Miss Sorabji. Western Scouts. E. B. Osborn. England and Italy. Bolton King. Gilbert White and His Recent Editors. Prof. Newton.

Madras Review.—Thompson, Minerva Press, Madras. 2 rupe2s.
May.

May.

The Feudatories of India.

The Hindu Gains of Learning Bill. T. S.
Prospects of Hinduism in the West. R. A.
Legends of Ancient Madura, E. H. Brookes.

The Ethics of the Bhagavad Gitá. M. Kunjunni Nayar.
John Ruskin. C. Gopal Menon.

The Tamils; Eighteen Hundred Years Ago. V. K. Pillai.

The Boer and the Hindu. K. S. Aiyer.

Medical Magazine.—62, King William Street. 15. June.

Constitution and Its Relation to Pulmonary Tuberculosis. Sir H. Beev

Sex Constitution and Its Relation to Pulmonary Tuberculosis. Sir H. Beevor. Posterior Basic Meningitis. Sir D. Duckworth. Medicine and Philosophy. Dr. T. C. Allbutt. The New University of London. Continued. Dr. W. H. Allchin.

Missionary Review of the World .-- 44, Fleet Street. 25 cents.

The Great Ecumenical Conference. Illustrated. Dr. A. T. Pierson. Addresses of Welcome to Delegates. B. Harrison and W. McKinley. Unique Aspects of Missions in Africa. Illustrated. R. H. Nassau. Asia's Great Need. Mrs. Isabella Bird Bishop. The Value of Medical Missions. G. E. Post. An Object Lesson in Self-Support in Korea. H. G. Underwood.

National Review .- EDWARD ARNOLD. 25. 6d. July. National Review.—EDWARD ARNOLD, 28, 6d. July, A Khaki Dissolution. Conservative M.P.
The Conspiracy against the French Republic. F. C. Conybeare. Dante's Realistic Treatment of the Ideal. Alfred Austin. Rights of the Weak. W. H. Mallock.
Parlous Condition of Cricket. Horace G. Hutchinson. American Affairs. A. Maurice Low.
A Plea for Military History. C. Oman.
A Trip from Uganda to Khartoum. With Map. Capt. M. F. Gage. The Swiss Army; Its Lessons for England. C. G. Coulton. Some Final Impressions of the Roman Catholic Church. Arthur Galton. Story of the Boer War. With Map. H. W. Wilson. New England Magazine. -5. PARK SQUARE, BOSTON. 25 cents. June.

The Passing of the Birds. Illustrated. E. S. Rolfe. The English Durchester. Illustrated. S. J. Barrows, New England in Wisconsin. Illustrated. Ellis Baker Usher. The Libraries of Rhode Island. Illustrated. H. R. Palmer.

New Ireland Review.—Burns and Oates. 6d. July.

New Ireland Review,—Burns and Oates, 6d. July.

How to start a Public Library. W. J. Johnston.

The Love Letters of Lord Edward FitzGerald. J. O'Mahony.

The Psychology of George Meredith. M. Vesey Hague.

Literature and Politics of the Vikings. Continued. G. F. H. Berkeley.

New World.—GAY AND BIRD. 3s. June.

The De:per Issue in the Ritualistic Controversy in the Church of England, K. C. Anderson.

On Preaching. W. Kirkus.

The Christian Ideal. C. A. Allen.

Plutarch and His Age. R. M. Wenley.

Religion and the Larger Universe. J. T. Bixby.

The Greek Games. W. McK. Bryant.

The Teaching of Jesus concerning the Rich. F. G. Peabody.

Ninteenth Contury.—Sameson Low. 2s. 6d. July.

Nineteenth Century.-Sampson Low. 28. 6d. July. The Lessons of the War; a Proposed Association.
Our Vacillation in China and its Consequences. Henry Norman, Soldier Settlers in South Africa. Col. J. G. B. Stopford.
The Home Generals and Their Work in the Coming Autumn. Col. Lonsdale

Hale.

Administrative Reform in the Public Service. P. Lyttelton Gell, In the Bye-Ways of Rural Ireland. Michael MacDonagh. Hooliganism and Juvenile Crime. Rev. Andrew A. W. Drew. Town Children in the Country. Mrs. S. A. Barnett. Sixpenny Telegrams—Why They do not pay. J. Henniker Heaton. Identification Offices in India and Egypt. Francis Galton. Mr. Wilfrid Ward's Apologetics. Robert Edward Dell. The Prerogative of Dissolution. Edmund Robertson. Wanted—a Leader. Dr. J. Guinness Rogers.

The Newspapers. Sir Wemyss Reid.

North American Review .- WM. HEINEMANN. 25. 6d. June. North American Review.—Wm. Heinemann. 2s. 6d. June.
The Issue in the Presidential Campaign. W. J. Bryan.
Australian Federation and Its Baists. E. Barton.
Will Education solve the Race Problem? Prof. J. R. Straton.
The Meeting of the Olymp an Games. Baron Pierre de Coubertin.
How England should treat the Vanquished Boers. Sir Sidney Shippard.
Modern Persian Literature. Prof. E. Denison Ross.
What has become of Hell? Dr. G. W. Shino.
Cecil Rhodes's Future. Princess Catherine Radziwill.
British and Russian Diplomacy. A Diplomat.
Antagonism of England and Russia. D. C. Boulger.
Great Britain in Asia. Sir Richard Temple.
Charter Needs of Great Cities. B. S. Coler.

Open Court.-KEGAN PAUL. 6d. June. The Tomb of Vibia. Illustrated. Dr. E. Maas.
The Old and the New Magic. Illustrated. Dr. Paul Carus.
The Concept. Dr. E. Mach.
Rhyme and Rhythm in the Koran. D. J. Rankin.
Gospel Parallels from Păli Texts; Psychical Powers. Translated by A. J.
Edmunds.

Our Day .- 112, LA SALLE AVENUE, CHICAGO. May. Leonard Wood, Governor-General of Cuba. E. C. Cleveland, Postal Savings Banks. C. Holdridge, Twentieth Century Tenements. H. T. Davidson, The Secret of Eff.ctive Preaching. Ian Maclaren.

Outing.—International. Naws Co. 25 cents. June.
The Country Cart of To-day. Illustrated. C. Whitney.
Evolution of the Trout and the Artificial Fly. Illustrated. Dr. H. Gove.
A Bit about Bass. Illustrated. E. W. Sandys.
Early Road-Diving and Its Patrons. Illustrated. Nathan A. Cole.
The Laying-Out and Care of a Golf Course. Illustrated. W. Tucker. Overland Monthly .- SAN FRANCISCO. 10 cents. May.

Golf in California. Illustrated. California's First Vacation School. Illustrated. Eva V. Carlin. The Story of a Paroled Prisoner. W. F. Prosser. National Pavilions at the Paris Exposition. Illustrated. Josephine Tozier

National Pavilions at the Paris Exposition. Illustrated. Josephine Tozi Pall Mall Magazine,—18, Charing Cross Road. 18. July. Naworth Castle. Illustrated. Rev. A. H. Malan. Dramatists and Their Methods. Illustrated. H. Wyndham. Elizabeth Chudleigh. Illustrated. Mrs. Parr. Anglo-American Literary Copyright. Alfred Austin. The Military Traditions of the City of London. Kathleen Schlesinger. Parents' Review.—Kegan Paul. 6d. June. The Mind of a Child and the Teaching of Religion. Rev. J. Kelman The Consecration of Influence in Society. Mrs. R. Jardine. Pearson's Magazine.—C. A. Pearson. 6d. July. Polo: The Rich Man's Game. Illustrated. H. Prott.

Pearson's Magazine,—C. A. Pearson. 6d. July.
Polo; The Rich Man's Game. Illustrated. H. Pratt.
The Criminal Lunatic Asylum. Illustrated. G. Griffith.
The Killing of the Mammoth. Illustrated. H. Tukeman.
How the Plonets are weighed. Illustrated. Frof. S. Newcomb.
The Possibilities of Reaching the Four Poles. I-lustrated. F. A. Cook
Diving as a Fine Art. Illustrated. H. Henry.
How will the World End? Illustrated. H. C. Fyfe.
Midnight Mountaineering. Illustrated. T. Morton.

Physical Review .- MACMILLAN. 50 cents. June. The Transmission of the Ionized Exhalations of Phosphorus through Air and Other Media. C. Barus.
An Hermetically Sealed Type of Clark Standard Cell. H. T. Barnes.
Concerning Thermal Conductivity in Iron. E. H. Hall.
Spark-Length of an Electric Influence Machine as modified by a Small Spark from the Negative Side. W. J. Humphreys.

Positivist Review .- Wm. Reeves. 3d. July.

As Others see Us. Frederic Harrison. Classification of the Sciences. J. H. Bridges. Professor Höffding on Positivism. F. S. Marvin.

Practical Teacher .- 33, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. July.

Rhineland. Illustrated. On turning over an Old Paris Sketch-book. Illustrated.

Primitive Methodist Quarterly Review.—Thomas MITCHELL. 25.

The Spiritual Condition of Primitive Methodism at the End of the Century.

The Spiritual Condition of Primitive Methodism at the End of the Centu R. Hind.
Our Lord's Teaching. B. Haddon.
The Economic, Physical, and Moral Evils of War. W. Spedding.
The Bass of Rel gious Belief. J. W. Rodgers.
West African Fetish. T. E. Currah.
The Spirit and the Incarnation. R. G. Graham.
The Temperance Movement. M. P. Davison.
The Original Home of the Indogermanic Peoples.
A. W. B. Welford.
The Social Aspects of Christianity. M. Johnson.
Bunyan's Dream in the Light of His Life and Times. J. D. Thompson.
The Pa. is Exhibition. H. Owen.

Public Health.—129, SHAFTESBURY AVENUE. 18. June. Municipal Dispensaries, C. Sanders, The Administration of Fever Hospitals. E. W. Goodall.

Public School Magazine .- 131, TEMPLE CHAMBERS. 6d. June. Bradfield College. Illustrated. A. F. Leach. School Journalism. A. E. Johnson.

Puritan .- 16, PILGRIM STREET. 6d. July. The Christian Endeavour Convention, July, 1900. Illustrated. B. E.

Pengelly.

"Lewis Carroll" as a Preacher. Illustrated. C. T. Bateman.

Scrooby; the Nursery of the Pilgrim Fathers. Illustrated. Charlotte

Mason.
Russia as a Temperance Reformer. A. S. Quick.
Regent Square Presbyterian Church and the Rev. Alex. Connell. Illustrated. F. A. McKenzie.

Quiver.-Cassell. 6d. July. The Christian Endeavour World's Convention. Illustrated. Rev. F. B. Meyer, Illustrated Rev. H. B. Freeman.
Native-Built Churches, Illustrated, F. M. Holmes,
Some Reminiscences of Longfellow. Illustrated. Rev. J. Coleman.

Review of Reviews,—(America.) 13, ASTOR PLACE, New York. 25 cents. June.

James J. Hill; a Builder of the Northwest. Illustrated. Mary Harriman

Severance.
Paris and the Exposition of 1900. Illustrated. Albert Shaw.
The New York Tenement-House Commission. Illustrated. Jacob Riis.
Summer Camps for Boys. Illustrated. L. Rouillion.
Automobiles for the Average Man. Illustrated. Cleveland Moffett.
The Refunding Law in Operation. C. A. Conant.
The Parsain roce. C. P. Seeh.
July.

Mr. Bryan in 1900. C. B. Spahr.
The New Australian Constitution. H. H. Lusk.
The Republican Candidate; the Record of President McKinley's Administration.

The Public Library and the Public School.
The Revival of Early Industries; a Profitable Philanthropy. Illustrated.
Helen R. Albee. Cotton-Mills in Cotton-Fields, Illustrated. Leonora Beck Ellis. New Developments in Textile Schools. Illustrated. Jane A. Stewart.

Review of Reviews .- (Australasia). Queen Street, Melbourne.

Fighting the "Black Death" in Sydney. Illustrated. P. R. Meggy.
The Secret of the Empire. Dr. W. H. Fitchett.
Shall Western Australia be broken up? J. W. Hackett.
All about Lord Kitchener. W. T. Stead.
How Jack fights on Land.

Royal Magazine.-C. A. PEARSON. 4d. July. The Art of the Camera. Illustrated. R. Grey.
The Rise of Kitchener. Illustrated. R. Maingay.
Women Who do Men's Work. Illustrated. Florence Burnley and Kathleen Schlesinger.

Daily Life on a Battleship. Illustrated. A. S. Hurd.

Tommy Atkins at Play. Illustrated. H. Grainger.

Football as a Fine Art. H. L. Adam.

St. Nicholas,-MACMILLAN. 18. Some Great Sea-Fights. Illustrated. Jessie P. Frothingham.

School Board Gazette.-Bemrose. zs. June. Evening Continuation Schools. Higher Elementary Schools.

School World.—MacMillan. 6d. July. Aids to Classical Study. Illustrated. W. H. D. Rouse.

Science Gossip. -110, STRAND. 6d. July.

Geological Notes in Orange River Colony, Illustrated, Major B. M. Skinner.
Notes on Spinning Animals, Illustrated, H. W. Kew, Butterflies of the Palacarctic Region, Illustrated, Continued, H. C. Lang

Birds at Lynmouth. T. H. Mead-Briggs. Geology around Barmouth. Illustrated. J. H. Cooke. An Introduction to British Spiders. Illustrated. F. P. Smith.

Scottish Geographical Magazine. - Edward Stanford. is. 6d.

The Basin of the Yukon River in Canada. With Map. Illustrated. J. B. Tyrrell.
The Cordillera of Mexico and Its Inhabitants. Illustrated. O. H. Howarth.
The Proposed Scottish National Antarctic Expedition. With Map. W. S.

Bruce. Bokhara. Illustrated. W. R. Rickmers.

Scribner's Magazine.-Sampson Low. 18. July. The Slave Trade in America. Illustrated. John R. Spears. Trees. Illustrated. F. French. The Relix of Ladysmith. Illustrated. R. H. Davis. Harvard College Fifty-Eight Years Ago. G. F. Hoar. The River People, Illustrated. D. Marshall. The Boer as a Soldier. T. F. Millard. The Tendancy to Health. D. G. Mason.

Strand Magazine.-George Newnes. 6d. July. Sociable Fish. Illustrated. F. T. Bullen.
The World's Cathedrals in Miniature. Illustrated. A. H. Broa Curious Incidents at Cricket. Illustrated. W. J. Ford.
Boiler Explosions. Illustrated. J. Horner.
Pruning the Great Hedge of Meikleour. Illustrated. A. Blair.

Sunday at Home .- 56, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. July. Rev. F. B. Meyer. Illustrated.

Napoleon at St. Helena. Illustrated. W. Stevens.
The Bible in Africa. Illustrated. Rev. T. H. Darlow.
The New York Conference on Foreign Missions. Rev. R. Lovett.
In the Heart of London. Illustrated. Continued. Mrs. Isabella Fyvie Mayo.

Sunday Magazine.-Isbister. 6d. July. The Religious Element in the Poets. Continued. Bishop Boyd Carpenter. The Christian Endeavour Society. Illustrated. J. W. Spurgeon. Little Folk of Many Lands. Illustrated. G. Winterwood. Bishop Chavasse of Liverpool. Illustrated. One Who Knows Hi

Sunday Strand.-George Newnes. 6d. July. The Life of Jesus Christ. Illustrated. Continued. Ian Maclaren.
Our Wounded at Home. Illustrated. Marie A. Belloc.
Princess Christian; a Philânthropic Princess. Illustrated. Mrs. S. A.

Tooley.
The Indian Famine. Illustrated. G. Clark.
The Teachers' Orphanges. Illustrated. J. H. Yoxal..
The United Kingdom in Pawn to Pay the Victorian Drink Bill. Illustrated. W. Greenwood.

Temple Bar.-MACMILLAN. 18. July.

Counsellor O'Connell. M. MacDonagh. Poets at Variance. H. M. Sanders. Heine's Frau Mathilde. Solomon Maimon; a Tatterdemalion Philosopher.

Temple Magazine.-Horace Marshall. 6d. July. My Pulpit Experiences. Illustrated. Rev. H. R. Haweis. How Tommy Atkins amuses Himself in Barracks. Illustrated. G. F. Wade. Some Distinguished Women and Good Work. Illustrated. Spbil C. Mitford. Concerning Paper. Illustrated. Miss Gertrude Bacon. Shirley Baker; a Missionary Who "ran" a Kingdom. Illustrated. A. Fratson.

The Romance of Lincoln Minster. Illustrated. Audrey Winter.

Theosophical Review. -3, LANGHAM PLACE. 18. June. The Philosophy of Bruno. W. H. Thomas. Apollonius; the Philosopher-Reformer of the First Century. G. R. S. Mead.

The Nature of Theosophical Proofs, Mrs. Annie Besant. Theism and Pantheism. Dr. A. A. Wells. Celi-Cêd and the Cult of the Wren. Mrs. Hooper. The Life and Work of Madame de Krüdener. By a Russian.

Travel.-Horace Marshall and Son. 3d. June. A Modern Pilgrimage to Mount Athos. Continued. Illustrated. Dr. H. Lansdell.

The Curious Churches of Bornholm. Illustrated, A. E. Bonser. Behind the Back of the Beyond in Inverness-shire. Illustrated, J. L. W.

Werner's Magazine. -43, EAST 19TH STREET, NEW YORK. 25 cents. June. Expression in the United States South.
William Shakespeare on Voice-Culture. Continued. L. A. Russell.

Wes

O'd an A Mod Austra

Loyalt

Boer v

Woma

Bordig Hecto

Science The T The V

How :

My T Amon Child

A Lac Santa

Print

The

The The Da

Bird:

Ober Graf

Pari

De

Hur

Fri: Wal

Tha

Cala The

The Che The Asi The

De

Th Ha Be

Y

H

Weslevan Methodist Magazine.-Charles Kelly, 6d. June. Westeyan methodisc magnaine,—arries keiler, od. Joh Old and New Madrid. Illustrated. Rev. F. G. Smith. A Modern Pilgrimage to Jerusalem. Illustrated. Frances E. Davison. Australasian Methodism. J. S. H. Royce.

Australasian methodism. J. S. H. Royce.

Westminster Review.—F. Warne. 2s. 6d. July.
Loyalty and War. A. E. Maddock.
Boer v. Briton. Continued. Hugh H. L. Bellot.
Woman and War. Nora Twycross.
Labour v. Landlordism.
Bordighern: Past and Present. W. Miller.
Hector Macpherson on Harbert Spencer. Oliphant Smeaton.
Science in Higher Grade Schools A. T. Simmons.
The Tenacity of Superstition. D. F. Hannigan.
The Value of Money and Prices, G. J. Forsyth Grant.

ajor B. M.

d. H. C.

rs. 6d.

ted. J. B.

Howarth.

well.

ly.

vie Mayo.

Carpenter.

s. S. A.

ustrated.

. Wade Mitford.

ted. A.

. R. S.

Dr. H. L. W.

c.

Wide World Magazine.-George Newnes. 6d. July. How a Forest Fire was extinguished with Wine. Illustrated. Prof. C. F. Holder. My Trip up the Matroosberg. Illustrated. Miss K. M. Wilson. Among the Wild Elsphants of Travancore. Illustrated. F. J. C. Martin. Children's Toys in Siam. Illustrated. H. Hillman. A Lady Ibez-Hunter in Baltistan. Illustrated. Mrs. E. Tweddell. Santa Catalina; a Californian Paradise. Illustrated. Prof. C. F. Holder.

Windsor Magazine.-WARD, LOCK. 6d. July. Skagen; a Danish Newlyn. Illustrated. A. E. Fletcher.
To the Memory of the Brave; How the Public Schools honour Their Dead Heroes. Illustrated. G. A. Wade. The Biggest Engine in the World. Illustrated. H. C. Fyf.: My First Century in Cricket. Illustrated. M. R. Roberts. The Passion Play at Oberammergau. Illustrated. A. de Burgh. The Education of the Blind. Illustrated. P. Gibbs.

Woman at Home.-Hodder and Stoughton. 6d. July. Paris Hatland. Illustrated. Marie A. Belloc, Lord Rosebery. Illustrated. Continued. General Hector Macdonald. Illustrated. A. Mackintosh.

Womanhood .- 5. AGAR STREET, STRAND. 6d. July. Weaving: a Wiltshire Industry. Illustrated. Helen C. Black. Littlehampton; a Haven for the Weary. Illustrated. Mrs. Ada Ballin.

Yale Review. -- Edward Arnold. 75 cents. May. Yale Review.—Edward Arxold. 75 cents. May.
Democracy and Peace. S. M. Macvan:.
The Political Consequences of City Growth. L. S. Rowe.
Railway Progress and Agricultural Development. H. T. Newcombe.
Experience of the Dutch with Tropical Labour; Abolition of the Culture System and Transition to Free Labour. Clive Day.

Young Man .- HORACE MARSHALL. 3d. July. Lord Rosebery, Past, Present, and Future. Illustrated. Arthur Mee. The Tyranny of the Drink Traffic. J. A. Steuart. The Romance of Commerce. Willium Dean Howells. With Portrait. W. Clark..

Young Woman .- HORACE MARSHALL. 3d. July. How to make the most of a Holiday. Madame Sarah Grand. Sweden's Queen; a Democrat in a Palace. Illustrated. Women's Clubland in Paris. Illustrated. Mrs. S. A. Tooley.

THE GERMAN MAGAZINES.

Alte und Neue Welt .- Benziger, Einsiedeln. 50 Pf. June. Printing and Its Development. Illustrated. O. von Karlstein.
The Holy Jubile: Year in the Catholic Church. Illustrated. E. e. mos.
The Prince of Wales. Illustrated. Dr. A. Heine.
The New German Civil Code. Continued. C. Burla.

Daheim.-Velhagen and Klasing, Leipzig. 2 Mks. per qr. June 2. Birds' Nests. Illustrated. C. Schwarzkopf. Paris Exhibition. Continued. Illustrated. H. von Zobeltitz. Paris Exhibition. Continued. Illustrated. H. von Zobeltitz.

Oberammergau. Illustrated. Prof. E. Heyck.

June 23.

Graf Hans von Kanitz auf Podangen. Illustrated. P. Grab.in.

Graf Hans von Kanitz auf Podangen. Illustrated. P. Grabbin Gutenberg. Illustrated. Prof. E. Heyck. June 30. Paris Exhibition. Continued. Illustrated. H. von Zobeltitz.

Deutscher Hausschatz.-F. Pustet, Regensburg. 40 Pf. Heft 12. St. Fridolin's Festival at Säckingen. Illustrated. M. Birkenbihl. Humour and Satire in the Old German Passion Play. Dr. J. Kanftl. Gutenberg. Illustrated. Heft 13.

Joseph von Führich. Illustrated. Dr. R. Huber.
Frisdrich Nietzsche. G. Saring.
Walldürn. Illustrated. K. O. Hartmann.
The Dolomite Country. Illustrated. J. Odenthal.
Oberammergau and the Passion Play. Illustrated. O. von Schaching.

Deutsche Revue.—Deutsche Verlags-Asstalt, Stuttgart.
6 Mks. per qr. June.
Calatafini, May 15, 1860; Reminiscences of Garibaldi. O. Baratieri.
Count Otto von Bray-Steinburg. Continued.
The Dread of the Hospital. Prof. J. Brandt.
The Papacy and the Death Penalty. Count P. von Hoensbroech.
The Position and Significance of Roumania in Europe. Dr. H. Kleser.
Chemistry—in the Service of Humanity. F. B. Ahrens.
The Legend of "Ritual Murder." Prof. A. Kamphausen.
Assiatic Shadows. M. von Brandt.
The Far Eastern Question. Concluded. Prof. W. Maurenbrecher.

Deutsche Rundschau.-Gebrüder Paetel, Berlin. 6 Mks. per qr.

Morocco. T. Fischer.
The Seven Lords of Lara. H. Morf.
Electricity and Wireless Telegraphy. Dr. B. Dessau.
The Berlin Academy of Sciences. W. Dilthey. Hanover, 1680-1866. Berlin Music. C. Krebs.

Gartenlaube .- ERNST KEIL'S NACHE, LEIPZIG. 50 Pf. Heft 6. Frederick William I. of Prussia at Wusterhausen. Prof. H. Peutz.
The Regulation of the Rhine near Lake Constance. Illustrated. J. C. Heer.
German Bu Idings at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. F. Vogt.
Naval Life. Illustrated. Graf Bernstorff.
Gutenberg. Illustrated. Prof. Nover.

Gesellschaft.—E. Pierson, Dresden. 75 Pf. June 1. The Victims of Fashion. Prof. H. Herkner. Böcklin, Klinger, and Stuck. W. Lentrodt. June 15. Young Roumania. G. Adam.

Grenzboten.-F. W. GRUNOW, LEIPZIG. 1 Mk. June 7. The Balic Provinces, Finland, and the Transvarl. E. Kraus,
The German Question in Transylvania. Concluded. H. von Schubert.
Archæological Stud/ in Greece and Asia Minor. Concluded. P. Pfitzner.
June 21.

Continental and Maritime Balance of Po The Rise and Fall of the Dutch Navy. Lavater in Denmark. F. Kuntze of Power. E. von der Brüggen.

Illustrirte Zeitung .- J. J. Weber, Leipzig. 1 Mk. June 7. Hans von Bartels. Illustrated. A. Fendler.

Gutenberg. Illustrated. The Elbe-Trave Canal. Illustrated. L.

Kunstgewerbeblatt.-E. A. SEEMANN, LEIPZIG. 1 Mk. June. Arabian Art Work, Illustrated. K. E. Schmidt. German Arts and Crafts at the Paris Exhibition, Illustrated. W. Gensel.

Monatssehrift für Stadt und Land.—E. Ungleich, Leipzig.

1 Mk. 25 Pf. June.

Karl Ernst von Baer and Darwinis.n. W. von Nathusius.

Th. "Away from Rome" Movement. Dr. Riels.

The Recent Catholic Moderation Movement. Dr. W. Martius.

Germany's Interests Over-Sea. U. von Hassell.

Jersey. O. Hohrath.

Eighd Marshal General von Steinmatz. C. von Zendin. Jersey. O. Hohrath. Field-Marshal General von Steinmetz. C. von Zepelin-

Neue Deutsche Rundschau. -S. FISCHER, BERLIN. 1 Mk. 50 Pf. June.

The Work of European Civilisation. G. von Suttner. Liszt's Letters to Princess Wittgenstein. Continued. A. von Schorn. Secession. Oscar Bie.

Neue Zeit .- J. H. W. DIETZ, STUTTGART. 25 Pf. June 2.

Socialism and the Capitalist Revolution of Agriculture. E. Vandervelde. The Neutralisation of Industrial Societies. H. Ströbel.

June 9.

Socialism and the Capitalist Revolution of Agriculture. Concluded. E.

Vandervelde.
The Regulation of Home Industries. Dr. F. Winter.
The Electoral Laws of the States in the German Bund. H. Wetzker. Nord und Süd.-Schlesische Verlags-Anstalt, Breslau. 2 Mks. June.

Anatole France. With Portrait. H. Lindau. Europe, 1900. Concluded. Optimist. Gutenberg and the Significance of the Art of Printing. J. Nover. Stein der Weisen, -A. HARTLEBEN, VIENNA. 50 Pf Heft 23.

Studies of High Mountains. S. L. Wood-Transport by Water. Illustrated. Dr. U.

Stimmen aus Maria-Laach.—Herder, Freiburg, Baden. 10 Mks. 80 Pf. per annum. May.

The Political Emancipation of Women, V. Cathrein.
The Ancient Classics and Modern Culture. G. Gietmann.
August Reichensperger. Concluded. A. Baumgartner.
Recent Publications on Marx's Socialism. Concluded. H. Pesch.
The Church of St. Lawrence at Florence. M. Meschler.

Ueber Land und Meer.—Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, Stuttgart.

1 Mk. Heft 12.

The Passion Play at Oberammergau. Illustrated. B. Rauchenegger.

Paris Exhibition. Continued. Illustrated. Dr. S. Epstein.

Umschau.—Neue Kräme, 19 Frankfurt a/M. 3 Mks. per qr.

The Russo-Swedish Expedition to Spitzbergen. V. Carlheim.

Vom Fels zum Meer .- Union-Deutsche-Verlags-Gesellschaft,

STUTTGART, 75 Pf. Heft 21.

The Berlin Art Exhibition. Illustrated. V. von Kohlenegg.

German Books for the People in the 15th Century. R. Muther. The Louvre, Illustrated.

Heft. 22.

Gustav Marx. Illustrated. A. Koerfer. Lawn Tennis. Dr. R. Hessen. German Books for the People in the 15th Century. Concluded. R. Muther.

Zeit.-GÜNTHERGASSE I, VIENNA IX./3. 50 Pf. June 2. Anatole France. Concluded. Marie Herzfeld.

June 9.

Paris v. France. Prof. C. Seignobos,

June 16.

The Boxers in China. W. F. Brand.
The Responsibility of Doctors. D. A. Weichselbaum.'
Housewives and Servants in Germany. M. Lammers.
Prague as the German Literary Capital. Prof. A. Klaar.
Incunabula. R. Muther.

June 23. Drevfus Redivivus. Pollen.

Prague as the German Literary Capital. Concluded. Prof. A. Klaar.

Zeitschrift für Bildende Kunst.—E. A. Seemann, Berli 26 Mks. per annum. June. Dürer's "Sea-Wonders." Illustrated. K. Lange. French Art in 1900. Illustrated. W. Gensel. Andrea Del Sarto; a Drawing at Düsseldorf. Illustrated. F. Schaarschmidt.

Zeitschrift für Bücherfreunde.—Velhagen und Klasing, Leipzig. 6 Mks. May-June.

The Illustrated Vitruvius Editions of the 16th Century. Illustrated. Max Bach.

Bach.
The Yugend and Its Artists. Illustrated. G. Hermann.
Schiller's Library. Illustrated. W. von Wurzbach.
Friedrich Bruchmann of Munich. Illustrated. T. Goebel.
The Schroffstein Family and Kleist. Illustrated. Continued. Prof. E.
Wolff.

Zeitschrift der Internationalen Musikgeseilschaft.—Breitkopp und Haertel, Leipzig. 10 Mks. per ann. June.

Camille Saint-Saëns as a Writer. A. Pougin.
The Teaching of Singing in the Gymnasiums. R. Starke.

Zukunft.—FRIEDRICHSTR. 10, BERLIN. 50 Pf. June 2.

The Hompesch Law.

American Universities. H. Münsterberg.

The Paris Exhibition. W. Hasbach. June : Humanity and Modern Life. K. Jentsch.

THE FRENCH MAGAZINES.

Association Catholique .- 14, Rue de L'Abbaye, Paris. 2 frs. June 15.

International Protection of Labour. M. Turmann. Dr. Rodolphe Meyer. C. Reichenbach.

Bibliothèque Universelle,—18, King William Street, Strand. 20s. per annum. June.

Dr. F. G. Haas. M. Reader. The Exploits of the Alpine Guide Zurbriggen. Concluded. A. Glardon. The Paris Exposition. Continued. H. de Varigny. The War in South Africa. Ed. Tallichet.

Correspondant .- 31, Rue Saint-Guillaume, Paris. 2 frs. 50 c. Tune 10.

The Concordat. Abbé Sicard.
William II. of Germany and Bismarck. J. Delaporte.
The Theatre in France during the Century. A. Claveau.
Duchesse de Berry. L. de. L. de Laborie.
Naval Warfare. Prehistoric Art. Marquis de Nadaillac.

The Dupty Ministry. Ch. Descotay.
The Social Policy of the B-lginn Catholics. M. Vanlaer.
Excavations in the Roman Forum. A. Baudrillart.
The Concordat. Concluded. Abbé Sicard.

The Theatre in France during the Century. Continued. A. Claveau. Humanité Nouvelle,-15, Rue des Saints-Pères, Paris. 1 fr. 25 c.

Russian Oppression in Lithuania. A. Letuvis, Australian Federation. J. A. Andrews. The Beginnings of American Literature. A. Schalk de la Faverie. Marxism. F. Domela Nieuwenhuis.

Journal des Économistes. -- 14. Rue Richelleu, Paris. 3 frs. 50 c. June.

The Principles of the French Revolution and Socialism. Concluded. E.

The Housing of the Working Classes in France. G. de Nouvion. The Study of Statistics. Ch. M. Limousin.

Ménestrel .- 2 bis, Rue VIVIENNE, PARIS. 30 C. June 3, 10, 17, 24. Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy in Switzerland, from His Correspondence. Continued. H. Kling.

Mercure de France.—15, Rue de L'Echaudé-Saint-Germain, Paris.
2 frs. Juns.

The Love Affairs of Chopin and George Sand. R. de Bury, Lombroso and His Works. J. Mesnil. The Centennial Exhibition of French Painting. A. Fontainas.

Monde Moderne. -- 5, Rue St. Benoft, Paris. 1 f. 60 c. June. Letters from French Soldiers. Illustrated. G. Moussoir.
The Heroines of the "Mémoires de Grammont." Illustrated. L. Dimier.
Italian Switzerland. Illustrated. A. Bailly.
The Sparrow. Illustrated. J. de Loverdo.
The Workrooms at a Parisian Dressmaker's. Illustrated. Jean Armor.
The Salon of 1900. Illustrated. A. Quantin.
The Subterranean World at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. L. de Launay. St. Helena. Illustrated. B. H. Gausseron.

Nouvelle Revue.—18, King William Street, Strand. 55 frs. per annum. June 1. mous Pages. G. Rodenbach.

Posthumous Pages. G. Rodenbach. The Centennial Exhibition. R. Bouyer. In e Centennia Exhibition. R. Bouyer.
Modern Gnostics. Jordan.
In Liberty Country: an Ideal Republic. A. Mazade.
Père Didon. E. M.
Letters on Foreign Politics. Madame Adam.

The South African War. Capt. Gilbert.
The Decennial Exhibition. R. Bouyer.
Quesnel's Corrrespondence.
The Enigma of the Hand. A. Meswill.
The Literature of the Pyrenees. G. Compayré.

Nouvelle Revue Internationale.—23, Bollevard Poissonière, Paris. 2 frs. 50c. Special Number. Spain. Illustrated. Mme. Rattazzi.

Questions Diplomatiques et Coloniales.—16, Rue Cassette, Paris. 1 fr. June.

The Genesis of a War. R. de Caix.
Touat and Morocco. A. Bernard.
The Commerce of German Protectorates. Dr. A. Zimmerman.

Réforme Sociale. -54, RUE DE SEINE, PARIS, 1 fr. June 1. The Annual Reunion of the Society of Social Economy. A. Delaire. Lodgings for Workmen in Paris. George Picot and others.

June 16.

Auguste Comte and Frédéric Le Play. H. Joly.
Housing in the Great Cities of the United States. P. Escard.

Revue de l'Art. -28, Rue du Mont-Thabor, Paris. 7 frs. 50 c. June 10.

The "Heures du Connétable de Montmorency" in the Condé Museum. Illustrated. Concluded. L. Delisle. The Portrati of His Wife by Jean Van Eyck at Bruges. Illustrated.

H. Bouchot. The French School of Painting at the Paris Exposition. Illustr de Fourcaud.

Medals at the Exposition. Illustrated. A. Hallays. Goldwork at the Exposition. Illustrated. H. Havard.

Revue Blanche .- 23, Boulevard des Italiens, Paris. 1 fr. June z. Henryk Sienkiewicz. J. L. de Janasz.

June 15.
The Mission of Rodin. Illustrated. F. Fagus.
The Enemies of the Paris Exposition. J. Benda.

Revue Bleue.-FISHER UNWIN. 6d. June 2. The French Press in the Nineteenth Century. J. Cornély. General Botha. Samuel Cornut. Fine Arts at the Paris Exposition. Continued. P. Flat.

June 9. The Municipal Elections in Paris. The French Press in the Nineteenth Century. Concluded. J. Cornély. Pierre Loti. Zadig.

June 16. The Boxers. Auguste Moireau. Fine Arts at the Paris Exposition. Continued. P. Flat.

June 23.

Gustavus III. of Sweden in Paris, 1771 and 1784. Ch. de Larivière.
The Co-operative Congress at the Paris Exhibition. L. Parsons.

The Sit Lucien Preside Revue

The Fr Rev

The In The Da The O Art at The D King V

Heinri The W Rev The R

Re The F

In Sa The E Litera

> The C Russia The U : Re The F

Revi

Foreig Revu The M Re

Swall Girls Frenc Greec

Rev

Irelan

Civ Chris

Japa Two

Cetti

F. Schaar-

BERLI

G. LEIPZIG ted. May

Prof. E. REITKOPF

ière,

TTE,

useum. trated. tr

o c.

June 30. The Situation in China. A. I Lucien Descaves. Zadig. President Steyn. S. Cornut. A. Moireau.

Revue Chrétienne .-- 11, Avenue de L'Observatoire, Paris. 6 frs. per ann. June.

Luther's Christianity. Continued. F. Kuhn.
The French Protestant Translation of the New Testament. E. Stapfer.
The Correspondence of Quesnel.

Revue des Deux Mondes,—18, King William Street, Strand.
30s. per half-year. June z.
The Inauguration of a Liberal Empire. E. Ollivier. The Inauguration of a Liberat Empire. E. Onliver: The Duchess of Burgundy and the Savoy Alliance. Comb The Origins of the South African Republics. J. Leclercq. Art at the Exhibition of 1900. R. de La Sizeranne. The Dyeing Industry. M. A. Dastre. Comte d'Haussonville.

The Dyeing Industry. M. A. Dastre.
June 15.
King William of Prussia. E. Ollivier.
The Pacification of Madaguscar. A. Lebon.
Heinrich von Stein. H. S. Chamberlain.
The Warfare between Town and Country. L. Wuarin.

Revue d'Économie Politique. -- 22, RUE SOUFFLOT, PARIS. 20 frs. per ann. May.

The Royal Commission on Agriculture in England. A. Souchon. The Wages Problem. E. Waxweiler.

Revue Encyclopédique.—18, King William Street, Strand.
75. per qr. June 2.
Pompeii. Illustrated. A. Baudrillart.
The French Colonial Troops. Illustrated. P. Laurencin.

The French Salon. Illustrated, R. Marx.
The Paris Exposition. Illustrated. P. Forthuny.

June 16.
In Salah and the Touat Peninsula. With Maps and Illustrations. H.

In Salah and the Iouat Pennsula.
Froidevaux.
The Evolution of the New Psychology. With Po-traits. T. Steeg.
The Valley of Aran. With Map and Illustrations. A. Bancal.
June 23.
Literature in Germany. Illustrated. L. Vernols.
Illustrated Post Cards. Illustrated. G. Bans and Ch. Nerlinger.

Revue Française de l'Étranger et des Colonies.—92, Rue de La Victoire, Paris. 2 frs. June.

The Colonisation of New Caledonia. L. de Sainte-Marie. The Colombation of New Calculul, 17, de Sainte Russia and the Pamics. The Uganda Railway. With Map. A. Montell, The War in South Africa. C. de Lasalle.

Revus Générale. -16, Rue Treurenberg, Brussels. 12 frs. per annum. June.

The Paris Exposition. F. Bournand. Is Russia a Catholic Nation? Bon. ds l'Épine. Foreign Diplomacy and Old French Soc'ety. V. du Bled.

Revue Internationale de Sociologie. 16, RUE SOUFFLOT, PARIS. 18 frs. per annum. May.

The Morality of Nature. G. L. Duprat. Revue pour les Jeunes Filles.—5, Rue de Mézières, Paris. 1 fr. 50 c. June 5. French Art at the Paris Exposition. G. Migeon.

Swallows and Storks. R. Candiani, Greece, Continued, E. Morel.

Girls in 1800 and in 1900. G. Chantepleure.
French Art at the Paris Exposition. Concluded. G. Migeon.
Greecs. Concluded. E. Morel.

Revue du Monde Catholique. —75, Rue des Saints-Pères, Paris. 1 fr. 50 c. June. The Drama of Mayerling. Continued. A. Savaète. The Drama of Mayerling. Continued Ireland and the Boers. J. de Clôture.

Revue de Morale Sociale.—103, BOULEVARD SAINT-GERMAIN, PARIS.
2 fr. 75 c. June.

The Cause of Women and the Future of the Home, M. Woman Suffrage in Ecclesistical Matters. P. Bridel. Art and Morals. Fr. Paulhan. Mrs. Josephine Butler.

Revue de Paris.—Asher, 13, Bedford Street, Covent Garden.
60 frs. per annum. June 1.

Letters to Gambetta. E. Spuller.
Murder of the French Ministers at Rastatt. X. X. X.
The Sports of Old France. J. J. Jusserand.
An Actors' War M. Albert.
The Adviatic Equilibrium. C. Loiseau. June 15.

The Boers. P. Mills.
The Amsterdam Stock Exchange in the 17th Century. A. E. Sayous.
Letters on the Marengo Campaign. Adj.-Gen. Dampierre.
Music and Human Life. M. Emmanuel.

Revue Politique et Parlementaire.—5, Rue de Mézières, Paris.
3 frs. June.

The Parliament of Paris under Louis XVI. E. Glasson.
Camille Pell:tan. J. E. Churles.
The University and the Republic in France. X. Torau-Bayle.
The Hague Conference. A. Medgahac.

Revue des Revues. -12, Avenue de L'Opéra, Paris. 3 fc.

June 15. Patriotism and Internationalism. P. Mieille.
The French Language and the French Canadians. J. Bidault.
Omar Khayyam and His Cult. Prof. A. Schinz.
Old Songs of Languedoc. P. Hortala.
The Tweve Sisters in Indian Mythology. Illustrated. Continued.
The Language of Birds. M. Bréal.
How to increase Human Energy. Illustrated. Nicolas Tesla.

Revue Scientifique .- FISHER UNWIN. 6d. June 2. Jean Hameau; a Precursor of Pasteur. M. Lannelongue. French Schools of Commerce. M. Soub-i-an.

J. and H. Vallot.

Rabelais. F. Brémond.
The Proposed Mont Blanc Railway. J. and H.
June 16.
The International Congress of 1200 at Paris.
The Origin of Shoes for Animals. L. A. Levat.
June 23.

Malaria and Mosquitoes. Ronald Ross, A Municipal School of Physics and Chemistry. Ch. Lauth, The Philotechnic Association of Paris. Berthelot.
The Culture of India-Rubber and its Future in Guatemala.

Revue Socialiste .- 8, GALERIE DU THÉATRE FRANÇAIS, PARIS. 1 fr. 50 c. June.

Socialism and Agriculture. E. Vandervelde. Pierre Lavroff. Continued. Ch. Ruppoport. The Paris E ections and the Socialist Party. G. Rouanet.

Revue Universitaire.—5, Rue de Mézières, Paris.
10 fcs. per ann. June 15.

Residential Universities.
The Congress on Secondary Education, 1900.
The Teaching of Living Languages; Symposium. Continued.

Revue de l'Université de Bruxelles.—37. Boulevard du Nord, Brussells. 1 fr. 50 c. May.

Spontaneous Generation. L. Errera.
Michel Bakounine and the Philosophy of Anarchy. A. François,

The Mysteries of Mithra in Ancient Rome. Comte Goblet d'Alviella.

Social Troubles in Flanders in the Middle Ages. G. Des Marez.

Michel Bakounine and the Philosophy of Anarchy. Concluded. A.

Université Catholique.—Burns and Oates. 20 frs. per ann.

The Political Testament of Cardinal Richelieu. Concluded. Canco Valentin. The Triple Alliance. Continued. Comte J. Grabinski. The Canonization of Saints. R. Parayre.

THE ITALIAN MAGAZINES.

Civiltà Cattolica.—Via di Ripetta 246, Rome. 25 frs. per annum. June 2.

Christian Marriage and the Senate. The Recent Inscriptions on the Forum. Co. Presentiments and Telepathy. Continued. Diary of the Holy Year. Continued.

June 16. Rome and the Holy Year. Presentiments and Telepathy. Japanese Art. Continued. Two Novels by Sienkiewicz.

Cosmos Cattolicus.-Vatican Press, Rome. May 15. The Cistercian Monastery of Lérius. Illustrated. E. de St. Julien. Corsica and the Holy See. Illustrated. A. Ferrato. Cettigne. Illustrated. Marquis Macswiney.

Flegrea. - PIAZZETTA MONDRAGONE, NAPLES. 20 frs. per annum. The Parliamentary Régime, G. Fortunato. Three Months at Palermo in 1860. F. B. di Carpino.

Nuova Antologia. -VIA S. VITALE 7, ROME. 46 frs. per annum. June 1.

Count Charles N. di Robilant. With Portrait. R. Cappelli. Memories of My Boyhood. Continued. E. de Amicis. Romualdo Bonfadini, L. Luzzatti. A Journey through China. Illustrated. A. Pratesi. Letter from Paris. G. Cena.

Gustavo Modena. With Portrait. E. Panzaochi.
Memoris of my Boyhood. Continued. E. de Amicis.
Vittoria Agamoor, Postess. E. Castelnuovo.
A Journey through China. Illustrated. A. Pratesi.

The Parliamentary Régime. G. Fortunato (Deputy). A New Cry of Pain. Senator F. N. Vitelleschi. The Tendency of Italian Government. Senator Ugo Pisa.

Rassegna Nazionale. - VIA DELLA PACE 2, FLORENCE. 30 frs. per ann. June 1.

Sorrow in Art. Antonio Fogazzaro.

Bianca Cappello and Francis I. dei Medici. G. E. Saltini.
Good and Evil in Art. D. Conti.
Religious Feeling in Manzonic Chateaubriand. E. Bertolini.
The Genesis of Americanism. S. Kingswan.
June 16.
The Aims of the Naval League. C. Manfroni.
The Last Journey of Columbus. G. F. Airoli.
The Attitude of the Intransigents during the Election. A Catholic Onlocker.
On the Eve of the New Parliament. A Department

On the Eve of the New Parliament. A Deputy.

Riforma Sociale.—Piazza Solferino, Turin. 12 frs. per ann. May 15. Some Theoretic Points in Workmen's Syndicates. E. Sella. State Bureaucracy in Italy. F. S. Nitti. Necessary Financial Reforms. P. F. Casaretto.

Rivista Internazionale. - VIA TORRE ARGENTINA 76, ROME. May.

The Methods of Social Science. G. Molteni. The Anti-Slavery Congress in Paris. F. Tolli. Poverty at Bergamo. Dr. C. Scotti.

Rivista Politica e Letteraria. - VIA MARCO MINGHETTI 3, ROME.

June 15. X. X. X. aly. P. Orano. The Elections at Milan. The Political Spirit of Italy. P. Orano. On International Law. Prof. Siotto-Pintor. "Via Lucis." D. Angeli.

THE SPANISH AND PORTUGUESE MAGAZINES.

Ciudad de Dios .- Real Monasterio del Escorial, Madrid. June 5. 20 pesetas per annum.

The Curse of the Serpent. Honorato del Val.
An Unpublished Account of the Battle of St. Quentin. Guillermo Antolin.
Electricity and Magnetism: and St. Thomas Aquinas and Others. Justo

The Religious and Civil Ceremonies of Marriage.

The Religious and Civil Certainties of June 20.

Letters Concerning the Eclipse, A. R. de Prada.
Electricity in the Middle Ag.s., Justo Fernandez.
On Matters Canonical. Pedro Rodriguez.

España Moderna. - Cuesta de Santo Domingo 16, Madrid. 40 pesetas per annum. June.

Notes on the Goya Exhibition. N. Sentenach. Death. Nicolas Perez Merino. The de Moratins. J. P. de Guzman. Spanish-American Poets.

Revista Contemporanea.—Calle de Pizarro 17, Madrid. 2 pesetas. May 30.

Some Historical Traditions of Cordova. E. Cotarelo.
The Influence on the East on European Poetry and on Philology. J. Faire y Oliver. The Diamond Industry. B. G. Iribarne.

June 15.

L. Cortarelo. Castilian Imitations of "Don Quixote." E. Cortare The Apparent Size of the Moon, R. Blanco. The Organisation of Labour, Manuel Gil Maestre.

Revista Portugueza.—Rua Nova do Almada 74, Lisbon. 15 frs.

The Islands of the Atlantic. Gabriel Pereira.

A Probable Influence on the Future of the Portuguese Mercantile Marin. A. Ramos da Costa.

The Present Conflict in South Africa.

The General Progress of Colonisation.

J. B. Bettencourt.

THE DUTCH MAGAZINES.

Elsevier's Geillustreerd Maandschrift.-Luzac and Co., 46, GREAT RUSSELL STREET. 18. 8d. June.

G. de Feure van Sluyters. Illustrated. Bulée. After the Dreyfus Case. Plemp van Duiveland. Dordrecht. Illustrated. C. J. van Geel. De Gids .- LUZAC AND Co. 3s. June.

The Siboga Expedition: Its Aim and Results. Prof. Max Weber.
Antoon Derkinderens's Latest Frescoes. Mrs. G. H. Marius.
Constantyn Huygens and Seventeenth Century Society. Prof. Kalff.

Vragen des Tiids .- LUZAC AND Co. 28, 6d. June. Fruit Crops and Jam-Making in the Netherlands. Dr. G. W. Bruinsma. The Plague Danger in Holland and Her Colonies. P. Adriana.

Woord en Beeld,-ERVEN F. BOHN, HAARLEM. 16s. per annum. fune.

Dirk Haspels, Actor. Illustrated. M. J. Brusse. Political Secrets. Illustrated. L. G. Vernee

THE SCANDINAVIAN MAGAZINES.

Finsk Tidskrift.-Helsingfors. No. 4.

On Names and Name Researches. Ralf Saxén. The Berlin Academy of Science. M. G. Schybergson. Political Letters from Germany. Emil Daniels.

Kringsjaa .- Olaf Norli, Christiania. 2 kr. per quarter. May 31.

Christiania University. Illustrated. P. Engelbrethsen. The Cold Spell in May and Its Probable Cause. S. A. Ramsvig. Pist Uijs. Continued. C. W. H. van der Post.

June 15.

June 15.

June 15.

Leady: Its People and Their Conditions. Hans E. Kinck.
Piet Uijs. Continued. C. W. H. van der Post.

Nordisk Revy.-STOCKHOLM. No. 10. Life's Problem and Modern Mysticism. N. A. A.

Nordisk Tidskrift.-P. A. Norstedt and Sons, Stockholm.

The Architectonics of Northern Trees. F. R. Kjellman. Holberg, Rostgaard, and Montaigu. Just Bing. Norway and Her People. Yngwaar Nielsen.

Tilskueren. - Ernst Bojesen, Copenhagen. 12 kr. per annum. June.

The Parliament of 1899-1900. Vilh. Lassen. Cecil Rhodes. M. Galschiöt

THE RUSSIAN MAGAZINES.

Istoritcheski Vyestnik.-Nevski Prospect 40, St. Petersburg.

Recollections of S. M. Zagoskin. Continued. Memoirs of Baron Steingel. Concluded. The Island of Anikiev. P. F. Ponomaref. Marriage by Imperial Ukaz. V. I. Zhmakin. A Century of Literary Development. Concluded. S. K. Borozdin.

Mir Bozhi.-Nadezhdinskaya 43, St. Petersburg. June. Anthropological Sketches. Professor A. F. Brandt. The Unemployed in Switzerland. Concluded. Prof. N. Reichesberg.

Alpine Glaciers. Nicolai Ivantsof. Concluded. Cecil Rhodes. E, Pimenova. The National Question in Switzerland. G. Kasperovitch.

Russkaya Muisl .- V. M. LAVROF, Moscow. May. Improving Village Health. P. Hansen.
Survey of Peasant Regulation. Continued. A. Yeropkin.
Russia's Proposals for Disarmament. Count Kamarovsky.
M. Korelin as Historian of Humanism.

Russkoe Bagatstvo.—1-9, Spasskava and Backavava St., St. Petersburg. May.

Types of Capitalist and Agrarian Evolution. Continued. V. M. Tchernof. Literary Factors in the American Revolution. P. G. Mizhuef. Heine's Friends and Enemies. A. G. Ecclesiastical Schools in Siberia. Concluded. V. Arefyef. Popular Universities in France. N. Kudrin. Vyestnik Yevropul.-St. Petersburg. June.

John Ruskin. Z. Vengerof. Educational Contrast and Needs. L. K. Industrial Homes. A. Gorovtsef.

er ann,

OME.

, Rome.

RID.

J. Falle

15 frs.

Marin .

Manoel.

nsma.

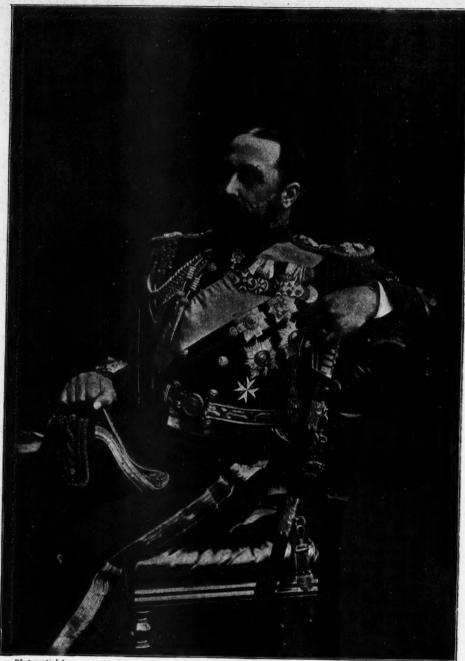

num.

LM.

um.

r., hernof.

XUM

Photograph by]

THE LATE DUKE OF SAXE-COBURG-GOTHA. Second Son of the Queen.

[Russell and Sons.

108

XUM

to e year he his a d with poir fata was Afte only ana step posi to h of : calli have muc

K

vitc resp for her Eur Cab fron who Kin per the phe Whe she ahea

She

begi

THE PROGRESS OF THE WORLD.

August 1, 1900.

The Death of Sunday night, July 29th, at Monza, by an Italian anarchist, who is said to have crossed the Atlantic expressly to execute the murder. Humbert had lived fifty-six years, and had occupied the Italian throne since he was thirty-four. On two previous occasions his life had been attempted, on each occasion with The third and fatal attack was made with a revolver. Three out of four shots fired at point-blank range took effect. The King, who was a fatalist, pooh-poohed the danger of assassination. It was a risk, he said, incidental to the calling of a king. After he was struck by the fatal bullet at Monza, the only words he spoke were "It is nothing." The anarchists, however, exult that they have taken one step nearer their cherished ideal, that of making the position of a ruler so dangerous that no one will care to hold it. No dream can be more absurd. Millions of men would eagerly accept ten times as risky a calling as that of king for a couple of pounds a week. As yet it is doubtful whether all the anarchist attempts have raised the insurance rate on royal lives by as much as one per cent.

The Marriage of the King of Servia.

It will probably be found on an examination of the history of Europe that love affairs have been more fatal to monarchs than the dagger or the revolver of the assassin. The Obrenovitches of Servia are singularly unfortunate in this respect. Milan wrecked his throne over an infatuation for a woman neither young nor beautiful, and for her sake divorced one of the most beautiful wives in Europe. And now his son Alexander has provoked a Cabinet crisis, and precipitated his father's retirement from the army by marrying Widow Maschine, a lady who is said to be some eleven years older than the King. The fatal fascination that the woman of fifty per cent, more experience sometimes exercises over the impressionable heart of a young man is a familiar phenomenon, and in its way it is natural enough. When the lady is not only older, but is also a widow, she is apt to become irresistible. But who can look ahead for a dozen years and not tremble for the marital felicity of the Servian King and his Oueen? She will be going off just when her husband is beginning to be in his prime; and even if Alexander were not the son of Milan, such a position is not one to be desired even by the most ambitious aspirant for the throne of a queen.

A Month of July was one of suspense. It is true that the excessive heat which enabled Londoners to understand something of the conditions in which life is endured in the tropics, largely paralysed any active manifestation of excitement. But all through July one question dominated everything. Had the Legations at Pekin been put to the sword, or were they captives in the hands of the Chinese? Each day brought its new story, and the next its contradiction. Circumstantial details were published of universal massacre which appeared to destroy the last foundation of hope. Then belated or misdated telegrams proclaimed that the Envoys were still alive. A memorial service for the victims of the massacre was being arranged at St. Paul's, when a clotted mass of contradictory and confusing rumour led to its abandonment.

The Rumours from Pekin.

Every morning and evening the newspapers resembled magic lanterndiscs, across which flitted a fantastic phantasmagoria of confused figures.

One day the Emperor was dead, the Empress mad, and Tuan reigning as Emperor in their stead. The next the Emperor was alive, the Empress supreme, and Tuan was in retreat. pleasant picture of the Legations safe and sound under the protection of the Imperial Court was, suddenly substituted for a vision of the Legations in despair under the concentrated fire of the Krupp batteries of the Imperial army. And all the while that allied Europe, America, and Japan chafed and menaced and bribed their best, not one authentic word as to the actual facts reached the outer world. the last day of July the cloud seemed to lift. There came to the outside world what purported to be authentic messages from Sir Claude MacDonald, Mr. Conger and other Foreign Ministers, bearing date July 21st. They state that news of the failure of the relief column reached Pekin on June 18th. China declared war on June 20th. After twenty-six days' fierce assault on the British Legation a truce was agreed upon. The defenders are said to have lost 63 killed and 98 wounded, and to have disposed of 2,000 of their assailants. They have provisions for several weeks, but little ammunition. The Allies have certainly been made more hopeful by these despatches, and promptly commenced their advance to Pekin.

The King of Servia.

Is the Chinese Dragon Awake?

While the fate of the Legations fascinated the imagination of the world, those who are accustomed to look ahead were absorbed in speculations as to a possible catastrophe so vast that even the massacre of the Envoys shrank into insignificance as a mere bagatelle. Has the Chinese dragon really wakened up? Is the long lethargic East about to shake the Western trespassers off its flanks as-to revive Dr. Kenealy's famous simile-a lion shakes the dewdrops from its mane? Are we face to face with a mere local insurrection-violent, no doubt, and serious, because located in the capital and capable of terrorising the Court-or has the long-dreaded moment come when the teeming millions of Cathay are inoving together to assert their right and their power to live their own life in their own way without being browbeaten, bullied, partitioned and plundered by the Foreign Devils from over sea? For if this latter possibility be correct, then the allied Western Powers might as well send a troop of small boys with peashooters to Chinese waters as despatch the armies and the navies which they have been preparing all last month. It has taken Britain ten months, sixty millions sterling and 250,000 men to occupy Bloemfontein and Pretoria. How many more will be needed if the international forces are to overrun and subdue the four hundred millions of Chinese? If China has really risen, Europe, plus Japan and plus the United States, can do nothing.

with the

Amid the mist of confusing reports The Yellow Man from the East, two things stand out White Man's Guns, clear and unmistakable. The Chinese have got guns as good as our own.

and, perhaps, as the result of the confidence inspired by the new weapons, the Chinese soldier, whether Boxer or Imperial soldier, displays a bravery equal to that of any Western. It is evident that the world was entirely misled by the collapse of the Chinese resistance to the Japanese invasion. It is now stated that the troops sent against Japan in that war were composed of the worst elements at the disposal of the Pekin Court. The real fighting men were left at home. Worthless levies armed, if possible, with more worthless guns were sent into the field, with the result that Port Arthur, with its impregnable fortifications bristling with guns, was captured by a frontal attack which only cost the victors six men. That was accepted as a crucial test of the decadence of China. It is now abundantly evident that the test was The Chinese were then armed with guns whose cartridges were misfits, and supplied with powder fifty per cent, of which would not explode. The Chinese sailors fought bravely, but the land forces made no Now that John Chinaman has got a stand at all. serviceable weapon, with cartridges that fit and powder that explodes, he seems to be capable of holding his own, man for man, with the best soldiers in the world.

The Chances Success.

Last month I quoted the significant words of General Gordon as to the impossibility of a Western conquest of China. I re-quote them to-day, for in view of the events of last month they enable us to appreciate the magnitude of the task which some would have us essay in a mad mood of vengeance :-

China's power lies in her numbers, in the quick moving of her troops, in the little baggage they require, and in their few wants. It is known that men armed with sword and spear can overcome the best regular troops equipped with breechloading rifles if the country is at all difficult, and if the men with spears and swords outnumber their foe ten to one. If this is the case where men are armed with spears and swords, it will be much truer when those men are themselves armed with breechloaders. We or any other Power could never for long hold the country. At Penang, Singapore, etc., the Chinese will eventually oust us in another generation.

The C have n be sup propos into C plant i can t contai imitati Let th China "No

The

The a

by the time

evacu

on Ju allied

the n

provo

failure up the the p and li Sixtyfell i the 1 seems plete. in wh had Impe the . chear cost woun

time

the A mate

they tear

suffic

impo

kills shell uplar deatl heav nths, sixty ipy Bloem. re will be verrun and inese? I and plus ng reports stand out ne Chinese our own, spired by her Boxer al to that vorld was Chinese ow stated war were sposal of were left ble, with with the fortificaa frontal n. That dence of e test was vith guns h powder Chinese nade no as got a powder ding his e world. mificant

to the onquest

n those We or ountry.

ntually

day, for able us ch some nce :-moving in their ord and ed with ult, and r their armed

The Chinese have not only got breechloaders, they have magazine rifles, and their new artillery is said to be superior to that of the allied forces. It is idle to propose to interdict the import of arms of precision into China. The Germans have established a great plant in China, with the latest improvements, which can turn out all the weapons they want. China contains everything, and the Chinese are the most imitative as well as the most industrious workmen. Let those who are clamouring for the partition of China remember Lord Dalhousie's famous declaration, "No Christian power can govern Chinamen, for they provoke a massacre every five years." The only military success gained by the Allies during last month was the expulsion of the Chinese from the native city and arsenal of Tientsin.

The Capture Tientsin.

The allied garrison of 8,000 men was so hard pressed by the besieging Chinese forces that it seemed at one time possible that they would be compelled to evacuate Tientsin and fall back upon the coast. But on July 13th a determined attempt was made by the allied forces to drive off their assailants and capture the native city. At first this also seemed doomed to failure, but on the following day the Japanese blew up the gates of the city, and the Allies entering, took the place by storm. It appears to have been sacked, and little quarter was given. Sixty-two pieces of artillery fell into their hands, and the rout of the Chinese seems to have been complete. The great arsenal, in which munitions of war had been stored for the Imperial army, fell into the Allies' hands, a gain cheaply purchased at a cost of 800 killed and wounded. At the same time it is evident that if the Allies are to be decimated every victory which they gain, the wear and tear of the campaign will suffice to reduce them to impotence. Disease always kills more than shot and shell, even in the healthy uplands of the veldt. The death rate will be much heavier in the marshy fever lands of China. The Allies do not expect to have more than 120,000 men in the field this month, and of these more than a third will be coloured. The various contingents were expected to stand pretty much as follows: Russian 30,000, Japanese 30,000. British Indian 20,000, German 15,000, American 10,000, French 7,500, Italian 6,000. But it is doubtful whether the Russians will be able to spare 30,000 men. They are likely to be wanted in Manchuria.

The Kaiser Vengeance.

The German Emperor, who has long been deeply impressed by the reality of the Yellow Peril, has raised the cry for vengeance with a lusty vehemence more worthy of Attila the Hun than of such an eminent Christian as the present head of No doubt the slaying of the the Hohenzollerns. German ambassador was a bad piece of work, but it cannot be compared for infamy with the deliberate massacre of the Armenians in the Turkish capital. The author of the much more heinous crime was taken to the Imperial bosom. The Great Assassin is the Kaiser's very good friend and brother; but as for these Chinese, they must be slaughtered without mercy. Addressing the troops embarking at Bremerhaven in July, the Kaiser said, speaking of the Chinese:-

If you close with the enemy, know that quarter is not to be given, and that no prisoners are to be taken. May

Westminster Gazette.]

[July 5, 1900.

The Dragon which they thought was Dead.

German Officers for China.

The commander, General Von Arnstedt, in a dark coat, stands in the centre.

the name of Germany make itself so felt in China that for a thousand years to come China shall never dare even to look askance at a German.

The day before the same troops had been preached at by Dr. Kessler:-

They must be the mailed fist to claim satisfaction for the cruel murders committed; they must also bear in mind that they were protectors of European trade, and, above all, remember that they were God's warriors, the pioneers of the crucified Saviour.

The

Contrast this savage vindictiveness of the Kaiser with the suavity and Tsar's Attitude. patience of the Tsar. The Chinese have attacked the Russian railway in the neighbourhood of Port Arthur, and carrying the war into the enemy's country, have invaded Russian territory from the far north of Manchuria, interrupting the traffic on the Amoor, cutting off Russian garrisons, and threatening to destroy the great overland railway which is to bind St. Petersburg to Vladivostock with a nerve of steel. It is also said that they have attacked the Russian outposts in Kuldja, on the western frontier of the Empire. The Russian frontier marches with that of China for 8,000 miles. China to Germany is a mere fantasy of Imperial adventure. To Russia she is an Imperial peril of the first magnitude. But the Tsar, although so much more deeply interested, has displayed the utmost moderation and good sense. No wild and whirling vows of vengeance and massacre come from St. Petersburg. The Tsar is said to have remarked that the Chinese ship of state had got out of its bearings; what was needed was to restore it to its true direction as speedily as possible with a minimum of interference.

The operations of The Need the international of a Common Language. force are ham-

Inc

day

COS

ind

app mo

like pas

an mo mi

op

ne

we

on

be

for

tha

in ch

to

th

wa

Pi

T

7.8

th

hi

ca CO

de

in au

N

in

So

pered by international jealousies and the lack of an international language. decision to place the railway from Tientsin to Taku in the hands of the Russians was arrived at by a majority vote of the Admirals on the station, England and America forming the minority. The Admirals at Taku may be regarded as the germ of the future governing body that will direct the forces of the Federation of the West. At present they find great difficulty in understanding each other. The attack on the native city of Tientsin was seriously imperilled by the fact that the British Commander and the Japanese General were absolutely unable to understand each other. If English is not available as a lingua franca, the invention of some kind of Volapuk is one of the most urgent necessities of the age. So long as the inability to comprehend our respective languages only entailed inconvenience it might be endured. But now that it is evident we stand in great danger of having our throats cut if we refuse to invent a common vocabulary, something may be done.

The Relief Coomassie.

If for the moment the White man is compelled to admit that he has met his master in the Yellow man, last month delivered him from the dread of having to make the same admission about the Black man. The small and famishing garrison of Coomassie was relieved on July 15th by Colonel Willcocks, who only just in time fought his way through the bush into the British lines. The Yorubas fought as well as the Haussas, so there is now open another stratum of possible African Sepoys, The leaguer was a vast charnel-house. The rescued garrison could hardly stand. Two or three days' delay and all would have been over. As it is, that crowning disaster was averted. The British flag still flies over Coomassie, and the Ashantee camp at Kokofu has been stormed. But our authority extends so far as the range of our rifles and no further. Already a new expedition is in preparation which has to begin the re-conquest of the country in October. The White man's burden is in danger of breaking the White man's back.

ations of national haminterlack of The ay from ands of at by a rals on America he Adegarded governct the of the d great each native he fact invene most nability ntailed that it ng our ocabu-

General

ner. If

man is as met n, last dread ut the son of olonel s way orubas open The scued days' s, that g still np at tends rther. h has ober. g the

In India the outlook is gloomy. Famine, pestilence and war-the The White Man's Burden Malthusian Trinity temporarily in India. dispossessed by the British Rajhave resumed something of their old authority. The Indian Government has been feeding six millions day by day to save them from dying outright, at a cost to the Exchequer in two years, direct and indirect, of £3,000,000. But the mortality has been appalling. Pierre Loti, who returned to Paris last month after visiting the famine-stricken area, seemed like a man haunted by a nightmare which would not pass. Add to the famine cholera and the plague, and you have not exhausted India's woes. For the moment the wars have relieved her of some of her military charges. But the China war by hitting the opium trade threatens to play the mischief with her next budget. The Afridis are uneasy on the northwest frontier, and if the Chinese teapot boils over on the Burmese side our Indian burden may easily become so heavy we shall have no strength to spare for Chinese expeditions and African wars.

The talk about Dissolution, which Prospects had somewhat died down at the end of June, has been revived at the end Dissolution. of July, and people are now saying that there will be a Dissolution this October. Early in July it was currently reported in well-informed quarters that Ministers deplored that they had lost the chance of dissolving when Mr. Chamberlain wished to make an appeal to the country immediately after the occupation of Pretoria. A Dissolution when it was possible to make believe that the occupation of Pretoria was equivalent to the conquest of the Transvaal might have justified Mr. Chamberlain's calculations, but to dissolve now, when it is evident that Lord Roberts has still the most difficult part of his task to accomplish, does not hold out prospects calculated to encourage an early appeal to the But it is now argued that the very country. desperate nature of the difficulties in which they are involved will compel Ministers to dissolve this They dare not wait, it is said, for their troubles to thicken. Already the reaction has set in. Next year they will be lost. Therefore—a Dissolution in autumn. We shall see!

The introduction of a supplementary The Cost estimate for 113 millions, of which £3,000,000 is allotted to the the War. operations in China, is a timely reminder of the bill which we are running up in South Africa. This estimate brings the total provision made for the cost of the war to nearly 70 millions, and the end is not yet. Our losses-killed, wounded, prisoners, and deaths from disease-are now returned at 34,000, not including those prisoners who have been captured and have subsequently been In addition to this total of 34,000, released. 20,000 officers and men have been invalided home. The war, therefore, has cost us about 55,000 men, or close upon two army corps. And although it is two months since the war was declared to be virtually at an end, the returns show a weekly addition of from two to three thousand to the grand total. At this rate South Africa will eat up an army of 100,000 men in twelve months.

There is a general agreement among the men of all parties that the soldiers What the who are now coming home from Soldiers Say. South Africa are thoroughly disillusioned as to the nature of the war in which their health has been sacrificed. Many of those who went out roaring Jingoes have come home in a sane and sensible frame of mind, perfectly convinced that the war was a horrible mistake and that the game was not worth the candle. The evidence also which is accumulating as to the way in which the troops were neglected and left to die uncared for in field hospitals after the typhoid broke out in Bloemfontein has produced a very deep impression on the public mind. The charges made by Mr. Burdett-Coutts are now being referred to the examination of a Commission which has no power either to compel evidence or to guarantee witnesses against the consequences of speaking the truth. No doubt we shall be told that such horrors are unavoidable concomitants of all wars; but there is nothing like bringing the knowledge of these concomitants home to the people to create a reaction against those who made war with a light heart and refused to accept an arbitration which would have maintained peace.

Although the end of the war in An Anticipated South Africa is as far off as ever, good people are busying themselves with anticipations as to what kind of welcome will be given to the soldiers, or so many of them as may be spared to come home. The event is sufficiently remote to have little pressing interest. But it is noteworthy that the Bishop of Rochester deems it necessary to issue in advance a public protest or warning against making the home-coming of our troops "a carnival of sin and shame." Despite all the good Bishop may say, the inveterate national habit of manifesting good feeling by treating with strong drink will result in drunken orgies all over the country. This, however, will be thoroughly in keeping with the whole discreditable episode. A war begun with horrid cries for vengeance could not be more appropriately closed than amid a heathen Saturnalia. But the prospect of the return of any soldiers from Africa except invalided men is so remote that the Bishop is wasting his time.

The merits of the war were discussed in the House of Commons on Wed-Plain Answered. nesday, July 25th. Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman summed up the general conclusion of all sensible men when he said:-

I will put a plain question and ask if the consequences that we have seen had been foreseen at that time, if we had known that all this sacrifice of life, suffering, and waste of money, not to speak of other evils that may be in the background, were to follow, is there any man here who would not have gone a great deal further than the right hon. gentleman showed a disposition to go in order to prevent an open rupture? There is not such a man among us. And can any one say that the attainment of the ostensible object—namely, the remedy of the Transvaal grievances—was worth all it has cost?

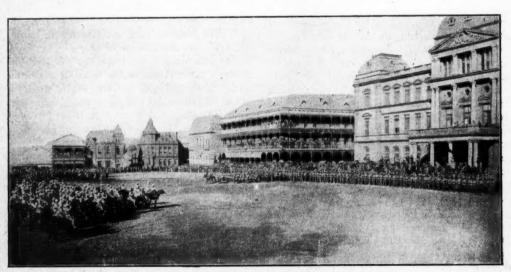

Mr. Lloyd George, who is steadily coming more and more to the front, put the case even more effectively when he said:—

As for avenging Majuba, we had been defeated in battles where the losses were greater than they were at Majuba. We had simply overshadowed Majuba with the ghastlier tragedies of Magersfontein and Spion Kop. At the last election the great cry was "Support home industries," and the Minister who got his party into power on the prohibition of foreign brushes was now engaged in the task of restoring British prestige with guns made in Germany, soldiers fed on French vegetables and South American meat, Hungarian horses provided with American saddles, and foreign fodder carried by Spanish mules.

Only 52 members, including Mr.
Morley, Mr. Bryce, Sir Robert Reid, and Mr. Courtney, voted for Sir Wilfrid Lawson's amendment reducing Mr. Chamberlain's salary as a protest against the war. Sir E. Grey put another nail into his political coffin by voting with the Government. after an extraordinary speech, in which he actually argued that Ministers could not be responsible for making the war because they had made no adequate preparations for its prosecution! He ignored, as do all apologists for the war, the fact that, leaving all other issues out of consideration, the Boers implored us to settle the whole dispute by arbitration, and that by our absolute refusal to permit the real questions at issue to be referred to arbitration we rendered ourselves solely responsible for the war. Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman did not vote at all-a feeble course, but one which was at any rate better than voting in favour of Mr. Chamberlain, But this splitting up of the Opposition into three sections, consisting of thirty-one against the war, forty for the war, and thirty-five neutral, only reminds us once more that as an effective force in Parliament the Liberal party has ceased to exist.

The Entry into Pretoria.

Mr. Ch

the for he proposed thing is the two no polit future. must be a milita governi governi country possible that the indicat length circum especia to the 1 The 1

State, in under reconce never, are pro-tend

Cample which Censof mili

it has sion o and p done Sultan taken want s is men invade taken trial, r with 1 transa things Of co ever

milita peopl gestat

runne

Mr. Chamberlain, in a speech as insolent, as arrogant and as effective as ever in its appeal to the prejudices and passions of the majority, made the following declaration as to the policy which he proposes to pursue in South Africa. He said:—

There are some things which are very clear. The first thing is the announcement which has been made that the two States will be annexed to Her Majesty's dominion, no political independence will be reserved to them in the future. At the very earliest moment civil administration must be set up, and a civil administration as opposed to a military administration is what we call Crown colony government. But the fact that we establish such a government with a view to make the condition of the country as easy as possible, to make as few breaks as possible with the past, is not to be taken as an indication that the government will last for long, or indeed as any indication whatever on the subject. The question of the length of such an administration must depend on many circumstances which we now cannot anticipate, but especially, of course, on the way in which the Boers take to the new government which we shall set up.

The meaning of this is that the Government intend to annex the Transvaal and Orange Free State, if they can, and put the conquered territories under the military jackboot until such time as they reconcile themselves to their lot. As that will be never, all these pledges about local self-government are primâ facie worthless.

Martial Law at the Cape.

into

now

with ables

rided d by

Mr.

eid.

Sir

re-

inst

his ent.

ally

for ate

as nat.

the

by mit

ra-

the

at ate

in.

ee

rty

us

What the rule of the military jackboot means in a colony nominally in the enjoyment of responsible government may be imagined from Sir H.

Campbell-Bannerman's complaints as to the way in which the Cape colonists are treated. He said:—

Censorship has been applied far beyond the range of military facts and communications. In some instances it has gone to the extent of interfering with the expression of political opinion and the conveyance of public and political facts just in the same way as would be done by the autocratic Government of Russia or the Sultan of Turkey. With regard to those who have been taken up under martial law, what is alleged is this, and I want some explicit answer. It is alleged that a man who is merely suspected of having been favourable to the invaders is looked upon as a rebel. He is apprehended, taken away from his farm and family, put in gaol without trial, not allowed to see a legal adviser or to communicate with his wife, not allowed to take part in any money transactions necessary for his farm; and this state of things goes on apparently indefinitely.

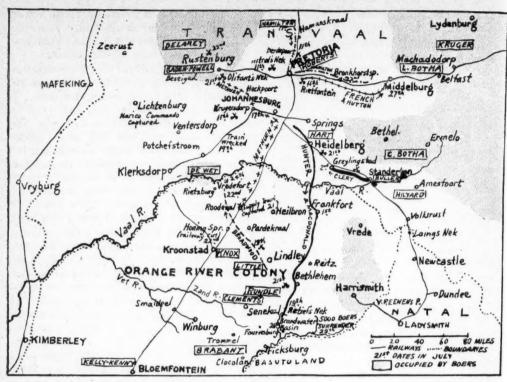

Of course he asked in vain. No explicit answer is ever forthcoming in such cases until the full cup runneth over, and an oppressed and outraged population deprived of justice appeal to the sword. All military rule engenders revolt, and in countries peopled by liberty-loving Dutchmen the period of gestation is short.

Our Failure in the Field. Another month has passed without bringing us appreciably nearer the subjugation of the brave burghers of the South African Republics. For weeks past the papers were full of confident announcements as to the speedy annihilation of De Wet and his Liliputian force in the Orange Free State. was not known whether he had 8,000 men or only 2,000; but half-a-dozen British forces numbering 40,000 or 50,000 men were told off to capture The half-a-dozen British generals marched and countermarched, concentrating, according to their plan of campaign, so as to form a cordon of iron round the Boers. When the coil was complete they were to capture De Wet and all his men, and send them to join General Cronje at St. Helena. They had all the railways at their command, and the bottomless pocket of John Bull to draw upon for all that they wanted. Mr. Winston Churchill had estimated one Boer as a match for four Englishmen, and here we had many more than four Britons per Boer. So we waited in confident expectation. De Wet was "in the toils." But lo and behold, one fine day De Wet simply romped through the cordon of iron, and marched off northward. He halted in his way to bag a railway train rich with rations, and a bunch of 100 prisoners, and apparently is as full of fight as ever. General Hunter succeeded in cornering Commandant Prinsloo near Fouriesburg, but all the Queen's horses and all the Queen's men seem to be powerless to seize De Wet, and there appears to be no reason why he should not continue these tactics indefinitely.

Lord Roberts' Confession of Weakness. In the Transvaal, Lord Roberts appears to have been in such difficulties at Pretoria that he was compelled to resort to an expedient which in warfare is only lawful to commanders of beleaguered garrisons in distress. When he entered Pretoria two months ago we all plumed ourselves upon the compliment paid to the humanity of Lord Roberts that was implied in the fact that Mrs. Kruger and the wives of the Boers were left in Pretoria. President Kruger knew, we said in complacent pride, that the British could be relied upon to respect and protect the wives of their foes. These self-congratulations upon our chivalry read somewhat curiously to-day when we are told that Lord Roberts has found it necessary to expel Mrs. Kruger and six hundred Boer women from Pretoria! They have been sent on by train to the Boer lines. Nothing could more plaintively reveal the straits to which our General is reduced. After two months' undisputed occupation he dare no longer face the risk of having to feed six hundred extra women in Pretoria and of allowing six hundred pair of women's eyes to see the difficulties of his bootless, half-fed garrison. On July 23rd Lord Roberts began a general advance towards Middleburg, which was occupied without resistance, the retreat of the Boers being covered by a terrible storm of wind and rain, which effectively checked the British advance. The Boers have fallen back upon Lydenburg, where President Kruger is preparing to make a stand in order to afford De Wet a longer range of communications in which to pick up those convoys upon which the Boers will maintain themselves in the later stages of the war.

Operations in South Africa during July.

The Cape Ministry expect a majority of six for their Bill disfranchising for the Cape Parliament. a term of five years all Colonials found guilty of supporting the Boers in their struggle for independence. So far the Cape Parliament has been busy debating Mr. Merriman's motion for the abolition of martial law. Captain Brabant pleaded for speedy punishment of the rebels in order to secure an early settlement and the forgetting of past quarrels. English and Dutch must live together, and it was best for them to be friends. "It is all very well to dissemble your love, but why did you kick me down stairs?" Captain Brabant's idea of making friends by speedy punishment reminds one of the way in which a famous revolutionary hero found no difficulty in the petition in the Lord's Prayer about forgiving our enemies. "I have none," he said, "I have shot them all." But of all methods of making friends, this of suspending trial by jury in order to disfranchise political opponents is the most curious. After a war men forget a good deal of straight shooting. but the memory of a dirty electioneering trick rankles in the mind for years.

The loyal Dutch of the Cape, who did not rise and who were bitterly taunted by their kinsfolk because they did not come to their assistance, have sent a Deputation to England to plead for the preservation of the independence of the Republics.

Th

me

the

une Mr

abo

wa

unj

Au

wit

a s

Th

sla

are wil

col

min

sig

aga

tog

of

ges

wa

tio res

op

Ne

tha

of

of

ha

Th

lim

aw

an

of

Eig

The Delegates are honest, sincere, simple-minded men, who are so firmly convinced of the justice of their own cause that it is difficult to make them understand how utterly they have been misled by Mr. W. P. Schreiner. He induced the majority to abdicate their rights. He refused even to allow them to protest against the use made of their railways to prosecute a war which they believed to be unjust, unnecessary and criminal. He explained that if they only abstained from action such as every Australian or Canadian majority would have taken without a moment's hesitation, they would have such a strong position and would be able to exercise so much influence when the time for settlement came. That time has not yet come, but already the door is slammed in their faces and they are told that they are fools to imagine that any one will listen to anything they have got to say. The only benefit which will accrue from the Deputation to Britain is to convince its members how passionately the British minority opposed to the war sympathises with them in their present distress.

A Turning of the Tide?

The great meeting held in Queen's Hall last month, attended by nearly 3,000 persons to listen to the case of our Dutch fellow-colonists, was very significant. Adequate precautions had been taken against disturbance, and admission was by ticket only. It was remarkable that 3,000 persons could be got together on a sweltering July night to listen to an hour's speech by a Dutch Afrikander; but the temper of the assembly was portentous indeed. Every suggestion that the Boers might even now be victorious was cheered enthusiastically, and the Dutch declarations of loyalty from the platform evoked very ominous responses from the audience. Never before did the opponents of the war let themselves go so completely. Never before did they shrink so little from the reproach that they were identifying themselves with the enemies of our country. It was an indication of the turning of the tide. Soon the opponents of the war will not have to excite popular indignation against its authors. They will have difficulty in restraining within just limits the passionate wrath of a populace tardily awakened to the way in which it has been deceived and its interests have been betrayed by the Ministers of the Crown.

Two great functions which took place in Paris on July 3rd and 4th, when the monuments of Washington and Lafayette were unveiled, serve as opportune reminders to British patriots of the fact that the traitors of to-day are the heroes of to-morrow. Washington was the President Kruger of his day and generation. Lafayette has his counterpart in Colonel Villebois de Mareuil. No Englishman now resents the homage which the united democracies of France and the United States pay to the heroes of the war of independence of last century. It is to be hoped that we shall not have to wait a hundred years before we shall find the same unanimity among Englishmen in recognition of the essential justice of the cause of the African Republics as there is to-day amongst us in regard to the cause of the heroes of the Declaration of Independence. George the Third and Mr. Chamberlain will be bracketed together in history as the men who used the resources of England in an abortive effort to crush communities of free men who took the field in defence of the essential English principles of liberty, self-government and independence.

River Transit in London. The excessive heat which has afflicted Europe last month told with especial severity upon the horses, whose sufferings, despite all efforts at amelioration in the shape of wet sponges and

The Shah of Persia,
Who is visiting Europe.

early English

est for semble airs?"

ls by vay in fficulty giving

e shot

riends,

isfran-

After

oting,

ankles

, who itterly

cause

tance,

or the

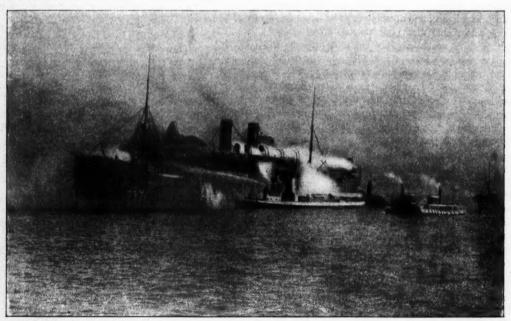

blics.

straw hats, were nevertheless sufficiently great to appreciably lessen the regret which is felt at the approaching extinction of horse traffic. Londoners discovered to their delight and surprise that the temperature in the electric railway was so cool that the journey on the new Underground was almost as refreshing as a dip in the sea. The difficulty of city transit in hot weather has naturally directed attention to the scandalous way in which the possibilities of river locomotion have been neglected on the Thames. A Committee of the London County Council has drawn up a report as to the way in which the silent highway of the tidal river might be utilised so as to relieve the pressure on the streets. The figures in this report are very interesting. They calculate that between 31 and 4 million persons take journeys every day by railway, tramway and omnibus in London. They propose to start a service of forty river steamers which will cost f,7,500 each, with a capacity of carrying 250 passengers. They would ply from Woolwich to Hammersmith. route is divided into five stages, with a fare of Each steamer, it is calculated, would carry 2,877 persons daily, and the cost of each journey would be about 15s. 11d. If they could secure 33½ millions of passengers in the year, they count upon total receipts of £140,000 per annum, which, if they are relieved from the pier royalty of £5,000 per annum now paid to the Thames Conservancy, would cover working expenses and the interest on the repayment of debt. It is never so easy to provide steamboat accommodation on a tidal river as it is on a stream like the Seine, but even after making all allowances no one can deny that the Thames steamboat has long been a disgrace to the capital of the Empire.

The Example of Sweden. I suggested some time ago that something should be done to utilise the unique collection of exhibits now on show in the great World's Museum now open in Paris for the benefit of the working classes in our country. A few enterprising employers have taken over trainloads of their workmen, but for the most part the British employer has ignored the Exhibition. The British Government has ignored it entirely. Other Governments are wiser in their generation. The Swedish Government has voted a large sum of money for the purpose of sending carefully selected workmen of various trades from Sweden to Paris. Each of these Government students, if they Collier's Weekly.

The North German Lloyd Liner "Bremen" burning on the Hudson River, New York, on June 30th.

hi

fo

na po tir It

Po

When the Dawn comes up like thunder, Out o' China 'crost the bay.—Kipling.

may be so called, received travelling expenses varying from 15 to 30 guineas, two-thirds of which is paid before they start, while the remaining one-third is paid when they hand in their written report of what they have seen and learned at the Exhibition. Sweden in this sets an example which other States will do well to follow. As for the British Government, which is spending two millions a week on the South African War, it naturally has no funds available for enabling the British artisan to share with his Swedish rival the benefit of a visit to the Exhibition.

A Notable

Last month there was celebrated at Berne the twenty-fifth anniversary of the foundation of the International Postal Union. It was decided to erect a monument at Berne in commemoration of the foundation of the Union, the cost of which, estimated at £8,000, will be borne by the budget of the International Bureau. Twenty millions of the new Jubilee postage stamps are being issued, of 5, 10 and 25 centimes, which will only be on sale until December 31st. It is stated that while the United States was the first to take the initiative in forming the International Postal Union, the original suggestion came from a Danish postal employé, Joseph Michaelsen by name. It is difficult to realise the immense strides that have been made in the cheapening of postage. Sixty years ago it cost 4s. 6d. to send a letter from Berlin to Rome; now 2½d. will frank a letter to the uttermost ends of the earth. If only the Postal Union could arrange for an international stamp which could be used as a substitute for coin in small remittances, it would render good service to the cause of internationalism. But for that we shall have to wait till the next century.

Death of Prince Alfred. On the 30th ult. a merciful seizure of heart paralysis ended the sufferings of the Duke of Coburg. Cancer at the root of the tongue had made death inevitable. Born in 1844, he was only fifty-six years old.

Photograph by]

[Gerschel, Paris.

General André.

(The New French Minister of War.)

thev

um.

y of

Con-

the easy

iver

fter

the

the

that ilise

now

eum

king

for the

d it

heir

d a areden

hey

DIARY FOR JULY.

EVENTS OF THE MONTH.

- July z. Reports from Simla state that the monsoon is still retarded.
- The trial of Sipido and his three accomplices for the attempted assassination of the Prince of Wales begins at Brussels.
- 3. The law for abolishing banishment to Siberia

  - The law for abolishing banishment to Siberia is signed by the Tsar.

    High officials in Kiang-su and Che-kiang remit to the British Consul at Shanghai over £6,000 for the Indian Famine Fund.

    The statue of Washington given by the Women of the United States to France is unveiled in the Place d'Iéna, Paris.
- by American school children is un-veiled in the gardens of the Louvre.

4. A statue of Lafayette presented to France

- veiled in the gardens of the Louvre.

  The jury at Brussels bring in a verdict of guilty against Sipido and acquit the three others accused. The Court considers Sipido irresponsible. He is placed at the disposal of the Government until he attains the age of 2x.

  In the French Senate a resolution approving the action of the Government in demanding General Jamont's resignation is carried by 164 votes to 64, and the Prime Minister's speech is ordered to be placarded throughout France.
- France.

  blonel Willcocks telegraphs that Sir
  F. Hodgson escaped from Kumassi on June 23rd with 600 native soldiers.

  be Deutsche Asiatische Bank at
- June 23rd with 600 native soldiers. he Deutsche Asiatische Bank at Berlin receives a telegram from Shanghai stating that the interest due on the 44 per cent. Chinese loan is duly paid in.
- Mr. Bryan is nominated as Democratic candidate for the Presidency. Mr. Adiai Stephenson is nominated Vice-President
- A statue of Mr. Gladstone is unveiled in Athens, in presence of the King, Cabinet Ministers, and the Municipal
- The Royal Assent is given to the Commonwealth of Australia Constitu-tion Bill.
  - The Bisley Meeting begins.
- The credit of 14,500,000 francs for the China expedition is agreed to without discussion in the French Chamber and also in the Senate.
  - The Session then ends.

    The Belgian Senate passes the Bill for ratifying the provisions of the Peace Conference.
- 11. The Federal Council on Foreign Affairs
  - meets at Berlin.

    Herr Mumm von Schwarzenstein is appointed German representative to C in place of the late Baron von Ketteler. to China
  - Mr. Hay and Dr. von Holleben sign the reciprocity Convention concluded between the United States and Germany.
- Count von Bülow addresses a Circular Note to the Governments of the Federated German States on the situation in China.
- The Earl of Hopetoun is appointed Governor-General of the Commonwealth of Australia.
- 14. The Allies capture the native city of Tientsin and the forts after, severe fighting; about 8,000 allied troops were engaged. British losses 20 killed, 93 wounded; casualties of Allies about 775
  - General rain falls all over India.
  - A deputation of Mr. Schreiner's constituents have an interview with him at Capetown.
  - The Christian Endeavour World's Convention opens at the Alexandra Palace.
- 15. The International Congress of Textile Workers meets at Berlin.

- 15. The garrison at Kumassi is rel'eved by the force in command of Colonel Willcocks.

  15. The Nationalists of France experience signal defeat at a by-election at No.
- 17. An agreement is reached between the Govern-An agreement is reached between the covern-ments of Great Britain, America and Russia to submit to arbitration the outstanding claims arising out of the seizure of British and American vessels by Russian cruisers in the North Pacific in 189a. News arrives at St. Petersburg that the Chinese have entered Siberia.
- 18. The Canadian Parliament is prorogued.
- Great French naval review takes place at Cherbourg.

Photograph by]

[Elliott and Fry.

Lord Hopetoun,

(Governor-General of Federated Australia.)

- The Metropolitan or Underground Electric Railway, from Vincennes to the Porte Maillot, is opened in Paris.

  Mr. Chambriain telegraphs to Sir W. J. Lyne, Premier of New South Wales, that the Governor-General of Federated Australia will be sworn in and the Commonwealth inaugurated at Sydney.
- The Cape Parliament opens.

  Mr. Hay, at Washington, notifies that Portugal has deposited $3,500,000 at the Comptoir d'Escompte in Paris in payment of the sum awarded to Great Britain and the 22.
  - United States by the Delagoa Bay Arbitration Tribunal. tion fribunal.
    Mr. Seddon, Premier of New Zealand, submits a scheme to the Colonial Parliament having reference to the New Zealand harbour defences and to the permanent Imperial
- The interest on the 1898 Chinese loan punctu-
- ally paid.

  The Queen's Prize at Bisley is won by Private

  The Queen's Prize at Bisley is won by Private

  The Queen's Prize at Bisley is won by Private

  The Queen's Prize at Bisley is won by Private

  The Queen's Prize at Bisley is won by Private

  The Queen's Prize at Bisley is won by Private

  The Queen's Prize at Bisley is won by Private

  The Queen's Prize at Bisley is won by Private

  The Queen's Prize at Bisley is won by Private

  The Queen's Prize at Bisley is won by Private

  The Queen's Prize at Bisley is won by Private

  The Queen's Prize at Bisley is won by Private

  The Queen's Prize at Bisley is won by Private

  The Queen's Prize at Bisley is won by Private

  The Queen's Prize at Bisley is won by Private

  The Queen's Prize at Bisley is won by Private

  The Queen's Prize at Bisley is won by Private

  The Prize at Bisley is the Prize at Bisley is won by Private

  The Prize at Bisley is the Prize at Bisley is the Private at Bisley is the Ward, 1st Devon Volunteers, who won it in 1897.

- signal defeat at a by-election at Nort, M. Thiebaud, the Nationalist candidate receiving only 2,226 votes, whilst M. Gentil, Radical Republican receives 5,979
- The Commission appointed to inquire into the treatment of the sick and wounded during the South African war begins its work at Burlington Gardens, W.
  - Burlington Gardens, W.
    The African Association for the discussion of Native Race Questions holds its conference in Westminster Town Hall.
- 25. The French Foreign Office publishes the text of the letter from the Chinese Emperor to M. Loubet,
  - The Boer delegates are received by M. Loubet in Paris. Judgment is given at Brussels in the Selati Railway case.
  - 26. The New South Wales Legislative Assembly resolve to despatch a military force for service in China.
    - The United States Consul-General at Panama states that the revolution there has collapsed.
  - 27. Arrangements are completed for the pu-chase by the United States of the Sibutu and Cagayan Islands from Spain.
  - 29. Assassination of the King of Italy at Monza

The War in South Africa.

- July 2. The foreign military attachés arrive from the front at Cape Town. Mr. Botha, member of the House of Assembly of Cape Colony for Aliwal West, is released on heavy bail.
- General Paget engages the Boers suc-cessfully at Pleisirfontein.
- 5. There is fighting at Ficksburg, and near Senekal.
- Sir Redvers Buller arrives at Pretoria; skirmishing goes on round Pretoria. The Boers attack Rustenburg. 800 British prisoners are put over the Natal border by the Boers; fighting new Visheontein. near Vlakfontein.
- Lord Roberts reports that several Free State Ministers surrender at Heilbron.
- ro. Lord Roberts reports the capture of Bethlehem by Clement and Paget's forces. The Agent-General for th: Cape of Good Hope notifies that no civilians are at present to proceed to the Transvaal.
- Lord Roberts reports a British reverse at Nitral's Nek, eighteen miles from
- Pretoria.

  15. The Boers hold a line of kopies five miles north of Wonderboom and Daspoort forts.
- 17. Fifteen hundred Boers break through the cordon formed by Generals Hunter and Rundle's Divisions between Bethlehem and Ficksburg.
- comprehensive Bill is brought in by Mr. Rose-Innes in the Cape Parliament on indemnity and martial law.
- 21. Fighting near Lindley between the British and De Wet's force.
  - General Knox reports that the Boers have cut the wires and destroyed the railway line north of Honing Spruit; a supply train and one hundred Fusiiers are c.ptured by De Wet's force.
- General Sir F. Carrington and his Rhodesian Field Force attack the Boer position at Selous River and carry it by assault.
- Mr. Merriman's resolution in the Cape Parlia-ment for the immediate repeal of martial law is opposed by Mr. Rose-Innes and Mr.

27. G

TI

27. Generals French and Hutton's forces encounter a terrible storm near Middleburg in their pursuit of the Boers; one officer dies of exposure, and the mules and owen suffer greatly. eneral Prinsloo and 5,000 Boers surrender at ience a t Nort, andidate

ilst M receives

into the during work at ssion or nference

the text Emperor ved by

in the

gislative milit..r, neral at the pu s from

Italy at s arrive

ouse of Alival

ers suc-

g, and retoria :

g. 800 ver the fighting

al Free eilbron. ture of Paget's

that no ceed to reverse es from

e miles forts.

gh the em and

by Mr.

ent on ish and ave cut y line in and ed by desian Parliamartial nd Mr.

ca.

The Crisis in China.

July 1. The Japanese Red-Cross Steamer, Kaknai, leaves Yokohama for China, to serve as a hospital ship for the wounded of all nations.

4. The British and Russian Admirals hold a council of war, and decide that it is impossible to attempt the relief of Peking without strong reinforcements.

The Russian Chief of Police at Port Arthur arrives at Tientsin. He reports that the Chinese were wrecking the Manchurian railway.

railway.

The German Emperor offers a reward of 1,000

Talway.

The German Emperor off.rs a reward of 1,000 taels to anyone who accomplishes the deliverance of any foreigner now shut up in Peking.

The Chinese Minister at Washington receives a despatch from Sheng, Director of Telegraphs at Shanghai, stating that the Foreign Legations and Ministers at Peking were safe on July 3rd.

According to Chinese official reports the Empress resumed the reins of Government on June 30th. She has appointed Yung Lu her Prime Minister. She orders the protection of all foreigners. Wu-Ting-Fang, Chinese Minister at Washington, delivers to Mr. Hay a telegram purporting to come from the Chinese Government explaining the situation.

ment explaining the situation.

The American Government informs the Chinese

The American Government informs the Uninese Minister Wu-Ting-Fang that failure to send news of their Minister at Peking will be regarded as an unfriendly act.

16. A despatch to Berlin from Chifu of date July 15th says the Alliss repulsed the Chinese 16 at Tientsin; at the same time the Japanese occupied part of the native Chinese city.

17. Li Hung Chang leaves Canton for Hong-Kong; he receives an Edict appointing him Viceroy of Chi-li. It is reported at St. Petersburg that the Chinese have entered Siberia.

18. Li Hung Chang passes through Hong-Kong on his way north, from Canton. The Viceroy Liu appoints Commissioner Taylor to act as Inspector General of the Imperial to act as inspector-teneral of the imperium Maritime Customs at Shanghai ad interim. Mr. Fowler, United States Consul at Chifu, telegraphs that the Governor of Shan-tung states that his courier left Peking on July 9th, when the Legations were still holding out. M. Delcassé proposes an international agre-ent among the Powers as to joint action in

China.

Mr. W. W. Rockhill is appointed Special Commissioner to China by the American

Commissioner to China by the American Government.

The Chinese Emperor telegraph's to the President of the French Republic requesting the intervention of France, and the State Department at Washington issues the statement that Mr. Goodnow, United States Consul-General at Shanghai, receives a cipher message from Mr. Conger at Pekin of the 18th inst.; this comes through the Governor of Shan-tung. Governor of Shan-tung. The Russians occupy the arsenal at Li-ku, north of Tientsin.

north of Tientsin.

2. An Imperial Edict purporting to be sent by the Emperor of China to the Southern Viceroys and Governors; it is dated from Peking, July 18th; the Edict states that the fullest protection has been afforded and that the foreign Ministers, with the exception of Baron von Kettler, are safe.

Tientsin and neighbourhood evacuated by the Tientsin and neighbourhood evacuated by the Chinese troops.

Li Hung Chanz arrives at Shanghai.
The British Consul at Tientsin receives a letter from Sir Claude MacDonald dated July 4th.
At a meeting of the Admirals at Taku it is decided by the vote of the majority that the railway from Tangku to Tientsin should be handed over to the control of the Russians, the British and American Admirals recording their dissent. A commission, consisting of Colonels Bower, Wogak, and Aoki, is appointed to govern Tientsia.

26. Mr. Kinder has arranged with the Chinese General for the protection of the railway beyond Pei-tang.

A cipher message received at the Admiralty from Sir Claude MacDonald: the Legation in Peking safe up to July 21.

PARLIAMENTARY RECORD.

House of Lords.

July 2. Lord Wemyss moves the second reading of the Militia Ballot Bill; the Bill is lost.

The Commonwealth of Australia Constitution
Bill passes through Committee, and is reported without amendment to the House.

ported without amendment to the House.

5. Second reading Workmen's Compensation Act [1897] Extension.

6. Lord Templetown moves a resolution in favour of compensation from the State to the Irish landlords; on a division his lordship's motion is carried by a majority of three against the Government Government.
The establishment of the Militia; statement by

The establishment of the Militia; statement by Lord Lansdowns.
 Third reading of Workmen's Compensation Act (1837) Extension Bill.
 The defence of the Empire and the reorganisation of the Army system.
 Colonial Reserve Forces; speeches by Lord Brassey and Lord Lansdowne.
 Lord Northbrook calls attention to the report of the Royal Commission on Indian Expenditure; speeches by Lord Welby, Lord Onslow, Lord Kimberley and Lord Salisbury.

Lord Onslow, Lord Kimberley and Lord Salisbury,

23. Second reading of the Education Bill.

24. Prohibition of Exportation of Arms Bill passes through Committee.

26. Third reading Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowner and Others) Bill and others.

27. Our Home Defences: speeches by Lord Wemyss, Lord Salisbury, Lord Rossbery, Lord Lansdowne and Lord Kimberley.

House of Commons.

House of Commons.

July 2. Mr. Brodrick on the Situation in China.

The Housing of the Working Classes Act (1890) Amendment Bill is considered. The Agricultur al Holdings Bill is discussed.

3. At the request of Sir W. Foster, Mr. Wyndham states the number of cases of enteric fever admitted into the hospitals at Bloemfontein: 2,087 admissions, 286 deaths.

4. The consideration of the Irish Tithe-Charge Bill is resumed in Committee.

Mr. Chamberlain reports having received great.

Bill is resumed in Committee.

Mr. Chamberlain reports having received great complaints from New Zealand as to the hospital arrangements in South Africa. Sir Charles Dilke states that he stands to the statements he has made with regard to the scandals in Intombi Camp.

Mr. Balfour communicates to the House the names of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the charges of mismanagement of the sick and wounded in South Africa. The appointment is severely criticised by Mr. Burdett-Coutts and others; Mr. Balfour promises to re-consider the appointments.

promises to re-consider the appointments.

6. Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman asks the Secretary for the Colonies as to the trials of Messrs, Van der Valt and Boogson in Cape Colony.

Colony.
 Tithe Rent-Charge (Ireland) Bill, Committee.
 The Agricultural Holdings Bill, report stage, as amended is resumed. Votes passed on Friday on Committee of Supply are confirmed on report.

11. The consideration of the Agricultural Holdings

11. The consideration of the Agricultural Holdings Bill is resumed.

12. Agricultural Holdings Bill. Third reading of the Housing of the Working Classes Act (1850) Amendment Bill.

13. The House goes into Committee of Supply on the Yote for the Home Office; Sir Charles Dilke calls attention to the Lead Poisoning in the Pottery District; speeches by Mr. Burns, Mr. Tennant, and Mr. Asquith.

16. Mr. Brodrick says the Government have no confirmation of the reported terrible calamity at Peking. Statement by Mr. Balfour of the business of the remainder of the Session. Irish Tithe Rent-Charge Bill; speeches by Mr. Gerald Balfour, Mr. Asquith, and Mr. Dillon.

17. Mr. Chamberlain announces the relief of Kumassi on the 15th. Mr. Balfour an-nounces the appointment of Sir David Rich-mond and Mr. Harrison as the two addi-tional members of the Commission of Inquiry into the treatment of the sick and wounded in South Africa.
Navy Estimates. Statement by Mr. Goschen

on the use of water-tube boilers.

18. Second reading of Volunteer Bill, Mr. Wynd-

Second reading of Volunteer Bill, Mr. Wyndham agreeing that the clause calling on volunteers to enroll themselves for service abroad be del:ted.
Third reading Agricultural Holdings Bill.
Committee of Supply, on the vote to complete the sum of £1,22,63 for National Education is below in Ireland.

in Ireland.
The Military Lands Act, 1832, the Reserve Forces Bill, and the Public Works Loan Bill pass through Committee. Second reading Naval Reserve Bill.

Naval Reserve Bill.

4. The Companies Bill as amended by the Standing Committee is considered.

5. Third reading Reserve Force Bill. Vote in supply to complete the sum of £55,250, for the Colonial Office Debate on the situation in South Africa; speeches by Mr. Buxton, Sir W. Luwson, Sir R. Reid, and Mr. Chamberlain, Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, and Mr. Balfour and Mr. Courtney.

5. The South African Hospitals Commission is made 2 Royal Commission. Lord George Hamiltor makes the annual statement on the finances of India; the area affected by the drought crower 400,000 square miles and the drought covers 420,000 square miles and affects 62 millions of people.

Supplementary Army Estimates. New War Loan; speech by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

SPEECHES.

July 2. The German Emperor, at Wilhelmshaven, on the Chinese crisis and Germany's duty.

7. M. Deleassé, in the French Chamber, on the situation in China.

The President of the University, at Athens, on Mr. Gladstone's services to the cause of Greece, and his eminance as a Greek scholar.

9. Mrs. Olive Schreiner, at Graaf Reinet, on the

9. Mrs. Olive Schreiner, at Graaf Reinet, on the war and its consequences.
13. Mr. McKinley, at Canton, U.S.A., on the policy of the Republican Party.
18. Mr. Courtney, in London, on the South African Settlement.
20. Sir Alfred Milner, at Cape Town, on the settlement of affairs in South Africa.
M. Loubet, at Cherbourg, on French particitism. patriotism.
27. The German Emperor, at Bremerhaven, tells his troops to give no quarter and take no prisoners in China.

OBITUARY.

July 2. Professor Dani: John Leech (Owens College, Manchester), 60.
4. Hon. A. R. Dickey (Nova Soctia), 45.
6. Rev. George Hill (Antrim), 90.
7. Dr. Falk (Berlin), 72.
Rev. William Fletcher, D.D., 90.
Mr. E. M. James, M.R.C.S., L.S.A.
M. de Blignières

M. de Blignières. Professor Max Koner (Berlin). Mr. Georges Marye.
Mr. J. A. Dyer (late chief sub-editor, Daily News), 70.

Mr. J. A. Dyer (afte other sub-suitor, Daily News), 70.
Mrs. Edward Geale (Dublin).
Professor Texte (of Lyons).
Mr. John Clark (Fellow of Queen's College, Cambridge).
Surgson Lieut.-Colonel Wellington Lake.
General de Pellieux (Paris), 58.
Sir Th. 2 McIlwraith, K.C.M.G., LL.D., 64.

CHARACTER SKETCHES.

I.-KING HUMBERT OF ITALY.

THE third time has proved catching time in the case of King Humbert. Twice before his life has been attempted by assassination, each time without success, King Humbert escaping unhurt. The third time proved fatal. The news of the murder of the King of Italy came upon Europe with the shock of the proverbial bolt from the blue. For some time past there had been no manifestations of discontent. The recent General Election had resulted in the return of over a hundred Socialists and Anti-Monarchists, which afforded a free constitutional vent for the popular dissatisfaction with the high-handed actions of the late Ministry, and the fall of General Pelloux while still possessing a majority of the Chamber, and the installation of his successor, had pledged the Ministry that the unconstitutional measures which were resorted to by its predecessor should not be repeated, and had, it was thought, disarmed even the most malcontent. The King was at Monza distributing prizes in the midst of an enthusiastic populace. The ceremony was complete, and he was driving away amid the cheers of the multitude, when suddenly the assassin dashed forward, sprang upon the carriage steps, and fired in rapid succession three shots, which took fatal effect. In one moment Italy had lost its monarch, the European community had received one of those sudden and violent blows which are felt from the centre to the circumference, making every crowned head and ruling personage feel how frail is the security which it possesses against the attack of a determined assassin. It is well not to exaggerate things, and the late King himself was the author of a famous saying often quoted in these latter days, that attempts at assassination were among the inevitable risks of his profession. He uttered this bon mot after the failure of the second attempt, when he received the congratulations of his courtiers with characteristic nonchalance. Monarchs and all those who tower head and shoulders above the dead level of the multitude are become targets not merely for the marksmen of discontent, but for the Anarchist and the madman. It is one of the penalties of being conspicuous. There is no khaki for monarchs and for presidents, and the marvel is, considering the notoriety which attaches to successful assassination, that attempts are not much more frequent. No doubt there are a great many more than the world ever hears of, for it is only when they get so far as to actually occur in public that the press, that sounding-board of civilisation, spreads the echo of the shot throughout the land until there is not a village or hamlet in Europe which is not all agog with the news of the latest crime meditated against the ruler of a people. The last attempt of the kind, which was fortunately unsuccessful, was that in which crazy Sipido attempted to kill the Prince of Wales; but the last great tragedy in which the assassin was successful was that of the Empress of Austria, a lady against whom even her murderer could allege nothing excepting that she belonged to the royal caste, and challenged destruction as an emblem of the social order which he wished to

When the first attempt was made to kill King Humbert by Passanante at Naples, shortly after his accession to the throne, the would-be murderer sprang upon the steps of the carriage, dagger in hand, and struck what he hoped would be a fatal blow at the king's person. Signor Cairoli flung himself between the king and his assailant, and received in his shoulder the blow which was meant for Humbert's heart. From that day, whenever the king drove abroad in Rome, he always rode in a lofty phaeton. the steps of which were carefully folded up so as to provide no foothold for any assassin who attempted to repeat the crime of Passanante. A very striking feature of Rome was the king's anti-assassination phaeton, for whereas in the ordinary victoria or landau the seat is very little raised above the axle, the king in his phaeton was so high up in the air as to be quite inaccessible to any sudden attack. Possibly if the king had used his phaeton at Monza he would have foiled the attack of Bressi. As it is, the throne has been vacated, one more monarch's scalp has been added to the gory bead-roll of the assassin, and a shudder of added unrest, disquietude, and uneasiness has been contributed to a situation already the reverse of attractive to persons of nervous temperament.

De mortuis nil nisi bonum is not a maxim which needs to be invoked in order to secure silence as to the deeds of the dead monarch. He was neither a bad man nor a bad king. He was in many respects an unobjectionable monarch. It may be objected that the present time is one in which it is impossible to tolerate mediocrities on the throne. But King Humbert could never claim to rank among the great sovereigns of his time. Personally he always displayed the courage of his house. Those who knew him maintain that he was a born fatalist, with a rooted disbelief in the possibility of individual action or personal will operating as material factors in the evolution of events. When he saw his duty clearly he did it with all the unconcern of a soldier ordered into battle. When the cholera was raging at Naples he visited the patients in the cholera hospitals, paying no regard to the warnings and protests of those who considered that he was unduly jeopardising the life of the King of Italy. In all similar circumstances when the question was personal, and when the duty of the man, the soldier, and the sovereign was clear and unmistakable, he faced death with indifference, nor is there any proof that the repeated attempts of the assassin in the slightest degree affected his nerve. In matters political he did not display the same intrepidity—he was indeed cautious almost to the verge of timidity. There is a curious anecdote of the excessive precautions which he took before venturing to substitute his own arms for those of Pio Nono on the Palace of the Ouirinal. The royal residence in the capital, like most of the other public buildings occupied by the Italian Government, at one time belonged to the Vatican. The statues of the Apostles still adorn the walls of the Ouirinal, and an inscription dating from Papal times still reminds the passer-by of its original owners. But the King, while tolerating the Apostles and the inscription, resented the presence of the pontifical arms of Pio Nono. One fine day a fire was reported in the palace, and flames were seen to be bursting from a small window immediately below the objectionable carving. They were extinguished without difficulty, but not before the smoke and flames had blackened and disfigured the Papal coat-of-arms. This being the case, King Humbert befo was the

A s

exc

him

add

the

ble pre H e

sin

the pos

oft

Ete

ete

ere

bu

sple

cor

pul

bui

and aw:

twe

lea

bel

me

pre

Ci

Ca

the sit fro

pai

tas

wh

esc pal

COI

hi

fav

of

Al

al

mo

mı

fev

pa

en

ordered their removal and substituted his own. But before the new coat-of-arms was in its place, all Rome was laughing over the story that the King had arranged the fire in order to afford him an excuse for his action. A small bonfire was made in the room immediately below the coat-of-arms with the express purpose of affording an excuse for the alteration which the King did not feel himself strong enough to make of his own motion. It is added that this coat - of - arms is the one solitary outward and visible sign of his presence in Rome. He has been sincerely free from the mania which possessed so many of the rulers of the Eternal City to eternise their memories by the erection of great buildings and splendid monu-ments, or the construction of public works. He built nothing, he repaired nothing, and he passed away after his twenty years' reign leaving nothing behind to commemorate his presence in the City of the Cæsars. This was characteristic of the man. He was singul .rly free from all love of ostentation or of parade. He was simple man, simple in his tastes, and never so pleased as when he could escape from his palace and his court and betake himself to his favourite pastime of the Piedmontese hunter. Although King of Italy, he was what he

n. Signor

assailant.

vas meant

r the king

y phaeton,

as to pro-

to repeat feature of aeton, for

at is very eton was ole to any his phaeof Bressi.

nonarch's assassin,

d uneasi-

eady the rament.

ch needs

deeds of or a bad

ctionable

t time is rities on claim to ersonally

list, with al action

in the early he red into ples he ying no

ho con-

he King

question

lier, and

d death

epeated affected

lay the t to the

of the uring to

on the capital,

by the atican.

of the

l times

s. But inscrip-of Pio

palace,

small arving.

before

red the

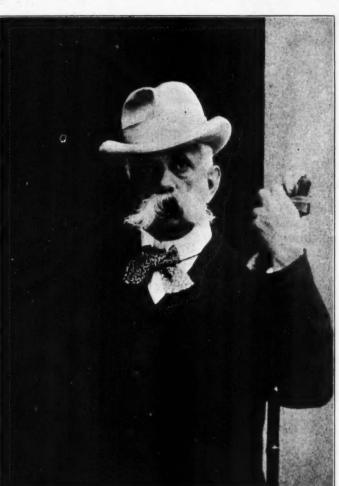

Those

always Piedmontese, loving to talk in the Piedmontese dialect so much that the tenure of the Giolletti Ministry was regarded as perceptibly more secure because Giolletti was one of the few Italian Premiers who could talk to the King in his own patois. He had behind him no such record as that which endeared Victor Emanuel to the hearts of his subjects.
Peither in private nor in public did he display those traits which captivate the fancy of the multitude. The Roman populace reared in traditions of public munificence and

Imperial and Pontifical splendour never took kindly to the retiring monarch, who was only too glad to be relieved from participation in the pomps and ceremonies of this evil world. His real life was lived at a shootingbox in the hills, to which he repaired whenever exigencies of State afforded him sufficient leisure to forget that he was a king, and only remember the pleasures of the chase and the joys of outdoor life. He carried this to such an extent as even to avoid those occasions of local popular celebrations at which it is the experience of monarchs to be displayed as part of the insignia of the nation. By this means he, indeed, escaped a good deal of the boredom which afflicts our own Prince of Wales, who goes through this royal parade with exemplary punctuality and patience. But it s doubtful whether, on the whole, it was good business for the monarchy.

The King was an excellent man of business. His Civil List was large, and, in addition to the Civil List, he was the possessor of immense estates in Piedmont, and not less extensive properties in other parts of Italy. These domains were administered with economy and ability when the Italian finances were in disorder. and more or less confusion reigned in the other de partments of State. It used to be a standing joke

Photograph by]

The late King Humbert of Italy.

[Guigoni and Bossi.

in Italy that the only Ministry that was flourishing was the "Ministry of the Royal Domains." The savings of the King are said to have been great, and it was a popular opinion in Italy that his accumulated wealth was invested in the Bank of England. Hence, when applications were made, as they always are made, from time to time by impecunious persons and institutions for subsidies from the royal coffers, the refusal was justified on the ground that the last penny had been sent to the Bank of England, and that there was nothing left to give away. What truth there is in this popular legend who can say?

Queen Margaret of Italy.

The first business of the King on rising every morning, which he punctually did at six o'clock when he was in Rome, was to attend to the management of his own private business. The early hours of the morning were spent with his secretary attending to all the details of his private property. After attending to his own affairs he spent an hour before breakfast in his own grounds in the company of his dogs, or in visiting his stables, for he was ever more at home with horses and dogs than with ministers and courtiers. At nine o'clock he took his first breakfast. After this he received his Ministers of State, who submitted to him documents and despatches, and discussed with him such affairs as necessitated his personal intervention. He usually lunched with the Queen, but only if she was alone, for if, as was often the case, she had invited many of her musical and artistic friends, he preferred lunching with the gentlemen of his household. After lunch he would sleep for an hour, and in the afternoon would drive in his highseated phaeton, of which I have already spoken. He was a man of exceeding regularity of habit, and this characteristic governed his afternoon drive. He seldom or never varied from his accustomed routes, of which there were two. One was over the summit of Mount Janiculum, and the other through the well-kuo vn Borghese Gardens. In the evening he dined quite simply in the Quirinal, for he was very little given to royal feasting. The Queen, who is devoted to music, has organised a famous quartette and quintette, who discoursed sweet music in the palace, but King Humbert had no taste for music, either vocal or instrumental, and where the music was there the King was absent. He was a man without any literary tastes, who seldom or never read any books, and took absolutely no part in the intellectual movement of modern Italy. Neither had he any taste for the drama. It was said of him that he never entered the theatre in his life: but this is an exaggeration, for upon ceremonial occasions he has entered the royal box. One of these rare visits was made recently when the production of Signor Verdi's "Falstaff" was made the occasion of a national demonstration. The King was present in the royal box, and the performance from the beginning was an immense success. When the second act was over the King said, "There is now no doubt as to the success of the piece; let us send for Signor Verdi" (an act of homage which was usually paid to the successful author only at the end of the play). Verdi was duly sent for, and when he appeared in the royal box the unprecedented honour of a summons before the close of the performance was enthusiastically applauded as testifying to the honour in which the King held the composer. The approval which signalised the summons to the royal box was considerably abated when the curtain rose for the third act and it was discovered that the King had left the theatre. He had anticipated the call to the author simply in order to escape from a performance which bored him.

Late in the evening between ten and eleven o'clock the King was nearly always to be met driving in the first pneumatic-tyred vehicle seen in Rome to visit the lady to whom he remained devoted before and after his marriage with touching fidelity. King Humbert was not like his father King Victor Emanuel, whose illegitimate offspring added so considerably to the population of Italy that a witty Italian once maliciously remarked, when the French were deploring the continuous diminution in their population, that the best service Italy could do to France would be to lend her Victor Emanuel for a time

The New Queen of Italy.
(Formerly Princess of Montenegro.)

amo

alto

of h

for affe

was

of 1

mai

was

It v

sho

Hu

The

has

Aft

hav

the san live

hig

inte

SOV

hol

ma

con

dw

the bee

cis

So

clo

red

me

in

So

to

on wh exp

lat

COL

wh

Pu Pe

wa

ob

sul

his He im

wa pa

in

Pe

SCI

to

ma

his

k absomodern It was his life; al occaese rare Signor national al box, mmense ng said, e piece ; e which the end hen he nour of ice was nour in l which derably l it was He had rder to ock the he first ne lady ter his vas not itimate tion of narked. liminucould el for a time. Contemporary history is always busy with the amours of monarchs; but King Humbert, if he has not altogether escaped an entry in the chronique scandaleuse of his time, is regarded as exceptional among monarchs for the fidelity of his relations to the woman of his affections. That that woman was not his lawful spouse was, perhaps, not altogether the unnatural consequence of his position. When at the age of twenty-four he married his cousin, the present Queen, there was no pretence of denying the fact that the marriage was, like most Royal marriages, a mariage de convenance. It was necessary for the dynasty that a legitimate heir should be born to the throne, and for one year King Humbert and his wife continued in conjugal relations. The fruit of this union was the Prince of Naples, who has now succeeded his father as Victor Emanuel III. After that year, the primary purpose of the marriage having been accomplished, it was understood that while the King and Queen remained good friends, lived in the same palace, and always kept up appearances, each lived their own life and went their own way. The Queen, highly educated, æsthetic, lived in a world of ideals, into which her husband, simple huntsman, soldier and sovereign, never entered. The extraordinary and unshaken hold which a lady twelve years his senior was able to maintain over the King to the last is a subject of universal comment in Italy. But upon this it is not necessary to

As a king Humbert has been praised by one party on the ground of his scrupulous attachment to the oath which he swore to the constitution, and by others he has been blamed not the less severely for his refusal to exercise those powers with which the constitution armed the Sovereign of Italy. I well remember discussing this question with leading Italian statesmen at Rome at the close of 1898. They maintained that the King had reduced the functions of a constitutional sovereign to a mere figurehead, and they were extraordinarily interested in hearing details as to the method in which our own Sovereign the Queen has contrived to use her influence to facilitate the working of the British Constitution. If only, they said, King Humbert had been as much a sovereign as Queen Victoria, many of the difficulties which afflict modern Italy might have been easily and expeditiously removed. The King, however, until the latter days of the Pelloux Ministry, remained a strictly constitutional sovereign. As minister succeeded minister, whether Piedmontese or Sicilian, he found in the King a purely negative support. Only in the latter days of the Pelloux Ministry, when General Pelloux executed what was practically a Parliamentary coup détat, and met obstruction by arbitrary decrees which the Supreme Court subsequently declared to be illegal, did the King extend his negative support to quasi-unconstitutional action. He believed, no doubt, that it was the only way out of an impasse, and he also hoped that when the General Election took place it would prove that the electorate approved of the action of the Ministry. When the result was made known that the Socialists and anti-monarchial party had increased their strength to a hundred members in the new Parliament, the King's confidence in General Pelloux disappeared, and it is said that it was the consciousness of this loss of the royal confidence which led to the resignation of General Pelloux before any proof had been afforded that he had lost the support of a majority of the new Parliament. One case in which the King would have acted more wisely if he had followed his own impulse was in the case of the amnesty of those who were convicted for participation in the bread riots some years ago. The King, it was believed. was in favour of giving a general amnesty at the end of six months. His Ministers objected, preferring that the amnesty should be postponed till the end of the twelve months. In the meantime there sprang up an agitation accompanied with considerable demonstrations of passion, which had this result, that when the twelve months expired Ministers maintained that it was impossible to grant the amnesty as it would seem to have the appearance of capitulation under dictation. Hence fresh bad blood, ill-feeling, and unrest, which might have been avoided, had the King ventured to assert his influence in the direction of mercy.

This, however, is attributed by some critics to his constitutional fatalism. He was never convinced that any action would alter things much either way, and as it was not clearly his duty as a soldier and a King to insist upon his own views, he fell back upon the advice of his ministers and left the responsibility with them. "The only initiative he ever displayed in affairs of state," said a one could say that he would do nothing with a more imperturbable and immovable decision." He was more imperturbable and immovable decision.' a negative King from first to last. But if this was true in home affairs, it did not characterise his foreign policy. The Triple Alliance entered into shortly after his accession to the throne was his policy as much as that of Crispi, and he has adhered to it with unswerving resolution through good and ill report. With equal tenacity he has maintained a policy of armaments which was a corollary of the policy of the Triplice. It was in his reign also that Italy embarked upon her illfated policy of colonial adventure in the Red Sea, the collapse of which, at the fatal battle of Adowa, will be remembered as one of the catastrophes of his reign. That it did not convince him that a policy of expansion was a mistake for Italy, may be assumed from the fact that when the scramble for China was initiated by his ally the Kaiser, the Italian Government showed a strong disposition to press for the cession of Chinese territory, and even in the last days of his reign his Government showed a disposition to take part in the International Crusade against China.

In Italian politics the question of Rome dominates everything. It was the Roman question and the need for safeguarding Italy against an attack from France for the purpose of re-establishing the temporal power which forced Italy into the Triple Alliance. Nothing has been done to effect an arrangement between the Vatican and the Quirinal, but the healing influence of time has told in favour of Italy, and Victor Emanuel III. succeeds to relations with the Pope much less strained than those which prevailed at the death of his grandfather. On the whole, King Humbert has not conferred any great and signal advantage to the kingdom over which he had been called to reign. Neither, on the other hand, with the exception of the misfortune in Abyssinia and the continual drain upon her economic resources entailed by the armaments necessary to a member of the Triple Alliance, will his name be associated with any national misfortune. As a soldier he did his duty bravely and well. As a sovereign he carried out his idea of duty without enthusiasm, but with the same steady adhesion to his obligations and responsibilities which characterised him in all the other departments of life.

He is succeeded by his only son, the Prince of Naples, now reigning under the title of Victor Emanuel III., who at the time when he was called to the throne was yachting in the Levant. The Prince of Naples is a man small of stature, who has never given any indication of exceptional ability or statecraft. At the time when the King was pressed to exercise his Royal prerogative and assert himself more in the government of his kingdom, it was reported in Rome that the King had said: "If you want anything like that to be done let me abdicate and my successor will have less scruples than myself." The Prince was reported, not unnaturally perhaps, to have expressed very strong opinions against Crispi at the time of the disaster in Abyssinia. But for the most part he has kept himself out of politics, and the world waits with interest not unmixed with curiosity to see the note of the first words which he will address to his subjects. He has one speciality which does not shed much light upon the line of his future policy. He is a devoted student of numismatics, and his collection of coins is said to be one of the finest in Europe. He married four years ago the Princess of Montenegro, a beautiful woman, simple and unostentatious, who was little qualified by her training in the mountain hamlet of Cettinge to play the rôle of a great European queen. The marriage, unfortunately, has not been blessed by offspring, so that in case of the demise of Victor Emanuel III. the Crown would pass to his cousin the Duke D'Aosta, the son of King Amadeus of Spain, who married a sister of the Duke of Orleans. Duke D'Aosta is an artillery officer of commanding presence and of considerable oratorical ability. He has a family-both sons and daughters-so that even in the case of another catastrophe the succession is secured. secured. The younger brother of the Duke D'Aosta, the Duke of the Abruzzi, is in the Arctic regions on his way to the North Pole.

Speculation is rife as to the motives which prompted the assassination. Before these pages can issue from the press full information should be in the hands of every one. Writing as I do on the day on which the news of the assassination reached this country, it would be absurd to do more than note one or two things. First, that the assassin

Partie se Salver

is an Italian, as was also the assassin of the Empress of Austria. Secondly, that his crime, whether prompted by the frenzy of an individual or by a criminal conspiracy, will be inevitably attributed to political motives, and will tend naturally, although illogically, to strengthen the reaction against the republicans and socialist parties in Italy. The Conservatives, who lost ground badly at the last election, will exploit the crime of Monza to the uttermost, declaring that it is the natural outcome of the teachings of their political opponents. may be true or it may be false, but it will be used unsparingly by the Conservatives of Italy. The crime of the assassin will probably tend to defeat its own ends by strengthening the hold of the dynasty upon the population, which, whether it be republican or monarchist, has little sympathy with political murder. Although the sad event has cast a gloom over Europe and has led to the cancelling of the fêtes and popular entertainments which were arranged in Paris in honour of the Shah and the Inter-Parliamentary Conference, it is not expected to have any immediate political results. It may increase the clamour for repressive legislation, and some French journalists are already using it in order to upbraid the Italian Government for refusing to support the demand for exceptional measures of international repression against the modern Thugs. What is too probable is that the crime is only the latest illustration of the lawless spirit of violence which is abroad in the earth at the present time. The attack upon the Dutch Republics is one illustration of this spirit, the assassination of the King is another. We are far from seeing the end of the unchaining of the spirit which makes the will of the individual or of the tion

for

his

uni

are

tha

cor

nat

ma

the mig

hav

Ex

eve

wh

the

edu

hu

a 1

of o

at !

tele

thr

are sub illu

the nation the sole law of right or wrong, and justifies an attack upon the government of a state or the life of a sovereign on the ground that either one or the other stands in the way of the immediate realisation of ambitions or of aspirations which cannot be gratified within the limits of law private or international.

XUM

of do

II .- DAVID FERRIER AND MALCOLM MCHARDY.

EW things are more mysterious than the rules by which the Press is guided in the reporting of public events. For the last two months the Paris Exhibition has been the centre of a series of congresses, which for variety, range and interest are unparalleled in the history of the world. The Paris Exhibition itself is an universal museum, and the congresses of the Exhibition are a kind of international parliament upon all matters that interest the human race. Yet, although these congresses are attended by picked experts from all nations, and discuss matters for the moral, social and material welfare of mankind, they have been treated by the English Press with almost absolute contempt. It might have been thought that the mere conception would have commanded attention. In the heart of the Paris Exhibition stands the Hall of the Congresses, in which every day meet together representatives of all the nations, who compare notes and exchange the conclusions arrived at by the study of the various problems which perplex the human race. Science has its representatives; education, labour, peace-almost every department of human activity holds during the period of the Exhibition a universal conference or parliament, largely composed of experts whose deliberations might have been thought at least as worthy of attention as the latest lying rumour telegraphed from Shanghai, or hackneyed speeches upon threadbare subjects of political controversy.

But, so far as the British public are concerned, they are practically non-existent. The following list of the subjects of the congresses held in the last fortnight illustrates better than anything else that can be said as to the nature of the interests represented :-

| Name of Congr       | ress.   |       |       |      |      | Date. |     |     |
|---------------------|---------|-------|-------|------|------|-------|-----|-----|
| Applied Mechanics   | S       |       |       |      | July | 19-2  | 5   |     |
| Commerce and Inc    |         |       |       |      |      | 23-2  |     |     |
| Comparative Histo   |         |       |       |      | 21   | 23-2  |     |     |
| Professional Medic  | ine     |       |       |      | 2.2  | 23-2  | 3   |     |
| Photography.        |         |       |       |      | 17   | 23-2  |     |     |
| Industrial Property | 7       |       |       |      | 12   | 23-2  |     |     |
| Applied Chemistry   |         |       |       |      |    | 23-2  |     |     |
| Modern Language     |         | ning  |       |      | 11   | 24-2  |     |     |
| Workmen's Protec    | tion ar | nd Co | npens | sil- |    | -4 -  | ,   |     |
| tion                |         |       |       |      | 11   | 25-2  | 0   |     |
| Medical Press       |         |       |       |      | 11   | 26-2  |     |     |
| Dramatic Art        | 1       |       |       |      |      | 27-3  |     |     |
| Electrology and M   | edical  | Radi  | ology |      |      | 27-A  |     | 1   |
| Navigation .        | -       |       | 67    |      |      | 28-   |     | 3   |
| Chronometry.        |         |       |       |      |      | 28-   | 22  | 4   |
| Press Associations  |         |       |       |      |      | 30-   | 77  |     |
| Teaching of Social  |         | ce    |       |      |      | 30-   | 22  | 3   |
| Architecture .      |         |       |       |      |      | 30-   | 22  | 4   |
| Higher Education    |         |       |       |      |      | 30-   | 22  | 4   |
| Tariff Regulations  |         |       |       |      |      | 30-   | 200 |     |
| Poor Relief .       |         |       | •     |      |      | 30-   | 22  | 4 5 |
| Colonies .          | •       |       |       | *    |      | 30-   | 2.2 | 5   |
| Comparative Law     |         |       |       |      |      | 31-   | 22  | 4   |
| Secondary Education |         | *     |       |      |      | 31-   | 22  | 6   |
| Philosophy .        | OH      |       |       |      |      | 1-5   | 22  | 0   |
| Treatment of the B  | lind    |       |       |      | 0    |       |     |     |
| Primary Education   |         |       |       |      | 32   | 1-5   |     |     |
| Pharmacy .          |         |       |       |      | 5.5  | 2-5   |     |     |
| Medicine            |         | *.    |       |      | 11   | _     |     |     |
| Dermatology.        | •       |       | *     | •    | 27   | 2-9   |     |     |
| Deimatology .       | 0       | •     |       |      | 2.9  | 2-9   |     |     |
|                     |         |       |       |      |      |       |     |     |

Among these conferences one which may, perhaps, command some space in the daily papers is the Congress of Medicine. It is expected that some eleven thousand doctors from all parts of the world will attend it. Whether this expectation will be realised or not I cannot say; but in view of the special nature of this assembly I thought it well to ask a valued contributor to furnish the readers of the REVIEW OF REVIEWS with brief sketches of two of the most distinguished medical men who will represent British medicine at the Paris Exhibition.

The writer has the pleasure of their personal acquaintance, but has written, needless to say, without their sanction or co-operation.

I.-DAVID FERRIER.

Curious is it in these days of universal advertisement that the men whose greatness endures beyond death, and whose services to humanity are immeasurable, should be less known to their contemporaries than the author of a sensational novel or ephemeral music-hall ditty. Go into any circle of educated cultivated persons conversant probably with the latest dramatic achievements of Europe, and it is a question whether they have even heard the name of David Ferrier, and none at all as to their complete ignorance of the nature of the life work that has made his name honoured amongst the savants of the world and forever inseparably associated with the achievements of the century in the science and surgery of brain diseases.

To realise how great has been the contribution of Ferrier to the astonishing advance made in this direction during the latter part of this century, it is only necessary for a moment to recall how little was known fifty or sixty years ago of the pathology of the brain and nerve centres and the localisation of brain diseases, by means of which alone surgical treatment of some of the most distressing maladies-tumours, paralysis, and a host of other nerve complaints-was made possible. Men at this time in London, Berlin, and Paris were making every kind of experiment and research, but the results were so dubious and the views of some of the older physicians so hostile that to take up the work required both courage and selfdenial as well as exhaustless patience and a conviction of the value of the object in view. These qualities David Ferrier possessed in their highest degree, and whatever modifications have to be taken into consideration with regard to the validity and value of his investigations and conclusions, it is indisputable that he was the pioneer of the great discovery of cerebral localisation, whose future no man can predict, and whose influence in the relief of a class of diseases hitherto almost untouched by medical or surgical skill is one of the most triumphant achievements of modern science.

It is well for David Ferrier and for his brilliant colleague, Victor Horsley, that they did not live in the days when witchcraft flourished, for the authors of such miracles would assuredly have been burnt as wizards. Go to the National Hospital in Queen Square, which is thronged from year to year with afflicted humanity, and-if you have sufficient courage and philosophy for the taskwatch the transcendent cures effected by the genius of Ferrier, who diagnoses and localises the diseases, and by Victor Horsley, who with something of almost demon-like skill performs the operation of trepanning, an operation which does verily often give back a man his faculties of mind and sight and hearing. Many of the most woeful maladies that afflict the human raceepilepsy, paralysis, brain tumours, etc.-have thus been brought within the reach of alleviation, if not of cure, since the memorable day when Ferrier, just thirty years ago, gave the results of his researches in a paper conress of piracy,

s, and

ngthen parties badly

to the

that itcome

f their

This

may rill be

y the

Italy.

sassin defeat

gthen-ynasty

which.

blican

little olitical

he sad

gloom

as led

of the enter-

were onour

Inter-

rence,

have litical crease

essive

some

s are der to vern-

pport

tional

tional

the nat is t the latest wless

ich is it the ttack

ablics

this

on of

We

e end

f the e will

f the es an

of a

other mbi-

ithin

tributed to the West Riding Lunatic Asylum Reports, and afterwards reprinted in the Transactions of the Royal Society. But long before this his university teachers and all who had come into contact with the Scotch youth during a career of unparalleled brilliance had been impressed by his genius and were predicting a great career for him, a career which it is interesting to note disproves the almost universally held opinion to-day that a man cannot make a great professional reputation for himself without money.

YOUTH AND EDUCATION.

Ferrier's parents were not sufficiently well off to give him a college education, and from the age of sixteen, when he won a bursarship into College Aberdeen University, and all through his medical career, which took place after he had got his degree, he supported himself by means of scholarships, smail posts put into his way by the professors interested in him, and coaching. Like many another Aberdeen youth who has risen to fame, his early life was not soft or easy, with the conditions of study made as light and pleasurable as possible. All through his University career he walked into Aberdeen from the little village two miles distant where he lives with his parents, getting up at five in the morning and working with that steadfastness which no other students of any University in the world show in the same degree as do those of the Scotch Universities.

Intending to devote himself to philosophy and classics, it was his teacher Bain who persuaded him that his bent was medicine. a view soon to be justified by Ferrier's winning the great prize of Scotch University life-the Ferguson This, Scholarship. as everyone knows, is open to the four Universities, and men of all ages, youthful and bearded, but mostly the latter, throw themselves into the mighty contest. Ferrier, whose power was so early recognised by his comrades at the University of Aberdeen that they declined to enter into rivalry with him, carried off the scholarship in his twentieth year, prior to taking his degree two years later, after which he proceeded to Heidelberg for a year, and returned thence to Edin-burg to study for his M.D. degree, which event signalised his twenty-fifth year.

HIS START IN THE PROFESSION.

By this time, owing to stern necessity, he had made himself a good teaching connection, and for a young man of less ambition this was a hopeful enough prospect of a good income, and prosperity and reputation of the decorous professional kind. But destiny had something more in store for David Ferrier than the work of the successful and brilliant tutor. She had endowed the slender, fragile-looking youth with genius, and with what does not invariably accompany genius—with the insight and steadfastness of moral character to turn it to signal service for the benefit of mankind. To turn a deaf ear to the prudent counsels of friendly professors, and to throw up a security for the uncertainties which were the only certainties facing a young doctor without influential friends or capital, implied, first, that courage and self-knowledge which enable a man to move boldly yet not recklessly on to the goal, however distant, that he has in view. So well justified was David Ferrier in his apparent recklessness, that within the next five years he had gained valuable experience as an assistant to the famous Dr. Image, of Bury St. Edmunds, and made the first direct advance upon the precise line of study in which he was later to evolve such valuable results by his appointment as assistant to Mr. Burdon Sanderson, of the Middlesex Hospital.

This first year in London Dr. Ferrier, the now far sought and honoured consultant, looks back upon with horror. Poor, friendless, unassured of his position, and at times barely able to keep his head above water, he has confessed to the writer that he was more than once tempted to flee from the loneliness and indifference of the unfriendly vast city back to the warmth and camaraderie of the circle of friends he had made for himself in Edinburgh. It is perhaps this period of unrest, of struggle, of sturm und drang, that, even more than the profound studies of his maturer life, have loft imprinted their stamp upon the great physician's strange, uncommon physiognomy, which at first sight may seem, as I have once seen it stated, "unremarkable" and "insignificant."

ITS EFFECTS ON THE PHYSIOGNOMY.

Insignificant in feature, perhaps, and unremarkable in the correct and thoughtful gravity of the consulting-room, where men of the most marked individuality as a rule wear a mask, but in the highest degree striking to those who have an opportunity of penetrating beneath the professional mask and discerning the other side of the personality. Go to see Dr. Ferrier, purely as the world-wide authority on nervous diseases, and it is ten to one you will come

David Ferrier, M.D.

amor few g No be fo leagu the 1 the s of s sublin storm is a p

Th

indivi

awa sma

Jew

esse

exar

like your ama

men

and a s

of D

man

and mak

of hi abou

worl

local

in th

sens

It

pers

Emb

stan

the med

intel

and unin

of ev

degr

hour

man

anxi

incid

few wom

cons

place

five 1

a fee

with to di

you v geniu

with easy

in do

of the

ct of a away with the impression that this singularly fragile and ecorous nore in small slender man, with his grave serious face, curiously lewish in its general cast of expression, is primarily and cessful essentially the scientific man, masterly in his methods of lender. examination, his swift, unerring decisions, his keen, hawkwhat h the like glance that seems to dive deep into the recesses of your being, and like magic bring up all kinds of amazing discoveries about your physical foibles, temperaer to nkind. ment and the rest. Perhaps you may even go away riendly and make another professional visit without catching a single glimpse of what is the vital characteristic ainties doctor t, that of David Ferrier just outside and beneath his professional manner-that is, an almost southern quality of vividness nan to reckand alertness, a something in his gesture and look that , howmakes his face curiously apart from the stolid physiognomy has in of his countrymen. Nothing sturdy or robust or wooden about this personality; nothing, I should say, in the world quite like those hands of his, so unerring in their ed was is apthat localisation of painful spots, so merciless, so dæmonic in their pursuit of disease, so charged themselves with years luable sensitive nervous energy. sistant

THE PARADOX OF HIS PERSONALITY.

It is this twofold suggestiveness which makes the personality of the man interesting and inscrutable. Embodying every attribute of the modern man of science, his Paganism, his analytical spirit, his materialistic standpoint, his belief in the logic of might (his views on the Boers might be appropriately entertained by a mediæval Turk!), he is the breathing denial of his own intellectual theories. There is no living man more kind and humane to the sickly, the unfortunate, and the uninteresting. Himself full of honours, the recipient of every sort of scientific homage in the shape of honorary degrees and medals, and the like, he will devote an hour's patient and careful examination to some working man or woman whose nervous breakdown is due to anxiety, overwork and poverty. A typical little incident of his humanity! The writer of this article a few years ago was one of a group of weary-looking women waiting for an hour or two in Dr. Ferrier's consulting-room. An interchange of conversation took place, with the result being elicited that not one of the five women, all working women, had ever been asked for a fee. And if they express gratitude he will meet them with banter, or hasten, if the mood of mischief be on him, to discover a weak spot in your spinal column and give you what is known as the "jumps." For though he is a genius he is a modern man, and to show intense feeling is with him not matter for dislike, but for amusement, for an easy half-mocking tolerance that perpetually leaves you in doubt as to the true inner nature of a complex being of this type. But assuredly there is no doubt that amongst the century's great names in medicine there are few greater than that of David Ferrier.

II.—MALCOLM MCHARDY.

No greater contrast in externals the world over could be found between David Ferrier and his friend and colleague at King's College Hospital, Professor McHardy, the renowned eye surgeon, big, burly, unconventional, the soul of straightforwardness and integrity, the terror of sticklers for professional etiquette, of which he is sublimely disregardful, the living symbol of bold seas, stormy skies, and the free wildness of nature, of which he is a passionate worshipping son.

A GENIAL ÆSCULAPIUS.

The critic who complained a few years ago that individuality of character was much commoner in fiction than in real life would congratulate himself upon an acquaintanceship with Malcolm McHardy. He is as real as Sir John Falstaff, and as full of humour as the old knight himself. Anyone who wants an afternoon of entertaining humour, rich, naïve, and abundant in its essence, and mingled with the true pathos of naked real life, should pay a visit to the Royal Eye Hospital at Southwark upon the afternoons-pretty nearly every afternoon of the week-when Professor McHardy is the visiting surgeon. I have visited dozens of hospitals on "out patients' day," and invariably come away tragically impressed by the cold, almost brutal atmosphere that characterises these occasions, during which a procession of wrecked human creatures receive the business-like attention and admirable skill of great physicians and

THE COSTER'S TRIBUTE,

It is the absence of this coldness, this formalism, this tacit recognition on both sides of the barrier between the "medical gentleman" and the povertystricken "cases," which strike one upon Professor McHardy's day at the Royal Eye Hospital, and fill the heart with warmth and geniality. "Treats a chap as 'e would isself!" I have frequently heard repeated by a dirty "coster bloke." "'E ain't no toff, Mc'Ardy," with ejaculations of astonished gratification that a swell gentleman from the West End should know the precise kind of marine oath that would reassure a poor bargee awaiting his operation with a trembling, sinking spirit; or the exact form of welcome that would go to the heart of a sweep. "Must 'a bin in the line hisself!" was the verdict of one exponent of the chimney sweeping art after being asked by the Professor a question that betokened a knowledge of the inner mysteries (and villanies) of the trade; and the same high praise will be tendered by the carpenter, instantly addressed by the name of "Chips," by the engineer, the bargee, the seam-stress, and other craftsmen. Humanity—that is the keynote of McHardy's success, and the passionate affection bestowed upon him by the South London artisan, to whom the Professor, in and out of the splendid hospital, not at fixed hours, but at all hours of the day or night whenever man, woman, or child needs his care and superb skill, is a familiar and welcome figure. The hospital, one of the most complete and perfectly equipped in England, rebuilt a few years ago, owes its existence to Professor McHardy's dauntless energies, and-characteristic of the man-is one of the few hospitals all the world over that is never in debt and never advertised.

OF FAMOUS ANCESTRY.

In its way, Malcolm McHardy's career has been as riking as any could well be. The son of Admiral striking as any could well be. McHardy, and grandson of Nelson's famous flaglieutenant, who suggested that the word "expects" should be signalled instead of "relies," he has held his ground, fighting abuses from the day when he was a student at St. George's and insisted that hospital appointments should be free and open, and adjudged according to merit instead of by purchase, at no matter what risk to his popularity and professional prestige. And his unpopularity amongst his correct and conventional brethren is indisputable, though he boasts the friendship of the noblest.

WHY AND WHERE HE IS UNPOPULAR.

A man who treats coster patients with far more kindly indulgence than he would extend to a millionaire mayor, a man who is perfectly honest and outspoken even when mage,

s, and

ct ad-

se line

e was valu-

point-

o Mr.

of the

OON.

ondon

w far

l con-

upon riendposibarely head

con-

that once

n the erence

t city

and circle

made ourgh.

period

le, of found their nmon

have cant."

ble in room.

a rule

e who sional

nality.

hority

come

such veracity militates against his professional interests and pocket, who outrages professional nicety by appearing in his West End consulting-room in a workman-like holland jacket, is not naturally beloved by Mrs. Grundy. His perfect mastery and thoroughness in every branch of his art is oftentimes inconvenient and embarrassing. Some years ago, whilst forming one of a committee to inquire into the sight of railway servants, he found that to arrive at correct conclusions it was necessary for him to ride upon engines amidst smoke, rain and snow, and did not shrink from doing so. A man who has not only an enormous private practice, but could double and treble it if he so desired, and achieves bold, brilliant operations that are the envy and admiration of less devoted men, is not likely to be considered popular amongst his professional brothers, for whose decorum and trade unionism the cares not one rap.

WHY AND WHERE HE IS POPULAR.

Such is Professor Malcolm McHardy, one of the most widely known men in London (and Margate, where every Sunday morning for two hours he may be consulted by the fisherfolk there), received with cordiality in Royal circles, welcomed at clubs where his bonhomie, humour and transparent unconventionality are a refreshing novelty upon the jaded artificiality of town life, the friend of half the theatrical world, from Miss Ellen Terry downwards, and the handy man of limitless resource to every distressed creature who wants his services. "A rough, rude, swaggering, domineering, overbearing fellow," say his enemies, and they are, it must be admitted, not unplentiful, as would be admitted joyfully by Professor McHardy, who is a born fighter. "The most kind, able, resourceful, undaunted man of the day," say his thousand clearer-sighted friends. "A Bismarck for resistless tenacity; a surgeon who inspires you with magnetic confidence in his strength and tenderness. You would no more doubt his decision if he ordered you forthwith to have out that eye, than you would doubt the seamanship of the strong, silent pilot to whom the destiny of the great ship yonder is entrusted."

HIS CAREER.

Professor McHardy has not attained his present position without the wringing of sweat from his brow. Intended for the career of a mechanical engineer, and disliking it, as he characteristically declares, solely because his part of his work so largely depended upon the work of others, he decided, when little more than a child, to enter the medical career; and from the age of seventeen, when he went to St. George's as a medical student, he has entirely supported himself, often filling three distinct posts at the same time. instance, at one time he was House Surgeon at the Belgrave Hospital, Orthopædic Registrar at St. George's, and Sole Clinical Assistant at the Royal South London Orthopædic. And this triple tenure has been his over and over again, so that though he himself insists there is no man in London with more insignificant qualifications, there is none that can compare with him in experience. Probably there is no other great oculist in the world who is also a good architect (McHardy drew up all the plans of the Royal Eye Hospital), a good mariner, a decent carpenter, and a fair draughtsman! His self-registering instrument for accurately and swiftly mea-suring the field of vision, is one of the indispensable accessories of eye surgery to-day, and in the Royal Eye Hospital, with its cheery motto "Eyes Right," there are half - a - dozen ingenious

Pale

race

B

to a clai

eve

sup

whi

skir

The

day

Per

in i bro

ma

buy

whi

ma

wh

hor

def

put

Th

ans

we

the rai

W

Ab

M

for dra

and aw

an

the

the

Malcolm McHardy, M.D.

(From a bust exhibited in the Royal Academy, 1900.)

THE TOPIC OF THE MONTH.

THE REVOLT AGAINST THE PALEFACE.

A M I not also a man and a brother?" That is the question which in various ways is being urged question which in various ways is being urged with some vehemence just now by all sorts and conditions of coloured folks. Did the Almighty give the Paleface a perpetual charter to rule all the non-white races of the world? Hitherto it has rather seemed as if this were really the case.

THE COLOURED MAN'S QUESTION.

But of late the coloured man is beginning to doubt, and to ask for the credentials by virtue of which the Paleface claims a right to dispose of his coloured brother and everything that he has. Hitherto the Divine Charter was supposed to be written plain and unmistakable on every white man's face. You had only to look at him. If his skin was white, even a dirty white, that was enough. The law of this planet was "white man on top." But nowadays the coloured man has doubts as to these things. Perhaps the charter of the ruling race was not to be found in its colour, but in its gun? And any one can buy a gun. The cunning white man is ever ready to sell his coloured brother as many guns as he can pay for. The coloured man has bought. He is buying, and he will continue to buy. And he wonders whether, now that he has got the white man's gun, he may not be able to dispute the white man's place. The Boxer is asking that question somewhat rudely in Pekin. The Filipino is pressing it home against the American. The Sultan is brooding El Senoussi is believed to have arrived at definite conclusions on the subject which he will shortly put to the test against English and French in the Soudan. The Ashantees have asked it, and have not found the answer altogether satisfactory.

THE PAN-AFRICAN CONFERENCE.

And now here in London, in this scorching African weather, a Pan-African Conference has been held under the high patronage of the Bishop of London, which has raised the same question in a formal constitutional way. A Pan-African Association has been formed, with Bishop Walters as President and the Emperor Menelik of Abyssinia and the President of Hayti as Honorary Members, which is to press, in season and out of season, for a recognition of the rights of the blacks.

The manifesto which the Pan-African Conference has drawn up and addressed to the Governments of the world is a remarkable document :-

The grievances and claims of the coloured people were set out and the hope was expressed that the natives of Africa would no longer be sacrificed to the greed of gold—their liberties taken away, their family life debauched, their just aspirations repressed, and all avenues of advancement and culture taken away from them. "Let not the cloak of Christian missionary enterprise," it continued, "be allowed in the future, as so often in the past, to hide the ruthless economic exploitation and political downfall of less developed nations whose chief fault has been reliance on the plighted troth of the Christian Church,"

The appeal may be addressed with advantage to others besides the Governments. It is a sign of the times of which we shall all do well to take note.

THE BLACK MAN'S RIGHTS.

The notion that even black men have .ghts is no doubt novel to most of us. In Hayti and Jamaica, and even on the Slave Coast, where he has enjoyed considerable freedom from the white man, he has not altogether justified the claims made on his behalf. What a pity it is that Miss Mary Kingsley died before the Pan-African Conference was held! It is one more count in the indictment of Humanity against this hateful South African War, that it should have cost us the life of the only Paleface who could make the Black Man intelligible to Europe! But even without Miss Kingsley's aid we may understand something of the black man's point of view. He may be very brutal and very bestial; he may in some districts practise cannibalism and celebrate the funerals of his chiefs by wholesale massacre; but even with all these failings he is still entitled to justice, and he has a right to ask us to do to him as we would that he should do to us if our positions were reversed. It may be right on the principle of the Golden Rule to subject our black brother to Mr. Carlyle's beneficent whip. It may be right to shoot him wholesale or hang him retail if he refuses to abandon practices distinctly anti-human. But when all that is admitted there remains a wide field of injustices done to the black man which ought not to be done. The weaker, the stupider, the more barbarous he is, the more careful ought the strong, the wise, the civilised to be to see to it that he is not cheated, pursued, murdered and plundered by the superior race. Justice and fair play, liberally interpreted, may not involve the recognition of the political equality of black and white. But they do entail the obligation of abstaining from slaying, torturing, outraging and ruining the black man whenever it may seem to suit the interest or the caprice of his white visitor.

IS FRATERNITY THE BEST POLICY?

There might be little hope of securing even a momentary hearing for these ethical truisms if it were not that the case of the Black Man is just now identical with the case of the Yellow Man. The revolt of China against the white men from over the sea and from beyond the river forces home the question whether, after all, it might not pay to infuse a little more fraternity into our dealings with coloured men all round the world. From the religious point of view there is, of course, no controversy. Paul's declaration that God hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth is decisive. The skins may differ; the blood is the same. The universal brotherhood of man is universally affirmed in theory and as universally scouted in practice. But as the dying rogue declared, "Honesty is the best policy. I know it, because I have tried both," so it would seem as if we shall be able to affirm that a little more brotherly feeling would pay, because we are now beginning to discover the cost of its antithesis. All our troubles have come upon us in China because of our arrogance, pride, haughtiness, and all those evil ways which lead to destruction. It is not necessary to go back to the four wars which we have waged with China in the Victorian era of settled peace. It is sufficient to note the history of the last few years-nay, of the last few months. We have treated and are to-day treating the Chinese as an inferior race. We bully them, extort concessions, seize their territory, and treat them as dirt vonder is present his brow.

neer, and s, solely ded upon re than a

e age of he went

s a medi-

s entirely

lf. often ct posts

time he

on at the

, Ortho-

at St.

Clinical

hopædic.

nure has nd over ough he nere is on with duali-

s none

re with

o other

e world

ly drew ans of nariner,

er, and sman!

stering

accu-

vision,

dispen-

of eye

ospital, motto

ere are genious

ly will emoval

phthal-

arches,

of life

s one

have ng the

Hos-

Pro-

good

Royal

e. For

beneat impuni and al vengef

Who result deaf to moder that to knows

whet Pekin Wha East tary Euro

Chin

from

East tary Euro not v alrea comi fuciu alrea beneath our feet. We believed that we could do it with impunity. And lo, the ground has moved beneath us, and allied Europe is confronted by China militant and vengeful.

THE YELLOW MAN'S PROTEST.

Who can say what revolutions may not be about to result from this magical transformation? The West, deaf to every other argument, listens to the thunder of modern artillery. What it has never hitherto realised is that the Chinese could use Maxims. "Every Russian knows," said Prince Ukhtomsky, after returning from genius with the idea of trying conclusions once for all with the intruding West?

A FIRST CLASS FIGHTING MAN.

Abbé Hue in his classic work on China, written half a century since, indulges in some speculations on this very point which may be useful to reprint here. Hue wrote:—

It may be that it would be possible to find in China all the elements necessary for organising the most formidable army in the world. The Chinese are intelligent, ingenious, and docile. They comprehend rapidly whatever they are taught,

Chinese City, Pekin. From the top of the Tartar City Wall.

China some years back, "that a handful of soldiers from our army would suffice to reduce to subjection the whole of China." To-day the allied West doubts whether with 200,000 men it can venture to advance on Pekin, which is only seventy miles inland from Tientsin. What has happened is that the West has inoculated the East with militarism. Upon the most pacific, anti-military people in the world it has grafted the militarism of Europe. The soldier is to the Chinese an "antisapeck" or not worth a cent man. But these antisapeck men have already secured for China a respect which she could not command by all her study of the philosophy of Confucius. And who can say whether the success which has already been achieved may not inspire some Chinese and retain it in their memory. They are persevering and astonishingly active when they choose to exert themselves, respectful to authority, submissive and obedient, and they would easily accommodate themselves to all the exigencies of the severest discipline.

The Chinese possess also a quality most precious in soldiers, and which can scarcely be found as well developed among any other people—namely, an incomparable facility at supporting privations of every kind.

We have often been astonished to see how they will bear hunger, thirst, heat, cold, the difficulties and fatigues of a long march as if it were mere play. Thus both morally and physically they seem capable of meeting every demand; and with respect to numbers they might be enrolled in millions.

The equipment of this immense army would also be no very hard matter. There would be no occasion to have recourse to foreign nations. Their own country would furnish in abundance all the material that could be desired, as well as workmen without number, quick at comprehending any new invention.

THE CHINESE AS A SEA POWER.

China would present also inexhaustible resources for a navy. Without speaking of the vast extent of her coasts, along which the numerous population pass the greater part of their lives on the sea, the great rivers and immense lakes in the interior, always covered with fishing and trading junks, might furnish multitudes of men, habituated from their infancy to navigation, nimble, experienced, and capable of becoming excellent sailors for long expeditions. The officers of our ships of war that have visited the Chinese seas have often been astonished to meet, far away from any coast, their fishermen braving the tempests, and guiding their miserable vessels in safety over enormous waves that threatened every moment to swallow them. The Chinese would very soon be able to build vessels on the model of those of Europe, and a few years would enable them to put to sea with such a fleet as has never been seen.

THE ONE THING M'SSING.

No doubt the reader will think the notion of this immense army, this avalanche of men descending from the high table-land of Asia, as in the time of Tchengis Khan, these innumerable Chinese vessels ploughing all seas, and coming even to blockade our ports, an exceedingly fantastic one, and we ourselves are certainly far from thinking it likely to be realised. But when you become thoroughly acquainted with this Empire of 300 millions of inhabitants, when you know what are the resources in soil and population of these rich and fertile countries, you cannot but ask what should prevent such a nation from exercising great influence over the affairs of the human race. What it wants is a man of genius, a man truly great, capable of assimilating the power and vitality of this nation, more populous than all Europe, and which counts more than thirty centuries of civilisation.

Even without such an alarming leader of genius, the Chinese might, without leaving Asia, inflict a paralysing blow upon the trade and commerce of the world, to say nothing of striking a deadly blow at the British Empire.

THE PRECEDENT OF THE CRUSADES.

These inter-continental wars are affairs of centuries. The Pope is said to have remarked as he saw the Italian troops departing for the Far East that this was the first time since the Crusades in which all nations had united to make war for the Christian cause. The allusion is more apt than felicitous, for the struggle between the East and West, which began when steel-clad Europe hurled itself upon the Paynim hordes which defiled the Holy Sepulchre, lasted for over three hundred years, and at the end of that prolonged death-grapple of continents the combatants were left face to face very much as they were at the beginning. It is to be hoped that we are not on the verge of another three hundred years' war at the other end of the Asiatic continent.

The gravity of the crisis in China hitherto has never been realised, even faintly, in Europe. Otherwise England would have long ago patched up any kind of a truce in South Africa which would have enabled her to have used her army for the defence of the threatened outposts of Western civilisation. Even now, when the reported massacre of the Legations has sent a thrill of horror through the world, few dream of the immensity and hopelessness of the struggle upon which they are invited to embark with such loud cries of vengeance.

WHAT IT MAY COME TO.

Everything depends upon how far the decisive and terrible success of the revolt against foreigners in Pekin will lead to a general uprising throughout China. If the southern and western provinces remain impassive, the situation created in Pekin is one which can be grappled with by the international allies; but if all China is up in arms, then the West can do nothing except singe the beard and inflict pinpricks on the hide of the great Chinese dragon.

One of the ablest Ambassadors in London, who has made a lifelong study of the Chinese question, expressed himself quite freely on this point. He said :-

If China really rises, the whole of Europe, with the addition of Japan and the United States, can do nothing except to put the girdle of iron around the Chinese frontier and leave the Chinese to stew in their own juice for eight years.

Such an opinion may seem fantastic to those who have been complacently building their calculations upon the prospect of developing the Chinese market, but the situation is not unlike that of the Soudan after the death of General Gordon. For thirteen years the whole vast territory of the Egyptian Soudan was cut off from civilisation. It was only the other day, by the capture of Omdurman and the death of the Mahdi, that it was made possible to reopen relations with that vast, fertile region.

THE CONQUEST OF CHINA IMPOSSIBLE.

I have had exceptional opportunities of discussing the situation in China with diplomats, both European and Asiatic, who are as familiar with Pekin as they are with Paris. One of the ablest of their number, who had a narrow escape from being the victim of the massacre, told me he thought it was almost certain that every Chinese Christian in the whole of China would be massacred—that nothing could possibly save them.

The Allies are at present preparing to send 200,000 men to the seat of war. With that force, if China does not sise, they may fight their way to Pekin.

As for attempting the conquest of China with 200,000 men under divided leadership, operating at a distance of thousands of miles from their base, it is sufficient to remember that Lord Roberts, in command of the same number

The Empress Dowager of China.

able, aft

at Preto

more th

The f

determi

part of their ov bullying some

Armeni

anather

ence, w

not ash

Constan

brother

From

Christer

thing the

its begi

been e

Chinese the oth

their w

They

thousanday if foes.

OUR

The

is inex

A Ge

grappled is up in inge the e great who has pressed addition t to put eave the ho have on the but the e death ole vast ff from pture of it was , fertile ing the an and re with had a ssacre, every ald be es not 200,000 ance of oo men

ient to same

Chinese Anti-Foreign Posters.

number of men, with undivided authority, has not been able, after seven months' hard fighting, to free his outposts at Pretoria from attacks of an enemy which cannot put more than 20,000 men in the field.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE REVOLT.

The fact is, that the white world is face to face with a determined effort, by no means confined to China, on the part of the coloured races to assert their right to live their own lives in their own way, without the perpetual bullying of the Palefaces. It began some years ago, when the Sultan asserted his right to massacre his Armenians as he pleased; a hope-lessly divided Christendom shrieked anathemas and confessed its impotence, while the German Emperor was not ashamed to proceed in state to Constantinople to greet as friend and brother the bloodstained assassin.

From that time the supremacy of Christendom has been shaken. Everything that has followed is its natural evolution, which even yet is but at its beginning.

A German officer who recently had been employed in the drilling of Chinese troops told a friend of mine the other day that the Chinese in their war with France spent the lives of their men with the same indifference that we spend arimunition. They were quite content to send thousands to be slaughtered day after day if they could kill a dozen of their

OUR ONLY CHANCE OF SUCCESS.

The reservoir of Chinese humanity is inexhaustible. The only chance for the white man in China is the cossibility of divisions among the Chinese themselves. In case of civil war in China, the party that is backed up by the international allies will probably triumph. We can only beat the Chinese by the help of the Chinese.

The British Empire in India was built up not by the conquest of the millions of Hindustan by a handful of Europeans. One section of the natives was called in to the aid of the British as allies, and so the British Indian Empire came into existence.

The great difficulty which confronts us is the fact that there is at least as much chance of differences paralysing the international forces as there is of civil war breaking out in China. Hence it becomes of supreme importance that the allies should abjure all international rivalries, jealousies and suspicions, which have been so diligently cultivated by the press, especially by the press of England. There is no room for any phobias in the allied camp.

THE CURSE OF RUSSOPHOBIA.

That we are now confronting the gravest crisis of our lifetime is largely due to the infatuated folly of British Russophobists, who called for the removal of Li Hung Chang from Pekin in the belief that he was in Russia's pocket. Now, Li Hung Chang was the only Chinese statesman who Willow believed it was impossible for China to get on without Western civilisation. He was sacrificed to British Russophobia, and with results which we see to-day.

This is no moment for the wild cries of revenge which have disgraced the German Emperor. We are face to face with a world movement which cannot be handled in passion.

The attack on the Legations, however terrible it may seem to us, was nevertheless natural. It was the result and inevitable corollary of the seizure of the Taku forts and the massacre of their garrison. Human nature is much the same all the world over, and if we had been in a similar position the white men would have retaliated where and how they could.

WHAT WE MAY ANTICIPATE.

For months, it may be for years to come, the Chinese market is lost to foreign trade. Christianity may be stamped out of China as completely as 200 years ago it was stamped out of Japan. It will be well if this is all that we have to face as the result of forgetting the Golden Rule in our relations to the Chinese. One of the awful possibilities of the near future is that the allies will quarrel among themselves, and that we may have a world-wide war which will lead civilisation backward.

The Paleface has become supreme in India by taking advantage of the internal feuds of the races which inhabit Hindustan. As the Chinese have learned to use the white man's gun, they may prove themselves not less expert in adopting the white man's policy,

OUR PERIL IN INDIA.

But there is a nearer danger which threatens The Chinese pot has boiled over in the extreme north, in the extreme west, and on the eastern littoral. Who can say how long it will be before it boils over on the southern rim of the Middle Kingdom? If the Russians found themselves suddenly attacked on the Amur, seven hundred miles north of Port Arthur, how soon may we not have news that the Black Flags have attacked the French in Tonkin, or that irregular Chinese banditti have entered Upper Burmah? Viceroy after Viceroy refused to annex Burmah, dreading a frontier conterminous with China. In a week or a month we may have reason to regret that we forgot their caution. It is a disagreeable thing to be a Cassandra, but I must say that it seems little short of suicidal madness to be depleting our Indian garrison at a time like this when the coloured man is beginning to ask whether he must for ever bear the yoke of the Paleface, and when close to our famine-stricken Indian Empire of 350,000,000 there is a colossal Chinese Empire of 400,000,000 manifesting ominous symptoms of revolutionary activity. More unlikely things have happened than a hurried patching up of any kind of a settlement in the Transvaal in the next three months which would enable us to liberate the troops that may be urgently required to reinforce the garrisons of India and Burmah.

THE COMING ECONOMIC CRISIS.

This is only one aspect of the revolt of the coloured man. It is serious enough, but it is probable that it will be less immediately appreciated than the economic results which are already accruing. Trade is beginning to slacken, but expenditure goes up and up and up every day. The bills for the wanton crime in which we are persisting in South Africa are maturing. The price of coal has gone up to a figure which cuts the throat of all manufacturers who work on a narrow margin. Everything is dearer. And now on the top of all this comes the sudden closing of the What Chinese market. that means to Manchester may be imagined from the fact that already many Lancashire cotton mills are running half-time. If the Chinese trade remains in a condition of suspended animation till Christmas, there is a bad look-out for many of the largest firms in Manchester. There is little prospect of any early resumption of the Chinese trade. Lancashire will suffer badly this winter. Instead of making a profit on the sale of shirtings to the Chinese, the Lancashire operative on half-time will have to spare contributions from his scanty earnings to pay for cutting the throats of his old customers. The cry of the unemployed will be heard once more in our streets, and this time there will be no restraining power to confine the forces of discontent and of despair within the limits of the law.

Photograph by]

Li Hung Chang.

[Russell and Sons.

A BAD LOOK-OUT FOR WINTER.

Mr. Balfour's fatal saying about its being more than human nature can stand to remain passive when any one does something you very much dislike, will be remem-bered and acted upon. The teaching of the whole British press, with a few inconsiderable exceptions, that it is right to kill and burn and plunder those who refuse to give in at once to all the demands which are made in the name of justice, dwells in the popular memory. What has been declared to be good sauce for the oligarch Kruger will be held to be equally excellent for the oligarch Salisbury. The Church, which, with some bright but rare exceptions, has pandered to t revo Mr. nea pilo indu brot deal eari pala

U

of t

exp Afri and fres relie an com inde esca the ting are land wie

skir

the

oatching I in the grate the orce the coloured at it will conomic nning to p every for the hich we South . The one up uts the acturers narrow thing on the nes the What chester om the many

If the ains in pended istmas, pok-out largest ester. pect of ion of Lanca-ly this naking ale of hinese, erative ave to from to pay pats of

The ed will in our e there power ces of e law.

e than ny one memBritish
it is refuse h are opular good
to be urch, dered

The Mailed Fist in China.

Unfortunately every finger wants to be longer than the other.

to the war spirit abroad, will be powerless to restrain the revolutionary spirit at home. There is no longer a Mr. Gladstone to dominate the democracy. We are nearing a serious economic and political crisis, with no pilot to steer us through the breakers. A drunken, self-indulgent democracy, with its hands reeking with its brother's blood abroad, will be a very ugly customer to deal with when hunger pinches at home and fanatically earnest demagogues point with frenzied finger to the palaces of our plutocrats.

PERILS AHEAD.

There is no saying where to expect the next outbreak of the coloured races. With great efforts and a frightful expenditure of human life our gallant troops in Western Africa succeeded in raising the siege of Coomassi, and replaced its exhausted garrison by a small company of fresh soldiers, who in turn will probably stand in need of relief in a few weeks. Preparations are being made for an expedition in October, which will have to begin the complete reconquest of Ashanti. We shall be lucky indeed if we have no trouble in Nigeria, and the French escape in Senegal. In the great State on the Congo the natives have grievances enough to justify them in putting the Belgian garrison to the sword. Further north, there are ominous signs both in Morocco and in the Hinterland of Algeria and Tunis that the mysterious force wielded by El Senoussi may be hurled against the Whiteskinned Infidel. We have not yet heard the last word of the Soudan, and Lord Kitchener may be needed in Khartoum long before Lord Roberts has crushed the resistance of President Kruger. Nor is it only from the East that our Egyptian outposts may find themselves overwhelmed. Menelik of Abyssinia is said to be getting restless. He has bought the white man's gun, and Italy knows how well he can use it.

THE WAVE OF REVOLT.

A subtle observer who has lived much in the East remarked the other day that the force of auto-suggestion was as potent among nations as with individuals. Whole races seem at times to be hypnotised, and along an entire continent spreads a wave of revolt with irresistible impulse. The mutterings of coming trouble among the Afridis on the North Western Frontier may subside. The sullen discontent of the warlike tribes and feudatory princes may continue to smoulder beneath the surface. But the atmosphere is electric, and any morning we may wake to discover that the storm has burst. Under such circumstances the prudent captain will furl sail. But, alas, our captain not being prudent, is bent upon steering with all sail set upon the South African breakers. Quos Deus vult perdere, prius dementat.

Menelik, Negus of Abyssinia.

0101010101010101010

THE MAGNA CHARTA OF THE AGED:

PROSPECTS OF PENSIONS FOR ALL.*

"WHAT is the outlook for Old Age Pensions?" I put the question the other day to a stalwart Labour Member from the North. "As black as midnight," he exclaimed; "never blacker than now." That is a view which I cannot share. The dismalest hour in the pensions movement fell just two years ago. Then, indeed, there seemed reason for something like despair. Lord Rothschild's Committee, which was appointed to find a practicable scheme, had declared that within the terms of its reference no practicable scheme could be found; and the Government appeared to acquiesce in this negative conclusion. But that was the darkest night which comes before the dawn. What has happened since then offers a striking refutation of my friend's pessimism. First, New Zealand passed her Pensions Act. The news of that measure put heart of hope into the organised labour of Great Britain, and led to the seven historic conferences with Mr. Charles Booth, which resulted in our own National Committee. By this imie the Government had taken the matter up again, tstrpped it of partisan colour, and appointed the Select Committee. That Committee pronounced pensions to be not merely desirable, but practicable, and prepared a scheme for legislative adoption. The cost of this scheme was seriously investigated by a Departmental Committee, and the subject of pensions found mention—negative it is true, but apologetic—in the Queen's Speech. Meantime, our National Committee has carried on its active propaganda, solidified British labour into a practical unit in furtherance of our demand, and won expressions of sympathy and promises of support from several of the most influential religious bodies. These two years have been bright with the dawn of new hope for the aged.

A LIFT UPON THE POWDER CART.

The dawn has not been unclouded. The most obtrusive among the many disturbing influences has been, of course, the War. A friend said to me the other week, "The War will have knocked the bottom out of your Old Age Pensions movement." That remark expresses an opinion which we know to be common, but which we know also to be mistaken. The War has undoubtedly slackened the pace of our movement. It has deferred the hope, aroused by the Peace Conference, of a diversion of national expenditure from armaments to pensions. It has absorbed the interest and energy of the nation to an extent which left little spirit for social reform. But its effects on our movement have not been wholly negative. It has deepened that sense of national unity which, when turned into home channels, ought to show itself in a livelier feeling of responsibility for the condition of the aged Briton. It has suggested that since millions of money are freely spent in order to give the franchise to a few thousand Outlanders, other millions might be spent in order to keep the franchise for aged fellow-subjects at home who are now robbed of their vote on receipt of parish relief. Taxation for war may at first sight seem to make taxation for pensions less possible, but a closer view suggests just the opposite conclusion. The expenditure forced up for the young man in khaki may be kept up for the old man in fustian. Vast increase or expenditure is more easily effected by war than by any peaceful purpose; but the peaceful purpose may be powerful enough to prevent a great expenditure from falling, which it could never have raised in the first instance. The War has also shown that the nation can bear without bankruptcy or serious inconvenience a very much heavier burden of taxation than had been supposed. The old argument against pensions, that "we can't afford the outlay," has certainly had its bottom knocked out by the War, m th re

pr ce

un

the jec

ex

the

OW

an ou

wh

tio

wit By

Ho

Th

me

pro

me

cor

hav

que

unr not hut

pov

par org

be 1

mil

of I

mer

pros

the

gen

mos

of

agit

the forc

mac

But,

Pres

whe

attit

inter

play

than

TI

vade favor

in pr

conc boar

broug close

0

Among other indirect gains to be gleaned from the War may be reckoned what Mr. Burt reports from Northumberland. He says there is a reaction setting in there against militarism, which presses for expenditure on pensions as a safeguard against expenditure on armaments. The contention is that if you involve the nation so heavily in legal provision for its aged members, it will not be able to afford aggressive wars.

THE NEW SENSE OF EMPIRE.

Warlike enthusiasm, whether directed towards South Africa or China, naturally suggests another powerful element in the situation to-day. That is Imperialism. The vastness and splendour of our world-girdling dominion. which burst like an apocalypse upon the mind of this country at the Diamond Jubilee, were made many times more impressive by the rally of the Colonies to the help of the Mother Country on the field of battle. The fascination of Empire, and the practical problems involved in its reorganisation—as, for example, in the creation of the Australian Commonwealth, and in the hoped-for federation of South Africa-may seem formidable to compete with the claims of our old folks on public attention. But this is a mistaken fear. The new-found enthusiasm for Greater Britain promises to be a distinct help to our cause. It need not and it will not be limited to the military exploits of colonists; it will extend to their yet nobler achievements in the field of social legislation. The progress of pensions in the Colonies has made the movement at home more rapid. Our very existence as a national committee roots in initiative supplied by New Zealand. And our efforts are not likely to slacken when we find the Prime Minister of New South Wales, the oldest of Australian Colonies, only the other day promising trade unionists that he would introduce an Old Age Pensions Bill this session. By all means let us cultivate and applaud admiration for our self-governing colonies. It is bound to bring wind to our sails.

THE FIRST AMONG HOME QUESTIONS.

Foreign affairs and military questions do certainly threaten to overshadow the demands of home legislation for some considerable time to come. This is a fact to be sincerely deplored. But the balance will right itself in time, and internal reform must have its innings. Then will be the time for enacting pensions. I have consulted on this point a variety of public men, journalists, members of parliament, and labour leaders. They one and all endorse the conclusion which I had formed as an independent student of public opinion: that, apart from foreign policy, and the military policy it involves, there are two questions which surpass all other questions in their hold on popular attention; and these two questions are-first, pensions, and, second, housing. At present, so far as we can see, we may accept it as a certainty that pensions stand first among all the innu-merable claimants for home legislation. To have got the question into this unrivalled prominence is to have registered no small advance. Our own demand for easily universal pensions has made remarkable headway during ut the the most exciting period of the war. Other and rival projects have retired or been abandoned. With the doubtful vent a have exception of the crude and impracticable proposals of the Select Committee, there is no other scheme than our own in possession of the field. We have been mobilising shown serious xation and consolidating our forces, we have been advancing gainst our lines as it were under cover of the darkness; and tainly when the day returns, our position and our strength will be an unexpected revelation to many. e War

* A paper read by F. Herbert Stead at the First Annual Meeting of the National Committee of Organised Labour for Promoting Pensions for All, held in Birmingham, July 22.

EXEUNT PARTIES; ENTER THE NATION.

The paramountcy of pensions among all home questions is the more remarkable in that it has been attained without the help of either of the great political parties. By the explicit avowals of leaders on both sides of the House our question has been classed as non-partizan, The cynic might say that this change of category only means that both parties have agreed to shelve a difficult problem. There is indeed a danger of non-partizan measures being overlooked amid the crowd of hotly contested claims. But this is a danger to which, as we have seen, pensions have not succumbed; and consequently I can only regard this elimination of party as an unmixed good. One party or the other may—or may not—be in power when the first Pensions Act is passed; but that accident does not affect the fact that the motive power which pushes the Act through lies not among partizan forces, but among the great neutral forces which organise and operate irrespective of party lines.

THE PRIME MOTORS.

The prime motors are too well-known to us here to be more than mentioned. The sad lot of more than a million of our aged fellow-subjects, the increasing pace of modern industry which drives the old out of employment, the injustice and impolicy of making old age a prospect of misery to the great majority of the people, the direct pressure of these facts on the homes and hearts of the workers, the uneasy feeling they create in the general conscience of the nation, and the simple but most powerful instinct of compassion for the feebleness of declining life—these are the abiding sources of our agitation and of its power. My concern to-day is with the channels other than party by which this fund of force may be turned on the wheels of our legislative machinery.

One of the most notorious of these is Journalism. But, except where ruled by powerful personalities, the Press is rather an organ for the diffusion of force elsewhere created than itself a creative agency. So far its attitude to our movement has been one of benevolent interest, with a spice of patronage. It has certainly not played the part of pioneer. It has been a mirror more than a motor.

THE ADVANCE OF WOMAN.

The influence of womanhood, which increasingly pervades the public life of to-day, is a factor eminently favourable to our cause. The care of the aged, whether in private or in public, has a strong claim on woman's concern; and the large number of women serving on boards of guardians and kindred public bodies has brought the most sensitive part of the nation's life into close touch with its aged misery. Already much interest has been shown in our crusade by various groups of organised womanhood. I would fain hope that the womanly sympathy and compassion which are richly stored within the habitations of the Primrose League will rally to the support of our plea for the indigent old folks. But the hearts of women altogether outside the ranks of public life respond to this as to no other political measure. Even those who have the most inveterate dislike of public questions, regarding them as exclusively the monopoly of the male, have shown a vivid feeling for the lot of the million and more of the aged who are now unprovided for. The power of woman, whether exerted in political associations or in the privacy of home, will be steadily and growingly on our side.

THE ARCHBISHOP'S LEAD.

But foremost among all the forces which are independent of party, and which may therefore be utilised for our ends, must be put the forces of organised religiou. The awful stress laid by the Founder of the Christian religion on the conduct of His followers to the poor is being more and more recognised, and is driving people more and more to the service of the poor. Through innumerable agencies of benevolence the Churches are being brought face to face with the sad facts of aged poverty, and are being forced to long for some large measures of national aid. The experience of the last eighteen months has shown that even the most ancient and least mobile among the Communions are ready to declare their sympathy with our demand. political leaders have been silent or have indulged in ambiguous speech, religious leaders have spoken out. Cardinal Vaughan, as became the British head of the Communion which, to its honour be it spoken, ministers to the very lowest grades of city life, has promised to support our proposals if by this summer no better scheme had been produced. As we have seen no sign of His Eminence supporting any other scheme, we gladly count on his adhesion to our own. And do I need to remind you of that memorable scene in Lambeth Palace last January, when, if I am informed aright, for the first time in all history a Primate of the Church of England received a deputation comprehensively representative of the trade unions of England, and received them with the most cordial sympathy? The workingclasses of this country will not readily forget that when Government and Opposition alike hung back from support of our demand the Archbishop of Canterbury acknowledged Head of the Anglican Communion throughout the world-expressed himself in full accord with our aims and promised to a measure embodying them not merely his "strenuous support," but also his vote as a Peer of

WILL THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND FOLLOW?

That courageous declaration of Dr. Temple has riveted on him and on his Church the expectant gaze of the Labour world. No corporation short of the State itself has such intimate connection with the poor as has the Church of England by law established. Through its ten thousand parishes, and through a vastly more numerous array of charitable agencies, the Church is placed in continuous touch with the needs of the aged and infirm. She ought to possess in consequence a fund of knowledge and of sympathy which should make her a most effective ally in our pension's campaign. Workingmen are beginning to ask, Will she in this movement take the lead to which her faith, her works, her position entitle and constrain her? Will the Church of England achieve for us what the Parties of England have failed

mising
I Age ltivate lonies.

rtainly slation t to be self in Then asulted
nalists,

ey one ned as apart

volves,

estions

e two

g. At mber-gainst

ons as vily in able to South

werful

ialism.

ninion,

of this times

e help

scina-ved in

of the eration

e with

m for

to our

to the eir yet The move-

as a v New

when es, the

The

XIIM

to accomplish? Has not the opportunity now arrived for which some of her best sons have long been praying? Amid the break-up of the old party system, and in the general despair of the mere politician, may not the Church stand forth as she has done of old, as champion of the suffering poor, and secure for them in their aged feebleness that boon with which cabal and caucus have hitherto only mocked them? Here is a glorious rôle open to her. Had she the courage, has she the determination equal to the venture? Dr. Temple's speech seems to suggest that she has : and the replies which Mr. Rogers has received from many of her bishops show that they are willing to be informed and-may I venture to add?—are waiting to be led. The Primate may feel that the burden of years and the enormous pressure of his present duties preclude him from initiating so heroic an enterprise. But we have the best authority for believing that were such a movement commenced within the Church, the aged archbishop would support it where and when he could.

WANTED: ANOTHER STEPHEN LANGTON.

I am no constitutional lawyer. I cannot pronounce upon the distinctive functions of Upper and Lower Houses of Parliament. I only ask the question by way of illustration. Would it not be possible for an Archbishop of Canterbury to introduce into the House of Peers a short declaratory measure which should include among the civil rights of Her Majesty's subjects throughout the realm the right to a pension at a given age? The financial measures required might be promoted by representatives of the Church of England in the Lower House. But such a declaratory Bill, if introduced by the Primate and supported by prominent members of the Bench of Bishops, would have an immense effect. I do not affirm that such a procedure is possible either in constitutional theory or in ecclesiastical practice. But I do maintain that the way is open for the Church of England, whether by directly initiating legislation or by applying social and moral pressure, to confer this great boon upon the aged. The effect which action of this kind would have on the future fortunes of the Establishment is a question which does not concern us here. Catholic or Protestant, Anglican or Nonconformist, we are all proud to recall the service rendered to English freedom by Stephen Langton, Archbishop of Canterbury by Papal nomination. And whatever our religious views may be, we should not be sorry if by the good offices of another Archbishop the Magna Charta of Old Age was won and pensions secured as a civil right for all. Can the Church of England produce another Stephen Langton? If I mistake not she has in her present bench of bishops more than one man amply able to play this part.

THE KEY TO THE SITUATION.

But no hopes which we may cherish concerning the attitude of the Anglican hierarchy must be allowed for one moment to supersede our own self-reliant effort. The demands of organised labour, organised labour must itself obtain. We reflect with pleasure upon the prestige and power which accrue to our movement from the great names which endorse it: names like those of Charles Booth in social science, of George Cadbury in philan-thropy, and of Frederick Temple in religion; but we can never forget that the key to the situation is in the position taken by the working classes. They and they alone can bring about universal pensions. United and resolute, they will win their way and gain their goal. Divided and lethargic, they will fail. Now, so far as the leaders of labour are concerned I think we have every reason to congratulate ourselves. They are practically solid on the question of pensions. The National Committee of Organised Labour is a most cheering sign of the times. It combines men of all parties in the State, and pretty nearly all schools of economic thought. Yet they have worked together with a unanimity unbroken, and, so far as I know, unparalleled. During the whole agitation, now extending over more than eighteen months, I have never heard uttered so much as one angry word. The com-mittee has superseded the old and disastrous policy of antagonism, within and without, by the spirit of concilia-tion and amity. Of this new and happier temper our organising secretary is the very embodiment; and thanks to it and to him the movement has not only unified labourit has also, as we have seen, won wide support from classes and interests altogether outside the Labour world. It is only characteristic of his genius and secure fuller representation in Parliament, they find their chairman in Frederick Rogers. So far as the leaders are concerned the prospect is excellent. The great question, which only time will answer, is: Will the rank and file follow their leaders? Are the masses of working-men indifferent or incredulous? Or are they zealous and resolute? As a working-man in Walworth said to me: "If the workers only put into pensions one-tenth of the enthusiasm they put into Mafeking, the thing would be done." The last word to the working classes in a survey of the situation must be-

Yet not without hope of other and higher assistance. The record of our movement reads like a series of social It has been made up of a procession of unanimities, of unexpected combinations, of eminent and spontaneous adhesions. I do not believe that these things are mere accidents. They hang together. They form a chain of increasing strength. They suggest a purpose and "a tendency not ourselves." They suggest that the incalculable factor in human affairs, the secret force of social evolution-whatever be the phrase which our ignorance or our reverence may prefer—has taken the matter in hand, and will put it through. The expecta-tion of the aged poor shall not always fail nor their hope

The fundamental principle of this agitation was in the subsequent proceedings reaffirmed by the following resolution :

That in the opinion of this meeting no scheme of old-age pensions can be considered satisfactory which does not deal with the problem from a national standpoint, and recognises frankly that all citizens, male or female, who have reached a given age should be entitled to claim a pension from the State.

This was moved by Mr. G. N. Barnes (A.S.E.), seconded by Councillor Millerchip (President of the Midland Counties Trades Federation), supported by Mr. Glen, of the Scottish Co-operators, and Mr. Willis, of the Oddfellows, and carried unanimously. A scheme of action for the General Election was decided upon. Councillor J. V. Stevens (President), Frederick Rogers (Organising Secretary), and Edward Cadbury (Treasurer)

TH vello cons

De in th ates the mast must for ' This Le arm be m let th destr Chin of th being

the v

hand

Orie

and

Chir of re rema task tion an in to it left hum try ! the posi

> bee hav d'é En sho

A

the mu

star and sha test evo leve WO CTO

dis

LEADING ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THE PROBLEM IN CHINA.

THE magazines for August are full of the revolt of the yellow man and the new questions it raises. The shrill cry for vengeance is less audible than the deep note of constructive responsibility.

RASE IT! RASE IT! EVEN TO THE GROUND.

Demetrius C. Boulger is in truculent mood. He writes in the Fortnightly on "Peking—and after." He reiterates what he said in 1880, that the Power which obtains the control of her fighting millions will secure the mastery of the world. But, he urges, no single Power must be allowed to secure that control. He then clamours for "an indelible act of vengeance and retribution." This is the policy he commends to Christian Powers:—

Let us hope that no false sentimentality will hold back the arm of righteous wrath, and that of Peking as a city there will be made an end. In its palaces may there be desolation, and let the ploughshare pass over its polluted streets. The complete destruction of Peking alone will strike terror to the heart of the Chinese race, and at the same time it will simplify the solution of the Chinese problem. . . . If we have lost the capacity of being vindictive, and the manner in which we have carried on the war against the Boers makes it look as if we had, let us hand the task over to the Japanese, who will do it in a thoroughly Oriental fashion, and wipe out the murderous brood of Tuan and Tung, with the she-devil of an Empress at their head . . . .

COMPETITION IN PARTITION.

With the downfall of the Manchus a central Government in China will also disappear, and it is impossible to see any means of reviving it. There is no one to put in their place. . . . There remains, then, no practicable alternative to a subdivision of the task, or, in plain words, to a partition of China. The destruction of Peking will, therefore, be followed at a brief interval by an international conference, the seat of which we must be careful to insist shall be in London. . . . How it will be done must be left to the discretion and opportunities of each participant, but human nature is not so bad as to justify any doubt that all will try to do it well for the honour of civilisation and the benefit of the Chinese people. It will be an international competition of the most interesting and critical nature, by which the relative positions of the races of the earth will be tested and assigned.

Mr. Boulger concludes with the sanguine hope that there will be imparted to this question "a chivalry, a mutual forbearance, and consideration that have not been witnessed among the nations since the Crusades."

A TESTIMONY OF HORROR.

Blackwood, which attributes the present upset to our having acquiesced in the violent and unjustifiable coup d'état of the Empress when she deposed the rightful Emperor, insists on exemplary vengeance:—

It is but common justice that the instigators of the enormity should be held personally responsible for it, and among these stand prominently forward the Dowager-Empress, Prince Tuan, and General Tung Fuhsiang. But the nation should bear its share, and, in addition to an ample money penalty, some lasting testimony should be given of the horror which the crime has evoked. If the walls of Pekin in which the people trusted were levelled to the ground, and their foundations sown with salt, it would teach future generations that such dastardly deeds cannot be committed without bringing down on their authors just and crowning retribution.

MR. FREDERICK GREENWOOD'S VIEW.

In the Nineteenth Century Mr. Frederick Greenwood discusses the Chinese Revolt which he predicted nine years ago. He says we have now discovered that "what the European Governments have to deal with is a truly national movement, not sudden and unconsidered, but of steady growth, calculated, determined, and supplied with every moral and material element of persistency." The issue lies largely within the choice of China. Mr. Greenwood thinks:—

The likelier thing, then, seems to be that Li-Hung-Chang's intention, at the same time his commission, includes the expedient of putting the revolt away out of sight; thereby leaving the European Governments to determine whether to be content with an ostensible suppression . . . or to call back the revolt and force on a conflict which may alter the destinies of Europe and Asia for centuries to come.

Russia's dream, "China is our India," and Japan's dream of a "Mongolian confederation that should sweep the world," must now be modified. For ourselves:—

Punishment for murderous lawlessness of course there must be, and to be fitting and politic it should be severe. But afterwards it will be wise to consider the dictum of the learned Von Brandt, that "the system of dealing with the Chinese will have to be altered materially;" and most wise will it be to think once, twice, and thrice before committing England to any scheme of conquest and partition.

WHAT MR. EDWARD DICEY THINKS.

"Vengeance and Afterwards" is the title of Mr. E. Dicey's contribution to the Nineteenth Century. He asks, Is punishment possible? England and most of the other Powers could not consent to sack, loot, burn Pekin, and put its inhabitants to the sword. "The conscience of Christendom would be shocked." To rescue the British Legation from death Mr. Dicey would employ all British forces available; "but to avenge their death at the cost of engaging in a war with China is a different affair." It seems that "any punitive expedition against Pekin can only be undertaken as part of a general campaign against the Celestial Empire":—

I do not hesitate therefore to say that the probable results of a European intervention in China must be the ultimate conquest of the Empire by one of the intervening Powers, or its partition between two or more of these Powers. These are not results which England can afford to contemplate with indifference, still less with satisfaction. Our interest therefore, for the time being, is to maintain the status quo in China.

Mr. Dicey also points out that if England interferes at all, she can only do so as a military inferior to Russia and Japan.

"DIPLOMATICUS."

"Diplomaticus" asks, in the Fortnightly, "Have we a policy in China?" and reviews with incisive criticism the weakness and inconsistency" shown by the British Government during recent years. He says:—

Had Lord Rosebery been true to his own principles, Germany would have found no opportunity of meddling in the Far East, and instead of England being to-day confronted and thwarted by a powerful Triplice, she would have divided with Russia the peaceful control of the whole of Asia. Had Lord Salisbury spoken a timely word at Kiao-Chau, a word it was obviously his duty to speak, the coastline of China from the Yalu to Tonkin would still have been unbroken, and there would have been no uprising of the Yellow Terror.

For the future, the writer says :-

If the other Powers annex, there will be a great deal to be said for a British Protectorate of what remains of China, with

141 resolute, Divided leaders eason to olid on nittee of e times.

pretty

ev have

, so far

on, now

e never olicy of oncilia-

per our thanks

bour-

t from

Labour

is and nite to y find

as the

: Will

re the g-man

it into

Mafe-

to the

be-

tance.

social ion of nt and things

orm a irpose

at the rce of a our

n the pecta-

hope

as in owing ld-age

l with ankly

n age

nded

iland

Glen.

f the

e of ipon.

ogers

urer)

The

the capital established at Nanking. Indeed, I do not see what else we can do.

A CORRECTION.

Last month we summarised a paper by "Diplomaticus" in a way which, he complains, misrepresented his position. We wrote: "For the future the writer urges that we should cultivate the friendship of Japan rather than that of Russia." He replies, "I have not said anything of the kind... My view is that our permanent duty is to act with Russia in Asia." But he considers the present "the worst possible moment for throwing ourselves into the arms of Russia." We regret to have misconceived his meaning. The exact words which he used and which we were paraphrasing run: "If we are on the eve of a political cataclysm in China, the friendship of Japan will be of greater value to us than that of Russia."

"CHINA FOR THE CHINESE."

Mr. Emerson Bainbridge, M.P., suggests in the Contemporary that the Powers should first agree on the general principle of "China for the Chinese": the establishment, therefore, of law and order and sound administration. Then—

The wisest course to be taken by the European Powers at the present moment would be to give to any single nation who would undertake it the opportunity of establishing a new administration for the whole of China, and the construction of a comprehensive railway system, on the understanding that the trade of the country was open and free to the whole world. Jealousy and distrust will prevent this.

As the next best thing, the writer recommends the assignment of separate areas to the Powers, or such administration and development subject to scheme prepared by an international board.

THE AMERICAN FACTOR.

Mr. Josiah Quincey writes in the Contemporary on "The United States in China." He recognises that Secretary Hay's circular marks a new departure in American policy. The United States enter the Eastern arena in a spirit of good will to Great Britain. But should the trouble expand into a struggle for Corea between Russia and Japan, or for Asia between Britain and Russia, the United States would remain strictly neutral. The writer sees only two courses open for the present crisis: the maintenance of a central Chinese Government subject to the control of the Powers; or the division of China into administrative areas or spheres of influence, within each of which one Power, acting through native rulers, should be responsible for order. In the latter case the United States would only ask for the open door. In the former, Mr. Hay's action would seem to involve his country in a share of the international control.

A FRENCH VIEW OF THE CRISIS.

In her interesting letters on foreign politics in the Nouvelle Revue, Madame Adam attributes the situation in China partly to the brutal mailed fist of Germany, but mainly to the perfidious intrigues of England. England, she says, gave to Sir Claude MacDonald instructions designed to unchain the fanaticism and Chauvinism of the Chinese. Madame Adam evidently has a great sympathy with the deep anger of the Chinese at the disturbing influences of Western civilisation. The old serenity of Chinese life is gone wherever the foreigners have come; and to insist at this time on the open door is simply to provoke the fanaticism of a people capable of shutting themselves up within a great wall. The Chinese consented to open their gates to European commerce little by little; they submitted to the introduction of Christian missions in so far as those missions were purely religious and humanitarian; and they trusted, says Madame Adam, a little too much to the Russians. with whom they have certain racial ties. The assistance afforded to the reformer Kangyuwi by Great Britain served to draw out the great qualities of the Dowager Empress, who will assuredly live in history as one of the great rulers of the world. Madame Adam reminds us that the Chinese people have never really accepted the foreign Manchu dynasty; and asserts that the patriotic Chinese hate the English devils more than all the rest of the foreign devils. Madame Adam's programme is to demand reparation for crimes which have been committed, to consent to the peace proposals of Li Hung Chang—while at the same time keeping a sharp look-out on that personage—and to give to Russia the mission of defending the interests of Europe. All this appears in the first July number; and the second July number lacks the usual article on foreign politics from Madame Adam's brilliant pen.

FROM A NORWEGIAN POINT OF VIEW.

Kringsjaa (June 30th) contains an article on the China trouble by a frequent contributor, who veils his identity under the initials "R. E." Not only is this writer an ardent Pro-Boer, but he has the temerity also to declare that the Chinese may claim a little of the same sympathy to which the Boers are so strongly entitled. That the Chinese are bigoted and narrow-minded in their arrogant contempt for all things foreign and that the Boxers are brutal and coarse, no one, he says, can deny. But is there not also, he asks, something bigoted and shortsighted and overbearing in Europe's treatment of the ancient religion and culture of China? Is there nothing brutal in the constant landgrabbings of the Powers? Take it all in all, the endeavour of the missions to obtrude the Christian religion upon China is to the full as narrow-minded and bigoted as the Chinese anti-foreign exclusiveness. What China needs is not the religion of the West, but its knowledge. Were China as enlightened as Europe, the superstitious outgrowths of her own religion would gradually fall away, and what was left-a purified Buddhismwould, as easily as Christianity-if not more so-reconcile itself with a high culture. The Powers have behaved in China, says "R. E.," too much like conquerors, too little like educationalists. It was their mission to convince the Chinese of the value and necessity of commercial, economic and political reforms, and make them per-sonally and pecuniarily interested in the carrying out of such reforms. This would have been "Good Samaritan" work, and China would possibly have grown well and sound, and we should have had in the East a new and greater Japan. But the politics of the Powers? Have these been in harmony with the claims of Christianity and civilisation? They have found a sick and apparently dying man by the roadside; and how have they treated him? Have they poured oil and wine in his wounds and sought to revive him? By no means. They have surrounded him like hungry vultures waiting for the last breath of life to leave their prey, that they might divide it amongst them. Already they have agreed how such a division should be made, not to cause an angry hacking-out of eyes amongst themselves. And now all at once the dying man has got on his legs again and begun to strike out right and left to save himself. At which the vultures are naturally irritated. They find themselves face to face with a new problem. Before, the proble:

Now t fully w Acc.
nut all fist" p tion of
for Eu Europ
a Chi poison
Europ
the wa death

Mr.
the C Jung I
if not c and vi of muc not gro
I ren
Li Hur
in 1880

the promomen reaction cannot whatev His reference of reference strong Liu K is sa "thor

By T IN Fang the n Unite

and h

Re ago to throw botto law. he sa natio of the between the same the door open slam mair gone Chin problem was how to agree in the division of the spoil.

Now the problem is how to make the man go on peacee intro-

nissions trusted.

issians,

served

mpress,

great

hat the foreign hinese

of the

is to

com-

Hung

ok-out

sion of ears in r lacks dam's

n the ils his s this tle of e so

and things

se, no

asks.

earing

ulture

land-

, the inded

ness.

t, but

e, the radu-sm-ncile ed in little

vince

rcial.

per-ut of tan"

and new ers?

hris-

and lave

his hey

the ight

now

gry

all

and find

the

fully with his dying.

According to "R. E.," the Powers will find China a nut all too hard to crack. They will find their "mailed fist" powerless. The Chinese are masters in the organisation of secret societies, and they will make life impossible for Europeans and for all who serve or sympathise with Europeans. No European will dare to accept food from a Chinaman. He will be starved out of China, if not poisoned or otherwise killed. And wheresoever a European shall dare to make his home, there at once on the walls will be posted a mystic placard that will mean death to him.

LEADING CHINAMEN.

Mr. D. C. Boulger obligingly instructs the readers of the Contemporary as to "Who's Who in China." Jung Lu he takes to be "a man in favour of moderation, if not of absolute progress." Kang Yi is "as anti-foreign and violent as Prince Tuan." Yuan Shih Kai is "a man of much craft and address." Prince Ching's "influence is not great." Of Li Hung Chang, he says:—

I remember well General Gordon saying to me that if we put Li Hung Chang in the place of the Manchus, as was talked of in 1880, we should find him more obstructive and difficult than the present dynasty. I think we should be prepared at any moment to see Li Hung Chang range himself on the side of the reactionaries and anti-foreigners as soon as he finds that matters cannot be patched up by one of his favourite make-believes. To whatever side he attaches himself he will bring little strength. His reputation and following are both gone, and his political, like his physical, vigour is now but a wreck.

Of Chang Chih Tung the writer speaks in terms of great respect. Old, and cautious, he espoused the cause of reform, but he has not much force behind him, and is strongly opposed to the opium policy of the foreigner. Liu Kun Yi is stronger, younger, more energetic, and is said to be well disposed to England. Sheng is "thoroughly unscrupulous," and is succeeding to the guile and humbug of Li Hung Chang.

A CHINESE PLEA FOR FAIR PLAY.

By the Chinese Minister to the United States. In the North American Review for July, Wu-Ting-Fang, the Chinese Ambassador at Washington, writes on the need for mutual helpfulness between China and the United States.

THE GOLDEN RULE OF RECIPROCITY.

Reciprocity, he says, was declared by Confucius long ago to be a word which could serve as a guiding principle through life; it is the foundation of society, it lies at the bottom of every system of morality and every system of law. If China is treated on the principle of reciprocity, he says, much good will accrue both to China and the nations which adopt this Golden Rule as the foundation of their policy. But he considers that the relations between the two countries are governed by any principle rather than that of reciprocity.

THE OPEN DOOR SHOULD OPEN BOTH WAYS.

The "Open Door," he says, is all very well, but the door ought to open both ways. The Chinese door is wide open to the people of the United States, but their door is slammed in the faces of the Chinese. His Excellency maintains that China in her treatment of strangers has gone far beyond what is required by international usage. China been so long accustomed to indemnify foreigners who have fallen victims to mob violence that she is looked on, in a sense, as an insurer of all foreigners residing within her borders. Most articles imported for the use of foreigners are on the free list. He suggests that instead of forbidding the entry of Chinese into the United States, the Americans should exclude the illiterate and degenerate classes of all nations by setting up some specific test of fitness, such as the ability to read the American Constitution.

THE WHITE MAN'S FAULTS.

He complains that the Americans and other foreigners disregard the common civilities of life and make themselves unpopular by assuming a lofty air of superiority. He also suggests mildly that smartness in business matters is not held in such esteem in China as it is in America. He says:—

Foreigners are sometimes guilty, also, of practising all sorts of tricks upon the unsuspecting natives. It should be remembered that the Chinese standard of business honesty is very high. The "yea, yea" of a Chinese merchant is as good as gold. Not a scrap of paper is necessary to bind him to his word

THE IMMENSE RESOURC'S OF CHINA.

If the Americans would but treat the Chinese on the principle of never doing to others what you do not want them to do to you, there is a limitless field for enterprise in the teeming population of China. He says, for instance, that the province of Shansi could supply the whole world with coal at the present rate of consumption for three thousand years. Once let the products of American farms, mills and workshops catch the Chinese fancy, and America need look no further for a market. Railways, he believes, will be most popular, although at first chiefly for freight.

CHINESE RAILS AS AN INVESTMENT.

The first China railway between Taku and the Kaiping coal mines has been extended to Tientsin and Pekin, and to Shang-Hai-Kwang. It now pays 14 per cent., and when the whole line is open they expect it will pay 30 per cent.:—

There are at present only about 400 miles of railroad open to traffic throughout the whole country, and all the lines building and projected foot up to 5,000 or 6,000 miles more. China proper covers about as many square miles as the States east of the Mississippi. Those States, with a population of 50,000,000, require 100,000 miles of railroad to do their business. China, with a population eight times as large, would naturally be supposed to need at least about an equal mileage of roads for her purposes. It would not be strange if the activity in railroad construction in the United States soon after the Civil War should find a parallel in China in coming years.

CHINA AS COMPARED WITH EUROPE.

As to the area and population of China, his Excellency says:—

The Province of Szechuen can muster more able-bodied men than the German Empire. The Province of Shantung can boast of as many native-born sons as France. Scatter all the inhabitants of Costa Rica or Nicaragua in Canton, and they would be completely lost in that city's surging throngs. Transport all the people of Chile into China and they would fill only a city of the first class.

The article concludes as follows :-

If the best guarantee of friendship is self-interest, surely the friendship of a nation of 400,000,000 people ought to be worth cultivating. China does not ask for much. She has no thought of territorial aggrandisement or self-glorification in any form; all she wants is gentle peace, sweet friendship, helpful exchange of benefits, and the generous application of that Golden Rule which people of all lands and all creeds must delight to follow.

THE BOXERS.

THE first July number of the Nouvelle Revue contains an interesting paper by M. de Pouvourville on the Boxers. The author hopes that the explanation of the causes of the anti-foreign outbreak in China may furnish also an indication of how the revolution may be quelled, and also how similar revolutions may be prevented in future. He traces the indignation of the Chinese Tories at the invasion of the foreign devils with their railway schemes, and shows how the secret societies of the Boxers, under the protection of Prince Tuan, and secretly countenanced by the Dowager Empress, first rose against the engineers of the Franco-Belgian railway, and so started a general movement against foreigners. M. de Pouvourville assures us that the connection of the word "Boxer" with boxing in the sense of the noble art of self-defence is a delusion. The sect, which is an offshoot of one of the two great secret societies in China, is called Kiaôtze, which signifies Society of Universal Harmony; the disorderly youths who fight in the streets are called Kiào, and from the confusion of these different but similar words has arisen the very false derivation. The outbreak is merely an incident in the eternal struggle between the yellow and the white man, and the railway concessions are merely a pretext for a revival of the contest which will only end, says M. de Pouvourville, either in the retreat of the white man or in the extermination of the yellow man.

A SECRET SOCIETY 2,500 YEARS OLD.

There are, as has always been said, only two secret societies in China of any importance-one for the North and one for the South; and the apparent multiplication of secret societies is due to the fact that any group of members belonging to one or other of the two secret societies are in the habit of taking a special name when they seek to accomplish some political design, in order that the parent society may not be compromised. So these so-called Boxers arose out of the determination to resist railway extensions. These Kiaôtze, as they should be called, emanate from the great Northern Secret Society, which is called Thiendianhien, known generally in Europe as the Society of the True Ancestor-this ancestor being heaven, "from which we all come, and in the bosom of which we shall all one day be restored." This society has existed for two thousand five hundred years, during which it has considerably changed its objects. It was at first a mystical organisation, and then it developed into a kind of Chinese Freemasonry designed to preserve the solidarity of the yellow race, and the Chinaman, even if he is not already a member of it, joins it the moment he decides to expatriate himself to the United States, or Singapore, or Ceylon, or Australia, or any other country of the foreign devil. His reason for doing so is that the society secures, in the event of his death, the return of his corpse to his native country, an essential object with them, for otherwise it would not be saved and restored to heaven, the True Ancestor, unless he were buried in Chinese soil. So that thus the very process of emigration which might seem the weakness makes for the strength of this remarkable society, which has developed from being a simple friendly society of Chinese into a definite alliance against white men. The Thiendianhien counts adherents all over China, but particularly in the North.

ANOTHER IN THE SOUTH.

The other secret society, which is better organised and infinitely more dangerous, is practically all powerful in the South; and M. de Pouvourville sees in it the great danger to French domination in Indo-China. It may be called the white Nénufar, and like the Northern Society it began in mysticism and developed into political tendencies. Now it has become absolutely revolutionary. having for its object the restoration of China to the Chinese, and to belong to it it is not necessary to be a

Enough has already been said to indicate that the objects of these two societies are irreconcilable, the Northern Society belonged the high Mandarins, the Ministers, and the members of the Imperial family, all of whom, like the great Li Hung Chang, are desirous of maintaining their own power, which is bound up in the existing order of things. The Southern Society, on the other hand, the bulk of whose adherents are Chinese of poor race, considers the present dynasty as usurpers, as indeed they are. It dreams of the fall of the present dynasty, and the substitution for it of a national royal family. Railways are a great terror to the Northern Society; but the Southern Society would utilise them for its own purposes.

NORTH AND SOUTH UNITING.

The white Nénufar is composed of ardent souls, wide-minded and intelligent people, who desire to have well-equipped armies, furnished with the most modern weapons, in order to preserve the national soil from the presence of the foreigner; and by foreigner the society means not only the white man, but the Manchu, the Tartar, and the Mongol from the North. At first the Nénufar did not think much of the Boxer outbreak; it supposed that it was an arranged rebellion started in order to consolidate the power of the Dowager Empress; but when it realised that the movement in the North was essentially anti-foreign, it prepared to make attacks upon foreigners, and revived its old dream of a Taeping Emperor at Nanking. It is terrible, in view of what has happened, to read M. de Pouvourville's confident prophecies. "It is impossible," he says, "to take seriously the hundred and twenty thousand men who played the bully before our Legations, and did not dare assail them, because there are in each of them an average of eighty European soldiers." The danger, he thought, lay more hidden in the national movement.

SECRET SOCIETIES AND GOVERNMENT IN CHINA.

IN the Revue des Revues for July 15th M. Francis Mury discusses the eternal Chinese question, which has once again cropped up. "And Europe as ever has once again cropped up. And Europe as ever has let herself be overtaken by events which had long been foretold her." M. Pichon, French Ambassador in Pekin, appears repeatedly to have called the attention of his Government to the dangers threatening the Europeans. "When these lines appear," said M. Mury, writing probably in late June or early July, "it is highly probable that not a single white man will be left in The European Governments could not have had the least idea of the Chinese character if they did not realise the necessity of protecting their subjects against the outburst of rage certain to follow the constructions and the taking of ports. "It is 20,000 men who ought to have marched immediately upon Pekin under Lord Seymour, and not 1,500."

CONTEMPT FOR ARMIES.

Most travellers manage to pass through China and know no more about its people than if they had stayed at home. "Because the Celestials think and act differently from ourselves they have always considered them as an inferior race, refusing to admit that some of their ideas and customs are quite as good as ours, and that the in lose n are so of us letter Eu she w has l temp much are n would not 1 soldi make Angl neve To to T whos the s

T

Wat

to t

to t ging Wat of h "W prer the can the eith que wife agr and oth

> the Soc me rec me the the Do dir sys cos

ind

pac cor int SOF the exi

political utionary, to the to be a hat the ole. To rins, the family, ng, are hich is The f whose present ams of n for it t terror would souls. o have nodern from er the t the North. Boxer bellion wager in the make of a iew of contake who dare erage ught, INA.

ancis
has been r
in
the fury, ighly ft in have

and yed difhem heir

inst

ions

ught

_ord

the inhabitants of the Celestial Empire would frequently lose much by changing their habits for those of which we are so proud." The Chinese, in their turn, think no better of us than we of them, in proof of which a most curious letter is quoted from a Chinese dignitary to his Emperor.

Europe, by showing the Chinese her mailed fist, thought she was going to terrify them into obedience. The result has been to earn for herself unlimited hatred and contempt. The Chinese, M. Mury says, despise nothing so much as war and men of war. "The Chinese armies are nothing but a rabble of rogues and plunderers who would find nothing to do anywhere. . Good iron is not used to make nails, nor a brave man to make a soldier, says a Chinese proverb." M. Mury proceeds to make the severest remarks upon the conduct of the Anglo-French expedition of 1860. The Chinese have never forgiven us the destruction of the Summer Palace. To this day the memory of it is used as a lash to whip up popular fury against the Europeans, whose destruction became the avowed object of the secret societies.

THE FEMALE FACTOR.

The most ancient secret society, that of the "White Waterlily," has been trying unsuccessfully since 1850 to upset the Tartar dynasty. Many women belong to this society, and they have often raised the flagging spirits of the men and led them on to battle. In China even a despised woman, if she belongs to the Waterlily Society, and her admission has preceded that of her husband, becomes the real head of the household. "Whether he likes it or not, the husband must yield his prerogatives to his wife. This rule naturally attracts to the Association a great number of women whose devotion can be absolutely counted upon; and as these women on the day of their admission take an oath never to tell either their parents or their husband, the latter is frequently astounded to learn on joining the society that his wife is there before him," a surprise which can hardly be agreeable to the poor Chinee. This society appears to have its own military and administrative organisation, and even a king in each province, who, as far as the other Waterlily societies are concerned, is absolutely independent. independent.

THE ONLY ALTERNATIVES.

The Boxers, who would be greatly astonished to know they were so called, are ostensibly members of the Society of the True and the Ideal, but in reality they are mere brigands. "The worse the reputation of the new recruits, the more welcome they are. The leaders are men of some education, weary of waiting for a place in the administration, or military mandarins who have left the army." M. Mury attributes the recent riots to the Dowager Empress, but scouts the idea that Prince Tuan directs the Boxers. The curse of China is the mandarin system. M. Mury concludes:—

What will the nations interested do when at the price of costly sacrifices of men and money they have apparently pacified China? Mistrusting one another, they will doubtless content themselves with some illusory satisfaction, and the international troops will retire, leaving the Chinese more embittered, more dangerous than ever for foreigners. Then some years later, when the Celestials have had time to convince themselves that it is they in reality who have expelled the Western Devils, fresh massacres will require a fresh intervention.

Well, I consider it criminal for the Governments in question to send their subjects to China as long as such a state of things exists . . . . If Europe, Japan, and the United States do not agree to transform China, there will be but one solution: to do what China wishes, draw an impassable circle round her, isolate her from the world, erase her from the map.

MISSIONS AND MISSIONARIES IN CHINA.

MR. POULTNEY BIGELOW, who has made two visits to China at intervals of twenty-one years, writes a very interesting article in the North American Review on the missionary question from a very independent standpoint. He describes the interesting Archimandrite of the Greek Church, Father Paladius, who had charge of the Russian Mission in Pekin. He was an Epicurean in a Chinese pigtail. He said that after being forty years in China he believed that he had made one Chinese convert, but he would not like to be certain of that one. As for the American missionaries, he regarded them as enthusiastic babies. Mr. Bigelow says that these missionaries are full of confidence, that they have made a large number of converts, and that China was being rapidly prepared for a great Christian awakening. He quotes one Doctor Corbett, who had been thirty-six years in China: "He told me that when he went travelling up and down Shantung he was received like any other traveller! Mr. Bigelow pays high tribute to the courage, and devotion and the lofty ideals stamped on the faces of the English and American missionaries.

He also visited the Jesuit stations. He says that their methods are very different from those either of the Russians or any of the others. Their success lies not so much in preaching things spiritual as in demonstrating the power of the white man as compared with the yellow. It is a combination of science and Catholicism for the overthrow of Buddha and Confucius. It is the Jesuits who are the weather prophets of the Far East. They have a well-equipped observatory connected by wire with many of the stations in the Eastern seas, and thus they can foretell the arrival of typhoons. The Jesuit does not attempt to overturn the faith of the Chinese; he merely attempts to modify and Christianise the local religions:

The Jesuit tells the learned Chinaman that Confucius was practically a Christian so far as his moral philosophy is concerned, and that Buddhism has many good points, but that the Roman Catholic is the religion which embodies what is good in every system, with the additional advantage of having expelled what was idolatrous.

Mr. Bigelow gives a vivid account of the way in which popular hostility is excited against the Christians by horrible posters which profess to show how missionaries scoop out Chinamen's eyes and practise all kinds of abominations. He thinks that the agitation against missionaries is actively though secretly fomented by the government, who use the mob to murder missionaries and then plead innocence. He is all in favour of the mailed fist method of dealing with the Chinese Government. It is interesting to note that Mr. Bigelow thinks that England has been meek and mild in her dealings with the Chinese. He says:—

The Opium War, the Lorcha Arrow War, the Anglo-French Expedition of 1860—these and similar smaller enterprises were all undertaken to avenge gross breaches of the law of nations. The history of England's intercourse with China shows but too clearly that, so far from having misused her strength in bullying a weaker nation, she has, to an extraordinary extent, submitted to official insult and violation of treaty rights rather than have recourse to force.

Blackwood for August opens with Captain Haldane's story "How we Escaped from Pretoria," which breaks off at the critical moment "to be continued" in a later issue. Mr. Wilfrid Sparroy urges that Britain should make use of the friendship cherished for us by the elder brother of the Shah, Governor-General of Ispahan, as a countervailing influence to Russia. His interests, ours, and his august brother's are pronounced to be identical.

THE ESSENCE OF CHINESE CIVILISATION.

MR. D. Z. SHEFFIELD, who was formerly president of the North China College, contributes to the Forum for July a very interesting article entitled "Chinese Civilisation: the Ideal and the Actual." The logic of the article is not very apparent, for its purpose is to explain, as something exceptional, the difference between the high ideals of Chinese religion and philosophy and the actual moral condition of the people, Mr. Sheffield apparently assuming that there is a greater difference between Chinese ideals and Chinese conduct than there is between Christian ideals and European conduct. This convenient assumption Mr. Sheffield, of course, does nothing to prove. His article, nevertheless, so far as it is confined to mere exposition, is very interesting.

THE CAUSE OF STAGNATION.

Mr. Sheffield attributes the arrested development of the Chinese to several causes, the first of which is the isolation of China from the other centres of civilisation. The supreme honour paid to the sages or holy men is another cause. The Chinese regard their sages as possessed of perfect knowledge and virtue, and their teachings and example are accepted as infallible:—

The result has been to create out of the teachings of the sages a vast social mould, into which the Chinese mind has been continuously poured, to take on the same unvarying type of thought

CONFUCIANISM.

The system of Confucian education is a third cause that has operated to give to Chinese civilisation a fixed and rigid form. Learning has always been honoured in China. It has been the one open door through which all classes of the people could attain to honour and to official rank. But learning has been confined within narrow lines. The teachings of the sages have been gathered into the "Thirteen Classics," or, more exactly, the "Thirteen Scriptures." These Scriptures are literally the road along which men must pass who are inquiring after truth. This classical literature, including commentaries from the hands of later scholars, contains the sum of Chinese learning.

ANCESTOR WORSHIP.

Ancestor worship has had the same effect:—
Again, the system of Ancestor-worship has helped to stamp the thoughts and customs of China in its formative period upon the life of the people in subsequent ages. This peculiar cult had assumed definite form twenty-two centuries before Christ, and the ceremonies of worship then existing have undergone but little modification down to the present time. The ancient classical writings imply, and in passages definitely teach, the conscious existence of the spirits of the departed, and their presence with the living, especially when the ceremonies of worship are observed. That Confucius had no clear notion of a conscious life beyond the present is made evident by his answer to his disciple's inquiry concerning death, "Not knowing life, how can I know death?" In the centuries subsequent to Confucius, philosophical writers, in their explanation of the evolution of nature—without conscious departure from the teachings of the Ancients—rejected the thought of continued conscious existence after death, but still laid stress upon the duty of worship

BUSINESS-LIKE MORALS.

Mr. Sheffield thinks that Chinese morals are founded on expediency, and he seems to think that in this respect also the Chinese are exceptional:—

There is much business honesty in China, but the root of that honesty is not fidelity to fundamental convictions of right; it is rather a strong sense of business responsibility, a realisation that "honesty is the best policy," and that failure to meet obligations will bring exposure and loss. The larger the transactions the greater the responsibilities, and the stronger and more numerous the checks against dishonest dealing. Thus, as business increases in importance the quality of business integrity improves, but the humble huckster who has a "moving price" for his wares, according to the shrewdness or gullibility of his customers, is at heart as honest a man as the prosperous merchant who sells at "one price" to all customers. The vast volume of trade in China does not rest for security upon mutual confidence in character, but upon mutual dependence.

It is to be hoped that the European Powers, after their present lesson, will adopt the Chinese principles, and deal with China on the basis that "honesty is the best policy." Mr. Sheffield does not fail to add that Christianity is the only thing that can save China. To which the Chinaman might reply that his Christianisers admitted that he had at least a system of morals founded on prudence, whereas the Christian peoples had lately shown that they had neither morals nor prudence.

IN PRAISE OF THE CHINESE.

THE FICTION OF WESTERN SUPERIORITY.

MR. CHARLES JOHNSTON writing in the North American Review on "The Struggle for Reform in China," gives a more detailed account of the various reforms attempted by the Emperor than I have yet seen. Mr. Johnston believes in the Chinese, and thinks that in many respects they are superior to the Western nations.

CHINESE SUPERIORITY IN ART.

He says that even now their arts and crafts are in many things so superior to ours that we buy as ornaments things which they destined merely for common use. For the Japanese and Chinese artizan is an artist, and in this they are a century ahead of their Western critics. He praises the Emperor, and declares that he might sit as a model for some Oriental saint on the threshold of the highest beatitude.

IN RELIGION.

As for the inherent superiority of the West, he declares it to be a fiction:—

The West is superior in combative and destructive elements the very things which the religion of the West has been trying to eradicate for two thousand years; so that, even from a Western point of view, Europe's material victory is a moral defeat.

IN LITERARY CULTURE.

Speaking of the devotion of the Chinese to intellectual training, the following passage is well worth remembering:—

It is hard to tell which we should most admire, the genuine enthusiasm of all China for literary culture, for familiarity with the highest thoughts and noblest words of the sages, or the marvellous ingenuity and precision with which this knowledge is tested by a system of examinations hardly equalled, and never surpassed, by any nation in the world—the vast halls, with their cloister-like divisions for ten thousand candidates; the seals set on the doors before the papers are given out; the counted sheets of stamped paper with name and number for the essays and poems of each candidate; the army of clerks copying the themes in red ink, lest any personal sign or mark should lead the examiner to recognise a favoured pupil; the enthusiastic crowds gathering at the doors; the cannons and music which greet the candidates first to come forth; the literary chancellor ceremoniously presiding; the lists of the successful eagerly bought up in the streets; the chosen essays and poems sent to Court for the delectation of the Emperor; the gold-buttoned caps and blue silk gowns of the graduates; and, lastly, the almost pathetic provision that whoever continues without success to try for any degree until his eightieth year shall receive it free from the Emperor himself, as a reward for faithful love of learning.

HOW JAPAN MIGHT HELP CHINA.

The Emperor, Mr. Johnston says, proposed to ask Japan to lend China a band of trained students who should Japan's foreign might of guidant Empress lady, a awaken says:—
The s

event; a vast au officers, sidise C with a marvelle best m swampi mercial outward well be

Mr. V Magaz
Centur
princip
Easter
observ city w
These Empir
also ir age a workn

The but its the un clearly sugges origingunpo passed tion of spans fifty fe spans

The having was w howev are al too m
with bridg

Orient Unformation to the he has turied The transfer of the tr

then

rs, is at lo sells rade in more in sells retheir la sells rade in more in sells retheir la sells retheir la wares.

that To nisers inded lately

ves a pted ston pects

e in ents For this He is a the ts—g to tern

ine ine ith the e is ver eir set nd nes he ds he reht for ad

k

ets

should introduce the Western civilisation into China. Japan's naturally ally was China, and the designs of foreign nations could only be withstood by the material might of China acting under the moral and intellectual guidance of Japan. For the moment he thinks that the Empress Dowager is in the ascendant, but she is an old lady, and if he survives her we may anticipate an awakening of China that will astonish the world. He says:—

The success of the young Emperor's plans is quite a probable event; and that success will mean a huge revenue for China; a vast army and fleet on the most modern models, with skilled officers, probably Japanese; a quite unlimited power to subsidise Chinese manufacture against all the world's competition, with a working class of hundreds of millions ready to accept marvellously low wages and quick to master the cheapest and best methods. In a word, it would mean the possible swamping of Western lands, in a military as well as a commercial sense. So that the policy of the door which may open outwards is about the most dangerous for the West that could well be conceived.

CHINESE AS ENGINEERS.

THERE is nothing new, we are told, under the sun, and Mr. Wm. Barclay Parsons in the July Engineering Magazine gives yet another illustration of the old adage. Centuries ago the Chinese were acquainted with the principles of good engineering design. In that far Eastern land the structures that impress the engineering observer most strongly are the bridges, the pagodas, the city walls, and certain details of building construction. These are found not only in the portions of the vast Empire into which foreign ideas have penetrated, but also in the unexplored interior, and of such self-evident age as to stamp them as genuinely Chinese both in workmanship and plan.

THE "ROMAN" ARCH.

The arch is generally believed to be of Roman origin, but its general use throughout China, and the undoubted antiquity of so many of the existing examples clearly demonstrate that it long antedates any possible foreign suggestions, and go a long way to establish it as of Chinese origin—a development, however, which, like printing and gunpowder and so many other inventions and discoveries, never passed beyond the national borders. . . The largest application of the arch principle is in the building of bridges, where spans of thirty or forty feet are common, while single spans of fifty feet are seen, and larger ones probably exist.

Mr. Parsons is full of praise for the structure and design of these bridges; but speaking of the most remarkable bridge he saw, a wooden cantilever, consisting of six spans, he says:—

The superstructure is not so old as the substructure, the timber having been undoubtedly replaced, possibly many times; but it was when visited in horrible condition of decay. It will stand, however, without repairs or attention—as all structures in China are allowed to do—until some day an extra-large crowd will be too much for the rotten timbers to hold up, and it will collapse with great loss of life.

From the point of view of artistic and essentially Oriental design the pagoda possesses the greatest interest. Unfortunately, with few exceptions, the large ones are being allowed to crumble to decay. They range from 100 to 200 feet in height, and are always composed of an odd number of stories. Not even in the latest innovation in house-building can the Western architect pretend that he has discovered anything which was not known centuries ago in the Far East. Mr. Parsons says:—

The method of putting up buildings with a rigid frame, and then encasing them with thin masonry walls, is supposed to be something essentially American; but, like so many designs claimed as modern, it finds a universal application all over China. Although the Chinaman has everywhere at hand brick-making clay, the product is not good, owing to his unfortunate tendency to over-economy, which in this particular case takes the form of insufficient burning. To give sufficient rigidity, house walls have to be made thick, and thick walls he found, as we have found, encroach seriously on floor space; therefore, he has developed "cage construction." The materials employed are usually round timbers, connected by mortise and pin joints, while the roof truss is a peculiar and ingenious combination of beams, taking load near the abutments only.

THE GREAT WALL.

Peculiarly interesting just now is the mention of the Great Wall, with its length of 1,500 miles, crossing wild hills and desert valleys, with its keeps and arched gateways, with its parapets and moats. Mr. Parsons penned his article before the outburst in China, which has destroyed, for some time at any rate, all hopes of introducing Western methods in engineering practice, but what he says of the Chinese as engineers will always remain true.

OPPORTUNITY FOR WESTERN ENTERPRISE

Undoubtedly the Chinaman has been a great engineer in the past; but will he let things rest as they are, or will he set about to learn the newer forms of applied science, especially in the direction in which he is most deficient —improved and modern methods of transportation? Mr. Parsons thinks he will remain where he is. He can construct bridges, pagodas and walls, but cannot make a machine the basal principle of which is movement. In this field the ground lies unbroken and the soil is rich. The author points out the peculiar circumstance that the Chinese, who are so strongly economical, are absolutely lacking in the idea of economy of movement:—

The development that is to come will be, therefore, along this line, and will show itself primarily in methods of moving people and goods—namely, in means of transportation; secondly, in the methods of moving the great untouched mineral wealth from its existing subterranean hiding-places to the surface—that is, in mining; and thirdly, in all matters of construction whose parts are moving—namely, machines.

The Origin of "Rule Britannia."

"Songs of the Sea" form the subject of an instructive sketch by Alan Walters in Temple Bar for August. He claims that England is richer in sea songs than any other country. Dutchman and German and Norseman and Dane have only a few. And "who ever heard of a French sea song worthy the name?" We are told of the earlier composers. But:—

We possessed no real national song of the sea until James Thomson received a commission to write words for a musical medley at the Prince of Wales's private theatre, at Cliefden, in Buckinghamshire, on the 1st of August, 1740. The result was "Rule Britannia," set to music by Arne, and touched up afterwards by Lord Bolingbroke. So the watchword song of Britons all over the earth was written to the order of a prince who had no English sympathies, and whose nautical knowledge was bounded by trips from Whitehall to Twickenham, in company with pretty ambassadresses.

Charles Dibdin, who wrote 1,300 songs—the best numbering only a score—was the "Tyrtæus of our fleet"; yet he made some glaring mistakes, and his ideal of a seaman was "hopelessly unreal." The writer inquires why Scott or Wilson or Southey never wrote a sea song, but left the task to the Dibdins. He fears that the age of sea songs is past.

GERMAN ENTERPRISE AT KIAO CHAU.

GERMANY has been a good deal reproached for her action in beginning the partition of China. But whatever may be said of the morality of her seizure of Kiao Chau, there is no doubt that she has made the best of her new possession. Mr. Charles Denby, late Secretary of Legation in China, contributes to the Forum for July a very interesting article, in which he describes the policy of Germany in China since 1898. Shantung, Mr. Denby points out, was the only maritime province in which Germany could have obtained a port without trenching on the interests of the other European Powers, and England's agreement not to extend her railways from Wei-Hai-Wei is a practical recognition of the fact that all Shantung comes within the sphere of Germany.

PUBLIC WORKS.

What has Germany done to justify her possession of Kiao Chau? She is building a great breakwater inside the bay which will afford the best harbour between Hong Kong and Port Arthur. Public works are being carried on on a most comprehensive plan, and millions of marks are being spent. Five millions of marks were voted for Kiao Chau in 1898, eight millions in 1899, and a larger sum is contemplated for this year. With this money roads are being built, a system of sewage is under way, bridges are being built, harbours improved, channels buoyed, and lighthouses erected. Foresters have been brought from Germany to restore the vegetation on the denuded hills :-

Besides the money spent by the German Government itself, encouragement has been given to a number of syndicates to take up enterprises in Shantung. The breakwater now under construction at the cost of millions of marks is the work of a Another syndicate has contracted to build a railroad from Tsingtau to the coal-field at Wei Hsien, about 100 miles distant, in two years, and thence to Chinanta, 150 miles further, in two years more. Here the road will connect with the Tientsin-Chinkiang trunk-line, for which an Anglo-German syndicate has a concession.

THE EFFECT ON THE NATIVES.

But better than all this is the effect upon the native population. Mr. Denby says :-

There is no country in the world in which poverty means such absolute destitution as in China; and the necessities of human life, under the stress of adversity, come nearer to zero here than the Western mind can conceive. At present, with German money freely spent, plenty prevails; work being easy to find and labour well paid. American flour has usurped the place of the sweet potato as the staple article of food. In German Shantung all have enough to eat, while those in other parts of the province are threatened with terrible famine.

GERMANY'S NATIVE SOLDIERS.

"The purpose of Germany," says Mr. Denby, "is commercial, not military. But the military side has not been neglected. The port is garrisoned by two thousand German troops, and experiments are being made in drilling Chinese :-

Since October 1st, 1899, they have now enlisted 125 men-100 foot and 25 horse—forming the nucleus of the Kaiser's first Chinese regiment. The Chinese enter eagerly into this service. Chinese regiment. The Chinese enter eagerly into this service. They receive eight Mexican dollars per month, with good food, good quarters, and clothing, which is far more than they could hope to obtain in any other employment. At first the promptness and accuracy of military drill are very trying to the Chinese. To be well set up and faultless in appearance, to obey instantly and precisely the orders given to them, are qualities about as un-Chinese as possible. It is a pleasure to see how an awkward coolle can be transformed into an alert, intelligent, and ready soldier, and this in less than two months.

The Germans assert that they can rely upon their troops, but they declare that no Chinese army, however well-drilled and armed, is dangerous unless led by foreigners. The Chinese recruits are all selected for physical soundness, and their powers of endurance have been remarked by all who came in contact with them. The new squad at Li-Tsun was marched 34 kilometres without any ill effects eight days after enlistment—an experiment which the officer in command admitted could not have been tried in Germany. As cavalry, however, the Chinaman does not seem to have proved a success.

The lack of inland water transit is the great defect of Kiao Chau. But the Germans think they can do anything with their railways. On the whole, Mr. Denby draws a very promising picture of German activity in China, and it is not very pleasant to contrast with it Wei-Hai-Wei, and reflect upon the distinction between Grabbing as a rational policy, and Grabbing without either morals or method.

THE MISSIONARY SCARE.

MR. ARNOLD WARD writes in the Nineteenth Century on the apprehensions excited in the native mind by the tactics of missionaries in Egypt. As an honest endeavour to make native opinion intelligible to us on this difficult question the following passage may be welcomed. To the native who can read both his own and European newspapers the situation, he says, probably presents itself thus :-

The archbishops and bishops who sit in the House of Lords, and therefore must have a considerable share in the government of the country, have exhorted the people of England to an enterprise having for its object the substitution of Christianity for all other religions all over the world. They are especially fired against Mohammedanism, an Oxford professor, one of those who last year entertained the Governor-General of the Soudan, having described it in a popular sermon as the triumph of Satan. As for Egypt, a bishop has told the people that God has given it to England for the express purpose of its conversion to Christianity. The missionaries in Egypt and the Soudan report that this is a very easy task. Prayers are offered up in all the churches for the conversion of and other infidels. In these prayers the Prime Minister and other members of the Government join. The former, the head of the secular Government in England, has attended a missionary meeting, has moved the resolution of thankfulness for the result of missionary labours, describes the Mohammedan religion as "mistaken" and as "terribly mutilated," admits that England's material conquests (including, of course, the conquest of the Soudan) are undoubtedly an invitation from Providence to take advantage of the means of spreading the Gospel, and looks forward through the co-operation of English secular civilisation to the ultimate victory of the missionary cause. To such a person, and there are many of this sort, it is evident, in spite of all disclaimers to the contrary, that the Church, the Government, and the people have united in one great conspiracy against the Mohammedan faith.

The writer's practical suggestions are these;—

In these circumstances, ought not the Church and the missionaries, from the bishops downwards, to exercise a somewhat greater degree of circumspection; to adopt, if possible, a more moderate tone towards Islam; to exact a more careful training of young missionaries, and to impress upon those who go out the political responsibilities which as British subjects they

THE most interesting article in the July number of the Monde Moderne is that on Westminster Abbey by A. Barthélemy. The palaces of the Champ de Mars form the subject of the article on the Exposition by Louis de J. H. Imperia eightee Edmun first, t interna was de chester Imperi Carlyle rialism Cromw lands a movem "the g the pu "Ocea

> To th which that al should divides We ha gone fa is the ideas ( every 1 trouble What scale, o children can con shall m to our s here th suggeste possesse order, d of patie give us when w social r tact, an Egy

when v A sto dry yea Egypt was un Thanks of the d was an people the stra their w and Ir hostili countr navies the c what Imper Imper

The

REORGANISATION OF EMPIRE.

"What Imperialism Means" is the title of a paper by J. H. Muirhead in the August Fortnightly. He finds Imperialism to be no new thing. It prevailed in the eighteenth and in the earlier part of the present century. Edmund Burke declared our dependencies to be "the first, the dearest, the most delicate objects of the internal policy of the Empire." The Imperial passion was depressed by the rise and dominance of the Manchester School. But as that school has declined, the Imperial idea has been on the ascendant. The name of Carlyle more than any other stands for the new Imperialism. He dwelt on the great Empire-builders, Cromwell and Frederick. He voiced the call of our lands across the sea. The early eighties saw the new movement attain depth and cohesion: then occurred "the great awakening that followed the death of Gordon," the publication of Seeley's "Expansion" and Froude's "Oceana."

SOCIAL STUDY OF SUBJECT RACES.

To the anti-Imperialist who enlarges on the crimes by which we acquired our Empire, Mr. Muirhead replies that altogether they do not amount to the crime we should commit by renouncing or abandoning it. He divides our task into the political and into the educational. We have not quite solved the political problem, but have gone far with the solution. But the infinitely greater task is the reconstruction of the moral, industrial and social ideas of four or five hundred million human beings in every grade of culture. And so far "we have taken no trouble to understand the people we are educating":—

What is wanted is a Child Study Association on a large scale, of which every civil servant and teacher in India and Africa shall be members, for the sympathetic study of the children of our Empire. For of all the prophecies to which we can commit ourselves this surely is the least uncertain, that we shall make no headway, nor accomplish anything of any value to our subjects, to ourselves, or to the world, without it. It is here that our main problem lies, for it is just here, as already suggested, that the natural advantages we have hitherto possessed are likely to, fail us. So long as it is a question of order, discipline, administration, the Anglo-Saxon combination of patience and pluck, energy and adaptability to circumstances, give us probably an advantage over any other nation. It is when we come to more delicate tasks, such as education and social reconstruction, requiring higher refinements of insight, tact, and sympathy, that our national genius is apt to forsake us. This is, of course, no reason why we should despair of them

Egypt is quoted as an example of what we can do when we try, with this illustrative incident:—

A story is told of an English engineer who, in a particularly dry year, saved the crops of thousands of the people of Upper Egypt by his prompt energy and unremitting labour. Their joy was unbounded, and nothing would content them, at the great Thanksgiving that was held in consequence in the chief Mosque of the district, but that the Englishman should be present. This was an unheard-of thing, but such was the gratitude of the people that the most deep-rooted superstition was overcome, and the stranger not only was permitted, but compelled, to share in their worship. Religion and science were for once reconciled.

THREE ESSENTIALS.

The Quarterly Review, in a paper on domestic parties and Imperial Government, argues that in face of German hostility and naval ambition "it is now necessary for this country to be prepared to meet and crush the allied navies of the three strongest and richest Powers in the continent of Europe." The writer lays stress on what he calls three "essentials of any approach to Imperial safety": a clear and consistent policy on all Imperial questions: full recognition of the place of the "great daughter-states" in the guidance of Imperial policy: an accepted plan for the organisation of the resources, naval and military, of all parts of the Empire. To promote the first object—the withdrawal of the party system from the Imperial sphere—the writer approves the suggestion that Lord Rosebery should succeed Lord Salisbury at the Foreign Office.

AN IMPERIAL COUNCIL.

To serve the second aim, "the close of the present war should be followed, as speedily as may be, by the summoning of an Imperial conference" to give expression to Colonial opinion on the settlement of South Africa, and to agree upon the character of Imperial defences required, as well as on the proportions of aid in men and money to come from each State in the Empire. The writer holds that no smaller changes could be made in the joint administration of Empire than are suggested by the defence committee:—

There should be formed an Imperial Council, consisting of members appointed by the United Kingdom and by the three great groups of self-governing Colonies—North American, Australasian and South African. This would not be a large body. The suggestion is that it should include—on the part of the United Kingdom, the Indian Empire and the Crown Colonies—the Prime Minister, the Secretaries of State for Foreign Affairs, War, Colonies and India, the First Lord of the Admiralty, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Each of the great groups of self-governing Colonies would send its direct representative.

COLONIES IN THE CABINET.

The writer also says :-

There is a good deal to be said for the proposal, which has occasionally been put forward, that standing Colonial representatives should be admitted to the meetings of the Imperial Cabinet at all times when foreign affairs are under its consideration, or should be regularly, and as of right, taken into consultation by the Foreign Secretary in all matters affecting Colonial interests. . . The voices even of Radical cavil against a firm and clear Imperial line will be, if not stilled, reduced in number and shrillness by the evidence that such a line has been taken up and is being pursued with the approval of the chosen plenipotentiary representatives of the profoundly democratic daughter-states of the Empire.

LEAGUE v. FEDERATION.

While the Conservative Quarterly boldly welcomes a policy of drastic innovation, the Edinburgh adopts a much more cautious line. It draws a great distinction between Colonial and Imperial Federation; and argues that Dominion and Commonwealth do not destroy the distance that parts us from a similarly federated empire. The writer says:—

What is needed among the various States within the Empire is consultation inter sg, rather than joint control; and the true ideal at which to aim would seem to be rather a great British League under one sovereign and flag than a Supreme Federal Government. At present it is surely wiser to let The Constitution grow as heretofore by usage, and by positive reforms based on experience, rather than to attempt in pursuance of a great idea fundamental changes in a system full no doubt of theoretical imperfections, but which nevertheless works surprisingly well.

THE SETTLEMENT OF SOUTH AFRICA.

The official announcement that 15,000 of the soldiers now in the theatre of war are expected to remain as colonists goes beyond Mr. H. A. Bryden's plea in the Fortnightly that 10,000 should be settled on the soil. He urges that half a million sterling would not be too much to spend in State-aided emigration. He sees plainly that "unless the country can be peopled with a permanent rural British population, in fifty years' time the Boer may be . , , master of the situation."

ľ

XUM

on their however led by ted for ice have h them. ometres

ed could owever, ecess. efect of can do Denby with it etween without by the eavour ifficult to To ropean resents to an etianity ecially one of of the iumph é that of its t and ers are Turks inister ormer, ded a ormer, ded a ulness medan dmits

e, the
from g the nglish onary ort, it

the omeole, a reful who they

t the

the A. orm de

PLANS OF MILITARY RECONSTRUCTION.

(1) THE BITTER NEED OF IT.

"HAVING eyes they see not," is the mournful verdict of "An Englishman" in the National Review on our authorities. The Government is apathetic, the Press is silent. The self-deception of the nation is symptomatic of moral decay.

FRENCH NAVY AND ARMY READY.

The writer calls attention to "grave dangers" of imminent urgency:—

The first arises from the presence in the Channel, for, I believe, the first time in history, of a French naval force equal if not superior to our fighting strength in home waters. At this actual moment the French have at Cherbourg and Brest no less than eighteen battleships and fourteen cruisers, all modern or modernised throughout; that is to say, where the ships are of antiquated construction, rebuilt, reboilered, and brought well up to date. Britain has at this moment twenty-five battleships and twenty-three cruisers in commission in home waters, but when we look into our own catalogue of battleships the greatest misgivings may be felt. Not only are fifteen out of the twenty-five of antiquated design, too often with old boilers, and a great amount of inflammable wood in their hulls, but actually, as I have said already, four of our vessels carry the muzzle loader as part, if not the main part, of their armament. And whereas in the French fleet there is an officer in command, Admiral Gervais, who has for years been preparing himself for the special task of directing the combined French squadrons in the event of war with England, and who has made himself familiar with the capacity of the ships and the officers under his control, it is impossible to discern that we have in England any such "Admiralissimo."

But not only is there a great French fleet in the Channel; there is also a great French army, not far short of 200,000 men, mobilised at Chartres, which, as a study of any good map will show, lies conveniently near the Channel ports.

OUR SOUTH AFRICAN ARMY DISAPPEARING.

To meet which we have a mere mob of half-trained men. The second danger is this:—

With the close of the war in South Africa and the expiration of a year from the date of enlistment of the special volunteer forces, our army at the seat of war will all but vanish.

There will be just over 60,000 men left, all of whom will be wanted in South Africa for another six months, and 50,000 for very much longer. What are we putting in their place?

A period of wars, not of profound peace, is before us, and before many years—perhaps before many months—have passed we shall have to fight as we fought of old, in the dim, forgotten days, for our very existence.

To make service less unpopular, the writer suggests the extension of the Workmen's Compensation Act to soldiers as employés of the State. "An Englishman" fears that only grave national misfortune will awake the nation.

OUR NAVAL FORCE DEFECTIVE.

Sir John C. R. Colomb in the Fortnightly complains that-

While both the United States and Germany are able to produce marine battalions promptly over sea wherever necessary, we cannot. . . This is the first time in the last century and a half of our history that a state of war finds us unable to produce in South Africa, China, or anywhere over sea, a marine brigade, or even a battalion or complete battery of marine artillery.

"INCREDIBLE" STUPIDITY.

In the August Cornhill Mr. Moorhead concludes his experiences with a Boer ambulance in Natal. He gives a vivid expression to the dismay he felt in witnessing the defeat of General Buller's forces on December 15th. He exclaims:—

I find myself wondering what on earth these men could have been doing so close to the river, and what they expected to do there—surely not to cross! surely not an attack against hillsful of Boers who were not even being shelled; but so it turned out to be, though where they were to have got through puzzled me, for the river was swirling, brown and muddy, in flood. . . . . . From all sides we heard how the troops had packed up their camp early that morning, firmly convinced that as their bombardment had not been replied to there lay only a simple march into Ladysmith before them; how General Hart had marched along in quarter column with shouldered arms till he was within a few hundred yards of the hidden Boers; in fact, detail after detail pointing to a most incredible state of things. Well might the old Boers laugh and say, "They are a foolish people these English in fight, and do most stupid things."

"EVERY CONCEIVABLE BLUNDER."

At the base hospital, he met "every German in the neighbourhood." He says :--

They were all unanimous in cursing the ignorance and stupidity of the Boers, and their low mean cunning, and in marvelling at the stupidity of the English generals.

Another doctor who had been stationed near Fort Wyllic told me that the French colonel had delivered a lecture after the battle was over to an admiring audience, pointing out how the British had committed every blunder in the battle that could conceivably be made, and that all that had been necessary to complete their defeat had been a counter attack on their disorganised left which the Boers absolutely refused to attempt.

MEDICAL UNDERSTAFFING.

Sir Walter Foster reviews in the Contemporary the history of the Hospital Scandals in South Africa. He says:—

Whilst the nation did everything possible, humanly speaking, there has been fault somewhere which must be investigated to the bottom. The R.A.M.C. is not (in my opinion) responsible, nor are the civil surgeons and staffs sent out to help them. But surely it is a little noteworthy as an example of the maladministration of the War Office that even at the present time, when we have the greatest army in the field that ever fought for this country, the R.A.M.C. all told should number less than was declared by fa late Director-General (Sir Thomas Crawford) to be "perilously low for a peace establishment." No wonder there were not enough officers of the R.A.M.C., even aided as they were by a more than equal number of civilian doctors, to meet the needs at Bloemfontein when the Stress was worst. It has recently been pointed out that the German Expeditionary force for China has 91 medical officers, as against 62, which is the number for a British force of equal strenorth.

(2) WHAT IS TO BE DONE.

THE Nineteenth Century gives nine pages of additional signatures of persons intending to join an association or vigilance committee, which is to fix public attention on "the lessons of the War." A public meeting is to be called to inaugurate it after the holiday season is over. The editor defines the "ordinary business principles" asked for as in the main, "(1) personal responsibility; (2) payment by results; and (3) promotion by merit." Seven papers are contributed on these three demands. Mr. Alfred Harmsworth is one of the writers, and laments that "we are suffering from a national self-sufficiency that is new and dangerous, especially dangerous in view of the growth of the United States and united Germany. Our people . . . are now the last among civilised folk to adopt new inventions, and we thereby lose all the new trades that arise out of these inventions."

The infantr present future at hom and the who ha

"He exercise Govern land, I select a America He wood Hardy horse se survive "A

Natal

content of the ton of one. pernici and by vanqui scoutin They i more s six pag five lim "the seems way ro

The tributes derived mention prone u and sp purpose in future Sever which a one in comfort three sidivided

Lord ment's

by Lor shown which we defence introdu the Go that "i is to be of enfor

INCREASE OF INFANTRY.

ing the r 15th.

ld have

ed to do

hillsful

ned out

led me.

up their ir bom-

e march narched

il after

Well

people

in the ce and

and in Wyllie e after ut how le that neces-

ack on ised to y the

. He

eaking,

ated to nsible.

e malt time, ght for

s than homas

ment."

M.C., ber of

en the fficers,

f equal tional

on or on on to be over.

ples "

ility; nerit." ands. nents

iency view nany.

olk to e new

The Earl of Northbrook finds the strength of "our infantry" proved to be insufficient, and urges that the present Militia Reserve should be abolished; that all future engagements for the Militia should be for service at home in time of peace and abroad in time of war; and that a real Militia Reserve should be formed of those who had completed their Militia engagements.

THE NEW WAR HORSE.

"How to breed Horses for War" is the question which exercises Mr. Wilfrid S. Blunt's pen. He would organise Government studs in Canada, West Australia, Basutoland, India, but not in the Home Country. He would select mares of hardy outdoor breeds, such as the South American breeds of Spanish origin, and Arab stallions. He would give the herd a wide range of poor land. Hardy ponies are wanted. The huge, well-fed cavalry horse suffers and dies where the pony, inured to hardship, survives.

A NEW DRILL-BOOK.

"A Staff Officer," who has been through every fight in Natal which led to the relief of Ladysmith, writes in the Contemporary on "The War and the Drill-book." A study of the casualty lists should, he holds, lead to a condemnation of the present Drill-book and the making of a new one. He condemns our peace-training as favouring the pernicious "Cult of the Bayonet," whereas it is by fire and by fire alone that an enemy must ordinarily be vanquished. Greater attention needs to be paid to scouting and to getting men quicker into the firing line. They must also be taught how to take to cover; and more space must be given to the art of flanking. Fortysix pages are now given to the frontal attack, and only five lines to other kinds of attack. The writer concludes, "the American Attaché's remark, on seeing Colenso, seems worth all the forty-six pages :-- 'Say, isn't there a way round?'

DOGS AND LIGHT TENTS.

The military critic of the Westminster Gazette contributes to the National Review a host of suggestions derived from South African experience. Two may be mentioned. For the supply of ammunition to men lying prone under fire human bearers are certain to be shot; and specially trained dogs are recommended for the purpose. Bell tents are a luxury which the soldier must in future contrive to do without:—

Several light and exceedingly portable tents have been devised which are in every way superior to the bell tent. I have seen one in particular which only weighs a few pounds, which will comfortably shelter three men, and which can be packed into three small packages of quite insignificant weight, and thus divided amongst the men who are to inhabit it.

COMPULSORY SERVICE; FOR-

Lord Newton deplores in the National the Government's rejection of the Militia Ballot Bill as "a case of paternal desertion." For it was brought forward in 1890 by Lord Lansdowne in time of peace, but when war had shown our weakness, this, "the one practical measure which would have given the country a real army for home defence," was not even alluded to. When it was again introduced last June by Lord Wemyss, it was disowned by the Government! The writer concludes with the remark that "if the present policy of the expansion of our Empire is to be continued the adoption of some modified system of enforced military service for home defence is not only desirable but unavoidable."

-AND AGAINST.

Vice-Admiral Sir Cyprian Bridge, late Director of the Naval Intelligence Department, states some facts and explodes some fancies about the old press-gang. It is a common idea that the navy was chiefly supplied with compulsory recruits. The writer explains that this was a mistake, due partly to confusion of two very different words. "A prest-man was really a man who received the prest of 12d. as a soldier when enlisted." Prestare meant to lend or give beforehand. Prest-men were thus voluntarily enlisted men! Coercion was employed by the press-gang; but only a small proportion of recruits-were thus obtained. In 1803, 37,000 volunteers came forward to serve, and only 2,000 were obtained by compulsion. The Vice-Admiral concludes:—

Compulsory service . . . failed completely to effect what had been expected of it. In the great days of old our fleet, after all, was manned, not by impressed men, but by volunteers. It was largely due to that that we became masters of the sea.

TO PREVENT HOSPITAL SCANDALS.

Mr. Arthur Stanley, M.P., suggests in the National Review that the difficulty be met by retaining the Royal Army Medical Corps as it at present exists, but adding a separate branch to deal solely with the organisation. He is very severe on the cruelty of understaffing, both to the patients and to the staff.

The Wedding-Ring Circle.

To commemorate the third volume of Round-About it has been decided to admit 12s. 6d. half-yearly subscribers until the members number 1,000. This will not interfere with the One Guinea annual subscription, which entitles the member to receive the monthly 32-paged post-bag, post free, to have the personality inserted in the list of members, to forward and receive private anonymous correspondence for twelve months, but will, it is hoped, enlarge the circle and its scope of usefulness. As has been frequently stated, the Wedding-Ring Circle was founded to enable lonely and scattered units of society to correspond and make friendships with each other-Many who are living dull and dreary lives in crowded cities and scattered villages would enjoy intellectual correspondence on subjects mutually interesting, not only for the sake of education but enjoyment, for the receipt by post of friendly greetings and terse remarks on timely topics adds interest to one's life and enlarges its horizon. The autumn and winter fireside loneliness quickly followsthe outdoor joys of a summer's day, and those who seek the intellectual companionship of one of the opposite sex can receive specimen copy of Round-About by sending stamped, addressed, foolscap envelope to the Conductor. Mowbray House, Norfolk Street, W.C.

The Royal Magazine.

A CAMERA having been invented (of course, by an American) to take in nearly as much as the human eye, Mr. Roderick Grey has made it the subject of the first article in the August Royal Magazine. Other articles are on "Royal Children and their Toys"—rather a dead-season subject—"The Medals our Generals Wear," and "A Dog's Toilet Club," instructive as showing how foolish idle people can manage to be. Mr. Charles Raytells us "How an Army Crosses a River," while all interested in the late Empress of Austria will turn to Mr. E. M. Lynch's paper, "The Future Rival of Monte Carlo," a description of her Corfu palace, the Achilleon.

BRITISH PRISONERS AT PRETORIA.

PAINFUL CHARGES AGAINST OUR OFFICERS.

MR. RICHARD HARDING DAVIS writes in Scribner on Pretoria in war time. He remarks on the calm of the Boers. He is struck with the great contrast between the composed acceptance of the war by the Boer and the Englishman's complete absorption in it. The Englishman reads, talks, thinks of nothing else. The Boer, with leisurely indifference, goes from farm to firing line and back again to farm almost at will, and only fights when he pleases. Mr. Davis says:—

I am convinced that throughout the war one man to ten has been the average proportion of Boer to Briton, and that frequently the British have been repulsed when their force outnumbered that of the Boers twenty to one. What terrible losses the burghers would have caused had they occupied the trenches in force is something the nations which next meditate going to war with modern magazine rifles should weigh deeply.

"A MISTAKE" WITH THE WHITE FLAG.

Here is an unpleasant incident even as charitably related by the Boers:—

At Spion Kop the attack on the hill was made by forty men, so few indeed, so they claim, that one of the English colonels surrendered, and then on seeing, when the Boers left cover, to what a small force he was opposed, threw down the white flag and cried, "No, we'll not surrender," and fired on the Boers who were coming up to receive his rifles. One can imagine what an outcry such an incident as this would have called forth from the English papers had it been the Boer who first raised the white flag and then thought better of it. But the comment the Boer made on this "treachery" was, "It was probably a mistake. Perhaps someone without authority raised the white flag, and the colonel did not know that. He wounded seventeen of our men, but I believe it was a mistake."

OFFICERS BUT NOT GENTLEMEN.

When the British officers arrived in captivity they were first accommodated in the Model School House, but were later removed to much less comfortable quarters in a distant camp. The grounds alleged for this removal make painful reading for any Briton who is concerned about the honour of his country. British officers, whatever the faults of their professional training, are at least supposed to be gentlemen. Yet this is what a friendly American reports of them:—

The Boers certainly provided much better accommodations for the officers than those to which their own men are accustomed either in the field or at home. . . . But the British officers, in their contempt for their captors, behaved in a most unsportsmanlike, ungentlemanly, and, for their own good, a most foolish manner. They drew offensive caricatures of the Boers over the walls of the school-house, destroyed the children's copy-books and text-books, which certainly was a silly performance and one showing no great sign of valour, and were rude and "cheeky" to the Boer officials, boasting of what their fellow-soldiers would do to them when they took Pretoria.

THEIR INSOLENCE TO WOMEN,

Their chief offence, however, was in speaking to and shouting at the ladies and young girls who walked past the school-house. Personally, I cannot see why being a prisoner would make me think I might speak to women I did not know; but some of the English officers apparently thought their new condition carried that privilege with it. I do not believe that every one of them misbehaved in this fashion, but it was true of so many that their misconduct brought discredit on all. Some people say that the young girls walked by for the express purpose of being spoken to; and a few undoubtedly did.... But, on the other hand, any number of older women, both Boer and English, have told me that they found it quite impossible to pass the school-house on account of the insulting remarks the officers on the veranda threw to one another concerning them, or made directly to them. At last the officers grew so offensive that a large number of ladies signed a petition and sent it to the Government complaining that the presence of the Englishmen in the heart of the town was a public nuisance, and in consequence of this they were removed from their comfortable quarters and sent to the camp.

One shudders to think that these are the men to whose tender mercies we propose to consign, under the plea of "military occupation," the life and honour of thousands of Dutch women. If officers act so as captives, how will they behave as conquerors?

A HUMILIATING SURPRISE.

When Mr. Davis went to see them at the camp, he says:—

The fact that I was accompanied by a Boer officer did not in the least deter them from abusing and ridiculing his countrymen to me in his presence, so that what little service I had planned to render them was made impossible. After they had sneered and jeered at the Boer official in my hearing, I could not very well turn around and ask him to grant them favours. It was a great surprise to me. I had thought the English officer would remain an officer under any circumstances. When one has refused to fight further with a rifle, it is not becoming to continue to fight with the tongue, nor to insult the man from whom you have begged for mercy. It is not, as Englishmen say, "playing the game." It is not "cricket." You cannot ask a man to spare your life, which is what surrendering really means, and then treat him as you would the gutter-snipe who runs to open the door of your hansom.

It is a humiliation to have British boorishness thus contrasted with Boer civility:—

Had the officers been decently civil to the Boers, which need not have been difficult for gentlemen—for I have never met an uncivil Boer—they might have been treated with even greater leniency.

INSULTING A WOUNDED BENEFACTOR.

Mr. Davis tells of a Free State Artillery officer, Captain Von Loosberg by name, who went wounded as as he was with head in bandages and arm in sling to return to some captive officers a Bible and two prayer-books found in their captured kit:—

But in spite of his reason for coming, one of them was so exceedingly insulting to him that Von Loosberg told the man that if he had him on the outside of the barbed-wire he would thrash him. His brother officers ordered the fellow to be quiet and hustled him away.

A PLEASANT FEATURE.

Mr. Davis was not blind to the good points about our officers. He says:—

What I liked best about them was their genuine and keen interest in the welfare of the Tommies of their several commands who were imprisoned at Waterval.

"Is it true they're sleeping on the ground?" they whispered.
"Do you know if they have decent medicines?" "Do they get their money?" "Won't you go and see them, and tell us how they are?"

It was good to find that most of them suffered for their men even more keenly, because unselfishly, than for themselves.

"DISTINGUISHED DONKEYS" is the title—tempting to small wits—of a sketch by W. A. George in the English Illustrated for August. He selects for distinction "Jacko," that draws the Queen's carriage; "Ned," that draws water from the well at Carisbrooke Castle; the white Arabian ass presented by Lord Kitchener to his Queen, the white pet donkey of the Parisian actress Mlle. Fleuron, the four which draw Baroness Burdett-Coutts' carriage, and the pet donkey of the Yorkshire regiment known as the "Green Howards."

bute inter Triu before capit tion

Lo

Profession the even In obsta deliri to pr

H

estat

I am has be canno in rec Greek their in Ca frighti egoism

Impe

the B
He
it is re
commothe inclains.
useful centur
art ar
Ducal
and of

I was barous Florer the nedependent have develor American

I m bring fortyfo persist

He

conclubecom greate: which state: their: Englan

WHY THE BOERS WILL TRIUMPH.

By Professor Lombroso.

PROFESSOR LOMBROSO, the Italian scientist, contributes to the North American Review for July a very interesting paper, which is entitled "The Ultimate Triumph of the Boers." Most of the article was written before Pretoria was occupied, but the capture of the capital of the Transvaal in no way modifies his conviction that the future belongs to the Dutch Afrikanders.

HINGOISM OUR DEATH WARRANT.

Looking at the problem from an historical point of view, Professor Lombroso sees the presage of England's ruin in the ascendency of military Imperialism. Our case is even worse than that of other nations:—

In Germany and France the Imperialist mania finds immense obstacles in the Socialistic parties. But against the Imperialistic delirium of the English there is no popular party strong enough to prevail. Imperialism may give a great fictitious strength to England, but in reality it will destroy the English system.

ENGLAND'S RESEMBLANCE TO ROME-

He thinks that England has fallen from her high estate and is no longer the champion of liberty among the nations. He says:—

I am aware that England, in itself, in its statutes and history, has been the greatest example of civilisation and liberty; but I cannot concede that it has given those boons to others, especially in recent times. They gave to the oppressed Armenians and Greeks only the succour of words; while, on the other hand, their Imperialism, obliging Malta to speak English, cultivating in Canada priest-made ignorance, allowing India to remain frightfully impoverished, proves to be Roman in its enormous egoism and arbitrary exercise of power.

-AND THE BOERS TO THE FLORENTINES.

If he finds a parallel to the Britain of to-day in Imperial Rome, he is at no loss to discover a parallel to the Boers in the Italian Peninsula. He says:—

He who studies the history of the Italian commonwealths, as it is revealed in the most recent documents, learns that the great commonwealths, certainly Venice, Florence, Siena, Lucca, were composed of pure and simple countrymen, some having escaped the incursions of the barbarians, others the cruelty of the castellains. Yet these gave us the greatest illumination, the most useful examples of liberty and of energy; moreover, not many centuries after their rise they dowered us with those marvels of art and poetry never as yet surpassed—Dante's poems, the Ducal Palace, Donatello's doors, the Cathedrals of St. Mark and of Siena.

I will admit that they have the appearance of being barbarous, but no more than had the Virginians of 1700 and the Florentines of 1100. It is not the irremediable barbarism of the negro or of the Bedouin, but a pseudo-barbarism, which, depending on agrarian conditions, will cease wholly when they have changed even slightly, giving place to such a rapid development of civilisation as occurred in Florence and North America.

HIS ASSURANCE OF VICTORY.

He admits that the fortunes of war are for the moment running strongly against the Boers, but he says:—

I maintain unshaken my belief in the power of freedom to bring to victory men selected, as were the Boers, against forces fortyfold their number. Even if England won, with the persistence of a year or two of war, I should not change my conclusions; because, on the one hand, the humble Boers have become the greatest heroes of the century, and are becoming the greatest martyrs to liberty. Up to this time, the only arts in which they have had exercise have been those of war and of state: and in these they have given really stupendous proofs of their ability. As to England, not to the dear and saintly England of Gladstone and Spencer, but to the corrupt England of Chamberlain and Rhodes, this evil enterprise in Africa will, even if successful, be fatal to her, because it strengthens the power and prestige of the most reactionary party, the Imperialistic.

IN SUPPORT OF PROFESSOR LOMBROSO.

In the same review Mr. Cronwright-Schreiner confirms the conclusions of Professor Lombroso. From examination of the situation in South Africa, he maintains that throughout South Africa the Dutch outnumber the British by 170,000, and their numerical superiority is even greater than these figures indicate, for there has been much intermarriage between Dutch and British, and almost without exception anybody with any Dutch blood in his veins is on the Dutch side. If we add to this the Britons who, like Mr. Cronwright-Schreiner, sympathise with the Dutch, the chances of a purely English-speaking ascendency in South Africa will be seen to be very small. If we annex the Republics we shall lose South Africa—that is the last word of Mr. Schreiner. The lines of the settlement which Mr. Schreiner favours are thus indicated:—

 Take complete control of the external relations of the Republics;

2. Fix a clear five years' retrospective franchise for both States, and place the Dutch and English languages on an equality:

3. Insist upon disarmament as to big guns and forts. Rifles should not be touched, and sufficient cannon (of size and number to be fixed) should be allowed, to quell the native risings.

Tommy on Crutches.

THIS is the title of a paper in the May Quiver by Rev. E. J. Hardy, Chaplain to Her Majesty's Forces, in the course of which he has several interesting remarks to make. He says, for instance, that—

The hasty methods of a modern campaign are shown by the short time that intervened between the going out of men, pronounced by doctors fit for anything, and their returning as the "wastage" of war, in some cases not fit ever again to earn their living.

Another fact which the Chaplain records is that-

The more of active service a man has seen, the less inclined he is to talk about it. I have known half a dozen Victoria Cross men, but never heard a battle yarn from one of them. I remember trying to draw from a friend who had distinguished himself in the battle of the Alma, where he had two horses killed under him, something as to his feelings and experiences in an engagement. All I could get from him was, "A battle is a very disagreeable place to be in. Come, and I'll show you my pigs." Some of the results of battle which I saw afterwards in hospital, enabled me to understand my old friend's willingness to speak of pigs, or of anything else, rather than of "glorious war."

The kindness of crippled soldiers to one another, and the levelling of race-prejudices between Boer and Briton when united in the common suffering of a hospital, are the redeeming touches in rather a sad article.

In the Cosmopolitan for July there are many articles of interest. Principal amongst these are A. H. Ford's on "Is Russia to Control All of Asia?" "Organised Thrift" by Vance Thompson, and "Modern College Education' by D. S. Jordan. There is a well illustrated article dealing with "A First View of the Exposition at Paris in 1900," by F. A. Kidder. The illustrations occupy practically the whole of the pages devoted to this article, and quite rightly, because they give an excellent idea of the appearance of France's great white elephant. The needs of noliday-makers are supplied by four short stories for midsummer reading.

he officers a petition resence of nuisance, om their ousande

how will amp, he

Intrymen planned sneered not very It was a er would one has continue hom you playing man to eans, and ich need met an greater to open

officer, ided as sling to prayerwas so the man ne would be quiet nd keen mmands nispered. they get lus how eir men

ting to English Jacko," draws white Queen, Mlle. Coutts' giment

COLOSSAL WHEAT COMBINE:

RUSSIA'S PROPOSAL TO THE UNITED STATES.

ONE of the most sensational disclosures of the month is that made by J. D. Whelpley in the August Fortnightly. It is entitled "An International Wheat Corner," and is described as "a heretofore secret chapter in the diplomatic history of the United States." The writer supplies "exact copies" of documents on file in the department at Washington, and gives details of the Russian proposals on the authority of the Russian officials who conceived them. The startling announcement runs as follows:—

On the morning of November 4th, 1896, the Russian Minister to the United States, Mr. Kotzebue, acting under instructions from his Government, proposed to the Hon. Richard H. Olney, then the American Secretary of State, that Russia and the United States should enter into a combine to corner the surplus wheat of the world for the purpose of raising the price of that cereal 100 per cent. As explained by the Russian Minister, this Government trust was to be created primarily for the benefit of the farmers of Russia and the United States, but it was believed that it would result in time to be of equal benefit to the wheat-producers of the entire world.

THE AMERICAN ANSWER.

Secretary Olney passed on the proposals to the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. J. Sterling Morton, who declined them rather emphatically, declaring that "the relation of supply and demand is the sole regulator of value." The matter was at once dropped by Russia as a diplomatic overture, but she has been busy accumulating facts and arguments against the belief in "supply and demand" as a decisive criterion. She has shown that, while the area and quantity of wheat grown advanced only 5 per cent. in 1882-1893 and the wheat-eating populations advanced II per cent. in number, with a steady increase of wheat consumption per head, the price of wheat dropped 50 per cent. In other words, although the demand exceeded the supply, prices fell by one half.

WHAT IT WOULD MEAN TO ENGLAND.

Russia still hopes to bring round the United States to her way of thinking. If she succeeds, Mr. Whelpley thus hints at the stupendous consequences:—

The possibilities of such a Government wheat trust as is proposed by Russia are startling. The wheat crop of the world in 1898 was 2,879,000,000 bushels. The price realised by the farmer is about fifty cents a bushel under ordinary conditions. Russia proposes to add nearly a billion and a half of dollars to the value of this wheat crop of the world. To the United States, producing 700,000,000 bushels, this would mean a gain of about 350,000,000 dols. to the agricultural districts. To the Russian farmers, producing about 400,000,000 bushels, it would mean a yearly gain of 200,000,000 dols., which would be nearly all net profit, as the consumption of wheat by the farmer bears small proportion to his production. On the other hand, to England, importing 125,000,000 bushels of wheat, it would mean an increase of over 60,000,000 dollars a year in her bread bill. The farmers of the United Kingdom would be benefited to the extent of 30,000,000 dols. by the increased price for their wheat, but the Russian American wheat trust would deal the English people the hardest blow of all. Upon France and Germany it would also fall heavily.

A NEW DIVISION OF MANKIND.

So serious, in fact, would it be to the wheat-importing countries, that it would soon constitute a bond of international sympathy which would ally the great wheat-importing countries as against those exporting. In the first group would come England, France, Germany, Belgium, Italy, Switzerland, the Netherlands, and many other smaller countries. In the opposing group would be Russia, Austria, Roumania and all of North and South America.

The vista of international politics opened up is indeed astounding. It suggests a reversion to the most primitive facts. The Powers that have the surplus stock of the world's food in their hands, if they stand together, need not proclaim war; they only need to proclaim—famine: and the rest of the world must yield—or fight for very life.

The writer does not expect the United States to consent to combine during the lifetime of the present generation. But he points out what an inducement is offered to the farmers of America and their agrarian party to respond to the advances of Russia.

THE ART OF DRESSING WELL.

A SLIGHTLY absurd discussion on this subject is carried on with great gravity in the Lady's Realm, the result being of course to leave matters just where they were before. There are two absolute essentials to being welldressed, money and taste; and two highly desirable adjuncts, time and thought. The general conclusions are not novel-we are too smart; we forget that welldressed people must be suitably dressed; money alone will not solve the problem of good dressing, and our neighbours across the Channel spend less and look much better than we do. But after reading the symposium, it is quite obvious that most women had better at once resign themselves to being hopeless guys, the minimum estimate being £50 a year to spend on dress. This, combined with taste, thought and much time, may save one from utter frumpishness. Another lady gives £100 as a minimum estimate for a good manager. The vexed question of whether women dress to please men or not is also raised, the conclusions being diametrically opposite. The Countess de la Warr, whose remarks are as sensible as any, observes :

To my mind the art of dressing well consists greatly in so having on the right dress for the occasion that no notice is taken of it. What spoils good dressing is that every one tries to dress against the other, and all want their particular dress to he remarked. It is quite a mistake to think that women dress for men to admire. To begin with, not one man in twenty ever looks into the detail of a lady's dress. As long as he sees nothing to offend the eye he takes no notice, and whether a dress has cost forty pounds or ten pounds is a matter of complete indifference to him. So, as I said, women do not dress to please men, but to please themselves, and to outvie each other and cause envy if they can among their friends. And this is why quiet dressing is so at a discount.

Comtesse de Montaigu has a novel suggestion to

In our colleges we have chairs of philosophy, psychology, painting, and music; why not also one dedicated to correct costuming, where young women may, along with other accomplishments, acquire the art of dressing well?

A woman to be well-dressed, according to this lady's ideas, would need to have little to do but to think of herself:—

She should make an exhaustive study of her own person, endeavour to enhance her good points and subjugate her defects. . . . . By a skilful shaping of garments the adipose female may appear almost sylph-like, while she of fragile figure is transformed into a Hebe.

On the whole the most practical article is by the Hon. Mabel Vereker, who thus sums up her conclusions:—

The art of dressing well is always to wear what is exactly suited to the occasion, to be careful that every detail is in perfect harmony, never to be conspicuous, and, above all, not to choose an extreme fashion, but to modify it so as to make the most of any personal attractions consistent with the type of dress to be worn.

MR fellow procedure countries in George up, the radvaria shi entered

GEI

The goods heavy their comp Mr. Vone is hand The bounty both a severe at an

ing d

sugar

expor

and r sures follow by import by important by import by import bank

In t man Ge capita upon Arge
able Germ face of

Germ virtus of he

Pow

Ge

abilit

GERMANY'S DEPENDENCE ON ENGLAND.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MADE IN GERMANY."

MR. ERNEST E. WILLIAMS, having duly alarmed his fellow-countrymen with the fact of German ascendency, proceeds in the National Review to issue a sort of counterblast, and to warn Germany in her turn. He first shows the bright side of "the economic revolution in Germany"—the forest of factories which have sprung up, the beautified cities, the population increased by 30 per cent., the exports going up by leaps and bounds, the rate of increase steadily increasing, the notable advance in output of coal and iron, in shipbuilding and in shipping. Hamburg surpassed Liverpool in tonnage entered in 1893; "she is now the first port in Europe, and ranks immediately after London."

GERMAN SUGAR IN PERIL.

Then he passes to the reverse of the medal. Woollen goods are suffering from over-production in Germany and heavy tariffs abroad. They and worsted are to have their output reduced by agreement 20 per cent. The competition of the United States is a serious factor, and Mr. Williams is inclined to back the States. He offers one instance of Germany's failure to keep the upper hand:—

There is the great beet sugar industry. Stimulated by the bounty system, this industry has grown to vast proportions, and both agriculture and industry generally in Germany would suffer severely from a backward movement. But a blow may be struck at any moment. The United States, by a special duty, have countervailed the bounty on German sugar, and this countervailing duty, added to the normal duty charged upon imported sugar entering the United States, has practically killed the export of German beet sugar thither. Canada has taken measures to keep the German sugar out of her ports. India has followed suit. It is at least on the cards that England, either by imposing a countervailing duty, or by prohibiting the entry of bounty-fed sugar into this country, or by joining a convention of the Powers for the abolition of sugar bounties, will deal another tremendous blow at the German trade. When the bounties are abolished or countervailed, West Indian production will again raise its head in effective competition with the German: Queensland, it is clear, will make her presence felt very formidably; the United States will see to the development of the sugar plantations of Cuba and Port Rico, Hawaii and the Philippines, in addition to cultivating cane sugar in Louisiana and beet sugar in other of the States. Germany's sugar outlook is by no means promising, and the very extent of the present development of the industry gives the threatened check a more serious character.

GERMAN VULNERABILITY.

German private finance is none too sound. German banks (unlike English) finance speculative enterprises. In the extension of her ventures Germany has given many hostages to fortune:—

German banks dotted about South American cities; German capital—assiduously piled up in recent years—gaily embarked upon all sorts of speculative foreign enterprises: tramways in the Argentine; railways in Asia Minor; German colonies, remarkable for nothing but their defencelessness and need of defence; German merchants, with assets and liabilities scattered over the face of the civilised and uncivilised earth. It is when we come to the consideration of these things that the exceeding vulnerability, the positive weakness, in an international view, of the new Germany becomes so startlingly apparent. . . . . . Germany virtually admits that she cannot develop those African possessions of hers without England's help.

GERMANY AT OUR MERCY.

Mr. Williams laments our cringing attitude before a Power so dependent on us. He says:—

Germany badly wants foreign markets for the sale of her increasing output of manufactures; other nations, with their own economic interests to look after, are shutting the door even tighter in Germany's face. She is therefore becoming abjectly dependent upon the markets of the British Empire. Already, by the institution of the Canadian preference, German traders have begun to shiver with apprehension; and Canada's example is going to be followed more widely. It can be followed to any extent, and quite easily to such an extent as would bring Germany to her knees, pleading for our clemency. At the present time a new commercial treaty is pending between this country and Germany; if we chose to insert stiff provisions in that treaty—in respect to our own economic interests it is sincerely to be hoped that we shall set our feet down pretty firmly—Germany would be helpless to resist.

THE STRUGGLE FOR THE PRESIDENCY.

If the Republican Party can really claim the credit for all the blessings which General C. H. Grosvenor declares have visited the United States in the last four years, their victory in the coming election may be considered beyond doubt. In the North American Review for July General Grosvenor contributes a long article dealing with the election from the Republican point of view, and compared with his unqualified praise of everything his party has done, Mr. Chamberlain's eulogy of the Immaculate Administration is mere apologetics. General Grosvenor gives the following epigrammatic summary:—

"Resolved, that the transition from deficits in peace to surpluses in war; from bond issuing to bond paying; from hopeless farmers to happy farmers; from men hunting jobs to jobs hunting men; from soup houses to banquet tables; from poverty to prosperity; is not the result of accident or chance, or famines in India, but is the result of having a party in power that knows how to run the country and command its confidence."

The following is the Republican platform as given by General Grosvenor:-

And now comes the issue of the campaign. We will charge that the troubles of 1896 came from the proposition of the Democratic party to destroy the integrity of the currency of the country. We will charge, and everybody will believe, that the substantial free-trade act of 1894 halted, biighted, overthrew and destroyed the industrial-prosperity of the country. There can be no answer to these charges. The Democratic party must show that the deplorable condition of the country in 1896 can be accounted for in some other way before they can expect the support of the country.

The only ground on which the Democrats now ask for election, says General Grosvenor, is that the Republicans have put it beyond their power to do any harm. But the election of Mr. Bryan, as the situation stands to-day, would insure the election of a large Democratic majority in the House of Representatives. Drunk with success, and maddened by former defeats, this majority would at once deadlock the processes of the government, until their pet foibles could be put into operation. More than that, a sweeping victory for Mr. Bryan would insure Democratic control of the Senate not later than the second half of his first term, and he, intrenched in power by one victory by this sort of argument, would be in a position to secure his re-election to a second term, and, with it, the control of both branches of Congress. Nor is this all. We have seen the dangers to the commercial interests of the country which were involved in the mere threat of Democratic success; and the very moment that Mr. Bryan and his school of politics should be elected to the executive branch, and a Democratic majority sent to the House, uncertainty, stagnation, and trouble would come. Having "scotched" the snake, the people of the United States must see to it that, until his whole nature is changed, he must be kept out of power. Defeat Mr. Bryan and his Populistic party this year and there will grow up in this country a real Democratic party.

of the r, need mine; ght for onsent ration.

to the

espond

result
were welliirable usions wellalone
d our much

um, it resign imate bined from miniion of aised, The in so taken dress to be ss for ever sees dress

plete please r and why logy, orrect com-

k of rson, ects. may rans-rans-Hon.

actly erfect soose st of o be

. . . . . . .

AUSTRALASIA ANNOUNCES HERSELF

TO THE EMPIRE AND TO THE WORLD.

THE creation of the Australian Commonwealth naturally calls forth in our kinsmen at the Antipodes a new fervour of national self-consciousness. Elation is justifiable, and a certain amount of robust self-assertion more than pardonable. Nevertheless, the new Australasian temper is to be reckoned with as a factor not merely within the Empire, but also in the general comity of nations.

THE FREEST GOVERNMENT IN THE WORLD.

In the Nineteenth Century, Mr. A. G. Berry, late Secretary to the Australian delegates, gives rein to his exultancy. He cries :-

Among nations that pride themselves on possessing free institutions may be quoted the United States, Germany, Switzerland, and Canada. Where in any one of these is there such a wide suffrage as will be exercised under the new Australian Commonwealth?

The youngest bairn does not fear to measure itself with the most gigantic member of the English-speaking brood. Mr. Berry goes on :-

Lord Hopetoun, who carries with him to Australia Her Majesty's personal appreciation in the shape of the distinguished Order of the Knigh: of the Thistle, is charged with the inauguration of the responsible Government of the Commonwealth. The magnitude of this task may be measured by the fact that our island continent in the South Seas is equal to that of the United States without Alaska. While our great sister nation in America is holding its Presidential election, upon which fabulous sums of money will be expended through the wide territories that extend from Maine to San Francisco, it is interesting to think that a gentleman holding Her Majesty's Commission goes quietly to Australia with the Queen's authority to put into operation a freer Government than that possessed by any Republic in the world.

THE GREATNESS OF THE COMMONWEALTH.

What the advent of the new federation may mean for powers neither Brt sh nor American is very plainly suggested in the Contemporary by Sir Robert Stout. He writes on "Australasia: her Resources and Foreign Trade," with an edge to his pen which will not be altogether liked in Paris and Berlin. He says :-

The population of Australasia is small at present, being estimated at four and a half millions, but it is equal to what the white population of the United States was at the beginning of the century. The race is a pure race. It has less admixture of races than Canada or the United States. . . . Our foreign trade is per head treble that of the United States, and our trade is With about a twelfth of Germany's populayearly increasing. tion we have about a third of her revenue.

We have an advantage that no Continental European nation possesses. We live under one flag. We have no Alsace-Lorraine, nor have we on our borders hostile nations, with our defence from foreign foes. We have only a small expense for our defence from foreign foes. We have only a small army, but we are under the ægis of the greatest navy in the world. Pe-haps the time is not far distant when we shall have a truly Australasian navy. . . . If we are attacked we are ready, and in time all our youths will be drilled, for the necessity of doing this is now being everywhere recognised.

To-day the feeling for the Empire is so strong, that no inquiry concerning the propriety or consequences of the Transvaal war is deemed proper. It is enough that Britain is at war, and that she needs help. The fact that European nations display strong animosity against the Empire draws the Colonists closer to their mother land. I believe that as a whole the people of Australasia are more loyal, more patriotic, and more devoted to the Empire than the people of the United Kingdom.

WARNING TO FRANCE.

In view of these facts Sir Robert asks if it is unreasonable to predict that "our United States of Australasia may, in the not very distant future, be deemed a factor both in European and Asiatic complications." He begins at once and peremptorily to show how :-

Does the French nation wish to remain on friendly terms with Australasia? Does it desire to promote trade between France and these Southern Colonies? If it does, then the attitude of the French public towards our Empire must be changed. If they persist in their present course they may soon discover that trade with France will decrease.

GERMANY, BEWARE!

Germany is similarly addressed. She has roused ill-feeling by her telegram to Kruger, by her annexation of Samoa, and by the time chosen for that annexation :-

Samoa has always been the pet group of the Colonies, and its surrender has been deeply felt. It is the Australasian Alsace, and whether it is wise for Germany to have two Alsaces remains to be seen. If there had been a Confederated Australasia and an Australasian Navy, I doubt if the German nation would have been permitted to seize Savaii and Upolu.

The incident can never be forgotten. If Germany is wise, and desirous of pushing her trade with us, she will take some pains to promote friendly relations with both England and Australasia. The subsidising of magnificent steamers, and the advertising of their wares, will equally be fruitless in pushing trade, if France and Germany persist in their present hostile attitude to our Empire.

PREFERENCE FOR THE UNITED STATES.

Happily the United States are under no cloud. With them "we feel we are one people":-

If, as is proposed, there is a preferential Customs Tarifi arranged by the Colonies, so as to allow all the goods of the Empire to be received at a rate less than that imposed on goods from foreign countries, I believe the goods from the United States would be exceptionally and favourably dealt with,

If other nations behave themselves, perhaps they may be similarly favoured. The youngest in the family of nations means to make things hum, evidently.

THROUGH THE SIEGE OF LADYSMITH.

MISS CORKRAN, the editress of the Girl's Realm, has interviewed Mrs. Murray, wife of a Ladysmith town councillor, upon her siege experiences. At first the privations had a touch of the ludicrous, but soon the disheartening element came, and came to stay :-

The list of petty, absolutely disheartening privations goes on all through the day. If it is a question of boiling a little water to make some substitute for tea, the terrible irony of the situation still continued; it might be by the discovery that there was not a morsel of fuel. There comes the time when there is no soap to wash with, when it is impossible to wash one's clothes. Beyond all these minor distresses is the ever-present sense of a terrible isolation, the awful realisation of being cut off from the world outside; of being separated from friends until the cordon world outside; or being separated roll flat and the with the living world outside. Thus the life of utter stagnation went on through the weary hours; even the relief of going to bed and crying oneself to sleep seemed to be denied by the official prohibition of a candle to go to bed by, for fear that lights should be traitorously used as a signal to the enemy.

"Everything," said Mrs. Murray, "was commandeeredeven our money. It was wanted for the troops. A cheque for the amount was given, payable after the siege was lifted."
Mrs. Murray is not afraid to make a most feeling reference to the Boers, and the numbers of their slain. A Dutch girl's letter to her lover is quoted at length, one of a packet of bloodstained relics picked up by Mrs. Murray on the South African veldt.

A office Revier same is evic pously this ty the fol Ast

by the interes

Vicero

impres

Man-in hint o

were s was re Societ of pers faster doubt notice and hi feats ( person deadli see. his ne for th said Refor agree a sub have a you very b for a that e in cha mean a sub every race, and f

inspe surpr peopl to ha that ' have humb stand T Lo our h late t equity

we pe

remin

so bl

So

In th Parli spicu Whe super T

satin

a m

Kais

THE SUPERIOR PERSON AS VICEROY.

A CHARACTER SKETCH of Lord Curzon in his new office is contributed by "Civilis" to the Contemporary Review in a paper none the less valuable because at the same time an amusing piece of light raillery. The writer is evidently tickled to observe how seriously and pompously the "progressive Viceroy" takes himself. From this type of literature it is difficult to select extracts, but the following passage is illustrative :-

As to the actual business of administration sent up every day by the Departments, which is, apart from matters of popular interest which get into the newspapers, the real work of a Viceroy, Lord Curzon has made an exceedingly good general impression. The nicknames he quickly earned—"the Young-Man-in-a-Hurry," "George the Fifth," "Imperial George" hint of the fatherly smiles of his Councillors, most of whom were struggling with the problems of India while Mr. Curzon was rounding his promising periods in the Oxford Debating Society; but while it is generally recognised that he is the kind of person who thinks he can make the world go round a little faster by kicking it, allowance is made for this fallacy, and no doubt a margin left for it in all matters brought to Viceregal notice. His capacity and his inclination for work are prodigious, and his recent tour on the frontier shows him equal to no small feats of physical endurance. He is content with nothing but personal experience, and into districts where the plague was deadliest and the famine sharpest he has gone down himself to The quickness of his grasp of complications brought to see. The quickness of his grasp of complications brought to his notice is matter of general comment; he has a genius for the main point. "Goschen told me that Dizzy had said to him after one of his speeches on University Reform," writes the late Dr. Jowett, "'Though I don't agree with you, of course, I congratulate you on having a subject; it is such a good thing for a young man to have a subject.'" Lord Curzon is an ideal example of a young man with a subject, and he is giving it his very best attention. The subject has presented itself, of course, for a couple of thousand years with such uniformity of paradox for a couple of thousand years with such uniformity of paradox that even a young man of signal ability may find a little difficulty in changing many of its aspects. That we shall see later, but meanwhile the magnificence of the spectacle of Lord Curzon and a subject that really suits him cannot be denied. Always and everywhere he carries himself as the representative of the ruling race, he is more than aware of what is due from him to them, and from all others to himself. The ruling race may congratulate themselves upon a lofty figurehead. Righteousness and equity are ever before him, and if, in his efforts to attain them, we perceive some gestures of the original prig, we are merely reminded of the defects of all qualities.

Socially . . . His Excellency does not find us in this connection so black as we are painted—in fact, he was gratified on early inspection to discover us a very passable white. Explaining his surprise at the comparative dulness and respectability of married people under the deodars, "we thought at first," he is reported to have said, "that they were afraid of us." I am glad to say that we have stood the test of more prolonged observation, but I have no doubt that we keep the breath of scandal from our humble hearths all the more successfully because of a terrifying standard and an illustrious example.

The good-humoured writer concludes with the remark-Lord Curzon's is a moving virile figure upon the open page of our history; it commands our interest, and invites our criticism. In the remarkable trinity of the man, the schoolmaster, and the Parliamentarian, one hesitates to predict which will most con-spicuously survive—perhaps Mr. Lecky would know—but for any of them the nation, however captious, should be grateful. When every flaw is noted, and every fleck revealed, it is the superior person that carries England's credit furthest.

The general impression left by this piece of genial satire is distinctly reassuring. It suggests that we have a more ponderous and pedagogic edition of the German Kaiser on the viceregal throne.

BURY OR BURN?

CREMATION AND COFFIN BOTH CONDEMNED.

A WRITER in the Quarterly Review makes a powerful attack on "the ethics of cremation." He regards it as an improper corrective to the mischievous practice of interment in vaults and coffins. He says :-

Little or no difficulty appears to have attended the ready and efficient disposal of the dead till towards the close of Charles the Second's reign. Not only was the strong coffin—the fons et origo mali—till then unknown, but the plainer sort of men were content to be carried to their graves in the open chests or coffers which were kept in every parish church for the occasion, and only employed to convey the body from the house of death to that other "house which hath been appointed for all living"; after which the chests were returned to their accustomed place, which was usually a niche in the church wall. Arrived at the grave, the body, enveloped at one time in coarse linen kept together by bone pins, and afterwards in woollen, was removed from its temporary case and buried.

Resolution of the body by the agency of the earth to which we commit it, is affirmed by the writer to be the natural and innocuous method. "Earth is the most potent disinfectant known." The common impression that graveyards pollute the air is emphatically contradicted :-

Nothing worse than carbonic acid (carbon dioxide) and water are ever given off from the surface of burial-grounds, and these only in quantities so small as to be even less than are naturally present in the superincumbent atmosphere; and, further, that even this little is at once taken up by vegetation and returned to the air, not as a source of peril to the health, but as a necessary increment of atmospheric renewal.

The two hundred disused burial-grounds in London now used as recreation grounds and health resorts are cited as proof. "The air of the open cemetery is absolutely inodorous."

Sir Seymour Haden reports from experiments carried on for twelve years in the burial of animals that bodies buried four feet deep required more than four years for their complete dissolution; three feet deep, three years; two feet deep, two years; one foot deep, one year; while bodies not buried but simply covered with a foot of earth disappeared, all save their bones, in less than a year; but in all cases without injuring the purity of earth or air :-

The Prussian Government has also made a notable contribution to our knowledge on this important part of the In 1872-73 a secret commission was issued by it to ascertain the condition of the dead in the battle-fields of the Two years, or thereabout, having elapsed since those battles were fought, it was feared, as many dead bodies were known to have been only superficially buried, that epidemic disease might result. What the commissioners found, however, entirely dissipated any such fears. In cases in which as many as eight hundred bodies, in the hurry incident to rapid military movements, had been thrust into one shallow excavation, these bodies, it was found, had already disappeared, their bones and accourtements alone being left. But to this disappearance there was a remarkable exception: the bodies of officers, having been buried in mackintoshes (the action of which resembled that of coffins) had not so disappeared.

Against the testimony of Sir Henry Thompson, the writer quotes the authority of Koch and Klein to show that the bacilli of anthrax being aërobic, or dependent on air, are, when buried four and a half feet, incapable of reproduction. The rest of the paper is occupied with the argument that cremation, by making exhumation impossible, prevents the detection of murders.

reasontralasia factor begins ms with France

If they at trade sed illtion of n :-- le of the

Alsace, remains sia and ld have se, and e pains ralasia.

sing of ice and

and its pire. With Tariff of the goods Inited may ily of

, has town the the es on water ation s not soap thes. of a n the rdon the

and ficial ights deque ed."

nt on efer-A e of ray

MAJOR-GENERAL BADEN-POWELL.

THE Woman at Home for August gives first place to a sketch of Baden-Powell, by Alexander Mackintosh. Though several of the stories told are now familiar to every newspaper reader, there is a good deal besides that is fresh and interesting. "His father, the Reverend Baden-Powell, Savilian Professor of Geometry at Oxford, was learned in theology and in physical science, and his mother is a lady of strong character and varied accomplishments."

HIS MOTHER.

Baden-Powell's father having died when the future Major-General was but three weeks old, he was brought up by his mother. The young widow of thirty-five, we are told-showed tact and ingenuity in the upbringing of her large family. In a recent debate on Youthful Offenders in the House of Commons, it was mentioned that Mrs. Baden-Powell never inflicted punishment on her children, and a contrast was drawn between the result of her system in B.-P. and the effect of corporal punishment on the childhood of Napoleon. Mrs. Baden-Powell ruled her sons by sympathy. She gave them a sense of responsibility and early taught them to do many things for themselves, B.-P. learning even to stew and boil and fry before he was in his teens.

Of Baden-Powell's brothers, one, who is now a Q.C., was thirteen years at sea-for one grandfather was an admiral, and the naval instinct seems to have rivalled the military-another brother is a barrister and painter of naval pictures, while a third, a major, is "a great authority on balloons, took to himself a wife last year, but the family is not much inclined to matrimony."

WHEN HE MET THACKERAY.

Mr. Mackintosh tells one pretty story of Baden-Powell's

A shilling given to him by Thackeray is one of B.-P.'s relics. The novelist "was handing Mrs. Baden-Powell in to dinner when he noticed that one of the little children was following behind. The young gentleman, according to his wont, was just scrambling into a chair when Thackeray, fumbling in his pocket, produced a new shilling and said in his caressing voice, "There, little one, you shall have this shilling if you are good and run away." It was only, however, when his mother told him he might go up to the nursery that he left.

He entered his army examination "just for fun," and came out second out of 718 candidates. His already planned University career went to the wall, and he was soon afterwards soldiering and pig-sticking in

LEFT-HANDED.

Like many deft-fingered people, Baden-Powell is lefthanded. "He can draw with his left hand and shade at the same time with his right. All his letters are written with his left."

In his time he has done many strange things :-

One of his earliest acts in India was to take from his baggage an ocarina, and to march at the head of the European children in the station through the streets of Lucknow, playing "The Girl I Left Behind Me." During his stay in the Dependency he brought life and amusement into many a dull camp and station by his fun and mimicry and his stage skill. Among his many strange achievements he can boast of having presented the "Pirates of Penzance" in Kandahar.

One is impressed by B.-P.'s handiness, by his ingenuity, by the use which he makes of the most unmilitary-like experiences. Even skirt-dancing was not wasted upon him. He was taken in hand in his youth by a devotee of that art, and when skipping from rock to rock in the Matopos, he appreciated the value of what he then learned in command of the feet.

INVENTOR.

He is even an inventor, as he has told us in a racy extract from his diary :-

I invented a perfect form of field-syringe, which I think I'll patent when I get home. Take an ordinary native girl, tell her to go and get some lukewarm water, and don't give her anything to get it in. She will go to the stream, kneel, and fill her mouth, and so bring the water; by the time she is back the water is lukewarm. You then tell her to squirt it as you direct into the wound, while you prize around with a feather.

In 1896, fighting against the Somnabulo, he had some training in semi-starvation, which afterwards came in handy for Mafeking. Fear is unknown to him :-

When asked what soldiers felt in battle, he ridiculed the idea that they thought about being killed. A sort of excitement took possession of one and produced the same effect as a couple of glasses of champagne. "You forget all fatigue," he said, "and your wits are more than usually sharpened." And he added that the mind is buoyed with a feeling of elation, but with a cruel under-current which the Kaffirs so aptly describe as "seeing red."

The World's Art as Mirrored in Paris.

THE Edinburgh discusses "The Pictures at the Paris Exhibition: the New Movement in Art." The writer assumes that in Paris we have "something like the chronicle and brief abstract of the painting of the world." He casts about to find some unifying principle. finds it in the principle of revolt :-

Essentially and primarily this revolt is against the domination of literature over painting. It must be remembered that in the beginning painting was what it can never be to-day, both literature It must be remembered that in the and a plastic art; its object was both to give information and to impress the eye. It had to produce an effect; but it had also to tell a story . . . But M. Marten's pictures are in no sense illustrations . . . . They translate for us an idea in the mind of the artist, not a piece of information which he has got from his

The tendency of this revolt against literary influence must, in the opinion of the writer, be in the direction of impressionism and so make towards realism.

Then comes the school of "light effects" which delights in showing room or landscape flooded with light, with "their eternal blue and their light which looks as if made of flour" (Delacroix). Their palette is small; excessive ultramarine, white, pink, purple; yellow and blue being in most general use. This tendency has in Besnard gone to a love for prismatic colouring. The writer adds :-

We may be sure that this prismatic painting will, in a short time—if it has not already—come to constitute a new school, and a recognisable genre. We see all kinds of painters showing and a recognisable genre. We see all kinds of painters showing a leaning that way, and swerving from the path which they seemed to have traced out for themselves. .

The primal impulse in every case has been essentially the same: to realise the great stir to the senses, and through them to the imagination caused by sudden effects of light.

The writer then deals with "another wide-spreading and deep-reaching current of art," which moves towards "the distribution of light and shade over the whole scene, which gives their relief to individual objects, and gives the effect of distance between one object and another": technically known as the "perception of values." In this branch Whistler is master.

The writer hopes for a reaction against the reaction: he waits for a regeneration of art, "a new and high art," which shall speak directly as music speaks through a Beethoven.

MR the F iust e cause nation count The of ext popula

and th

sionswhich more expres ironic meant record pictur "Kis rule. kisses gloom

Mı

The

mino

proce A came Purita partia critica and h manu with bitter men :

W had stress afford his co and and s bette kind ing. some and i

It facto Lord W

reco

W Wch optin appr an a But for has enth seas

rece

"MERRY ENGLAND" ONCE MORE?

MR. G. S. STREET, writing "from a London attic," in the Pall Mall Magasine for August, reviews the season just ended. He finds, in spite of the gloom and absences caused by the war, a very real movement towards national gaiety. He maintains that the character of the country is changing. He says:—

The crowds which for some years have thronged the grounds of exhibitions by night, listening to bands, the crowds in the popular parks and wherever music and gaiety are to be found, and this year the very significant affair of carnivals and processions—does not all this mean that we are throwing off the gloom which has oppressed us these last few centuries and are becoming more kindly and brotherly and gay? Only a few years ago the expression "Merry England" seemed to be empty, almost ironical and a mockery. We could hardly believe that it ever meant anything. But it did mean something once. Our own records and the records of foreign travellers among us show pictures of manners which were free and gay and debonair. "Kiss and be kind, the fiddler's blind"—that was the good old rule. But by-and-by the fiddler stopped playing, and people's kisses were furtive and suspect. It is customary to attribute that gloomy change to the Puritans.

WHO WAS THE KILL-JOY?

Mr. Street contends that this view is mistaken. The Puritans "were actually a minority, and a small minority." Their rule was followed by a reaction. He proceeds:—

A century later came a long and impoverishing war, and then came the manufacturer. He was the enemy, he and not the Puritan. The Puritan and the reaction, and all that, were partial accidents. The gloomy teachings of smug and hypocritical solemnity never touched the mass of the people. Poverty and hardship and inhuman exaction of labour touched it. The manufacturer was the enemy. The glorious epoch associated with the revered names of Bright and Cobden meant short and bitter lives and grinding toil for infinite multitudes of English men and women—and children . . . . .

WHAT HAS MADE US GAY AGAIN.

When we accuse the manufacturer, we must remember that he had not to choose between more or less prosperity, but in the stress of competition between more and none. He could not afford to be kind-hearted while the laws allowed the greed of his competitors to be heartless. But the laws ceased to allow it, and the working classes were given leisure to look about them and see that the world is not all chimneys. Leisure, sanitation, better wages, better food, have gradually made it possible to be kind and gay. The outward character of the English is changing. We are coming to demand something pleasant to hear, something bright to see. Bands and processions will increase and multiply.

It is interesting to find the change ascribed to the factory legislation, for which that stern, modern Puritan, Lord Shaftesbury, was in great part responsible.

THE NEW COLOUR GIVEN TO LIFE.

Whatever the cause, the writer is sure of the fact he records:-

We are learning, re-learning, that music is to hear gladly, and flowers are good to see and smell, and grass to lie on. That is the great fact of the change. But by its side—I'm in an optimistio mood—there is growing a wish to distinguish and appreciate what is not only gay or lively, but beautiful; there is an æsthetic revival, feeble and fitful in most places. . . But what is more important, because it is more elemental, is this new, or renewed, love of the populace for open-air festivities, for processions and bands, and shouting and laughter. That has been the really important fact—next to the national enthusiasm for the Queen and her soldiers—of the London season, more important than all the bazaars and balls and receptions recorded in the "social diaries."

Carnival, Ladysmith, Mafeking, are sounds which suggest other and less agreeable ideas; but if they have dinned the value of pageant and colour and open-air music into John Bull's prosaic poll, they have not been wholly fruitless.

SMALL INDUSTRIES NOT DOOMED.

THE common economic superstition that small industries are bound to disappear is vigorously assailed by Prince Kropotkin in the Nineteenth Century. He gives the following figures for the United Kingdom:—

| 1897.                                        | Number of factories or departments. | Numberof personsemployed. | Averagenumber ofoperatives. |
|----------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------|-----------------------------------|-------------------------------------|
| Textile factories                            | 10,883                              | 1,051,564                         | 97                                  |
| Non-textile factories Workshops (without mo- | 79,059                              | 2,755,460                         | 35                                  |
| tor)                                         | 88,814                              | 676,446                           | 8                                   |
| Total                                        | 178,756                             | 4,483,470                         | 25                                  |
|                                              |                                     |                                   |                                     |

He estimates, however, that the number employed in workshops should stand at a million, or about one-fourth of all industrial workers. He presents a variety of other statistics and estimates, and then summarises as follows:—

From these dry figures we learn that only one small part of the British industrial workers—not more than one-eighth, if we take the total at 4,800,000 persons, finds employment in those large factories which employ more than 500 operatives. From three-eighths to one-half of them toil in middle-sized factories employing from 100 to 200, and occasionally to 500 operatives; and very nearly one-half—that is, more at any rate than 2,000,000 persons, find their living in the scores of thousands of small factories and workshops. The thousands of small things which we require in our daily life are made chiefly in those busy agglomerations of the small industries; and, judging from what we know of other countries, we may surmise that the aggregate value of all that is produced in the small industries in Britain must not be very much below the aggregate value of what is produced in the large factories. As to the "few usurpers" of whom Marx wrote, we find in their place something like 200,000 employers. . . . .

The more one examines into the present state of the small industries in this country, the more one is inclined to think, on the contrary, that they have been steadily developing and conquering new fields for the last fifty years, and that those practical engineers are right who have maintained, as Professor W. Unwin did, that they must win still more in importance, when a supply of electro-motive force will be obtained at a low price in every human agglomeration, large or small.

Yet the false theory has led to their neglect in education and in accommodation, while foreign nations have profited.

ISRAEL in London is the subject of a readable paper by George A. Wade in the English Illustrated for August. The chief complaint the writer has to make of the East End Jew is dirt. He says:—"I flatter myself I know most of the foreign quarters of the East End, but the districts of the most benighted of Chinese and Hindus, to say nothing of the Irish and poorest English, are simply Paradise to the dirt and squalor of the Jewish district." "Were it not," he adds, "for the dirt which seems to dog the habitation and life of every Eastern native, and of the Israelite in particular, the Jew would be almost a model citizen."

a racv

hink I'll girl, tell n't give n, kneel, ime she so squirt nd with d some ime in the idea ent took with a ribe as

Paris writer te the world." He in the erature and to also to sense ind of uence lights

with made essive
blue s in
The

short chool, wing they

y the

ding ards ene, gives er ":

ion: art,"

.....

ENGLAND, RUSSIA AND JAPAN.

"IGNOTUS" writes in the May National Review on "Great Britain's Debt to Japan," but his article is more an exposition of our common interests with Japan than an attempt to show in what way we are indebted to her. He maintains that if Russia were at war with us, Japan would inevitably attack her, not because of any very clear appreciation of her interests, but because of the "berserker temper" of the Japanese Navy—which is not, "Ignotus" might have added, a particularly good preparation for war, as we have found out to our cost.

JAPANESE PREPARATIONS.

But Japan has also a standing quarrel with Russia,

So great is the tension at the moment that all through Apripractically the whole Japanese Navy has been mobilised, with a considerable part of the Army. Great secrecy has been observed as to the doings of the fleet, and no one except the British Commander-in-Chief on the China Station was invited to be present. This, by the way, was one more instance of the warm friendship existing between the two navies, and is a delicate return for the concessions granted to Japanese warships in our home dockyards. So much, however, is reported of these manœuvres—that the handling of the ships was admirable, and the target practice almost continuous and of the best class.

ENGLAND AND JAPAN.

The pivot on which British policy must revolve in the Far East is a friendly Japan, says "Ignotus," and our real interest is to reconcile Japan and Russia. This is excellent; but when he says that we cannot stand by and see Japan beaten, it is rather committing us too much, especially when he admits that the "berserker temper" may rush the Japanese into war:—

The British people must be prepared to turn a deaf ear to the anti-patriots and Russophiles, who will declare that the Japanese are not white men, are not Europeans, and have the supreme fault of being our friends—which, of course, at once proves them to be unworthy of our support. Sentiment will be worked for all that it is worth: it must be disregarded. The destruction of Japan, in the opinion of every thinker qualified to judge questions of policy, would be merely the prelude to an assault upon the British Empire. Therefore, though we have every reason to desire a reconciliation, perhaps even a general understanding with Russia, it must be a reconciliation and an understanding to which Japan is not sacrificed.

JAPANESE STATESMANSHIP.

"Ignotus" attributes to Japanese statesmen every quality which he laments the lack of in our own. They are firm, far-sighted, always ready, and masters of the art of war. They yielded wisely to the three Powers in 1895; but with the mental proviso that they should obtain satisfaction when opportunity offered. When this day comes, Russia will be hampered by the great distance from her base, and "Ignotus" holds that no Russian warship can leave Europe once war is declared.

RUSSIA'S WEAKNESSES.

Russia will have to rely in the Far East upon the supply of steam coal already accumulated, before the war, upon the spot. Japanese cruisers can and will intercept neutral colliers, should these attempt to bring cargoes north from Singapore and Hong Kong. A glance at the map will show that, even with a much superior feet, Russia would find it difficult to safeguard the movement of such colliers past the numerous fortified Japanese harbours on the Eastern Sea. Japan, on her part, has an unlimited supply of coal, and, though this coal is of very inferior quality to the product of the Welsh collieries, she is at least guaranteed against any failure in the motive power of her ships. Remember that in naval war coal will be the Admiral's first concern, and that it was want of fuel which drove Cervera to Santiago and ensured his destruction, and we see the immense importance of this factor. Perhaps also we shall understand why Russia has bought 140,000 tons of Welsh steam coal this winter.

If "Ignotus" were better informed upon Russian affairs he would be satisfied with a simpler explanation of the purchase of coal. As a matter of fact, the Russians this year are passing through what they call a "fuel famine" unparalleled in the history of the country, and naphtha, wood, and coal have gone up in price to an unprecedented height. So serious is this, that an industrial crisis has arisen which threatens with loss every industry in the country.

THE PERILS OF THE PARTY-SYSTEM.

"THE Price of Party Government" is the title of a paper contributed by Mr. W. S. Lilly to the Fornightly Review for June. Mr. Lilly maintains that the Party system has reduced the art of politics to the art of vote-catching, and that it denies the existence of politics as a science. All the great sages of the world from Aristotle to Kant regarded politics as a branch of ethics, a science of national morality. The judgment of the nineteenth century is that the Man in the Street who has no scientific equipment, possesses a natural gift which fully qualifies him to settle all questions. As far back as 1858 Lord Salisbury, then at the beginning of his political career, pointed out that principles had altogether departed from politics; and Mr. Lilly asks whether any one can discern any vestige of a principle in Lord Salisbury's political life.

In times of great crises Mr. Lilly thinks the Man in the Street is an excellent counsellor; but as an instrument of government in quiet times he is untrustworthy. In consequence of this all the great and glaring needs of the country which call for satisfaction are neglected. At home we watch the rapid decay of agriculture; the depopulation of the country; overcrowding in the town; deterioration of the people; and destruction of their food supply. No Government dares to grapple with this question. For the Man in the Street has not yet begun to clamour. In dealing with international questions and home defence the Government is ruled by the Budget, and the Budget by the Man in the Street:—

It is always in terror that the Opposition will raise the cry of bloated armaments, and rob it of the votes necessary to life official. Of this, foreign statesmen are well aware. Hence their belief that England may be flouted, and her rights infringed, and her interests thwarted, with impunity. Occasionally that belief proves to be ill-founded. But in general it is too amply justified; as British policy (so-called) of late years, in Egypt, in the Soudan, in Madagascar, in Zanzibar, in Newfoundland, in Siam, sufficiently shows. Such is the price we pay for Party Government in the domain of foreign politics—a situation not only in the highest degree degrading to this country, but in the highest degree dangerous.

Mr. Lilly suggests no remedy. But as France, the country which he thinks has "bested" England most of all, is no less controlled by the populace than ourselves, it is hard to see that the defect lies in the system of government. The logical conclusion from his argument would be that the Frenchman selected his rulers with more discrimination than the Englishman. Yet Mr. Lilly says that in all great crises our masses are in the right. But will anybody admit that the French masses in all great crises—such as the war of 1870 and the Dreyfus case—were also in the right?

IN Mond he h desig Fran histo idea of so must willin peop bring poss beca milit has tant

expa

on to adm

dest

obje

FRA

loss
the e follo whice Loui arm quer negl sea
A
a n supe

abs

Mir

other admicon Colland

or,

lon her Fr. in con as to un rec ca we that Er me fus de

FRANCE'S FLEET AND HER COLONIAL ARMY.

immense inderstand coal this

Russian

nation of Russians

a "fuel

etry, and that an ith loss

tle of a nightly

Party

of vote-

cs as a totle to ence of ientific

ualifies

8 Lord

career,

1 from

liscern

olitical

Man

as an itrustaction

cay of over-

; and

ment

in the

with vern-

Man

cry of

o life

Tence

ts in-nally

s too

rs, in

New-

e we

this

the fall.

it is

ern-

bluc

ore

says

But

reat

eſ.

In the second July number of the Revue des Deux Mondes M. Brunetière prints a very interesting letter which he has received from Vice-Admiral de Penfentenyo, designed to show a bellicose policy is inadvisable for France. He begins by drawing several lessons from past The French, he says, have always had a false idea of the employment of naval force; they are a nation of soldiers, and the sea is to them an obstacle which must be surmounted; they would burn their ships willingly, like Œneas. But to the English, an island people, the sea is the great road of communication which brings all peoples together in the time of peace, and the possession of which in the time of war means victory, because the command of the sea is the only base for any military operation outside. This conception of the sea has been and will always remain one of the most important factors in what the Admiral calls "the terrible expansion of the Anglo-Saxon race." France, he goes on to say, has never been able to rise to the height of the admirably simple English naval strategy—namely, to destroy the enemy on the sea. Neglect of this essential object by successive French naval commanders led to the loss of the last Colonial Empire which France possessed at the end of the eighteenth century. There is no need to follow the Admiral through the detailed historical proofs which he adduces for this thesis. The loss of Canada, Louisiana, of Egypt, and the deplorable end of Leclerc's army in St. Domingo, were merely the inevitable consequences of the errors of French strategy-namely, the neglect to secure any solid base of operations on the

At the time of the Crimean War the French fleet was a match for that of England; but since 1870 our superiority has been allowed to grow. France has been absorbed in internecine strife, and has used up thirty-two Ministries of Marine in thirty years. England, on the other hand, has secured something like a continuity of administration in naval matters. Thanks to her command of the sea, Great Britain could transport in complete security a quarter of a million of men to South Africa, in spite of the protestations of all the European press, and in spite of the sympathy of all the Powers with the Boers. The Admiral puts his finger on the real defect in French administration when he alludes to the anxiety in France to create numerous well paid Govern-ment posts to increase the patronage of the politicians. Her essentially Continental temperament, he says, does not permit France to understand that a Minister of the Colonies is for her an absurdity, that prosperous Colonies and a powerful Colonial army will be only chimeras, or, rather, grave strategic and financial mistakes, so long as she does not possess a fleet necessary to make her famed and respected on the sea. What figure will France cut, he asks, in the serious events now developing in China, events of which the principal factor will be the command of the sea? The squadron system, expensive as it is, is an absolute necessity to the Power which wishes to keep and defend her vast foreign dominions. Germany understands it to perfection, and the Emperor William recently said, "What a magnificent piece of the Chinese cake we should have been able to cut off for ourselves if we had not delayed so long in providing ourselves with a war fleet which we lack!" The Admiral roundly declares that if France does not wish to lose her vast Colonial Empire a second time she must radically change her The submarine boats-about which so much fuss has been made-though serviceable, perhaps, for the defence of the coast, will never assist one jot in securing freedom of communication on the sea. The Admiral deprecates discussion in Parliament by ignorant politicians, and bitterly declares that in France everyone speaks on everything, even on that of which he knows the least.

The Admiral then turns to the question of the Colonial army, and he recalls the fact that after Fashoda there was a great outcry in France for a proper Colonial army, which would have saved Fashoda from the ignominy of having to yield. This is a radical mistake. Let us suppose, says the Admiral, that at the moment of Fashoda a powerful army could have been transported there by a wave of some magician's wand. Let us suppose, also, one or two great naval victories assuring the freedom of the Mediterranean to the French fleet for the moment. What would then happen? France would have nothing to put against the three English squadrons composed of modern cruisers which England, thanks to her Naval Defence Act, would have then been able to put in array. As a natural consequence the supplies of the supposed Colonial army at Fashoda would become impossible, and the story of Bonaparte in Egypt would have been repeated.

"POPULAR UNIVERSITIES."

A NEW SOCIAL MOVEMENT IN FRANCE.

THE Edinburgh, discussing Paris in 1900, declares that the union Mr. Morley predicts for England between the Liberal Left and the Independent Socialists has actually taken place in France. The intellectuals and the industrials have formed a mutually helpful alliance. The writer says:—

So far the clearest result of this alliance of Socialists and Liberals has been the recent foundation of the Université Populaire; scarcely three years old, it has already a college in almost every quarter of Paris and the environs, and aims at a social evolution which shall do away with the need for revolution.

The Universités Populaires are to the independent Socialists what the friendly societies and small collegia were to the Christians of the Roman Empire—a place of meeting and friendship, a mart of knowledge; they are, in the phrase of their creator, M. Deherme, a co-operative association in ideas. Nothing con be simpler than their organisation. A group of well-wishers is generally responsible for the rent; it rarely exceeds a hundred pounds a year. The subscriptions of the members (5d. a month for individuals, 71d. for families) cover the expense of lighting and fuel. Some leading spirit organises the staff of lecturers, never paid. There is, of course, in these conditions no penalty for non-attendance, but we believe there is no record of a speaker having failed in his engagement. The attendance is not very large, but regular. One thousand five hundred members are inscribed at the College of the Faubourg St. Antoine, from three to four hundred in the smaller centres, more again in some of the popular suburbs such as Montreuil or Choisy-le-Roi. The audience is chiefly composed of skilled artisans with their wives, the women often forming half the assembly. The standard of lectures is high, social and natural science being especially in request. The programmes are composed in accordance with no particular body of doctrine. . The object of these colleges, rather, is to develop thought in every direction, in all its variety, in all its infinite fecundity. "Sans doute c'est le chaos," admits the audacious innovator. But what is the universe if not a cosmos perpetually created out of chaos?

The lecturers are among the first men in France. M. Duclaux lectures on science, M. Séailles on philosophy, M. Faguet on criticism, M. Seignobos on history. To the reading rooms of these colleges, entirely recruited by voluntary contributions, the writer sends such learned periodicals as the "Annals of the Pasteur Institute" and the "Revue de Métaphysique et de Morale."

FRANCE V. ENGLAND.

A FRENCH OFFICER'S FRANKNESS.

THERE are significant signs that the idea of a French invasion of England is becoming more and more widely spread among our neighbours across the Channel. Once more the Revue des Deux Mondes is made the repository of a scheme of this kind, which, however much it may be ridiculed by British naval strategists, cannot be regarded by the politician as anything but a disturbing indication of French opinion. It is General de la Rocque who develops in more than thirty pages of the second February number his ideas on the subject, which he calls "Sketch of a Naval Programme in 1900." The conclusions at which he arrives are briefly :-

That the part of the French fleet in a war against England, and à fortiori, against any other nation, would be nothing from a defensive point of view, because none of the essential strategic, none of the vital parts, of France is within the reach of the guns of a hostile fleet. From a defensive point of view, on the contrary, the French fleet would play an extremely important part, because it would permit the utilisation of the enormous superiority of the French army by the disembarkation of forces sufficiently considerable to obtain and retain a footing in the hostile country. With cruisers, transports, and in some cases submarine vessels, the French fleet would permit of the convoy to and the disembarkation of an expeditionary force on the coast of Great Britain or Ireland, in Egypt, or elsewhere. The General's final conclusion is that, if his opinion be not taken, and if such offensive action against the territory of the British Empire were to be judged impossible, then France would be logically compelled to regard her fleet-maintained at such great expense—as an article of luxury which she should give up in order to spend the cost in increasing the efficiency of her national army.

FRANCE ON THE OFFENSIVE.

So we arrive at the conclusion that in a duel between France and England, the vital points would be in France from the point of view of defence, and in Egypt or on the territory of Great Britain from the point of view of offence. And the General declares that England is powerless to do anything which could injure the vital forces of France. In this way the General comes to the consideration of the question, What should be the objective of France in taking the offensive against England? The answer of the younger school of naval experts would be, to destroy the maritime commerce of England in order to starve her out; but the General well points out that this scheme would be difficult, if not impossible, to carry out, as the French cruisers would soon be stranded for lack of coal and supplies, the coaling-stations of the world being practically all in the hands of England. Moreover, the age of the corsairs is past. General de la Rocque lays it down as a principle that the French warships ought to be strong enough to engage those of the enemy, and to destroy or disable a number of them at least equal to their own, while at the same time rendering possible operations of a different nature designed to utilise the immense superiority of the French land forces. General is very frank about the British fleet, which, he says, has been belauded and dressed up as a bogey by time-serving and ignorant French politicians. General's opinion, our fleet is characterised by the same hypocrisy which runs all through us as a nation. It has, he thinks, a splendid external appearance, and is altogether a very well-groomed fleet (extérieur très soigne), but really it is a whited sepulchre. Inside there is the commercial instead of military intelligence, from which spring confusion and a lack of proportion between the two aims of offence and defence. Thus our latest and best cruisers have armour where it is not wanted, and are without it in their most vulnerable parts, while our naval ordnance is mediocre from every point of view. The General relates an incident which occurred in 1891, when the French Government bought some Armstrong guns in England. The firm sent over two experts with the guns to explain their working to General de la Rocque. These experts enlarged on the delicacy of the mechanism and the necessity of training the gunners who were to serve the pieces, but the General astonished them by producing, at the end of a week, a lieutenant just returned from Madagascar, an adjutant, and four or five gunners, who had mastered the weapon in every detail and indeed knew more about it than the experts themselves. experts confessed that in no other country had their pieces been put to such practical tests, whereupon the General replied that he had had at his elbow all the time ordnance of far greater destructive power combined with much greater simplicity of construction. The General can hardly find words in which to express his admiration of the French ordnance, and in this respect he portrays England lagging slowly behind her neighbour and feebly imitating her achievements. Lyddite he represents as a poor copy of the far more powerful melinite of the French. Audacity, pride, and power of gold are, he says, the real elements of the English domination, while the French being Catholics and therefore accustomed to confess their errors while at the same time exaggerating them, have allowed the marvels of wisdom, science, good sense, and conscientious labour, which France has unceasingly produced, to be depreciated, insulted, and rendered useless.

AN INVASION OF ENGLAND.

France ought, says General de la Rocque, to accumulate at Brest, Cherbourg, Toulon, Rochefort, and Lorient all the requisites for striking a decisive blow on the coast of England, Ireland, Egypt, or elsewhere. Thirty or forty thousand troops resolutely landed could not be dislodged by the wealthy and majestic regiments of Great Britain. The attack on England would be greatly helped by a number of submarine vessels, the introduction of which into the French navy is not so recent as is commonly supposed. The programme of naval construction which the General puts forward includes the significant item of transports, of which he thinks France will soon have a sufficient number. It also includes mobile cruisers in which speed would be sacrificed to armament and which would only be used in French, English, and Northern African waters. Torpedo-boat destroyers he considers useless. Altogether, the article is a disquieting indication of the feelings which probably obtain in higher French military and naval circles. It may, perhaps, be taken by optimists as a consequence of the British reverses in the earlier part of the Boer war; and yet it is difficult to read the article carefully without coming to the conclusion that it would have been written and published in any case.

"How Sacred Pictures are Tattooed" is the subject of a paper in a recent Sunday Strand, which will probably affect most readers painfully. The writer avers that clergymen of all denominations, including one bishop, have deliberately undergone this religious tattooing process. The head of Christ, the thorn-crowned head of the crucified Christ—life-size—have thus been reproduced on the living human skin. There is actually given a photograph of Da Vinci's picture of the Lord's Supper tattooed on the bare shoulders of a living woman!

THE Finot, France of the 1 present, however and M He natt influenc with th more ar One be gene really to the con guages

"Wit apers, French French product tells fir from th and av in the of the period from e British days fo choly r of its in

Fino

Russia

Spanish

conque French still to metho trouble waning waste Gover who a probal Asia. to M. avail Canad their ! Switze often though that v contin domai and N of Mr of En its bu

In ment deny that

THE GROWING DISUSE OF FRENCH.

THE editor of the Revue des Revues, M. Jean Finot, contributes an article to a recent number, "France in the war of tongues. To save the patrimony of the French language." At any other time than the present, one would naturally describe the sentiments which inspired such an article as "patriotic." Now, however, "patriotic" too often means merely jingo, however, "patriotic" too often means merely jingo, and M. Finot does not deserve to be so libelled. He naturally laments the decrease of the importance and influence of his own dainty language-a decrease which, with the low and lowering birth-rate, is likely to grow more and more serious.

One opinion expressed by M. Finot will probably not he generally shared, especially by those who have never really tried to master his language. He gives a table of the comparative difficulty of the leading European languages as follows: (ascending order) English, Italian, ce, from between ir latest wanted.

s, while

of view.

n 1891.

ng guns

he guns These

and the rve the cing, at d from

rs, who indeed pieces

eneral

anceof

reater

ly find rench

agging

g her opy of lacity.

ments

being

their

have

e, and y pro-

less.

ulate

nt all ast of forty dged

itain.

by a vhich

only hich

m of ive a rs in hich

hern

ders

tion nch

n by

the t to sion

ase.

t of bly

hat op,

orothe

on a

per

Spanish, German, French, Russian.
"Without the foreign readers who buy our books, papers, and reviews," he says, "three out of four French editors would close their houses, and as many French authors would be compelled to suspend their production." Aided by excellent diagrams, M. Finot tells first the story of the rise of the French language from the inferior rank of a secondary dialect, to be far and away the greatest vehicle of thought and culture in the world. This golden age lasted till the middle of the eighteenth century, and throughout that long period French alone would easily carry a traveller from end to end of Europe. "English, outside the British isles, was simply unintelligible." But the palmy days for French are over, and we have now the melancholy reverse of the medal, the sure and steady decrease of its influence and importance.

FRANCE CARELESS.

Finot remarks that whereas the English, Germans, and Russians usually manage to impose their language on conquered provinces, this is rarely the case with the French, which he attributes to the fact that France has still too much generosity left to condescend to sanguinary methods adopted by the other Powers. The greatest trouble is that France, instead of waking up to the waning influence of her language, does what she can to waste what advantages she possesses. The French Government has alienated the affections of the Armenians, who are now turning towards England, whom they will probably help to destroy the relics of French influence in Asia. Over Egypt, too, it is now no use sighing, thanks to M. de Freycinet. France does not even adequately avail herself of the unswerving loyalty of the French Canadians, inasmuch as she fails to encourage them in their literary efforts as she might do. In Belgium, in Switzerland, and in Slavonic countries, France is too often merely reaping what she has sown, and has no thought for the morrow. In England, M. Finot remarks, that while French is less and less studied, German is continually gaining ground. Even in its once undisputed domain of diplomacy, French cannot hold its ground, and M. Finot cites the Hague Conference and the action of Mr. Holls and Captain Mahan in persisting in the use of English. The English Foreign Office also conducts its business with several Powers in English.

A REMEDY.

In his impassioned defence of so admirable an instrument as the French language, it is hardly possible to deny M. Finot the heartiest sympathy. His remedy is that France should be a great reservoir for intellectual humanity, the adopted country of every work with new or original ideas; that she should be a kind of intellectual mother to the numerous smaller powers which centre round the three great Powers, French being the universal language into which the works of these weaker nationalities are translated, the medium through which they become widely known. Thus will the influence of French be legitimately extended and increased, while works which, written in a little known tongue, might have almost escaped attention, will be the property of the world-Cosmopolitanism, M. Finot says, is not the distinctive characteristic of the German so much as of the Frenchman. The simplification of the language and spelling reform are minor methods of extending the popularity of French, while the author would have an academic crown offered to the best foreign authors who bring out their works in French, and even suggests that a special set of prizes might be offered to the author who would give information as to the best method of spreading the language. Paris should also offer prizes to the most capable students anxious to complete their French studies in Paris.

A MASTERPIECE PORTFOLIO.

SELECTED BY LEADING ENGLISH ARTISTS.

MR. FREDERICK DOLMAN, in the Strand, writes of "the world's greatest pictures," in the opinion, that is, of our leading artists. Most of the artists, before answering the question as to which they considered the greatest picture in the world, said it was quite impossible to select any one picture as before all others. Others so modified their answers as to let it be shown that they only considered the picture they had named as preeminent in one particular-colouring, for instance, grouping or ideality, according to the special bent of the individual. artist. The results of the inquiry were as follows :-

| Artist.                         | Picture selected.                                      | By whom painted. | Where kept.               |
|---------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------|------------------|---------------------------|
| SIR L. ALMA-TADEMA,R.A. | The Disputation as tothe Sacrament.                | Raphael.         | Vatican.                  |
| K.A.                            | The Entombment of Christ.                              | Titian.          | Louvre.                   |
| W. P. FRITH,R.A.            | Sacred and ProfaneLove.                            | Titian.          | Borghese Palace,Rome. |
| SIR W. B.RICHMOND,R.A.  | Portrait of the JewellerMorett.Also mentioned: | Holbein.         | Dresden Gallery.          |
|                                 | Christ before Pilate.                                  | Tintoretto.      | Venice.                   |
| FREDERICKGOODALL,R.A.   | Miracle of St. Mark.                                   | Tintoretto.      | Venice.                   |
| Phil Morris,                    | Surrender of Breda.                                    | Velasquez.       | Madrid Gallery.           |
|                                 | Baechus and Ariadne.                                   | Titian.          | National Gallery.         |
| G. A. STOREY,A.R.A.         | Lady Mulgrave. Also mentioned:                         | Gainsborough.    | (America).                |
|                                 | The Maids of Honour.                                   | Velasquez.       | Madrid Gallery.           |
| B.W. LEADER.R.A.            | Polyphemus and Ulysses.  Also mentioned:               | Turner.          | National Gallery.         |
| 1                               | Crossing the Brook.                                    | Turner.          | National Gallery:         |
| G. F. WATTS,R.A.            | Sistine Madonna.                                       | Raphael.         | National Gallery.         |
| G. H. Bough-ton, R.A.       | Bacchus and Ariadne.                                   | Titian.          | National Gallery          |
| MarcusStone, R.A.           | Vale of Rest.                                          | Millais.         | Tate Gallery.             |
| J. M. SWAN,A.R.A.           | Lesson in Anatomy.                                     | Rembrandt        | The Hague.                |

AN EDUCATIONAL EXPERIMENT.

"DESTROY THE ROD AND REFINE THE CHILD."

PROFESSOR OLERICH, in the Strand Magazine, under the title of "The Cleverest Child in the Word," gives particulars of an educational experiment begun in 1897, upon an eight-months-old girl baby. The child was born in February, 1897, in Iowa, and she was adopted, the professor says, "to test, in a practical way, a new theory of education, which we believe to be much superior to any educational system which has heretofore been used. No attempt was made to select a particular child; on the contrary, we desired to get an average child. Hence, physical health was the only point of pedigree which we regarded as of vital importance, and even of this we knew little or nothing."

The subject was not at first very promising. "She was a pale, an almost sickly-looking, baby, with a mouth that was a little crooked, and the right side of her face considerably fuller than the left." She was also "a crybaby," but all these defects quickly disappeared, and the child is now of the average in size and weight, though certainly in nothing else.

The baby's first lesson was to amuse herself playing on the floor; her next to put herself to sleep, and here the normal part of her training ends.

The experiment has indeed upset most of the excellent old-fashioned nursery dogmas. This baby, for instance—has always been permitted to eat as much of everything as she desired. Between meals she has always eaten whenever her appetite prompted her to do so.

"Viola"—the name of this "cleverest child"—has been taught everything by play, never studying a lesson in her life (of  $3\frac{1}{3}$  years). She received her first book at

13 months.

At 17 months she could read short sentences; and at 2 years and 11 months "she could read at sight, with force and expression, almost any reading matter in the English language. She could also read German nicely before she was 3 years old. At the age of 3 years and 2 months she read English, German and French."

The colours and their varied shades, 25 national flags, the geography of the United States, and the simplest geometrical figures, were all learned before I year and 9 months. Before  $3\frac{1}{2}$  this prodigy could read numbers going into octillions. At I year and 10 months she knew the portraits of over 100 celebrities. At I year and 11 months she could point to almost all the bones in the human skeleton, and had apparently begun the study of elementary anatomy.

And so when she was precisely I year II months and 25 days old—extreme precision is observed in recording her performances :-

She passed an examination before a disinterested committee of examiners, who found that she knew 2,500 nouns by having either the pictures or the objects themselves brought before her. The committee estimated that she knew at least 500 more nouns which they could not present as objects or pictures, making a total of 3,000 nouns which she knew at this age—perhaps more nouns than the words of all parts of speech used by the average adult.

Spelling and writing soon followed, and elementary botany after them; while shortly after her third birthday it was thought high time that she should learn to typewrite, and a Smith Premier was accordingly bought for her. The result in May last was that—

She is quite proficient in translating French and German into English, and is familiar with a large number of scientific terms used in astronomy, geology, grammar, physical geography, history, etc. Her attention, her memory, her observation, her power of discrimination, her reasoning, and her ability as a critic are as marvellous as her other attainments.

This child, we are assured, is average, a statement much more incredible than any of those regarding her acquirements. Professor Olerich's desire is to show that "a child, at a very young age, can be a good reader, a skilful writer, an excellent speller, and an erudite scholar; that freedom and kindness produce far better educational results than coercion and cruelty; that interest, and not force, should be made the incentive for learning; that all learning should be in the form of play; that no injury can result to the child, no matter how much it learns, so long as it is left completely free."

THE HERALD OF A NEW ITALIAN LITERATURE.

THE Quarterly contains a glowing panegyric of Gabriele d'Annunzio, whose novels and tragedies are under review. The writer is especially eloquent on his "inviolate style, which frames all his thoughts, lucid or terrible, in words of immortal comeliness." It has brought him, he concludes, "European fame; it may herald the dawn of a new Italian literature." He has "the grand style": he will find room in the pedigree of Dante, Virgil, Sophocles, for his own descent:—

His Italian is impregnated with Dantesque idioms. Though it never flings abroad the careless graces of Boccaccio, any more than it can rival that prince of story-tellers in his tripping movement, it bears upon its firm sentences once and again the imperial seal of Leonardo da Vinci; it plays, to our astonishment, with the prettinesses of Marini; it dyes itself in the purple of ecstatic saints, like Catherine of Siena and Frate da Scarperia. It is not humorous or familiar; when, as in "Il Piacere," it apes the ugly colours of M. Zola or the corrupting elegance of M. Bourget's unregenerate days, the form seems to reject the content, and D'Annunzio appears at his worst. But his genuine manner is the Dantesque or that of Leonardo, "a thing of Nature beheld in some great glass"; it has the "preservative aroma" which art bestows on reality; when it isolates, it makes the figure immortal with some balm that no Egyptian craftsman ever knew. There are pages in this last of the moderns worthy to live by the side of any prose, though dating from Italy's golden periods. The master has told us of his obstinate effort to create an Italian that should be fit for "works of loveliness and poesy," at once latter-day and archaic, no less real than magnificent, subtle and fugitive as the music heard in a dream, curious in its "motives," while graphic as the rendering of outward and visible forms by the most objective of painters. In much of this daring attempt he has triumphed openly. The charm which his writing does in fact exercise over thousands is indisputable.

His fortune " is now at its height " :-

He has done great things; if to have attained the secret of style, and to give back the enchantments of landscape, were all, he would deserve to rank with the masters. Amid the chaos of journalism, with its piebald jargon, its vulgarities of thought and tone, he has fulfilled his own message which declares that "the word is life and perfection." Submitting to what seems a law of human growth, he takes the prose which is on men's lips, since they will not endure rhyme or formal poetry, and refines, adorns, deepens it, until it astonishes yet charms as if it were the style of gods... Instead of merely resuscitating the antique forms, the man throws himself boldly on the current of his inspiration; he snatches from painters their palette with its rainbow; from mystics their incomparable metaphors, imagery, fire of spiritual emotions; from musicians their minors and chromatics; from every art something, provided it be individual, not a fancy hung out on the void, but a fact burning as in the spectrum with its peculiar flame. In the "grey flood of Democracy"—by which he means the marsh-level that covers old institutions, yet sees no imperial Venice rising above it with palaces and towers—language remains, for those who will handle it like fine gold, an inheritance beyond the assaults of barbarism.

M. Mone with system the vicollectoo is work class itself. The been attem form that they lift a labou truth meas move char the whice second to M weal the important with intelligence in the intelligen

mer

nec

be f init for littl bro pre wor and fori ten sen of imp and cro to pro of cou ecc the dis

WO

be ibility as a statement arding her show that reader, a e scholar; ducational t, and not t; that all no injury learns, so

RATURE.

egyric of dies are nt on his , lucid or It has ; it may He has digree of Though any more s tripping again the astonishhe purple Frate da orrupting seems to rst. But ardo, "a when it that no is last of , though be fit for archaic, ne music

ic as the ective of iumphed

cise over secret of vere all, chaos of ght and at " the ns a law n's lips, refines, vere the forms, iration; ; from piritual ; from y hung with its

which sees no

wersold, an MIND v. MUSCLE.

BRAINS IN THE SOCIALIST STATE.

M. FOUILLÉE, in a paper in the Revue des Deux Mondes on "Mental Labour and Collectivism," deals with that familiar objection to the various collectivist systems, that they do not take into account sufficiently the value of mental and moral work; in other words, collectivism as a serious system of economics is based too much upon manual labour and the interests of the working classes. The liberal professions are frequently classified as unproductive, and the calling of literature itself is regarded as parasitical.

The nature and value of mental labour have always been a great difficulty with the collectivist. Marx attempted to reduce intellectual labour to a condensed form of manual labour; but this is rather like arguing that diamonds and coal are equally valuable because they are both made of carbon. The effort necessary to lift a hundredweight of goods affords no key to the brain labour of a Darwin, a Socrates, or a Descartes. The truth is, says M. Fouillée, that brain work cannot be measured by material standards.

MIND IN INDUSTRIAL PROGRESS.

M. Fouillée goes on to lay down certain laws in the development of work. The first is the progressive predominance of mental labour; this is exhibited in the movement of science and scientific industries which is characteristic of modern times. Side by side we have the progress of invention and of imitation; the first of which is manifestly by far the most intellectual, for the second is really only mechanical reproduction. According to M. Tarde, capital-which must not be confused with wealth-represents the inventions, while labour represents the imitations. There is yet a third kind of work which Marx has ignored: that moral energy-perhaps even more elusive than intellectual work-which consists in the sustained attention, perseverance, patience and courage, without which not only the industrial world, but also the intellectual would collapse.

FREEDOM A NECESSITY.

M. Fouillée's second law is the progressive liberty of mental work, and indeed of all work. It is obviously a necessary condition of the greatest intellectual work to be free from rules. The inventor must have his individual initiative uncontrolled; the increase of civilisation makes for the increase of this liberty. The savage who does little or no work is hardly to be distinguished from his brother savage; while the civilised citizens of any country present notable differences one from another. Thus, work itself tends to emphasise the individual element, and progresses more and more towards the personal form. Side by side, however, with this individualising tendency is an opposite and socialising tendency, in the sense that every age inherits the great results of the work of previous ages. This, however, does not minimise the importance of the inspiration of the individual. Scientific and industrial progress are in no sense the work of the crowd, which, indeed, has as a rule been bitterly hostile to every great labour-saving invention. How will the proposed Collectivist Society organise the workers who work with their brains? How can the eight hours' day be imposed upon a Victor Hugo, and how can the value of his work be estimated? Newton's law of gravitation could not be described as an immediate addition to the economic resources of mankind; Newton, therefore, in the economic State, must be ranked below the man who discovers a new material for candles. Again, time is often required. The contemporaries of Galileo could not foresee that his discovery of the satellites of Jupiter would have the effect of saving many ships with valuable lives and cargo from being wrecked.

THE TRANSFORMATION OF MUSCLE TO MIND.

We come to the next law—namely, that material labour is transformed gradually into mental labour. The age of machinery has obliged manufacturers of all kinds to become more intellectual, and the management of the machines themselves has had the same effect on the workers. Broadly speaking, it is the machine that undertakes the manual labour, and enables the worker to employ his brains far more than if the machine had never been invented. In France at this moment steam does as much work as would require the muscles of 105,000,000 men; and as there are only about 10,000,000 of adult workers, it follows that every French working man has on the average under his control the equivalent of ten workers, whose labour he is able to direct.

SOCIAL AMELIORATION.

This bring us to another law—the progressive amelioration, by means of mental labour, of the social condition of the manual labourers. M. Fouillée comes to the conclusion that, though there are some important elements of truth in Socialism, considered as a method of social progress by the means of Society itself and of social laws, yet there are in collectivism, and, above all, in communism, vast hypotheses chiefly based upon a negative criticism of what exists. Human progress is menaced by a system which apparently leaves no room for intellectual and moral effort, or for the inspiration of genius. The Chinese mandarin who allows his nails to grow in long and beautiful spirals, in order to show that he has never done any manual work, is not really more ridiculous than a system which would treat as an idle fellow the man who only uses his hand to hold a pen, and only works with his brain.

A Year's Plunge into Paris Slums.

It is a "mysterious disappearance" truly which the June Young Man records, quite after the manner of "the romantic elopement" made prominent in the daily press, only in this case the mistress of the disappearing man was Philanthropy. Says the writer:—

Some years ago a good many people were talking of the disappearance of an English author, who had suddenly left his home and friends, and gone nobody knew whither. There was not the slightest clue to his whereabouts, and the author had left nothing behind which would suggest an explanation of his disappearance. He was rich, had many friends, and moved in good society, and at least one of the books he had given to the world had created an enormous sensation. The strange disappearance was a nine days' wonder in the circle in which it became known. . . Then it was cleared up by the appearance of the author amongst his friends. He came as suddenly as he had left a year before, and it transpired that he had spent the year in Paris, among the poorest of the poor in the French capital, living and working in the midst of the lowest stage of poverty in France. The man who thus startled his friends was Mr. Egmont Hake, the cousin and biographer of General Gordon.

Mr. Hake has always had a deep sympathy with the poor, and he had resolved to know the poverty of Paris from the inner side. Closing his banking account, he cut himself off from his friends, deprived himself of his income, and abandoned his position in Society for twelve months, arriving in Paris disguised as a workman, with barely a penny in his pocket. He was compelled to do a hundred odd jobs to earn his living, and by-and-by he fell among the rag-pickers of the boulevards, and, sating in his lot with them, he stayed amongst them for a year, studying their ways and manners, and living as they lived.

LESSONS FROM EUROPE.

SOME THINGS AMERICANS MAY LEARN.

THE HON. S. J. BARROWS writes in a recent Forum on "Things we may Learn from Europe." He opens his paper by remarking on the superior airs of Americans—even naturalized Americans from Europe—in regard to the backwardness of everything European, and then proceeds by way of contrast to give a considerable list of European customs and institutions which he prefers to their European substitutes. The first of these relates to travel.

TRAVEL.

We have good sleepers in America for night travel; what we lack is the day-sleeper. By stuffing your coat between your head and the window pane in an American car you may catch a nap, and you are somewhat better off if you can hire a chair in a car. The European car has the great advantage of a high back for your head and a cushioned corner. By pulling down the arm of the seat you have a good pillow, and by pulling down the hood over the lamp at night you have a comfortable sleeping-car. Our own Pullman cars have one great defect—the overhead racks are inadequate; so that there is no convenient place for hand baggage. The electric light has been introduced to some extent for lighting steam trains abroad. Our Pullmans would be greatly improved if each section were lighted in this way; also the terrible heat which makes them travelling ovens in summer would thus be much reduced.

The English baggage system is superior to the American, and "baggage smashers" are unknown. A good cab system is unknown in America, while France is far ahead of her in the utilisation of motor cars. England, France, Germany, Switzerland, and Norway are all ahead of America in road building.

POSTS.

In postal matters America has also something to learn:—

At his London hotel there are fifteen deliveries a day. He may drop a card in a post box at eight in the morning, get an answer at noon, and mail a reply which will get to his friend before evening. Within the last three years, whenever the Postoffice Bill has come up in the House of Representatives, there has been discussion as to the practicability of the pneumatic dispatch. One might as well discuss the practicability of the telephone. They would smile at such suggestions in London or Paris, where a slight addition to the postage will secure a rapid delivery by pneumatic dispatch. Another great convenience in the postal system abroad is the method of paying money orders. One is not obliged to go half a mile to a branch, or three miles to the central post-office to get his money. The postman who brings the order brings the money with him. You receipt for it, and that is the end of it.

America has inherited from England the most awkward system of measurement in the world, and America is apparently waiting on England before she adopts the metrical system. In measures, weight, temperature and pitch, America should follow continental Europe.

POLICE.

"If a vote could be taken by American travellers a shout of gratitude and admiration would go up for the courtesy and efficiency of the London police":—

The traveller gets the impression that this is no accident, but is due to an admirable system of administration; and he is right. After a thorough examination of the whole London police system, with the help of a friend who is an expert in such matters, I am convinced that it is the system that secures and trains and regulates an excellent personnel; and it is the personnel which illustrates the excellence of the system. This is due partly to freedom from all political influence in appointments, and partly to a system of checks by which it is almost impossible for a policeman to yield to bribery and corruption without being detected. The police show remarkable self-restraint in exercising their power and authority; and one reason for this is, that arrests are not stimulated by the wretched system of fees which has prevailed in so many parts of the United States. "We are taught not to interfere too much," said a patrolman; and if an emergency had arisen, I am sure that this brave fellow would not have made the mistake of interfering too little.

PRISONS.

America should also adopt the Continental system of giving prisoners a share of their earnings, and at the same time imitate Europe in paying more attention to discharged convicts. In municipal matters we can teach America much.

THRIFT.

Europe might learn from America to dispense with lotteries; but, on the other hand, she does more to encourage small investors:—

There is also ample provision, which scarcely exists in this country, for loaning money to the poorer classes at comparatively low rates of interest. This is provided for, notably in France and Italy, by that union of business and philanthropy which is seen in the great Monté di Pietá of Milan, and similar institutions in France. In some places it is under government control; in others, as in Milan, it is operated by a corporation. In Milan it was organized forty years before Columbus discovered America, and to-day some 8,000,000 dols. are invested in various activities. The institution receives more than half a million pledges every year, all but 10 per cent, of which are redeemed. I did not discover that this exercises any demoralising effect on the community.

ART AND INDUSTRY.

In art, of course, America must seek foreign inspiration. But in business methods America, if she has little, might take a leaf from Germany's book:—

Concerning business methods in general, our consuls abroad report that Americans have a great deal to learn from Europe in regard to the introduction of goods into new markets; and from no country have we so much to learn as from Germany. This is of special importance now that China and Siberia furnish a new field for American enterprise, for the products of our brain and soil. The peddler in rural districts has a great advantage over the man who paints his advertisement on a fence and expects his customers to come to him; he has the advantage of showing his goods and talking them up. This is as true of China as of New England or the Black belt; it is not enough to advertise American goods as we advertise them in this country; they must be shown and they must be talked up. A gentleman who is familiar with Siberia assures me that the Germans are making an immense headway, because they learn the language and go into every new settlement with their wares. We must also learn to pack our goods as attractively as goods are packed abroad.

Altogether Mr. Barrows seems to see a good deal in our effete institutions worthy of imitation. But unhappily all his flattering—as when he speaks of better European telephones and tramways—does not apply to us.

IN July, the first number of the Newfoundland Magazine was published. It contains articles on topics relating to Newfoundland.

THE July number of the Revue de PArt is an Exposition number, and the various articles it contains are devoted to French art—Painting, Sculpture, Medals, Silverwork, etc.

STORIES of escape from Boer prisons give a fresh interest to similar narratives from long ago, such as, for example, Eveline Godley gives in Longman's of the way three English midshipmen got out of French prisons in 1807. They undermined the gate of their prison.

vigoro declar of war

He intole the co

the En what the ve evider consur contin quent finance Europ As prolifi important continuation and the continuation are continuation are continuation and the continuation are continuation are continuation and the continuation are continuation and continuation are continuation are continuation are continuation and continuation are continuation are continuation are continuat erisis war for The indee I the since later In M. Z

broug

The reagain responsible that out—generated, to repity, reign about surel

Y man A pres we l are from war

the sm: has

gra rec ver

in

ted. The eir power s are not prevailed ght not to mergency not have vstem of l at the ntion to in teach se with nore to in this ratively France which is institucontrol;

n Milan covered sted in half a ich are ralising ration.

might abroad ope in from This is a new n and e over ets his g his New ertise must ho is ng an into rn to n our y all pean

land pics posiare lals,

resh , for way s in

M. ZOLA ON WAR.

THE North American Review for April contains a vigorous onslaught on war by M. Zola. He begins by declaring that his whole being rebels against the idea of war: "I am amazed at the bloody uselessness of war."

THE VALUE OF THE HAGUE CONFERENCE.

He passes under review the strain, yearly growing more intolerable, of the accumulated armaments of Europe, and the consequent dread of complete economic collapse. He

In the Conference held at The Hague there was an indication of this fear. I do not care to analyse the reasons which prompted the Emperor of Russia to convoke this Conference, but, be they what they might, they were born of the situation, they were in the very air. All nations are preoccupied. It is a universally evident fact that the war budget of each people is gradually consuming its fortune and that such a condition of affairs cannot continue indefinitely, unless the nations come to grief. Consequently, to the question of army equipment may be referred the financial, political and social anxiety now prevailing throughout Europe.

As has been said, the Conference of The Hague has been prolific of no practical results; still, I consider it a highly important event, a very propitious occurrence, inasmuch as it brought up the question. It showed the uneasiness of nations, indicated that they fully realise that the social and economic crisis through which they are passing is the issue of the terrible war footing on which the people of Europe are obliged to live. The opinion is an intelligent one: the existing situation is indeed awful, and may, in the near future, lead to catastrophe. I therefore consider the Conference of The Hague important, since it called forth a momentous question which must sooner or later be solved.

"THE LAST ABOMINATION."

In the increasing costliness and deadliness of war M. Zola sees its approaching end. He says :-

The further we go the more impossible war seems to become, the more it appears to develop into a crime of high treason against humanity, an atrocity for which no nation would be responsible. If present difficulties have reached such a pitch that we could not lay down our arms without first fighting it out-if, in the near future, we were to suffer from a sort of general conflagration, I think that war would be forever at an end, because after the great massacre the nations would be unfit to resume the struggle, and exhausted, filled with horror and pity, they would be convinced that henceforth peace should reign among them. Yes, the whole world would hold this last abomination in such remorseful abhorrence, that warfare would surely die.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN STRUGGLE.

Yet M. Zola frankly admits the fascination of the martial ideal. It is "grandly poetic":-

And that it is poetic may be learned by observing what is at present taking place in the Transvaal. Since the war broke out we have beheld all nations intensely interested; the newspapers are replete with telegraphic dispatches, and all correspondence from that quarter is eagerly perused, even we, the enemies of war, reading it most attentively.

He finds "the almost universal sympathy expressed for the Boers" to be readily explicable. The Transvaal is a small country struggling against a colossal empire, and has fought for its freedom with exceptional bravery.

WHY M. ZOLA DOES NOT "INTERVENE."

The splendid victory which M. Zola won by his action in the Dreyfus case may perhaps excuse the somewhat grandiose air with which he refers to the letters he has received-especially from Holland-soliciting his "intervention" in the South African dispute, as though he were one of the Great Powers. His reasons for declining to intervene strike one as rather lame :-

In the first place, I was and am still ignorant of the primary cause of this war; I have not studied the question, and its close consideration was something of which my occupation would not permit. Therefore, it would have been difficult for me to decide either in favour of England or the Transvaal.

Secondly, the question was a political one. Thirdly, he would not be listened to by England. Fourthly, the Boers could take care of themselves. Lastly,

I had but just spent eleven months in England, where I received the most touching hospitality, and I felt that it would ill become me to interfere and thereby displease the English people, who had treated me with such sympathy and discretion.

He acknowledges while he deplores the "old warlike atavism" in the blood "which prompts us to applaud the conqueror even though he is at fault."

"THE REAL HUMAN STRUGGLE."

Nevertheless, war is doomed because it is useless. "The democratic movement, the great Socialist movement" now advances. "The real human struggle is no longer on the field of battle, but on that of labour." Wage-labour must pass as slave-labour has passed :

The contention that we witness is really between capital and labour, and will eventually lead us to that other state which, as yet, is not clearly defined, but which will surely exact a total reorganisation of labour and bring about a new distribution of riches . . . It is certain that in this future society war will be unheard of because the reorganisation of labour will everywhere beget greater solidarity, bind the different nations closer together, either by arbitration or some other means of which we have, as yet, formed no conception. War cannot be a factor in this future state which the struggles of a closing century will link to the century about to dawn. It will be doomed to disappear, for it will be incompatible with the new condition of

"WAR'S LAST AGONY."

Therefore it is no dream that "we are witnessing war's last agony," "the last fitful glow in the dying embers of war." Even in France "the martial ideal is on the wane": the contradiction between the nation as army under strict discipline, and the same nation as a free democracy, may explain certain recent and untoward events. He "would that France might be the handmaid of the new order." For "thought is supreme: it breaks swords and stops the cannon's roar. The world was never positively conquered except by thought."

M. Zola admits and laments the present "alarming recrudescence of militarism" in the United States and in England. He says :-

It can be clearly foreseen that if England should continue to meet with reverses in the Transvaal or, if victorious, should later be forced to defend herself, or to attack stronger nations, she would hurriedly adopt conscription and exact military service from her subjects. This contingency is a serious one and shows that England is about to enter upon a new phase of her history.

WAR KILLING WAR.

Nevertheless, I consider these terrifying symptoms the result of that ever-increasing uneasiness which is pushing to extremes the dread of war, is goading nations on to self-destruction, forcing them to make extravagant preparations for war in the hope that they will never again have to fight. The present crisis will, I feel, be the last, and is undoubtedly war's death-cry. It is war killing war.

THE story of Paternoster Row, "the holiest street in England," is told by Mr. J. E. Chamberlain in the Temple Magazine for August.

RELICS AND THEIR CULT.

IN the Revue de Paris M. Luchaire gives a curious account of the part which the veneration of relics has played in the religious life of the Continent. He points out that not only the archæologist, but the passing visitor to the French Exhibition, cannot but be struck by the extraordinary collection of reliquaries gathered together in the smaller of the two Art Palaces.

together in the smaller of the two Art Palaces.

There may be seen exposed to the gaze of the curious and of the indifferent, relics which have been venerated for centuries, notably the extraordinary golden idol encrusted with precious stones, known to those interested in such matters as the image of "St. Faith, the Virgin of Conques." St. Faith is reputed to have worked miracles for over a thousand years; innumerable pilgrims have passed before her shrine, bringing her offerings and imploring her intercession. During the Middle Ages this image actually owned property, not only all over France, but in England, Spain and Italy. Occasionally she was taken a tour among her properties, but she does not seem ever to have visited this country! These almost royal progresses were a source of great interest and enthusiasm to the towns and villages through which St. Faith passed, and whence she was credited with working numerous miracles. After such a past there seems something grotesque and melancholy in the thought of poor St. Faith playing her part in the great Raree Show now being held on the banks of the Seine.

AS AMULETS.

Relics played an almost incredibly important part in old Christendom; instead of swearing with the aid of a Bible, a witness in those days called God to witness his truth by placing his hand on a relic. When the plague broke out in a city the town relics—which generally consisted of the limb of some great saint, a piece of the true Cross, or even a portion of the garment of a martyrwere brought out of the reliquaries and taken in procession through the streets. Before starting on a long journey or on a dangerous expedition, the traveller began by making a pilgrimage to some holy place sanctified as having once been the dwelling, or as having now possession of the relic, of a well-known saint; and also he would try, or his friends would attempt to procure for him some little relic, which was placed as a kind of amulet either in the hilt of his sword or in a small bag round his neck. The value of a relic differed according to the holiness of the saint or martyr with whom it was connected. Then, as now, Jerusalem was the most frequented place of Christian pilgrimage, but each country had its own "holy places."

EDUCATIONAL VALUE.

France was fortunate in the possession of the Crown of Thorns, and each of the Apostles was represented by a relic, including a lock of hair of St. Peter. Less likely to be authentic were objects supposed to have been touched by the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. Great kings and princes knew that they could give no greater pleasure to their friends and vassals than by presenting them with a relic. The populace learnt their Bible history through their relics, and one town famous for its objects of the kind proudly boasted of possessing a little piece of the manger from Bethlehem, a cupful of the incense brought by the Magis, a finger of St. John the Baptist, and a lock of the hair of St. Mary Magdalene. The higher religious authorities, successive Popes, and various bishops made vigorous attempts to stem this cult, which often degenerated into mere idolatry; but even when it was decided that no relic should be shown of which the authenticity was not more or less proved by tradition, the populace became exceedingly angry and clung to the reliquaries more determined than ever.

A MISSING HEAD.

One of the most authentic and interesting of mediæval relics was the body of Saint Geneviève, the patroness of Paris. In 1162 the terrible news went forth that the saint's head had disappeared, stolen by some too ardent devotee. The then king, Louis VII., made it known that if the head was not replaced by a certain day he would have all the monks in the Priory of Saint Geneviève, where the relic had been kept, severely beaten. But as sometimes happens on less important occasions, the threat had its desired effect, and when in the presence of the King and the whole Court the reliquary was opened, the saint's head was found intact. It not unfrequently happened that several towns believed themselves to be in possession of the same relic, and this caused not a little scandal.

Even to-day in republican France there is no town, and very few villages, that has not its set of relics, and now, as then, additions are constantly made to them. But the clergy do not encourage the cult of miracle-working relics, and look with suspicion on any stories of the efficacy of touching a relic. Belief in their power seems, however, to be engrafted in human nature. Even now many miracles are said to take place yearly at Ars, which is of course full of relics of the famous curé, who would doubtless have been the first to deprecate the uses to which his reputation for holiness has been turned by his zealous countrymen and countrywomen.

"Watts's Quality of Vision."

IT is a very beautiful appreciation of "the art of Watts" which Mr. Arthur Symons contributes to the Fortnightly Review. The following passage is at once summary and suggestive of the whole study:—

More than most painters, most at least of those painters who have the genuine pictorial sense, Watts's quality of vision is conditioned by a moral quality of mind. He sees nobly, he sees tenderly, he sees disinterestedly. There is a little picture of the head of a donkey, full of a perfectly simple feeling for a despised animal taken for once frankly on its own merits, despised animal taken for once lankly on its own ments, without disdain and without dishonouring pity, which seems to me to indicate with great clearness the peculiarly honest quality of his imagination. I do not always feel that in every one of his allegories he is quite sure of the limits of pictorial expression, that he surrenders himself quite fully to the thing seen, without undue confidence in the meaning behind it. But the mind which sees visible things as the symbols or messengers of moral ideas has conceived a whole world upon canvas in which there is not a mean or trivial corner. He paints nakedness with the strenuous and manly purity of one to whom the body is the divinest thing in the world, and he paints the faces of men with the passionate and interpreting and surrendering intuition of one to whom the soul is the divinest part of the body. His landscape is that of one for whom the finger of God is continually creating the earth over again, day by day, at sunrise, at twilight, and at sunset. A great joy breaks out of all his work, as if the face of man and the body of woman, and the form and colour of the earth and sky, were not so much the slaves and recipients of light, waiting for the moment in which they should become worthy of art, but themselves radiated light out of their own substance, and art were rather awaiting upon the moment in which it should apprehend something which was already there all the while. And so it is that the portraits, always so beautiful as pictures, seem always to show an understanding of the people who have sat for them, more, probably, than the people themselves have ever had.

IN the Alfred E cally of fortune to the rovende there are memory. less degre mental in our unjos or worry fatigue si there, sir interest e of life ar and at of least suff In the art, and great tha

even tha

The n

below th

and tur

pictureso in the co highland in their not sim outline view Æ as well Abov making Eastern azure a attempt idea of odours light up of gloss vine an given i yucca a the ver

> The lovely. fortress shadow familia foreland into ou of the s surf, di nook a opaline of sight historic capacit and ag delight one sm broken

empara about th

With

SICILY AS A HOLIDAY RESORT.

shown oved by

ry and

ing of ève, the nt forth

y some made it certain

f Saint

everely

portant

hen in rt the intact.

elieved

nd this town, s, and

them.

iracle-stories power Even t Ars,

e lises

ed by ert of

o the once

who ion is

y, he

for a erits.

seems every torial

thing

But

ngers

as in aints

hom the nder-

f the

God,

ut of

and hich

ight

was aits,

der-

bly,

In the American Catholic Quarterly for July, Mr. Alfred E. P. Raymund Dowling writes most enthusiastically of a summer in Sicily, which it has been his good fortune to enjoy. He says:—

To those who seek to make their travels a store of fruitful provender whereon the mind may feed in the afterglow of life, there are few places which provide so rich a feast for the memory. All true travel must be accompanied by a greater or less degree of bodily discomfort, but in the retrospect only the mental impressions endure, and our thought then will transport our unjostled bodies over the scenes of the past without fatigue or worry. Sicily does not demand any unusual share of this fatigue such as is commonly supposed to be necessary for a visit there, since the railway now makes all places that are of supreme interest easily accessible. At Palermo there exists every luxury of life and inducement to make it a winter and spring residence, and at other places there are to be found hotels which are at least sufficient for the traveller's needs.

In the combination of its varied history, its relics of ancient art, and beauty of nature and climate, Sicily affords a charm so great that Egypt occurs to the mind as its sole competitor, and even that fails in respect to the physical aspects.

ITS ROMANTIC BEAUTY.

The mountains—that girdle the greater part of the island from below the western Eryx, circle round along the northern coast and turn again down the eastern to Ætna—give the land its picturesque aspect of configuration, for they leave but a small extent of level ground unbroken by spurs from the main ridge in the centre, and no spot is out of sight of these sheltering highlands. The honeycombed limestone and lava that prevail in their composition are the very materials to render a country not simply fruitful, but luxuriant, and to furnish it with varied outline and romantic spots, while from almost every point of view Ætna itself is visible, and is a source of awe and wonder as well as of grandeur in the landscape.

Above all, the gorgeous sun irradiates mountain and valley, making them to "laugh and sing" in the language of the Eastern Psalmist, flooding the panorama with every tint of azure and golden light from morn till eve, and defying all attempts to find a nomenclature of colour that will convey any idea of its varying splendour. The air is fragrant with the odours from citron and jessamine, fiery globes of pomegranate light up the thickets, orchards of orange and lemon with leaves of glossy green, grey oliveyards, vineyards of graceful native vine and purpling grape, to which the town of Marsala has given its name, the sombre carot, the soaring aloe, hedges of yucca and prickly pear, flowers and shrubs creeping down to the very shores or hanging in festoons and masses from the broken cliffs; in short, everything that can charm the eye and emparadise the senses is to be found lavished by Mother Nature about this bright island.

ITS LOVELY COAST-LINE.

The configuration of the steep and rugged coast-line is equally lovely. The Bay of Palermo, with its guardian mountains like fortresses to protect its entrance, and the Bay of Catania, shadowed by lordly Ætna seated on his snowy throne, these are familiar from repute; but the whole coast is fretted by broad forelands of warmly glowing hills whose rocky barriers broken into outlying crags form deep recesses which echo to the whish of the sunny sea; masses of black lava rock, set amid a creamy surf, diversify the line of shore, while a rich flora occupies every mook and cranny and responds with glowing colour to the opaline iridescence of the waters. But it is not only the senses of sight and smell that are captivated, for every spot teems with historic memories, appealing to our historic sense and intellectual capacity, deepening the enjoyment, so that one goes back again and again to the lavish bounty of the physical and mental delights of the island, as Cardinal Newman once said, like "as one smells again and again at a sweet flower."

GREEK TEMPLES.

With the exception of Athens, nowhere, even in Greece itself, are such fine remains of that country's art to be seen as are found at Girgenti, Segesta, Selinunte and Syracuse. Some of the most magnificent temples that the Grecian architect ever produced still exist here, and a dominant desire in the mind of every intelligent visitor to the island is to see those that stand erect. But although the larger number of the existing remains of Greek art lie overthrown, yet there are three temples standing erect, while others are embodied in churches. It would be a good thing if no one were allowed to take the higher classical forms in our schools or become teachers at our universities in classical subjects unless he had travelled in the countries where Greek and Roman works are to be seen. A few months' study of these to a man already well read in their history is a duplication of all he knows, and brings a life and reality into his teachings that saves time and brightens the labour of the pupil.

All the temples in Sicily are in the style called Doric, from being perfected in the Doric cities of Greece, those first art schools of Europe. Like the Norman style in England, it is marked by its simplicity, solidity, and impressiveness, and was governed by strict rule, simple proportion, and pure harmony.

THE GATE OF PARADISE.

But the study of these temples would take up a greater portion of our space than we now propose to give it, and we return to a review of the eastern coast of Sicily as that most sought by the traveller in search of natural beauty, and because physically and historically it is the most interesting. It is hard to compare lovely scenery, and probably unfair to do so, but most persons will register in their memories the journey from Messina to Syracuse as perhaps the most singularly attractive and beautiful of any in Europe. The towns along this coast—Messina, Taormina, Catania and Syracuse—are each worthy of a visit. Messina is throned against a background of castled rocks and pine-crested hills that wander into the distance, gradually rising in height and grandeur. There is not the spaciousness and scope about it that Palermo, its rival in commerce, presents, and the mountains press upon one from all sides save that of the sea.

But we must hasten on, for Messina is, as it were, but the gate of Paradise, and only the beginning of a coast drive southwards that exceeds all others with which we already are acquainted. The scenery increases in romantic beauty as we advance; on one side we have rocky islets set amid opalesque waters, deepening into sapphire blue and bounded in the distance across the straits by the Calabrian Mountains; on the other, picturesque crags and castle-topped heights succeed one another in riotous profusion, and one wishes to stop at a dozen spots to let their extreme loveliness sink into the memory.

In the railway it is difficult to know on which side to turn, both land and sea present such ravishing aspects. Inland broad watercourses down which the winter torrents rushed are now, in May, dry and stony, and are being traversed by oxen-carts. They lead up into deep ravines in the mountains, with sides broken and rugged, but green with citrons and pomegranates whose fragrance fills the air.

EDEN.

We had the good fortune to be at Taormina when all visitors were gone; no worrying guardians, beggars or touts dogged our steps, and the quiet life of the town was undisturbed. The beauty of the spot was penetrating in its intensity, and one could not but think that the effect of living in such scenes must have influenced the thought of such a highly-strung, simple people as were the ancient Greeks.

Life here might be like that in Eden, for earth seemed full of heaven, and sin alone a discord in its harmony. Taormina is a place at which to stay for a long time if the traveller be desirous of restful beauty and comfort: it is an ideal spot for any one having reading or writing to do, or for convalescence from illness or worry.

In the Temple Magazine for August the Rev. H. R. Haweis has an article on Hymns and Hymn-Singing. In the same magazine Mr. A. E. Hanscomb publishes an article on Some Famous Choirs.

THE ITALIAN REVIEWS.

ITALIAN VIEWS ON CHINA.

THE China trouble looms large in the Italian reviews; no less than five articles dealing with various phases of the subject appear in the Nuova Antologia (July 1st and 16th) alone. Most of the articles describe the country and its customs. The most noteworthy pronouncement on the subject is from the pen of Professor C. Lombroso, who, taking the China embroglio as his text, protests energetically against the blind confidence that European nations repose in the diplomacy of their accredited representatives. Diplomats, he declares, give themselves importance with a great display of silence and mystery, and in reality only occupy themselves with sport and social functions and the corps de ballet! They keep their governments in total ignorance of all that ought to be known; and so we have not only Italy, but countries like Germany and England, displaying an amazing ignorance of a nation like the Chinese, among whom they have been officially represented for years. It is said that Admiral Seymour did not even possess a reliable topographical map of the country round Tientsin! Professor Lombroso, unlike most Italian writers of the moment who urge their country to assert herself in the Far East, rejoices that Italy has no cause to pursue an aggressive and costly policy towards China. He sums up the situation in these pregnant sentences:—

When I hear certain politicians exclaim: "See, anti-militarism has gone bankrupt, for everything points to a vast increase in existing armaments in order to meet the needs of the time," I reply that the very opposite is true, that what we should say is that diplomacy has gone bankrupt, for instead of curbing the rapacious impetuosity of the various nations it spurs them forward blindfolded in directions where they are bound to meet with disasters owing to the nature of the climate and of the people they wish to overcome and subdue; whereas if we knew how to curb their senseless covetousness we could enjoy the peace and happiness which would spring from a reciprocal understanding between the nations of Europe, who would only send forth their armies to battle on behalf of one or other of those noble ideals which prove themselves the best of all allies in time of war.

An anonymous writer in the Rivista Politica e Letteraria (July 16th) declares that the cause of civilisation is much hindered in China by the missionaries, who are the source of all the recent trouble. "Not only are conversions for the most part purely formal, but they merely serve to deprive the convert of certain natural virtues while clothing him in all our vices, whereas he remains entirely alien to our good qualities." He would replace religious missionaries by purely civil functionaries. In international politics the writer foresees a new triple alliance between England, the United States and Japan, who are all interested in asserting the commercial principle of the open door as opposed to the territorial designs of Russia and Germany, and he urges his country to side with England in the coming struggle.

The Rassegna Nazionale publishes a very sympathetic sketch of Father Hecker, the founder of the Paulist Congregation, round whose life, it will be remembered, so much of so-called "Americanism" centred. It also publishes translations of the recent letters of Archbishop Ireland to the Duke of Norfolk and to Cardinal Rampolla, which have produced a recurrence of ecclesiastical controversy concerning the American prelate.

The Civiltà Cattolica is enabled to publish the latest Latin poem from the pen of Neander Heraclius, the pseudonym of Leo XIII. It is an appeal to a youth, Rufus, to amend his ways, and is stated to have occupied the leisure moments of the aged Pontiff quite recently.

MRS. GLADSTONE:

WIFE AND PHILANTHROPIST.

DEAN WICKHAM contributes to Good Words a sketch of "Mrs. Gladstone as seen from near at hand." Of he wifely devotion one pathetic anecdote is given :-

Her efforts were unresting, and rarely unsuccessful, to economise his strength and time by giving him all the comfort of home and none of its worries. It is a touching witness in a small matter, to the master-purpose that in the wanderings of he failing life one of the very last fancies which expressed itself it ready for him was after time. She scolded the nurse and sen urgent messages, and then turning, as she thought, to him, with her old tact changing her voice that he might not guess that there was any delay or difficulty, said, "Shall you be ready soon to start, darling?"

But the writer brings also to view her philanthropic initiative :-

The Newport Market Refuge was due to her initiation. She got together the committee which found the disused slaughterhouses in Soho, in which the Refuge was first established, and partly by means of meetings, at which Mr. Gladstone spoke, partly by endless personal correspondence, and by appeals party by entress personal correspondence, and by appears through The Times, she raised the funds both for the start and for the subsequent developments. It was a new departure in the effort to grapple with the problem of the shelterless.

The Free Convalescent Home, so long located at Woodford Hall, like the Industrial School attached to the Newport Market Refuge and her own Orphanage for Boys at Hawarden, grew out of the needs of which she had had personal experience in the London Hospital during the great cholera epidemic in 1867. There were two novelties in her scheme: the absence of nomination, payment, etc., and the attachment of the Convalescent Home to a great hospital. As Mrs. Gladstone had been its foundress, so she watched over it, visiting it constantly.

One incident in the romance of philanthropy may be cited :-

She was travelling down to Woodford. The footman had taken her ticket when she started, and she had no money, having left her purse at home, or (as she often did) emptied it. On the way she entered into conversation with a sad-looking young lady in the carriage and learned, by degrees, her trouble —a sick husband whom she was just sending off for a voyage to Australia as a chance for his life, but whom she could not afford to accompany. In the interest of the story she overran her station. As she got out, remembering that she had no money, she borrowed a shilling of her travelling companion, and then gave her her address in St. James's Square and asked her to call, telling her that she would see what could be done The same evening, at a smart dinner, she told the story with such effect, that with her own promised contribution, there was enough to pay the second passage to Australia. Next morning the young wife came and with her to the door her husband, who was afraid she might have been hoaxed, but she was warmly received, and the story being fully verified, she was made happy by being enabled to accompany her husband on his voyage.

She never had a thought of personal risk or trouble or fatigue. It struck no one as anything but what was natural in her that in the first hours after Mr. Gladstone's death she should have driven up the village to comfort the new-made widow of a collier who had been killed that morning in a mining accident.

WITH the exception of a good sketch of Baden-Powell, noticed elsewhere, and another of the series of articles on Lord Rosebery, the August number of the Woman at Home is composed of the lightest tales and storyettes.

CHARITY v. SMOKE is the title of an ingenious study by Harold Macfarlane in the August Sunday Magazine. It springs from the fact that the nation annually spends about £11,000,000 on charity, and over £26,000,000 on tobacco.

GEF "The for Ju seasor the wo the m Every and ir in it, a be his

In p present poets i

So To that a out of Dante and wa pride : The M So The necha Their same u It is I world their li be sore surpris and de

But call h gener Doe affecti holdin throttl to the ideal. death. expres throttl should motor should the hi believ thousa or as westcause engine brothe

Wh not h and t his ey life makin the pr

they n

past s the w

THE ENGINE DRIVER AS POET.

GERALD STANLEY LEE contributes a fine paper on "The Poetry of a Machine Age" to the Atlantic Monthly for June. It may be read with advantage in the travelseason of the year. Mr. Lee contends that "the poets of the world are the men who pour their passions into it, the men who make the world over with their passions. Everything that these men touch, as with some strange and immortal joy from out of them, has the thrill of beauty in it, and exultation and wonder." This might be said to be his text:—

In proportion as we are more creative in creating machines at present than we are in creating anything else, there are more poets in the mechanical arts than there are in the fine arts.

AMONG "THE MEN WHO MAKE."

So considered, the inventor is a poet :-

To know an inventor in the moment of triumph is to know that a chord is touched in him strange and deep, soft as from out of all eternity. The melody that Homer knew, and that Dante knew, is his also, with the grime upon his hands, standing and watching it there. It is the same song that from pride to pride and joy to joy has been singing through the hearts of The Men Who Make from the beginning of the world.

So of the men who live with machines :-

The brakeman and the locomotive engineer and the mechanical engineer and the sailor all have the same spirit. Their days are invested with the same dignity and aspiration, the same unwonted enthusiasm and self-forgetfulness in the work itself. It is not given to brakemen, as it is to poets, to show to the world as it passes by that their ideals are beautiful. They give their lives for them—hundreds of lives a year. These lives may be sordid lives, looked at from the outside; but mystery, danger, surprise, dark cities and glistening lights, roar, dust and water, and death and life—these play their endless spell upon them.

"HIS WHOLE SOUL IN HIS ENGINE."

But it is upon the engine-driver, or as the Americans call him the engineer, that Mr. Lee lavishes his most generous idealism. He says:—

Does anyone know an engineer who has not all but a personal affection for his engine, who has not an ideal for his engine, who holding her breath with his will does not put his hand upon the throttle of that ideal and make that ideal say something? to the poet who shall seek to define down or to sing away that ideal. In its glory, in darkness or in day, we are hid from death. It is the protection of life. The engineer who is not expressing his whole soul in his engine, and in the aisles of souls behind him, is not worthy to place his hand upon an engine's throttle. Indeed, who is he—this man—that this awful privilege should be allowed to him, that he should dare to touch the motor nerve of her, that her mighty forty-mile-an-hour muscles should be the slaves of the fingers of a man like this, climbing the hills for him, circling the globe for him? It is impossible to believe that an engineer-a man who with a single touch sends a thousand tons of steel across the earth as an empty wind can go, or as a pigeon swings her wings, or as a cloud sets sail in the west—does not mean something by it, does not love to do it because he means something by it. If ever there was a poet, the engineer is a poet. In his dumb and mighty, thousand-horizoned brotherhood, Hastener of men from the ends of the earth that they may be as one, I always see him-ceaseless-tireless-flying past sleep-out through the night-thundering down the edge of the world, into the dawn.

"A FRAGMENT OF THE NEW APOCALYPSE."

What matters it that he is a wordless man, that he wears not his heart in a book? Are not the bell, and the whistle, and the cloud of steam, and the rush, and the peering in his eyes words enough? They are the signals of this man's life beckoning to my life. Standing in his engine there, making every wheel of that engine thrill to his will, he is the priest of wonder to me, and of the terror of the splendour of the beauty of power. The train is the voice of his life. The sound of its coming is a psalm of strength. It is as the singing a man would sing who felt his hand on the throttle of things. The engine is a soul to me—soul of the quiet face thundering past—leading its troop of glories echoing along the hills, telling it to the flocks in the fields and the birds in the air, telling it to the trees, and the buds, and the little, trembling, growing things, that the might of the spirit of man has passed that way. The idealism, and passion, and devotion, and poetry in an engineer, in the feeling he has about his machine, the power with which that machine expresses that feeling, is one of the great typical living inspirations of this modern age, a fragment of the new apocalypse, vast and inarticulate, and far and faint to us, but striving to reach us still, now from above, and now from below, and on every side of life. It is so that the very dullest of us, standing among our machines, can hardly otherwise than guess the coming of some vast surprise . . . So long as men are more creative and godlike in engines than they are in sermons, I listen to the engines.

Perhaps there may be too much letting off of steam in this rush of Mr. Lee's eloquence; but there is along with it indubitable driving power.

A SEMI-SALVATIONIST COURT.

THE visit of the Swedish monarchy to this country and to France lends a special interest to a sketch in the Young Woman of "Sweden's Queen: a Democrat in a Palace." Her Majesty is not strictly speaking a member of the Salvation Army. Mrs. Booth-Tucker put her connection with it in this way:—

"The Queen is the friend of the Army. She has contributed liberally to our funds. She is interested in the Warm Shelter, which is a clubroom for the poor in Stockholm. Her son, Prince Bernadotte, often speaks at our meetings. He has entertained me at his home. When I entered, the Princess, his wife, came toward me in impulsive Swedish fashion, with both hands outstretched. 'We love you, because you love the Army,' she said. Prince Bernadotte has given up Court life and his right of succession to the throne to work for humanity and religion. The Queen is not enrolled with us, but she is our warm friend."

A pathetic story is told by a Swedish Salvationist, which

A pathetic story is told by a Swedish Salvationist, which shows the extent of the Queen's interest in religion. Some time ago a blind woman was converted at a Salvationist meeting in Stockholm, and, hearing of the incident, the Queen asked that she might be brought to the palace without being informed where she was, or whom she was to meet. The woman was accordingly left with the Queen and ladies of the Court, and for two hours she spoke to them of her new-found hope, exhorting the Queen and her Court, all unconsciously, to give up their lives to the Saviour.

Prince Oscar, whose romantic renunciation of the crown that he might marry the woman he loved is known to everybody, is "an enthusiastic member of the Young Men's Christian Association."

The Windsor.

THE Windsor for August is light and readable. A group of battle-pictures, with notes on their painters by Robert Machray, forms a leading feature certain to catch every reader's eye. S. L. Bensusan supplies notes about Morocco under the sounding title "A Problem for Empires." Miss F. Klickmann gathers together "the favourite quotations" of certain "literary people," with portraits and comments. Photographs from a balloon make Mr. F. A. Talbot's chat with Mr. Percival Spencer, the aeronaut, the more striking. "In the Footsteps of Cupid" is the title which Mr. Frederick Dolman gives to sketches of "Lovers' Leaps," Lovers' Seats, Gallantry Bowers, etc., in various parts of the country.

ds a sketch." Of he

l, to econocomfort of witness in a trings of her ied itself in have been se and sen o him, with ss that there dy soon to stion. She slaughterdished, and one spoke, by appeals e start and rture in the lanthropic

Woodford ort Market rden, grew ence in the in 1867. of nominaorvalescent d been its y may be otman had no money, emptied it. td-looking her trouble voyage to could not e overran e had no ompanion, and asked l be done ompanion, and asked I be done I the story ion, there t morning and, who is warmly ide happy yage. or fatigue. hat in the driven up who had

-Powell, articles oman at ettes. us study agazine.

spends

XUM

SPARKLES FROM THE EMERALD ISLE.

"In the Bye-ways of Rural Ireland" Mr. Michael MacDonagh has found much to tell over to the readers of the Nineteenth Century. His paper is one of the liveliest in the whole of the August magazines.

IRISH FOLK-SONGS.

He begins by saying "the Irish peasant is passionately fond of music." Unfortunately, "he has no voice for singing, yet he sings—sings often and lustily in a rude, unmusical monotone. The social gatherings of the peasantry remind me of Horace Walpole's description of Heaven, where every one must sing, whether he has a voice or not.'

The writer pays this striking tribute to the songs of his

However rule in language or ludicrous in sentiment they may be, they are—unlike the folk-songs of other countries—never coarse. There was not an obscene expression in the hundreds of ballads which I have heard sung or read, a proof, I think, of the pure-mindedness of the peasantry in all matters appertaining to the relations between the sexes.

AN ODD BALLAD.

Here is a specimen of an extraordinary jingle that suggests Mr. Gilbert rather than the spontaneous muse of the folk-song :-

In the "Phoenix of the Hall" we are told of the successful wooing of a squire's daughter by "a labouring boy." Pat "one night for recreation and silent meditation strolled by a fair plantation," when he met the young lady and at once fell madly in love with her :-

Being quite captivated, and so infatuated, I then prognosticated my sad forlorn case; I quickly ruminated, Suppose I was defeated,
Would I be implicated or treated with disgrace?

So therefore I awaited, my spirits elevated;

No more I ponderated, let what would me befall,

But then to her repeated how Cupid had me treated, And then expostulated with Phœnix of the Hall.

But "Phoenix of the Hall" rudely spurned his advances :-

Without more hesitation she made a declaration Of her determination to lead a single life,

Saying sorrow and vexation, and many an alteration, Attend the humble station of what is called a wife. "Without equivocation or mental reservation,

Unto your application I will not yield at all;
Your wild insinuation can make no penetration,
So drop such speculation," said the Phœnix of the Hall.

Pat, however, persisted in wooing her in polysyllables.

THE OLD QUALITIES.

The writer thus reports of his compatriots :-

The Irish character is, in truth, still distinguished by all its old qualities-its good humour, its light-heartedness, its placid outlook on life, its soft, oblivious, dreamy moods, its disposition to take things easy, its emotion and excitability, its superstitiousness, its hospitality and courteousness to strangers, its deep respect for women, its family affections and attachment to home, its inexplicable blend of childlike simplicity and farseeing shrewdness. The individual peasant of to-day is perhaps more sober or less extravagant in manners than his grandfather; but the community is unchanged.

A BUDGET OF PLEASANTRIES.

He finds the Irish peasant still in Sir Walter Scott's phrase "the gayest fellow in the world under difficulties and afflictions." Here are a few glints of his humour:—

A peasant met with an accident which resulted in a broken leg. The neighbours, of course, commiserated him. "Arrah," he remarked, with a gleam of satisfaction in his eye as he regarded the bandaged limb, "what a blessing it is that it wasn't

Two countrymen who had not seen each other for a long time met at a fair. They had a lot of things to tell each other, "Shure it's married I am," said O'Brien. "You don't tell me so!" said Blake. "Faith, yes," said O'Brien, "an' I've got a fine healthy bhoy which the neighbours say is the very picter of me." Blake looked for a moment at O'Brien, who was not, to say the least, remarkable for his good looks, and then said, "Och, well, what's the harrun so long as the child's healthy !"

A peasant once asked another what a phrenologist was, and when he was answered, "Why, a person that can tell by the feel of the bumps on your head what kind of a man you are," he exclaimed: "Bumps on me head is it! Begor, thin, they'd tell him more what kind of a woman my wife is." However, it is not often that Pat, and Bridget go to "the Coort" to have their domestic quarrels adjusted. Only in a very, very bad case of family troubles is the aid of the law called in. In such a case, which I read about recently, the wife was evidently in fault, for the husband said to the magistrate, with deep feeling in his voice, "She's a most ungrateful thing, yer honner. When I married her she had not a rag to her back, and now she's covered wid

A landlord in the south of Ireland recently received a letter from a tenant in the following terms:—"Yer honnor,—Hopin' this finds you in good health as it laves me at present, your bulldog Bill has assassinated me poor ould donkey."

AMONG DEVILS IN CENTRAL AFRICA.

CAPTAIN M. S. WELLBY writes in Harper's Magazine for August of his experiences while travelling through the unknown country between the capital of Abyssinia and the White Nile. He had many wonderful adventures and narrow escapes, of which he gives a graphic account.

The most curious portion of his article is that in which he deals with the devils of Walamo. He says :-

It seems to be a generally accepted fact that the natives of Walamo are capable of imparting a devil, or jinn, to the bodies of strangers who come there, more especially if they are permitted to be present while the stranger partakes of food. Curiously enough, on returning from my visit to the stockade, I found one of my Somalis in a very remarkable condition. His look was that of a wild man. At times he would talk and rave utter nonsense, now and then ejaculating the word Walamo; at others he shook from head to foot.

The man was liable to such fits for some considerable period of time. All the natives put it down to possession by a Walamo devil. Captain Wellby determined to dispose of this superstition by eating a meal before a number of Walamo natives :-

I put my little table outside my tent and called for breakfast, and finished my meal much to my own gratification, but to the great displeasure of my followers. Now comes the strange part of it all. The next day I felt strangely unwell, and was altogether "off colour" and "off food." I felt I was undergoing the tortures of a bad sailor on a rough sea. This, too, was the only day I felt unwell through the whole of my journey; but I took good care to keep my ailings to myself. It has been suggested to me that poison was placed in my food, but this I can most emphatically deny.

Various reasons for this result of braving the Walamo devil have been suggested to Captain Wellby, but he is unable to accept any as correct. He says :-

With regard to my own peculiar condition, it has been suggested to me that at the time of my famous meal I was undergoing great mental strain. I must say, however, that during the breakfast I was unaware of this, as at that time I regarded the Walamo devils and their craft as being well inside the sphere of imagination.

DOF by Sir seem joke ci of the is, it Home Home procee A k gatheri

humou

rejoine

Will author apocal inverte A la " Pleas my dea keeps h Had

Drink

Sir 1

edge a A.D one day turned that his into th "Oh, y the tab gone in Her dinner The and gro wet tag been th particul of them but also manna The defeate border A w inscribe gone fro able pro the text match." The Review ing sm and 'ne Lisle, Trappi There that, to ecured

Park, as

STORIES IN THE MAGAZINES.

A local story goes that this same Mr. Homer at a public gathering, feeling unwell, had suddenly to leave, when a local humourist remarked, "Homer's 'Odd, I see,'" and another rejoined, "Homer's 'Ill, I add."

"ANGELS IN BOTTLES."

william Barnes, a local poet and parson, is quoted as authority for several stories. Here is one, in which the apocalyptic relation between vial and angel is somewhat inverted:—

A lady told him of a question put to her in the Sunday school: "Please, ma'am, does God keep His angels in bottles?" "No, my dear, why should He?" "Please, ma'am, because mother keeps her spirits in bottles."

Had the child heard from temperance orators of the Drink Demon or "the Devil in solution"?

A KILLING RETORT.

Sir Robert Edgecumbe gives an ancient jibe this local edge and setting;—

A Dorset doctor of somewhat boastful temperament was dining one day at a big dinner party, when the conversation after dinner furned upon the army as a profession. The doctor remarked that his parents had made a great mistake in not sending him into the army, for which he declared himself eminently fit, "Oh, you make a great mistake," said a Dorset squire across the table; "syou would not have killed half as many if you had gone into the army as you have in your own profession."

STRAINED INTENT.

Here is a sequel to a Parliamentary contest. The defeated candidate was speaking at an agricultural dinner in presence of the elected member:—

The dinner was held in a large marquee, which was creaking and groaning under the strain of a boisterous storm of wind and wet raging outside. The speaker, in making reference to his successful opponent, happily said "that whatever might have been their respective feelings on a recent occasion, on that particular day they were in complete accord, for they were both of them entirely satisfied, not only with the state of the canvas, but also with the state of the poll "speaker".

WHEN THE NEW FLAME CAME.

The last we shall quote is a smart thing which yet

A widower in a somewhat prominent position in life had inscribed upon his late wife's tomb, "The light of mine eyes is gone from me." Taking unto himself a second wife with remarkable promptitude, a Dorset yokel scrawled, as his comment upon the text set forth upon the tablet, "But he soon struck another match."

A HERMIT ON STRIKE.

The solemn and erudite pages of the Church Quarterly Review for July unexpectedly break out into the following smile. The reviewer closes with it a very interesting and not unsympathetic sketch of Ambrose Phillips de Lisle, the ardent convert to Rome, who founded the Trappist monastery in Charnwood Forest in 1844:—

There is a pleasant story—perhaps it is only ben trovato—that, to add the last grace of antiquity to his surroundings, he secured a hermit to live in a "full poor cell" in Garendon Park, as solitary as was possible, with crowds of people coming,

perhaps in "fifiy carriages," to inspect this Neo-Palæozoic curiosity; and that, one day, when he took a party of visitors to see his pet with a glow of pride and pleasure in the possession of such a rarity, lo! the hermit was missing; and when inquiry was made, the gamekeeper, under whose charge he had been placed, blurted out before all the company that the hermit had struck for more beer.

A CRITIC IN SAVAGE MOOD.

MR. W. E. HENLEY, in the Pall Mall Magazine for August, takes occasion from Mr. Ernest Coleridge's third volume of Byron's poetry to relieve himself of much irritation. He believes that Byron had "in his belly sacred fire enough to burn up the world"—the description rather suggests Moloch than the Muses—and he writes as if he would fain stamp out all altar fires that have been kindled to rival poets. He begins with Macaulay:—

Macaulay's account of Byron's message to the world—that you should hate your neighbour and love your neighbour's wife—is, like so much else of Macaulay, the cheapest clap-trap.

"SHAMS SIGNED TENNYSON."

He scornfully contrasts with Byron's intense realities of flesh and blood the "faintly smiling Adeline," the May Queen, and "these other Tennysonian beauties." Then he flames forth:—

These shams signed "Tennyson" are already dead, and not dead only, but damned,—damned to the infernal deeps—"With Erebus and tortures vile also." They are not perhaps so dead as the Laura Pendennises and the Esther Summersons of the epoch. But they are dead, and they are likewise damned, and there is surely an end of them. As dead, but scarce so considerably damned, once we come to think of it, as the Swinburnian ideal which some five-and-twenty years ago we young men that made rhymes went mad to match.

"FUTILE GABBLE WHICH IS BROWNING."

After this hard swearing at Tennyson and Swinburne, he turns on Browning:

And that mass of half-inspired, half-realised, half-uttered and wholly perfunctory and futile gabble which—some noble pages apart—is Browning, what has become of it all? The Societies are dead; the Primers—(this was a poet whom you had to read with a crib, as though he had been no decent middle-class Englishman, but "an ancient who wrote crabbed Greek in no silly days")—the Primers, I repeat, have gone the way of all waste; the reading of riddles and the reading of poetry have once more come to be recognised as two distinct and several branches of intellectual activity. . . . Byron can still be trusted to mop the floor with such traditions as have succeeded those he left us. . . . Byron, for all that his critics can say and do, remains among the very greatest in English Letters, and, as an influence on art in general, can be held only less potent and less lasting than Shakespeare himself.

These diatribes are perhaps useful as a reminder that critics, like other men, are subject to the influences of temperature. For may we not charitably suppose that they reveal only the reaction of the writer against the recent heat-wave?

THE names in which churches are dedicated is the theme of a work by Miss Frances Arnold-Forster which is reviewed in the Church Quarterly. The popularity of certain dedications at certain periods is shown to be significant of theological changes. Over 900 churches are dedicated to St. Peter alone, 300 to St. Peter and St. Paul jointly, 320 to St. Paul alone—seven-eighths of which were built since the Reformation—576 to St. John the Baptist, and 533 to St. John the Evangelist.

ch other.

n't tell me
I've got a picter of ras not, to then said,
nealthy!"

t it wasn't long time

was, and ell by the you are," in, they'd owever, it " to have bad case ch a case, fault, for his voice, l a letter —Hopin' your bull-

I married

vered wid

fagazine bugh the inia and ventures graphic

natives of he bodies

permitted Curiously ound one look was ave utter at others iderable ssession ined to before a oreakfast, the great part of it ther "off te tortures ally day I ok good gested to an most as been al I was er, that t time I ell inside

Walamo

ut he is

THE REVIEWS REVIEWED.

A STORY OF THE RESERVED

AMERICAN REVIEW OF REVIEWS.

THE Chinese Revolution is sketched from intimate knowledge by Mr. Stephen Bonsal. He lays great stress on the change which has occurred since two years ago, when any officer would have undertaken to get into Pekin with 500 Europeans behind him, all the military forces of China notwithstanding. Now Admiral Seymour, with nearly 3,000 men, is driven back. Mr. Bonsal sensibly declares that "Russia and Russian intrigue have nothing whatever to do with the agitation" which has revolutionised China; for the excellent reason that Russia could get all that she wanted by means of diplomacy. He earnestly implores England, the United States and Japan to stand together in resisting partition and in maintaining integrity.

The Kansas Convention, which nominated Mr. Bryan, and which his influence alone induced to carry the silver ticket, is described by Mr. Walter Wellman. Mr. Bryan assured him that he was well content with his work.

Mr. Theodore Roosevelt is the theme of two sketches, Mr. Jacob Riis is the writer of one, which make us realise afresh the truth of Mr. Low's remark in the National Review that Mr. Roosevelt is the most interesting figure in American politics at the present hour. His work as governor elicits a special eulogy.

Mr. W. O. Partridge pleads for the establishment of an annual National Exhibition of Art, on the lines of the Paris Salon and the London Academy. Such an exhibition would not merely bring money to the city—say New York—in which it was held: it would promote the formation of an American school, and with that would come an apocalypse of America in Art.

The Century.

THE August number contains the continuation of Mr. Morley's study of Oliver Cromwell. He brings it down to Cromwell's quarrel with the First Parliament. Other chapters deal with the breaking of the Long Parliament, the Reign of the Saints, and the first stage of the Protectorate. The article is as usual well and carefully illustrated. The chief feature of Professor C. L. Bristol's contribution on the Treasures of the New York Aquarium is the fine colour printing of the illustrations. John Burroughs' account of Summer Holidays in Alaskan Waters is most topical during this hot weather. It appears that mirages are quite common in the peninsula. Sir Walter Besant writes on Riverside East London, the article being illustrated by Joseph Pennell and Phil May.

The Quiver.

THE most interesting article in the August Quiver is on "Curious Village Customs of To-Day"—customs still prevailing in little-known parts of England. Another paper, which somehow ought to be more interesting than it is, is upon "Some Last Letters" from such well-known characters as General Gordon, Lord Tennyson, Oliver Cromwell and Marie Antoinette. There is also an article on "Tommy Atkins at Church," an effete khaki production—let us hope the beginning of the end of this type of paper.

THE NATIONAL REVIEW.

As with the other reviews, the contents of the National for August revolve between China and South Africa, and have been noticed in the Leading Articles, along with Mr. Ernest Williams' "Economic Revolution in Germany."

MCKINLEY'S VACILLATION.

Mr. Maurice Low points out the two-fold anomaly—that in China and in the Philippines United States troops are actually fighting, although, Congress not having declared war in either case, there is legally no war in existence. He thinks an extra Session of Congress may be necessary to extricate the Executive from the present dilemma. He thus characterises Mr. McKinley:—

The policy of the Administration has been characteristically McKinleyish. Vacillating is the only word that properly describes it. It has been uncertain and inconsistent. In every great emergency which he has been called upon to meet since he has been in the White House, Mr. McKinley has followed but never led. He has always waited to find out what 51 per cent. of the American people wanted, and when he felt that the margin of safety was on his side he has acted. Consequently, his ccurse has been marked by indecision; he has hesitated; his utterances have been ambiguous, he has not even scrupled to reverse his position, as in the case of the Porto Rican tariff, and he has kept the nation in suspense until he felt sure that he was simply voicing the sentiments of at least 51 per cent. of the American people. Then he has acted.

"IS THE BROAD CHURCH PARTY EXTINCT?"

Canon Page Roberts answers :-

"That such a Party can become extinct is simply impossible. So long as there is a Church, and man remains a rational being, it must exist. Final opinions are the fortresses of fools." Yet if the Broad Church Party can never become extinct, it must, at least among the clergy, be always a small party, like the advanced guard of an army, the first to occupy a position which will subsequently be held by the whole force... The Broad Church laity, like the Broad Church clergy, are a little flock.

They are said to be specially needed in the great cities and centres of education.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Mr. Leslie-Stephen contributes a characteristic appreciation of Walter Bagehot. Rollo F. Graham Campbell presents an elaborate seheme for improving the working of the Judicature Acts.

Harper's Magazine.

THE August number of this magazine is largely given up to fiction suitable for the holiday season. There are nine short stories, instalments of the serials by Mr. I. Zangwill and Mrs. Humphry Ward, besides poems and general articles. Captain Wellby's account of his travels in Central Africa is noticed elsewhere. Mr. Sydney Brooks deals at length with the differences between American and English electioneering methods. He gives a very good description of typical English methods of appealing to the electorate, and his article is a very readable one. J. H. Ecob deals with "A Century of Church Methods," and Dr. Hudson writes on "Evidence of Life after Death." The number is one of great interest.

THE although We has struction

The African to his Dr. The 1878, history

The p with his of South the care the resp conclusi history Dr. The While security their rel Crown a repres associate Boers w weaker in fact which y justice.

an interest corresp writer s Great minds of strong l starting condition

After some e poetry What condition wanting present definite, great po

forward

Poet The range a great soldier is some as they

A p adopte
in the
of Eur are nov convert expects memor
Wester

THE QUARTERLY REVIEW.

THE July number is principally concerned with literature, although current events are by no means overlooked. We have noticed elsewhere articles on Imperial reconstruction, on cremation, and on Gabriele d'Annunzio.

DR. THEAL'S HISTORY CHALLENGED.

The first place is given to a review of Dr. Theal's South African history, in which the writer takes strong exception to his interpretation of documents, He also contrasts Dr. Theal's present work with his "Compendium" of 1878, which was as pronouncedly pro-British as the history is pro-Boer. He remarks:—

The process of confronting Dr. Theal with his earlier self, and with his own original authorities, at several momentous epochs of South African history, is one earnestly to be recommended to the careful attention of those upon whom will rest in future the responsibility for the implicit acceptance of these fallacious conclusions. The modern school of writers upon South African history may be said to have been founded and maintained by Dr. Theal

The reviewer closes with this reflection :-

Whilst the colonists of other nations were fighting for the security of their persons and property or the free exercise of their religion, and whilst those of other territories of the British Crown were engaged in an arduous constitutional struggle for a representative government or some other privilege which was associated in their minds with the idea of political liberty, the Boers were mainly intent on claiming the right to keep their weaker fellow-subjects in a state of bondage. Their Governors in fact were "tyrants" because they put an end to a tyranny which was revolting to civilised humanity and the sense of justice.

OUR DEARTH OF GREAT POETRY.

"The conditions of great poetry" form the theme of an interesting study, and are held to lie in a certain correspondence between the poet and the age. The writer says :—

Great poetry is never produced except in periods in which the minds of men are excited by strong feelings, dominated by strong beliefs, or animated by strong hopes, which the poet, at starting, has had no share in producing. . . The national conditions most favourable to the production of great poetry are conditions of national vigour, confident of success and looking forward to further triumphs.

After illustrating this statement, the writer finds in it some explanation of the fact that we have now no great poetry:—

Whatever may be thought of personal faculties, the general conditions that go to produce great poetry are for the moment wanting. The faiths, the hopes, and the aspirations of the present generation are not in a state of sufficient, or sufficiently definite, excitement to generate the emotional atmosphere which great poetry requires.

Poetry is essentially emotion; but-

The mere emotional gift of poetry will no more make a man a great poet than the mere emotion of patriotism will make a soldier a great general. . . . Postry is great in proportion as it is something more than poetry, and poets are great in proportion as they are something more than poets.

MODERN JAPANESE LITERATURE.

A paper on Japanese literature recalls how Japan adopted "at one gulp" Chinese letters and civilisation in the fifth century, and records a like swift assimilation of European culture in the nineteenth. Roman letters are now being used in place of the Chinese by Christian converts and by the scholarly classes, and the writer expects that the native script will soon become a mere memory of the learned. Following on the translation of Western fiction—

The old style of romance has been completely revolutionised, and just as native artists have attempted to obey the canons of European art in their latest pictures, so modern novelists endeavour to arrange the efforts of their imagination on Western models. One great defect of the older novels was, as has been remarked in the case of the native plays, the violations of common decency which disfigured their pages. . . This is now all changed; improprieties are avoided, and the personages represented converse in a style which might suit the pages of Jane Austen. . . . A new set of subjects has been thrown open to the novelist. Full advantage has been taken of this privilege; and the most advanced socialistic and revolutionary ideas, which formerly would have entailed on both author and publisher consignment to the darkest prison, are now daily promulgated with impunity.

Style, too, has changed, and poetry strikes a deeper note.

"NEW CREATURES FOR OLD COUNTRIES."

This is the title of an essay on acclimatisation of foreign species. What progress has been made in England may be gathered from this glimpse of the Duke of Bedford's "paradise" at Woburn:—

In the centre of the scene lies the big grey palace, set among rolling waves of park, studded with ancient trees... Axis deer, Japanese deer, Pekin deer, red deer, Caucasian red deer, Virginian deer, and a mouflon sheep may be seen grazing quietly together... Among them stalk gigantic wapit, lords and masters of the mixed multitude. Under the chestnut trees is a herd of black and white yaks with their calves, with thar and other wild sheep; and close to the drive is a small herd of zebras, with a foal or two.

There has been similar success with birds and fish and insects. The rainbow trout imported from the United States is hailed as "the universal trout" for all temperate waters. Compared with our trout they are as game to fish, better to eat, and handsomer to look upon; and they alternate with it as regards seasons of spawning.

OTHER ARTICLES.

An appreciation of Byron declares that it was through the "directness of his vision of the world, and of his speech about it, that he became a poet, that he made a new thing of poetry." "His quality of humanity was genius to him and stood him in place of imagination." Another writer inquires into the reason of the Eastern Empire lasting so much longer than the Western, and finds it "above all" in "the incomparable strength" of the situation and walls of Constantinople. "A British School at Rome," for the study of classical and mediæval archæology, is now being mooted and receives the reviewer's warm support.

The Lady's Realm.

THERE is not very much in the Lady's Realm for August. An anonymous illustrated paper upon the Duchess of Fife, eldest daughter of the Prince and Princess of Wales, is pleasant reading, although, as the writer remarks, it cannot be maintained that the Duchess is either brilliant or a strong individuality. She is merely a sweet, domestic Englishwoman, too retiring to take more part in public life than she is absolutely obliged to do. Her favourite residence is Sheen Lodge, Richmond Park. Another anonymous article is on "The Queen's Gardens," at Frogmore, Windsor, and Buckingham Palace. The Lady's Realm is also following the fashion in having a croquet article, with photographs of the champion players. The second instalment of "Royal Love-Stories" is given, entertaining and somewhat gossipy.

National frica, and long with in Ger-nomaly-

tes troops

t having

o war in eteristically in every et since he llowed but that the isequently, hesitated; cerupled to tariff, and nat he was

ent. of the 133 mpossible, nal being, ols." Yet it must, at like the ion which the Broad c appre-Campbell working

he great

here are
Mr. I. ems and s travels
y Brooks merican
a very ppealing ble one.

ethods,"

VIIM

THE EDINBURGH REVIEW.

THREE of the July articles call for separate notice, those dealing with Paris in 1900, with the new movement in Art, and with Imperial federation. The historical interest is uppermost this month.

THE FRENCH IDEA OF NAVAL WAR.

Chevalier's history of the French Navy leads the reviewer to insist on Captain Mahan's conclusion that commerce-destroying as a plan of campaign against England has always failed. The author suspends judgment' as regards submarine boats. The writer kindly summarises M. Chevalier's opinion into a single sentence:

His opinions are hat the French fleet should not seek for occasions to fight pitched battles, that squadrons should be kept in readiness to go to places where we should least expect their arrival, and that our commerce should be actively and vigorously harassed.

The general principle is "to make war without fighting."

THE FOUNDER OF PARLIAMENTARY RULE.

Goldwin Smith's "United Kingdom" gives rise to much comment and criticism. The reviewer says:—

Of all our kings, the only one whom Mr. Smith admires—the only one who seems to have been placed by destiny in his proper sphere—is Edward I. "His reign (he says) is an epoch in the history not of England only, but of the world. He reigns now, through the institutions to which he gave life, over almost all European nations, in America, in Australia, in Japan. He will continue to reign, even if his special institutions should pass away, as the statesman who achieved a union of authority with national opinion. . . He was the real founder of parliamentary government; and had he lived, or not been thwarted by the malice of fortune, he would, in all probability, have been the founder of British union."

TWO LADY NOVELISTS.

Mary Cholmondeley and Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler are selected as types of recent novel writers. The writer divides fiction into two classes—the novel of incident and the novel of observation; the former commending itself chiefly to men, the latter to women. Miss Cholmondeley's chief concern is plot and dramatic or melodramatic psychology; but so far as she is a satirist, she contributes to the novel of manners. But what is secondary with her is primary with Miss Fowler. The reviewer grants that Miss Fowler is "really witty," but complains that her work, while undeniably witty, is also undeniably vulgar: "this continuous crackle of pretty verbal smartnesses wearies beyond expression." Miss Fowler "is assured of a huge literary popularity"—"the immediate vogue that goes to the chronicler of momentary phrases." Miss Cholmondeley's future is, in his judgment, more difficult to forecast. "Her work has a fine intellectual distinction and unusual constructive power." The central object of her attack is in all her books "the mean outgrowths of religion."

OTHER ARTICLES.

The article dealing with the South African War and its critics reproduces General von Schmeling's confident predictions of January 14th, and brims over with exultation at their falsification by the subsequent course of events.

Progress in Ireland is reviewed with a large measure of satisfaction, the writer holding that the changes of the last thirty or forty years have made for the successful economic development of the country. He rejoices in the fact that though the Recess Committee four years ago failed to secure the support of two-thirds of the Irish Nationalist members, every section of the community approved the Act which has given effect to the Committee's suggestions.

A sketch of the Knights Templars—soldiers, monks, heretics—concludes with words which may be commended to those who exult in the crushing of weaker States:—"Once again, as from many another chapter of life, we may learn that, if the vengeance of the strong is to strike, the vengeance of the weak—silent as Calvary's—is to suffer."

The life of the Iron Duke is commended as an example to statesmen who to-day are tempted to truckle to the mob.

The history of the Hudson's Bay Company is held to justify that concern being ranked among the builders of Empire.

THE CONTEMPORARY REVIEW.

THE August number is principally military, imperial, and foreign in its complexion, and under these various headings citations have been glouped elsewhere.

SIR ALFRED MILNER.

Mr. F. Edmund Garrett supplies a clever apologia for Sir Alfred Milner and his work. He ridicules the representation of Sir Alfred as "an incompetent, a garbling, a mannerless and hectoring bully," and wonders what "diabolic sea-change" could have come over one who before he sailed for South Africa was generally applauded as the "finest flower of human culture." His main tribute is given in these sentences:—

Milner has successfully provided the nucleus of a non-Rhodes Imperialism. . . . Everybody knows the healthy tendency of Englishmen and Scotsmen to discover dissentients to almost any conecivable opinion which is general enough to seem tyrannous. Here they are in South Africa all united, one may almost say to a man. To-day, for the first time, we have the spectacle of the Dutch split up and the English united. The present unanimous rally, look at it how you will, is a great fact, and a great moral force; it strengthens us to confront the world now, and the future in South Africa; and that rally, as the words it finds nearly always declare, we owe in a near and personal sense to Sir Alfred Milner.

Though the racial spirit has made him less acceptable to the Dutch, Mr. Garrett exults in declaring that Milner "has, actually, as the war went on, converted his neutrality' Premier into an Imperial co-worker."

TOLSTOY ON ART AND LIFE.

Aylmer Maude in taking up the cudgels for Tolstoy's theory of art against malignant reviewers, restates the novelist's definition of art, and his view of life:

Art is a human activity, consisting in this, that one man consciously, by means of certain external signs, hands on to others feelings he has lived through, and that other people are infected by these feelings, and also experience them.

The religious perception of our time, in its widest and most practical application, is the consciousness that our well-being, both material and spiritual, individual and collective, temporal and eternal, lies in the growth of brotherhood among all men—in their loving harmony with one another.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Mr. Robert Donald repels, point by point, Lord Avebury's attack on municipal trading, and by a wide survey of actual municipal achievement proves his fears to be ill-grounded. Mr. W. H. D. Rouse argues for higher salaries in secondary schools. The average salary of an assistant is just below £120; of a headmaster, usually ten times as much. Tonbridge is the best paid, the headmaster receiving £5,000, his assistants less than £200. Mr. Arthur Symons indulges in an impassioned panegyric of the actress, Eleonora Duse. Her art is pronounced to be "always suggestion, never statement, always a renunciation."

FOR Augus closing international dozen essay.

"TI

our for a direct a confithe fur warns Anglo
by two the or foe wh

Mr.

with t her be he pu engin make count most is chi Frenc will p hopef "fran nal, l War and p faith Wi imitat

> > armo

those buildi

day is able p

"Co the i and pern Th Parlicertai

THE FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW.

FOREIGN and Imperial questions bulk large in the August number. The most startling paper is that disclosing Russia's overtures to the United States for "an international corner in wheat," which, with some halfdozen other articles, demands separate notice.

"PUT NOT YOUR TRUST IN" KAISERS.

"The crux of foreign policy" is the subject of an unsigned essay. The writer holds that "the paramount purpose of our foreign policy must be to find out once for all whether a direct understanding with Russia is possible, or whether a conflict may be reckoned upon as the great certainty of the future, towards which preparation must be bent." He warns us against counting on anything of the nature of an Anglo-German alliance. The policy of Germany is ruled by two ideas: "Austria to be preserved at all hazards as the only natural ally, Russia to be conciliated as the one foe whose enmity under present circumstances might be mortal." England occupies only a third place.

A GOOD WORD FOR FRANCE.

Mr. Richard Davey presents "a few French facts" with the good-natured idea of helping us to appreciate her better qualities and look charitably on her faults. As he puts the case, the Republic is young-"a new steam engine with a somewhat antiquated boiler." "Of the two makes history, while history makes us. countries, France and England, France is probably the most practically religious; "her pornographic literature is chiefly for export and is scarcely read at home; the French army is not dominated by clericalism. What will perhaps most surprise English readers is the writer's hopeful view of the French press. Once it was either "frankly Voltairean or frankly clerical." Now le Jour-nal, la Libre Parole, l'Echo de Paris, la Croix (the French War Cry), and a host of other papers which are light and popular, are decent in tone and offer no outrage to faith and morals. The writer adds:—

With the political spirit of these papers and their numerous imitators I have nothing to say, but I feel certain that they are building up a wholesomer tone in journalism, and possibly the day is not far distant when it will be as difficult to find objectionable papers, caricatures, and novels in France as it is here.

OUR GUNS AFLOAT.

Mr. J. Holt Schooling compares the Armaments of Seven Navies, and generally reaches conclusions gratifying to Englishmen. He says :-

Taking all classes of guns, Great Britain has 36 3 of every 100 guns that exist in the seven Navies, as compared with the 30.7 per 100 of France plus Russia, and, if we neglect all muzzle-loading guns, then Great Britain has 35.6 out of every 100 guns that form the armaments of the seven Sea Powers. Looking at the above facts, and noting also that our biggest lead over France plus Russia is upon the score of quick-firing guns, one can scarcely avoid the conclusion that these are satisfactory results to have obtained.

He observes also that Russia's battleships and armoured cruisers are more numerously armed than those of any other navies.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT IN DUBLIN!

Judge O'Connor Morris offers a political survey of "Contemporary Ireland." He suggests one remedy for the ignorance of Ireland which is displayed by English and Scottish legislators, and which forms one of the most pernicious sources of Irish disaffection :-

The result could be of no doubtful good were the Imperial Parliament to hold, its sessions in the capital of Ireland at certain intervals of time. . . . The presence in Dublin of the Imperial Parliament would, I am convinced, greatly weaken the cry for Home Rule.

He presses for a thorough inquiry into the present state of the Irish land system, and for Royal favour to descendants of Irish Jacobite nobles.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

Most of the August number is occupied with the sensational problems presented by current hostilities, and has been quoted accordingly elsewhere. Separate notice has also been given to Prince Kropotkin's vindication of "small industries," to Mr. Arnold Ward's warning to missionaries in Egypt, and to Michael MacDonagh's "Bye-ways in Rural Ireland."

THE DEARTH OF CIVIC CONSCIENCE.

The Bishop of Hereford is exercised by the slow growth of moral influence in politics. He attributes it to

The Divine Founder of our religion and His apostles deliberately confined their teaching to personal morals.

Throughout our whole educational system we find very little systematic training in the morals of citizenship. All real moral progress is from the individual heart outward, and consequently corporate advance has to wait upon individual

He urges religious teachers to exercise their prophetic vocation and see to the training of the young in civic

"PROMOTING TRUE REPUBLICANISM."

Mr. Edward J. Hodgson contributes an American view of the Boer war. He holds that the utter unpreparedness of Great Britain for war proves her innocence of any plotting for gold or dominion. He urges-

On the grounds, then, of justice, freedom, good government, and the advancement of the human race, we are bound to give our sympathy and moral aid to England as once more she battles against the forces of reaction, obstruction and antifreedom, and goes forth to supplant governments evolved and maintained by those forces by free, enlightened and progressive government that aids and encourages the citizen to make the most of his mental and physical powers, instead of cramping and repressing them, . . . So shall we promote true republicanism upon earth.

THE PRESS-GAG IN SOUTH AFRICA.

Sir T. Wemyss Reid protests against "the gag which has been applied with merciless and unprecedented severity to the representatives of the press." in the field of war, whence the shock of Mr. Burdett-Coutts' exposure:—

Not only have their telegrams been mutilated or suppressed altogether, but their letters have been subjected to the most rigorous censorship, a censorship which has certainly not been less severe than that carried out in Russia. The result is that no unpleasant facts have been allowed to leak out, and we have had none of the benefit which the last generation, for example, derived from the presence of the famous correspondent of the Times in the Crimea. I cannot pretend to understand the meekness with which the press has submitted to a censorship that has systematically been extended to matters that had no direct connection with military movements.

THE IMPERIAL NOTE.

"The Imperial Note in Victorian Poetry" is investigated by Mr. J. A. R. Marriott. He reckons Tennyson, Mr. Newbolt, and Mr. Kipling among the "Imperial Singers," but finds nowhere the characteristic note of the more finely-tempered imperialism so delicately suggested as in Browning's "Home Thoughts from the Sea," with the challenge, "Here and there did England help me; how can I help England?"

rs, monks, be comof weaker r chapter the strong silent as d as an

is held to uilders of to truckle

imperial. e various logia for he repregarbling, ers what one who plauded is main n-Rhodes ndency of most any yrannous. ost say to cle of the nanimous eat moral and the s it finds sense to ceptable t Milner ted his ites the one man is on to r people nd most.

ll-being,

'olstoy's emporal 1 men-Lord a wide is fears ues for verage headis the istants in an Duse. , never

THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW.

EVEN the heats of July and the prospect of the holiday season cannot slacken the tense purpose of the Westminster. The August number is as strenuous as ever, and no less instant in its devotion to the sacred cause of land nationalisation.

AN ESTIMATE OF MR. JOHN MORLEY.

The first place is given to a study of John Morley by Thomas Bowran. The gist of the writer's estimate appears in the following passage :-

With few exceptions, his attitudes, temper of mind, and emphasis are invariably truly and firmly placed. But when the character of his solutions is considered, and his reading of contemporary life, its tendencies of realisations, and its readjustments of social organisations, we are conscious of his ineptitude and limitations. Emphatically agreeing that his purposes are purposes of advancement and enroblement, his reading of the signs are hesitating and narrow, his appreciation of methods doubtful and obsolete, and that, instead of historical knowledge being an illuminating force, it has obscured the working of the new tendencies, his feelings after the new purposes, and his comprehensions of methods requisite to present conditions.

A SIGNIFICANT PLEA.

Mr. William Diack, writing on Radicalism and Labour, pleads for a combination of modern Radicals, New Trade-Unionists, and avowed Collectivists, in support of (1) old age pensions, (2) the land for the people, (3) a shorter working-day, and (4) nationalisation of railways. He suggests that twenty-five or thirty seats should be selected for attack on these lines at the next election. It is significant, however, that the writer insists on eliminating, as "a dead weight to social progress," the question of reforming the House of Lords:—

I say with all the energy I can command: While there are hungry mouths to be filled, whilst the shoulders of little children are prematurely bent under the crushing weight of commercialism, while the fathers in factory, mine, and forge are overworked and underfed, while the aged veterans of labour, stricken not with the weight of years, but with the far deadlier weight of poverty and hardship, stagger into the cold and cheerless workhouse, cease tampering with the political machine—your referendum schemes can afford to wait—and turn your thoughts to actual ameliorative measures that will help to make the burden of life sit somewhat more lightly on the shoulders of the poor.

A DEATH DUTY OF 100 PER CENT.

Franklin Thomasson, while agreeing with Henry George's goal of land nationalisation, proposes a different method for attaining that goal. He says:—

In the plan I am about to propose there is no injustice done to anybody. This plan, again, is in itself nothing new. It is merely the application to land of a tax already in operation—namely, the tax known in England as the death duty. Let the title to all land lapse to the nation on the death of the present owners.

The writer reckons the national rent-roll at £200,000,000 a year, which would yield to a population of 40,000,000 £5 a head, or £10 for each adult. Out of this sum not only could all taxes be paid, but also premium for an oldage pension fund.

Mr. Scanlon's suit of Hodge v. Lord Broadacres, or Labour v. Landlordism, is brought to a close by the jury returning a verdict for plaintiff that "all men had originally, and have now, equal rights to the use of land: that the authority which took away these rights was not a competent or sufficient authority."

THE PRICE OF THE PEACE OF THE WORLD.

A comprehensive transaction with the United States is proposed by Mr. J. P. de Putron. He argues that the West Indies are bound to fall to the United States, and suggests that the transfer might be made the occasion of a compact between the two Powers, by which England would gain passage for her ships of war through the Nicaragua Canal, free trade for herself and Canada with the United States, and the use of American coaling-stations in time of war. The United States would gain the Nicaragua Canal, the West Indies, Bermuda, Azores, etc., besides the use of English coaling-stations. As the joint Anglo-American fleet numbers 543 vessels, Mr. Putron thinks that the peace of the world would be secured by his plan, and would be cheap at the price. The Eastern Question, he says, will be settled at the American Isthmus.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Josiah Oldfield as against vivisectionists pleads that limits should be set to experimentation, and lays stress on "the maternal teaching" that life is sacred and pain is terrible. Dudley S. Cosby puts "the hard case of the Irish landlords," and appeals to the Government to do all they can to compensate the landlords and keep them in the country, since "to ruin and disfranchise an educated class as they are now doing" is a fatal course. Allan Laidlaw's inquiry, "What are immoral plays?" follows Nietzsche in his condemnation of the "slavemorality" of repression.

CORNHILL.

THE August number of Cornhill shows a merciful regard for the holiday mood, and inflicts no very weighty articles on its readers. We have noticed elsewhere Sir Robert Edgecumbe's Dorset Humour and Dr. Moorhead's adventures with a Boer ambulance.

Lady Grove writes cleverly on Women's Suffrage in time of war. She brings into killing contrast the two arguments that women must not concern themselves with politics because they do not fight, and that soldiers must not concern themselves with politics because they do fight. She points out that only about  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., or only a little over 700,000 in every 29 millions of the adult population, are ever called upon actively to defend the Empire against foreign enemies. The rest are employed in various other ways in contributing to the prosperity of their country. And in this category there is a numerical preponderance of several thousand women over men.

Mr. Frederic Harrison is loud in his praises of Mr. Firth's Cromwell. He pronounces it to be "an excellent book, a fascinating book, a decisive book." He says, "It will pass with historians as the final estimate of the character and achievements of the Protector." Mr. Harrison is surely overbold when he predicts the finality of the estimate of any man. He singles out as the distinctive point about the book that "Mr. Firth for the first time combines a full and detailed narrative of Cromwell's entire career with exhaustive research into all the original sources." Mr. Harrison describes Cromwell as "the first consistent and systematic architect of British Imperialism." He also says, "There never was so systematic an opportunist."

Mountaineering supplies Francis Connell with a text for the recital of several Alpine adventures, and Mrs. E. M. Nicholl gives a humorous sketch of life in "a faraway corner" in Texas. She relates an ingenious way the Mexican Government over the border has of dealing with its criminal desperadoes. It sends soldiers to arrest them, but when arrested the prisoner never arrives at gaol or court. His guards report that he was shot as he tried to escape. This happy dispatch saves the trouble of incarceration and trial, and thins out undesirable members of the community.

interess with V between Johnst with M sionari among paper Lombit the Bo of the

THE

Mr. statisti sus of diction The latest th

In to per cer agricul table o

1880

1890

1900

1880

Mr. secrets on Sp are no Gamb of wh gives of wor he rea was the

Mr. to the Francisland about would Atu, to No si 800 m techniconside development of the state of the

Mr

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW.

casion of England

ugh the ida with coaling-

uld gain

Azores, As the els, Mr.

ould be

e price.

l at the

ds that s stress

nd pain

of the

to do

p them

ise an course.

lavs?"

'slavenerciful

veighty ewhere

d Dr.

uffrage ontrast

oncern

fight.

with

t only

every

upon emies.

conn this

everal

f Mr.

ellent

of the

Mr.

nality

e dise first well's iginal "the ritish

is so text Mrs.

far-

way

aling

rrest

s at

is he uble

able

THE North American Review for July is chiefly interesting for its China articles. I have dealt elsewhere with Wu Ting-Fang's article on "Mutual Helpfulness between China and the United States," with Mr. Charles Johnston's paper on "The Struggle for Reform," and with Mr. Poultney Bigelow's on "Missions and Missionaries in China." There will also be found noticed among the Leading Articles Mr. Cronwright Schreiner's paper on "The Settlement in South Africa," Professor Lombroso's predictions as to "The Ultimate Triumph of the Boers," and General Grosvenor's "Republican View of the Presidential Campaign."

THE GROWTH OF AMERICA.

Mr. Michael Mulhall contributes one of his excellent statistical papers, forecasting the result of the U.S. Census of 1900. The following is a summary of his predictions:—

The census of 1900 may be expected to compare with the two latest thus:—

|      |                         | Schoolpupils. | Farms,millionacres. | Million dollars. |                    |      |
|------|-------------------------|-------------------|-----------------------------|------------------|--------------------|------|
| 1880 | Population, 50, 156,000 |                   |                             | Wealth.          | Manufac-tures. | ing. |
|      |                         |                   | 536                         | 43,642           | 5,370              | 270  |
| 1890 | 62,622,000              | 12,710,000        | 623                         | 64,876           | 9.372              | 452  |
| 1900 | 76,200,000              | 15,610,000        | 728                         | 91,040           | 13,326             | 495  |

In twenty years the population appears to have risen fifty-two per cent., but the increase under all other headings, except agriculture, has been much greater, as shown in the following table of comparison:—

|      | Population. | Scholars | Agricul-ture. | Wealth. | Manufac-tures, | Min-ing. |
|------|-------------|----------|-------------------|---------|--------------------|--------------|
| 1880 | 100         | 100      | 100               | 100     | 100                | 100          |
| 1890 | 125         | 128      | 116               | 147     | 175                | 167          |
| 1900 | 152         | 158      | 136               | 209     | 249                | 183          |
|      | GAM         | BETTA    | AS A ST           | UDENT.  |                    |              |

Mr. Joseph Reinach, who served as Gambetta's private secretary, edits a collection of notes by his old employer on Spencer, Buckle and Comte. The notes themselves are not very interesting, as they contain very little to show Gambetta's own views, and are mostly mere summaries of what he had read; but Mr. Reinach in his preface gives some interesting details as to Gambetta's method of work. He read everything and remembered everything he read. Rabelais was his favourite author. Mirabeau was the historical figure he most admired.

AN AMERICAN-PACIFIC CABLE.

Mr. Chandler Hall discusses the two rival cable routes to the Philippines. The first of these routes is from San Francisco to Manila, by way of Honolulu, Midway Island, and Guam. The cost of such a cable would be about 25,000,000 dols. The other, or northern route, would go through Sitka, Kadiak Island, Dutch Harbour, Atu, the Japanese-Russian border, and Northern Japan. No single stretch of such a cable would be longer than 800 miles, and the cost would be less by half. The technical difficulties of the northern route are also less considerable.

THE AMERICAN CARRYING TRADE.

Mr. E. T. Chamberlain contributes a plea for the development of the Pacific carrying trade of the United States:—

Of the 5,390 clearances of steamships from this country for Europe in 1899, only thirty-nine were under the American flag. Too much intelligence, industry and money have been expended by foreign companies and governments in establishing their shipping interests in the North Atlantic to render possible a speedy recovery by the United States of its former rank in that branch of ocean carrying. But the trade of the Pacific is relatively undeveloped. During 1899, there were only 185 clearances of merchant steamships from this country for all of Asia, of which, however, only twenty-four, two a month, were American

LORD PLAYFAIR : AN APPRECIATION.

Mr. M. W. Hazeltine contributes an article on the late Lord Playfair, of whom he says:—

A close student of the branch of science which deals with the economic conditions of life, Playfair was a watchful observer of the startling developments which these conditions underwent. To the new order of things he sought to apply the old economic truths, and it was repeatedly his good fortune to draw the right economic lessons from the new conditions of human life with which he was brought in contact. Few men of our time have done more than he did to show the bearing of new industrial facts and of fresh scientific discoveries upon the old laws of supply and demand. A philosopher among politicians, and a politician among philosophers, he was to achieve more than one memorable success in applied science and in politics, and he was to attain, at last, the honour of being one of the few men who, at a moment when the two branches of the English-speaking race seemed drifting towards ruinous collision, were able to intervene and avert a disaster that might have wrecked the cause of human liberty.

OTHER ARTICLES.

There are only two other articles, one by Miss H. Wright, entitled "State Care of Dependent Children," and the other by Dr. Alfred Calmette on "The Plague at Oporto."

Pall Mall Magazine.

THE most striking things in the August number appear in the monthly literary and society gossip, and have been quoted elsewhere. "Searchlight" tells us "how to popularise our army," and urges increased pay or increased comforts. Improved barrack-rooms, sufficient lavatories, separate dining-rooms, recreation-rooms entirely maintained by the State, abolition of stoppages for hair cutting, barrack damage and hospital, more attractive uniform for infantry of the line, and an entirely free kit—at present the soldier must supply his own underclothing—but not separate cubicle, are among the reforms he asks for.

Blanche Warre Cornish calls to mind "the lordly custom" which came in at Eton soon after the accession of George III. "to present a life-sized picture in oils of any boy leaving the school whose portrait the headmaster requested instead of 'leaving money.' The result is a unique collection of portraits of young men painted by Reynolds, Hoppner, Romney, and Beechey." Reproductions are given of portraits obtained in this way, of A. H. Hallam, Charles J. Fox, Mr. Whitbread, Mr. Gladstone, Earl Grey, and others. "A Son of Oxford" writes with pious enthusiasm of his alma mater, and accompanies his words with pictures of the well-known buildings. Mr. George A. Wade sketches "some famous collaborators," among whom he includes Beaumont and Fletcher, Erckmann-Chatrian, Gilbert and Sullivan, Meilhac and Halévy, Besant and Rice. "With Constable" Mr. Frederick Wedmore goes over the scenes glorified by the painter's genius.

THE Girl's Realm for August is rather a good number. An article on the siege of Ladysmith is separately noticed. Mrs. C. N. Williamson writes a timely and interesting article, very well illustrated, on "The Girls of the Passion Play." Sarah A. Tooley in describing the Play-hours of Royal Children has some very readable pages about Queen Wilhelmina and King Alfonso. Another article is on "Some Novel Summer Retreats."

THE FORUM.

WITH the exception of Mr. Charles Denby's article on "Kiao Chau: a German Colonial Experiment," and Mr. Sheffield's paper on "Chinese Civilisation," the Forum for July does not contain anything which requires separate notice. I have dealt with both these articles in the section devoted to China.

HOW TO SAVE FROM FIRE.

Mr. W. J. Boies contributes an article entitled "Lessons of the 175,000,000 dols. Ash-Heap." The United States in 1899 lost 150,000,000 dols. worth of property by fire, and this year the losses, it is estimated, will amount to 25,000,000 dols. more. It has been proved that the vast steel sky-scrapers which are so much in fashion in America are not really fireproof at all, and an insurance expert has recently declared that there is not a single fireproof building in New York. The only efficient protection against fire, Mr. Boies maintains, is an elevated fire service:—

By means of the stand-pipe system of forcing water to the top of tall structures we can throw a stream from the roof of a building three hundred feet away. Why not install such plants throughout the congested districts of all our large cities, and place the extinguishing forces in instant command of anything on fire for blocks around?

ON CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. A. M. Low, in an article entitled "Does Government Service Pay?" makes the following contrast between the English and American Civil Services:—

In the English service the subordinate salaries are lower than in the American service, but the higher officials in England are better paid. In England it largely depends upon the individual whether he shall remain a subordinate or go to the top. If his capabilities are limited he enters the service in one of the junior grades, and must be content to remain there, as the rules do not permit his promotion from that grade to the one above; but if he has abilities of a high order, and can pass an examination admitting him to a class from which promotions to the highest positions are made, his future is largely in his own keeping.

THE COMING GENERAL ELECTION.

Mr. Thomas Burke has an article on "Social Reform and the General Election," which is entirely devoted to the question of the taxation of ground values. Had it not been for the South African War the coming General Election would have been fought on this issue, and even as it is Mr. Burke thinks that land reform will play an important part. Mr. Burke quotes some remarkable figures to show the necessity for reform :—

Every inch of land between King William's statue and Trinity Square, London, cost £30 10s., or at the rate of £191,000,000 per acre—beyond all doubt the highest price ever paid in England for land. The South Eastern Railway Company was asked at the rate of 65,000,000 dols. per acre for a piece of ground in Bermondsey, which had a depth of sixteen feet only. The demand was so exorbitant that even a railway company had to pause, finally declining to purchase. In the year 1880 land in Cannon Street was sold for 30 dols, a square foot; and six years later the price of land in this identical street went up to 75 dols, a square foot—an increase typical of the growth of land-values in London, even in such a short period of time as elapsed between 1820 and 1886.

Mr. R. P. Falconer asks "Is Crime Increasing?" and answers the question as follows:—

Crime, in the broadest sense, including all offences punished by law, has probably increased slightly in the last twenty-five years. On the other hand, crime, in its deeper moral sense, as we are apt to picture it, has decreased. Changes in our environment, not changes in our moral standards, have multiplied minor offences.

SUBSIDIES FOR AMERICAN SHIPPING.

Mr. E. T. Chamberlain writes on "The Shipping Subsidy Bill," the objects of which he states as follows:—

To establish in the United States the industry of building all types of ships for the foreign trade, and of promoting their navigation under the flag of the United States, with American crews. The object is thus three-fold and comprehensive. If enacted and successful, it means the harmonious development, of the United States into a maritime power second only to Great Britain. Though this development involves expenditure, it will be a wealth-producing process, the return to the nation far exceeding the outlay. The method of the bill is direct. It proposes appropriations from the Treasury, covering in all a period of thirty years, the maximum for any one year not to exceed 9,000,000 dols. Several years must elapse before the maximum is attained; so that the total expenditures provided for may be put at about 250,000,000 dols.

AMERICA AS A WORLD POWER.

Mr. C. A. Conant begins what promises to be a very interesting series of articles on "The United States as a World Power." The present article is, however, merely a prefatory one, and deals chiefly with the positions of the European Powers. Mr. Conant treats at length of Russian progress, which he characterises as follows:—

The Russian Empire, therefore, may be described as the greatest "trust" in the world. From the natural attributes of government monopoly it meets no opposition on Russian soil Seeking to guard industry at home by high tariffs, and to promote competition abroad by distributing with a generous hand in loans and bounties the gold derived from the infinite resources of international finance, and armed with absolute command over many millions of people, who are accustomed to ready submission to the military system, the Russian Empire represents the greatest organised force which confronts Western civilisation.

OTHER ARTICLES.

There are four other articles, none of which calls for quotation. Mr. W. C. Fox, writing on "America's Relations with Germany," retails the circumstances of the great dispute which raged so long over the importation of American pork. Mr. Hans Devrient describes the Passion Play at Oberammergau, but says nothing new for English readers. Mr. F. L. Clarke sketches the history of Hawaii since the arrival of Europeans.

THE STRAND MAGAZINE.

THE August Strand is a good number. Besides Pro-fessor Olerich's article, "The Cleverest Child in the World," noticed elsewhere, we have a khaki article on "Deeds of Daring and Devotion in War," which is not bad of its kind, and a paper on "The Secrets of the Zoo," which shows that the superintendent and keepers of the Zoo need quite as much courage and coolness as any soldier. The article is very readable. Sir Robert Ball writes on "The Structure of the Sidereal System," which deals partly with the uses of photography in astronomy. The best star photography is done by long exposure of the plates, the longer they are exposed the greater the number of stars which come out. Stars can thus be photographed which are beyond the range of the most powerful telescope. Sirius being so remote that its rays take nine years to reach us, we see Sirius through a telescope as it was nine years ago. Some stars seen through telescopes being one thousand times farther off than Sirius, their light must have taken nine thousand years to reach us. We see them, therefore, as they were nine thousand years ago, before the earliest records of human history.

THE first of Railwa showing Russia.

The mountain the rock souvening mountain tions are tunnelli

The so muc Russia inspect Mathe " Best Profes for Fa Nation which States Tools, mecha Crane Smith H. Be

TH

first p Chine

Mr. paper He pi upon years. increa be fu betwe weste Unite place it und storel the n her c had t of th sprin coast

The consistence New New Engine Unio

M

of Ig

At pi

for I

the

.....

CASSIER'S MAGAZINE.

hipping

ates as lding all

ng their merican

sive. If opment.

only to nditure,

nation

ect. It

n all a not to fore the rovided

a very

es as a nerely

ons of gth of

as the ites of n soil

nd to nerous

com-ready repre-

estern

ls for rica's es of ortaribes

hing

s the

Pro-

the e on

not

the pers

28 bert

m,"

in ong

the

can

the

its

a a een off

ind

ere

THE most interesting article in the July number is the first of a series by L. Lodian on Russian and Siberian Railways. Several photos are given, amongst others two showing spills on the Ural Railway. Speaking of the Russian aversion to tunnelling, he says:—

The Russian railway engineer will sooner blow up a small mountain than make a tunnel, leaving a yawning chasm between the rocks, with two "streaks of rust" at the bottom thereof as a souvenir of his activity. Or if he finds that after going to the mountain, the mountain is not likely to yield to him, his instructions are to circumvent it by a long detour. Anything to avoid tunnelling!

The bridges are all copied from American structures, so much so that the writer did not see a single notable Russian bridge originality during 8,000 miles of railway inspection across Siberia and Russia. Mr. Ewing Matheson gives an account of the history of making "Best Yorkshire" Iron. Extracts are given from Professor W. S. Aldrich's lecture on Electric Power for Factories. In Invention as a Factor of American National Wealth, W. C. Dodge describes the benefits which the patent system has given to the United States. Dr. Colman Sellers, in his article on Machine Tools, gives a short history of their introduction into the mechanic arts. Joseph Horner writes on Foundry Cranes. Economics in Machine-Shop Work, by Oberlin Smith, and the Development of Fly-Wheels, by Charles H. Benjamin, complete the number.

THE ENGINEERING MAGAZINE.

THE July number contains many interesting articles, first place being given to Mr. Parsons's description of Chinese engineering, noticed elsewhere,

THE REVIVAL OF AMERICAN SHIP-BUILDING.

Mr. Waldon Fawcett contributes the first part of a paper on "The Ship-building Yards of the United States." He prefaces his description of the yards by some remarks upon the rapid growth of the industry during recent years. In the opinion of the best informed men the increase during the three closing years of the century will be fully equal to that of any decade which intervened between the inauguration of metal ship-building on the western side of the Atlantic and the year 1898. The United States have commenced a fight for the foremost place amongst ship-building nations, and have commenced it under the fiercest competitive conditions. Great national storehouses of material in the American forests enabled, the new nation to secure the supremacy of the seas with her clipper ships, and for the same reason Great Britain had the field largely to herself in the early development of the metal vessels. Now, however, shipyards are springing into existence on both the Pacific and Atlantic coasts of the Great Republic, and during the early summer of 1900 the increase of the value of contracts over a corresponding period last year amounted to £1,400,000. At present American firms are executing naval contracts for Russia and Japan, and, of course, the new navy of the States keeps naval constructors fully employed. The increase in the mercantile marine is, however, considerable. Mr. Fawcett gives a description of the three principal firms in America-namely, the Newport News Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Company of Newport News, Va., the William Cramp and Sons' Ship and Engine-building Company of Philadelphia, and the Union Iron Works of San Francisco.

THE MINERAL WEALTH OF CANADA.

Mr. H. Mortimer Lamb gives an interesting account of "The History and Progress of Mining in British Columbia." Gold, silver, lead and copper are largely mined, but the increase of the gold product has naturally given mining a great impetus. Copper also shows an increase, but silver and lead are decreasing. Mr. Lamb describes the methods used for extracting, smelting and transporting the ore, and illustrates his article with a great number of photographs. In conclusion he says:—

There is no longer any question as to the exceedingly bright future in store for the mining industry of this country. Gradually the obstacles to progress, which appear now so formidable, will be overcome; the labour problem will present far fewer difficult points as the mining districts become more thickly populated, and as the industry becomes more firmly established; mining and metallurgical costs will be still further reduced as conditions are more perfectly understood; and in proportion to the growth and importance the industry attains, so will be the readiness of capital, both British and American, to enlarge its scope in what must uitimately become one of the most important centres of mining activity in the whole of America.

THE GREAT RIVALS.

The Iron situation is dealt with in an interesting article by Mr. J. Stephens Jeans. He treats it chiefly by means of comparisons between the different countries. From this it appears that the United States easily take the lead in the production of pig iron and steel. From Mr. Jeans' tables we see that the increase in tons of pig iron produced in America in 1899 over that in 1898 is 1,846,769, in Germany 829,251, and in England only 624,248. As is to be expected, Mr. Jeans, who is the Secretary of the British Iron Trade Association, treats his subject with great lucidity.

W. H. Dormer writes on the Power Features of the Paris Exhibition.

Other articles are rather more technical.

THE NOUVELLE REVUE.

WE have noticed elsewhere M. de Pouvourville's instructive article on the Boxers.

In the second July number M. Regamey writes a very interesting paper on Japan, illustrated with some graphic pictures. Japan has been overrun by engineers of various nationalities. Indifferent to the beauties of nature, and eager only to exploit the country, while, at the same time, disposed to treat the Japanese as inferior beings, they mistook the calm gentleness characteristic of the Japanese for timidity, and were surprised and even scandalised when the race which they despised revealed an unsuspected energy which destroyed their best laid plans. M. Regamey considers that the events which followed the Chino-Japanese War, in which France shared to some extent in the odium which Russia incurred among the Japanese, have fallen out to the commercial advantage of England.

THE WAR IN SOUTH AFRICA.

Captain Gilbert continues his ably-written articles on the War, taking the story of the military operations down to the middle of December last. Captain Gilbert notes that the action of General Buller in ordering that officers should not wear the distinctive tokens of their rank lest they should attract the special fire of the enemy had a great effect in keeping down the serious losses among the commissioned ranks. Captain Gilbert also notes that the hospital service of the British appeared, considering the circumstances, to be admirably organised; though it is not quite clear whether he is speaking generally, or only of the arrangements made after the battle of Belmont.

THE REVUE DE PARIS.

THE Revue de Paris keeps its place as by far the most fiving and the most interesting of the three great French monthly reviews. While cosmopolitan as regards its choice of fiction—Annunzio's much discussed novel "Fire" has just appeared in its pages—its contents have become typical of the best French thought, and its editors evidently aim at making the contents of each number as varied and as bright as possible. We have noticed M. Luchaire's curious article on "Relics and their Cult," a subject which is, perhaps, at the present moment more topical in this country than it is in France, where the veneration of relics, holy images, and so on is taken as a matter of course.

THE PRINCE DE JOINVILLE.

Of particular interest to those who would fain see France a monarchy, and who have made any study, is M. Laugel's admirable appreciation of the late Prince de Joinville, who was for so long the last surviving son of Louis Philippe, and in whose person were centred the memories of the traditions left by the last French King and Queen. Nowadays it is hard for us to realise Paris with its own patriarchal Court, for Louis Philippe and Marie Amalie were, like the Queen and Prince Albert, the parents of nine children, and theirs was a very happy and united family life which could not but have its ennobling influence on the country at large, as well as on the Princes and Princesses whose fate it was to grow up in such a Court. The Prince de Joinville was the sailor of the family, and for many years he really lived on the sea, first in one French man-of-war and then in another, and it was as commander of La Belle-Poule that he brought back to France the remains of Napoleon from St. Helena. In 1848 the Duc d'Aumale and the Prince de Joinville were in Algiers, and when they there learnt that their father was deposed and had to fly the country, putting patriotism before personal ambition, they made no attempt to bring to their side that portion of the French army and of the French navy in Algerine waters; instead, they left the colony quite quietly and joined their unfortunate parents in England, and there many years of the Prince's later life were spent, although he lived for some time in America with his two nephews, the Comte de Paris and the Duc de Chartres, who fought with the North in the great War of Secession. After the Franco-Prussian War the Prince de Joinville was able to once more live in France, and M. Laugel's slight sketch-in which not once is mentioned the Duc d'Orleans-makes even the casual reader realise all that France lost in losing her monarchical ideals, for no Napoleonic figure, either in the past or in the present, is clothed with the remarkable grandeur and self-abnegation of this son of Louis Philippe.

THE BIRTHPLACE OF ENGLISH SPORTS.

M. Jusserand, who has written so admirably on mediæval England as well as on mediæval France, continues in both numbers of the Revue his account of the sports and physical exercises of old France; and as we read his descriptions of the great wolf and stag hunts, of the village games, and of the many forms of physical exercise followed with zest by the great nobles, it seems almost incredible that the modern Frenchman has to come for his outdoor games to this country. As an actual fact most so-called national British sports seem to have first come to us from the other side of the Channel, notably football—known even in St. Louis as jeu de soule or sole—the game of bowls (there are few French castles without a bowling alley), tennis, as opposed to lawn tennis, and croquet; indeed, cricket would seem the only outdoor game which can claim to be wholly of English manufacture.

A FRENCH EXPLORER.

At the present moment very topical is M. Francois' account of a journey from Canton to Yun-nan-sen. writer was French Consul at Long-Tchéou from 1896-98, at the end of which latter year he was commissioned by M. Delcassé to inquire into the commercial and economic state of certain provinces of Tonkin or French China. Whenever it was possible he travelled by water in a Chinese junk, and though the country was supposed to be at peace, he thought it wiser to provide his boat with port-holes, each containing a miniature cannon. Among his Chinese employes was a certain Tong, who in his spare time devoted himself to watching for favourite sites for graves; he made careful notes of any that occurred, and on his return home was able to sell his information for a considerable sum, for the Chinaman considers that his own good fortune may depend on where he buries his near relations, beginning with his father and mother, who may count as ancestors. M. Francois, who writes with a greater sense of humour than is usual with a French traveller, does not seem to have been badly treated, and some of the observations he was able to make are really curious. It is quite clear that he does not much believe in the opening up of China to Europeans; on the other hand, he considers that Europe may be very glad ultimately to adopt the Chinese as a servile race, for he considers that they make admirable servants. "When a foreigner is in China he must cultivate any mesmeric power with which he may be endowed; sometimes one's only chance is to boldly walk forward right into the middle of a Chinese mob. The Chinaman is incapable of cohesion; in a mob each man fights for himself, each is fearful of death. Always remember in a Chinese crowd that you are dealing with each individual separately." This advice reads curiously in the light of late events: but it must be admitted that it also seems to be the experience of other European travellers in China.

ALSACE-LORRAINE.

The two political articles dealing, the one with the Roman question of 1862-which obtains a certain genuine value owing to its having been written by the M. Thouvenel who was at that time one of Napoleon the Third's trusted Ministers-and an even less topical account of the relations which existed from the year 1648 to 1871 between Alsace and France, by M. Pfister. The writer attempts to prove that when what is now the German province passed into French hands, the tract of country, though given one name, was really made up of a number of ecclesiastical properties, of principalities, of free burghs, and of tiny states, and that these gradually became merged in one another and formed, under the wise rule of France, a happy and contented province enjoying the same rights as any other, and after the Revolution sharing in the great ideals of fraternity and justice which then swept like a wave over the whole of the country. "The Westphalian Treaty gave to France a series of States lacking cohesion and united aspirations, the Treaty of Frankfort withdrew from her a united province endowed with a soul. The language may have remained German, but the soul was, and is, French, and this is why Alsace still remembers and will never forget.

usual notice Admi

M.

articl Move Fran the s of ho death coast and It w but Mau with vario realit allow antiof th Lavi freed Save emai pen prep wort vent freed hunc The and

> M exan The some Boro the bein class elect polit activ up a ism coun book had inter civil is th mari

the (

ing t her Pier

mea

com

THE REVUE DES DEUX MONDES.

castles

1awn

m the olly of ancois'

The

96-98,

ed by

nomic

China.

in a

posed

e his iature

ertain

imself

he

n his conown near

may ith a rench

, and really elieve

other ulti-

r he

Vhen

neric one's

the

able ch is rowd

ely."

nts;

the man

alue

enei

sted

ela-reen

pts

nce

ugh

of ghs,

me

ule

the

ion

ich

ry.

of

the nce

ed

is

THE Revue des Deux Mondes for July is quite up to its usual standard of interest and importance. We have noticed elsewhere an interesting letter sent by the Vice-Admiral de Penfentenyo to the editor, and printed in the second July number.

FRANCE AND THE SUPPRESSION OF SLAVERY.

M. Bonet-Maury contributes a long and well-informed article to the first July number on the Anti-Slavery Movement of the Nineteenth Century so far as it affects The attitude of mind in which he approaches the subject may be gathered from his recital of the story of how the three black servants of Livingstone, after his death at Ilala, embalmed the body and brought it to the coast of Zanzibar, after travelling on foot for nine months and undergoing a thousand dangers and privations. It was a signal example of the negroes' gratitude; but the story perhaps scarcely justifies M. Bonet-Maury in putting the black race on an absolute equality with the white. The writer is justly indignant at the various forms of labour contract under which the reality of slavery is often disguised. If at first France allowed herself to be outstripped by England in the anti-slavery movement, yet now, thanks to the efforts of the Duc de Broglie, Victor Schoelcher, and Cardinal Lavigerie, she has resumed her place in the van of freedom. M. Bonet-Maury is no unpractical theorist. Save in very rare circumstances, he says, the complete emancipation of a slave community by a stroke of the pen always does more harm than good; they must be prepared and educated for freedom in order to be worthy of it. The Governor of French Guinea invented a scheme by which slaves could buy their freedom by saving up a certain sum of money—two hundred or three hundred francs—out of their wages. The question of polygamy is one of great importance, and has naturally divided the missionaries from the civil or military authorities. M. Bonet-Maury's opinion is that the safest course is to recognise polygamous marriages, but to encourage by every possible means the Christian, or monogamist, union.

MUNICIPAL SOCIALISM.

M. Bourdeau has gathered together some interesting examples of practical Municipal Socialism in France. The socialist and the radical socialist are in power in some of the largest towns, such as Lille, Lyons, Bordeaux, and Marseilles; but England is regarded as the Mecca of municipal socialism, our municipalities being more directly under the influence of the workingclass vote than Parliament itself, for in Parliamentary elections the issues are confused by questions of Imperial politics. A tribute is paid to Mr. Chamberlain's municipal activity in Birmingham; but Glasgow is deservedly held up as the most conspicuous example of municipal socialism in operation. The story is told of a municipal councillor of Glasgow who was astonished to read in a book that his municipality was a socialist body. He had never thought of it in that light; he had only intended to take the steps which seemed to offer the best means of assuring the moral and material welfare of the community.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Among other articles may be mentioned an entertaining travel article by Madame Isabelle Massieu, describing her journey across Indo-China; and a paper by Baron Pierre de Coubertin on "The Psychology of Sport."

THE REVUE DES REVUES.

THE July numbers of this magazine being somewhat less international than usual, are less interesting to English readers. Purely international, however, is the idea of an American National Institute, recently founded in Paris, thanks to the efforts of an American lady, Miss Smedley, and opened with a speech from M. Sully Prudhomme, the full text of which forms an article in the July 1st number. The idea of the institute is to facilitate social intercourse and exchange of ideas between the United States and France.

M. Paul d'Estrée, in two long and rather scandalous articles, entitled "The End of a Society," describes the state of higher Parisian society under Louis XV., quoting largely from the reports of the then head of the police force—reports carefully drawn up, we are told, to feed the royal appetite for "anecdotes galantes."

M. Georges Pellissier discusses "The Politician in Modern French Literature," in which, he assures us, no one is so unjustly treated as the politician. In almost all novels and plays in which a politician appears he is represented either as consumed with ambition or as a rogue. Even if he was honest before entering political life, when once he is there he has no choice but to become corrupt and abominable.

M. Rosny reviews Mme. Clémence Royer's new book on "The Constitution of the World." In the present state of scientific knowledge matter appears inexplicable, and to elude us if we seek it; but Mme. Royer has persisted in not allowing it to elude her. She supposes that there are atoms, impenetrable, individual and eternal, not solid, but gaseous. Matter is made solid or liquid by variations in the pressure brought to bear on it; gas under pressure gives the idea of a solid. On this hypothesis the writer has built up a marvellous and original theory of the universe.

There are two other scientific articles by Dr. Caze, one of which, on Therapeutics of the Future, deals with three new healing agents—cold, heat, and electricity. By the application of extreme cold cases even of cancer are said to have been cured. Where an operation used to be performed, the patient is now plunged into a temperature of 110 deg. below zero. This is also sufficient to destroy all microscopic life, and Dr. Caze hopes that science will greatly benefit by the discovery of the uses of extreme cold. A celebrated New York physician, Dr. Sprague, has discovered that such affections as rheumatism, gout and sciatica can be benefited by the application of intense heat. He has accordingly been experimenting as to what was the highest temperature which a human being could endure, and found that 400 deg. Fahrenheit (100 deg. above the boiling point of water) could be borne without harm and even with great benefit by a girl suffering from acute rheumatism.

Dr. Caze has also an article on the Genesis of Liquid Air, in which among other strange things he shows that the boiling of water is really a form of its getting colder.

An Italian marquis, secretary to his Embassy in Paris, writes on the little Italian boys who sell plaster images about the streets. They have hitherto carried on their trade without the least regard to the laws of copyright; and as French sculptors, imagining that they are being harmed by these itinerant vendors who copy their works when and where they like, are asking for Government protection, we may not see the little image-sellers much longer, at any rate in the Paris streets.

GERMAN MAGAZINES.

Deutsche Revue.

THE all-absorbing topic of China occupies considerable space in the German magazines. Most of them, however, were written before the crisis reached its acute stage, but nowhere is there any talk of "Revenge."

THE POWERS AND CHINA.

M. v. Brandt, in the July number, writes on the chances of concerted action in China by the Great Powers. Such action, he truly says, demands the highest diplomacy. Russia and England are almost openly hostile, and the presence of Japan adds yet another disturbing element. The greatest possible mistake would be for each Power to use the present state of chaos for its own ends. He considers the suppression of the rising mere child's play to what would follow if it were necessary to police the whole of China. Reckoning that the population of the Celestial Empire is 350 millions, the policing would require an army of 350,000 men, reckoning a thousand to keep a million in order, an assumption which is of course absurd. After things are reduced to quietness, the Powers must, with a light but firm hand, compel the Chinese Government to make due reparation. A good part of the article deals with Corea.

TOMMY ATKINS AND HIS YANKEE COUSIN.

Mr. Poultney Bigelow writes a most interesting article comparing the Americans, British, and Boers as soldiers. In his opinion the Yankee soldier is the best he has ever met. He speaks of the regulars. He rather objects to the way in which the volunteers, and especially the roughriders, were belauded and praised in the American press, whilst the regulars were hardly ever mentioned. Mr. Bigelow says that the chief difficulty the American soldier had to contend with in the Spanish war was the fact that the officers were appointed for political reasons solely. The Government at once saw an opportunity of obtaining votes for the next election, and used it accordingly to the detriment of every department during the war. Comparing the American soldier with Tommy Atkins, he says that the former is a stronger and older man than the average Tommy. The Yankee regular combines the courage of the British soldier with the resourcefulness of the Boer. Tommy Atkins, however, is much better looked after than any other soldier. Mr. Bigelow illustrates this by citing the case of Wei-hai-wei and Kiao-Chau, Hong Kong and Manila. He found the English soldiers under Admiral Seymour were splendidly and extremely well looked after, and although they had been in occupation only six months cricket and football grounds were in full swing and everyone was in the best of health. At Kiao-Chau, on the contrary, dysentery and fever were ever-present guests, although only one hundred miles divides the two places. At Manila the American soldiers toiled and perspired at all sorts of hard work in thick woollen garments, but across the water at Hong Kong Tommy Atkins were light tropical clothes, lived in palace-like barracks, and had Chinamen to do his hard

Mr. Bigelow mentions the impossibility of bringing home responsibility to any one when there are so many heads of departments and commanders-in-chief. He enters rather fully into a discussion of the Boer character and the war, mentioning incidentally that the Boer thinks he is fighting in order to avoid being put under a tyrannical government, and the English think they are fighting in order to give him a more liberal one.

Professor Passow, of Heidelberg, contributes a rather technical article: "The Speech of Deaf Mutes."

Deutsche Rundschau.

M. v. Brandt, writing upon the Chinese crisis in an article on Colonial Politics, shows a certain leaning towards the present action of the Chinese. The Boers, he says, who defend their country against the invader are called patriots, but the Chinese who do the same are barbarians. Very few Western people understand the Chinaman. The diplomatist only tries to make capital for his country in order that he may receive a higher post nearer home. The missionary deals only with his converts. Turning to West Africa, Mr. Brandt laments the supineness of the German Government in neglecting to have the railway energetically pushed forward. England, he says, in the midst of a war costing her millions on millions, yet votes almost without a discussion 4½ millions for the completion of the Uganda Railway, whilst Germany cannot yet decide whether or not she should grant £5,000 for the finishing of the East African line. He complains of the difficulty of getting German capital for the colonies, and concludes by saying that their, development is thereby seriously retarded, for until capital for railways and mining machinery is forthcoming nothing can be done.

THE PARIS EXHIBITION.

The first of a series of articles on the Great World's Show, by A. Schricker, gives a brief account of the opening, and passes quickly in review the position of the warious exhibits. Of Alfred Picard, the Commissioner General, he says:—"Picard was born in Strassburg fifty-five years ago. In 1862 he entered the Polytechnic School, and two years later the Ecole nationale des ponts et chausses. Having finished his studies, he travelled in the East, and on his return became an engineer in Metz. During the war he was responsible for the completion of the huge barracks in less than two months. After the fall of Metz he joined the Army of the Loire. Later in Nancy he carried out great engineering enterprises. He also controlled the railway traffic and arranged for the supply of water for the new forts. Since then he has constantly been engaged upon engineering projects which have finally placed him in the front rank of his profession. In 1889 he was intrusted with the general supervision of the Exhibition. Mr. Schricker closes with a description of the German Pavilion.

OTHER ARTICLES

Alfred Stern, of Zurich, contributes an interesting article on "Blücher's Letters in the Year 1809." Many of these letters are from Blücher to his son in England, and several of these were never received by the latter. Von Eckardt writes upon the Islam reform movement during the last one hundred years. Islam, he says, has always desired to be a world-wide religion, and to-day that desire is stronger than ever. The article is chiefly an historical survey of the Mohammedan peoples during the closing century.

Nord und Süd.

E. Maschke writes an exceedingly interesting article upon Michail Nikiscrowitsch Katkof. It is chiefly a survey of the Russo-German relations from the time when Katkof first made his influence felt in the sixties down to the time of his death. M. de Giers, when Foreign Minister, always successfully opposed Katkof in his desire for wars. M. Maschke considers that Bismarck and Giers worked together for this end, and that Bismarck was always opposed to Katkof.

Georg Reinbach writes a sketch of Johann von Mikulicz-Radecki; M. Grunwald contributes some interesting letters which were exchanged amongst diplomatists at the beginning of the century.

I H succes an Ita numbe excelle in eve public beside admir. kewica the on Italy. spiritu feel th althou painti remin know in its ments comp differ Italia aims produ indus world inter revie publi infor Engl gram good gives > cont Gard Fine mov sprin acco amo in th Cou of a won their de ( fron on Ital revi

and

Ger For the I the An Lit

(Pa

THE ITALIAN REVIEW

I HAVE to congratulate Signora Salazar upon the success which has at last crowned her efforts to establish an Italian Review in the English language. The first number of the Italian Review, a two-shilling monthly published at 51, Via Castelfidardo, Rome, is a very excellent periodical, the like of which would be published in every capital in Europe if the English and American public were really interested in the life of other nations besides their own. My only feeling in welcoming this admirable magazine is that it is too good to live. Sienkewicz rightly declares that every man has two countries: the one is that in which he was born, and the other is Italy. "Faith, science, and, in short, all culture and spiritual life have come from Italy; thus every one must feel that he is in a sense a grandchild of hers." But although there is no cultured home where books, prints, paintings, statues or photographs from Italy do not remind us of our indebtedness to that country, very little is known about its modern life and the remarkable progress in its intellectual, industrial and agricultural developments. The aim of the Italian Review is to furnish a complete knowledge of modern Italian life in all its different branches. By creating a knowledge of modern Italian life it hopes to achieve many good results. It aims at establishing direct communication between producers and consumers by developing Italian art and industry, and by keeping educated men throughout the world an courant with the progress of one of the most interesting nations of the world. It promises a complete review of Italian reviews and Italian new books. It publishes a serial, and undertakes to supply practical information on all subjects which are of importance to English or American visitors to the Peninsula.

The first number, which opens with the editorial programme, contains more than a dozen articles, which give good promise for future usefulness. "An Italian Deputy" gives a very hopeful account of the present economical and political condition of Italy. Violet Fane (Lady Currie) contributes a charming poem, entitled "In a Roman Garden." The General Director of the Antiquities and Fine Arts explains his aspirations of bringing about a movement whereby a new Italian artistic youth may spring up. Madame Salazar gives a very gratifying account of woman's progress in Italy, which illustrates amongst other things how great an incentive to progress in this direction has been given by the International Council of Women. Madame Salazar promises a series of articles upon women's work, and maintains that women in Italy are fast rising to an appreciation of their duties, patriotic and social. Professor Count Angelo de Gubernatis writes on the "Literary Movement in Italy from 1860 to the Present Day." There are papers also on the last years of Italian Art and the last years of Italian Opera. There is an interesting account of the revival of Italian agriculture in South Italy, and the General Director of the excavations in the Roman Forum describes the results of the new explorations in the Vesta temple.

The following is a list of the Italian Reviews noticed in the department of the Review of Reviews:—The Nuova Antologia (7, San Vitale, Rome), the Political and Literary Review (Rome), the Journal of Economists (Palazzo Orsini, Monte Savello, Rome), the Naval League (Spezia), the Military Italian Review (Voghera, Rome), Colonial Italy (Rome), the Italian Review of Sociology (Fratelli Bocca editori, Rome), Vittoria Colonna (Naples), Literary Rome (Rome), Cosmos Catholicus (Rome), the Catholic Patriciate (Rome), the Young Ladies' Review (Rome), the Illustrated Stage (Via Fra Domenico, Florence), the Modern Review of Culture (Via E. Poggi 11, Florence), the Social Culture (Rome), the Illustrated Musical Chronicle (Voghera, Rome), the Scholastic Review (Bemporad, Florence), the Economist (Florence), Flegrea (Naples).

Altogether the Italian Review is a highly creditable publication. How long shall we have to wait, I wonder, before a similar review is published in English in

Quarter of a Century of the "Church Quarterly."

With its current issue the Church Quarterly Review completes twenty-five years of publication. It was initiated in meetings held at the Deanery of St. Paul's, and the circular proposing it was signed by A. J. B. Beresford Hope and R. W. Church. The first number appeared in October, 1875. Weoffer our sincere congratulations to the editor of this organ of scholarly Anglicanism on the service it has rendered and the high tone it has maintained. Even those who differ from its distinctive views most strongly cannot but respect its dignity and be helped by its serious and devout spirit. With all its polemics and its highly contentious tenets it is careful to keep its readers in touch with the springs of religious life and more than most ecclesiastical prints is an organ of piety. The survey of the quarter-century characteristically includes a statement of its creed:—

The ultimate and supreme authority of Holy Scripture; the Divine promise of guidance so that the final decisions of the whole Catholic Church are infallibly right; the reality of sacramental grace so that in Baptism the baptised person is in very deed a member of Christ in union with His sacred body, in Absolution the sins of the penitent are actually forgiven, and in the Holy Eucharist the consecrated bread and wine are made to be the body and blood of Christ—these form parts of that great system of truth to which the Tractarians were committed, which it has been one of our purposes to defend.

A paper on "Dr. Pusey's Spiritual Letters" offers a good example of the strictly edifying function of the Review. By the way, it acknowledges one advantage of his letters over his personal talk: "For on paper he had to finish his sentences, which he was never known to do in conversation!" The Bishop of Ripon's "History of the Church of England" is subjected to very severe criticism. Other articles are mentioned elsewhere.

Index to the Periodicals of 1899.

THE tenth volume (1899) of the "Annual Index to Periodicals" is now ready. As a time-saving appliance, this work must be indispensable in all libraries, public and private; and to enable students and every one to whom it would be of service to possess it, it is issued at a price which brings it within the means of all. Without this Index, the majority of articles in the periodicals would lie buried and forgotten; with its classification and arrangement the reader can discover every article, however vague its title may be, that has appeared on any subject. As all synonymous headings are avoided and numerous crossreferences from leading headings to kindred topics are supplied, there is no difficulty in turning up with certainty references to all the matter in the periodicals of the year connected with any topic. It need hardly be pointed out how useful it is for the journalist or general student to see not only what has been written, but to know what subjects remain unexplored. Vol. III. is out of print, but Vols. I., II., IV., and V. (1890, 1891, 1893 and 1894) may still be had, price 5s. nett; or 5s. 6d. post free; Vols. VI.-X. (1895-1899 inclusive) at 10s. nett, post free.

is in an leaning

e Boers, invader

ame are

and the capital higher with his laments

glecting

orward.

cussion

ailway,

African

erman

g that or until

oming

Vorld's

of the

of the

sioner

sburg

ponts led in

Metz.

on of

r the er in

He

r the

has

which iper-

th a sting

lany

and, tter.

nent avs.

and

e is ples

icle .

v a hen

to ign

his

rck

hat

CZ-

ing

THE BOOK OF THE MONTH.

A CHRISTIAN SOCIALISTS' HANDBOOK: RUSKIN'S ECONOMICS TOLSTOYFIED FOR THE MASSES.

This little book not only offers the reader more solid matter than volumes upon volumes of works written on the same theme, but does what multi-volumed works on political economy do not do,—it states economic problems clearly and simply. Any one who reads this book with unprejudiced mind and sincere desire to find answers to the problems which confront people of our times, will find those answers, and will arrive at a clear understanding of things which most people imagine to be difficult and abstruse. He will find also moral guidance and stimulation to good.—Count Tolstoy's Introduction to "The Anatomy of Mis.ry."

"THE Anatomy of Misery," Mr. Kenworthy's Plain Lectures upon Economics, is not a new book, but the second edition, which has just been issued from the press, may achieve results which justify me in dealing with it as the Book of the Month. It is a little book of which some seven thousand copies have been issued. It has been described by Mr. Hobson as "Ruskin reduced to a System." Mr. Kenworthy thinks that he has not only systematised Ruskin, but has penetrated even further into the structure of economics than was effected by "Unto this Last." In view of the emphatic commendation given to it by Count Tolstoy it may be well to summarise what it is the author has to say as to the existing state of things, and what are the remedies for the evils with which we are all unfortunately familiar.

Mr. Kenworthy is a Tolstoyan—that is to say, he believes that force is no remedy, a fact which cuts him off at once from the methods of those with whom he is in close sympathy. Mr. Kenworthy starts from the principle that society should be organised for the equal welfare of all, and using this as a scalpel he proceeds to anatomise limb by limb the diseased body social, ascertaining the extent of the disease in each part by comparison with the healthy part. Each section of his book is prefaced by a short poem which sounds the keynote of the chapter. For instance, the first part is prefaced by a poem first part is prefaced by a poem entitled "Decline and Fall," in which the note is struck in the following quatrain:—

My England! Rome has proved in vain The wisdom that a nation needs, For in her steps thou reelest down The road that to destruction leads!

Mr. Kenworthy is a poet as well as a political economist and a hot gospeller of the Tolstoyan school, and he uses every shaft in his quiver to pierce the armour of his enemies. This makes "The Anatomy of Misery" a tolerable vehicle for social propaganda, for many who dissent from his conclusions will nevertheless welcome the opportunity of putting before the people an impeachment of the existing social system that is eminently moral in its tone and Christian in its ethics. Mr. Kenworthy, who writes in very simple language, goes directly to the point when he gives chapter by chapter the facts and the principles, the methodical study of which, he maintains, is the only hope for the people. He comes before us as the teacher of truths which must be put into practice if we are to be free from the uncertainty, poverty, meanness which curse the lives of our people. The purpose of human life, he maintains, is happiness, development, pleasurable activity. This leads him into direct antagonism with the capitalists of the Manchester School, who in the name of political economy have blindly plundered and trodden down their fellow-men during this century. Self-interest, intelli-gently understood, Mr. Kenworthy explains, leads us to the acceptance as our first principle in economics, "thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself," and to interpret this as Simon did, "from each according to his ability to each according to his needs." For, he asks, is it not our interest to have people about us healthy, capable and in-telligent, or is it better to live among sickly slum-folk? By neglecting our fellow-creatures we defile our own surroundings and deeply injure ourselves.

From this starting-point Mr. Kenworthy has little difficulty in proving that the existing order conflicts both with the fundamental principle of true econo-

Tolstoy.

conflicts both with the fundamental principle of true economics, but defeats the objects which it professes to have in view. He accepts the definition of Ruskin as to wealth comprising only those products of labour which are good to be enjoyed by men, while false wealth covers those articles which are bad to be used or enjoyed, such as adulterants of food, unhealthy luxuries, pestilential dwellings, bad books and pictures. How far then, he asks, does our present social system produce wealth? He answers, that even of the bare necessaries of life, a suffi-

Count Leo Tolstoy.

* "The Anatomy of Misery." By J. C. Kenworthy. Second Edition. With Introduction by Count Tolstoy and letter by Professor Alfred R. Wallace. The Clarion Office, 88, Fleet Street, E.C.

munity:

Every ye

ciency of

Every yedestitution people are enough ho reasonably crowd into walk the strefuge. The people, knowst, unceasonable wast, unceas

The sur worthy's o poem, " T

Mr. K proceede devoted : politic. ceded h moderati Probably is so terr Britain, attentior month. young n British . not very they ap sergeant guarante 11,000 r and of t passed regimen populati men suf has reta requiren result o pure ai healthy in our s race wh Spectate years t physica

And w

people

wealth,

war in the hea

ciency of good clothing and shelter is not forthcoming to satisfy the needs of a large portion of the community:—

Every year, the people who die directly of starvation and destitution are counted by hundreds; every year, thousands of people are stinted to death. As regards shelter, there are not enough houses, even of the worst kind, to anything like reasonably accommodate all the population; whole families crowd into single rooms; in one place and another thousands walk the streets nightly, or sleep in the open, having no place of refuge. Those who have any idea of the lives of the mass of the people, know what this dearth of the necessaries of life is,—a vast, unceasing horror.

The sum of the whole matter, according to Mr. Kenworthy's opinions, is expressed more forcibly in his little poem, "The Mill," than in his prose:—

Two millstones in a mighty mill Grind on unceasingly; The stone beneath is Daily Toil, Above, Uncertainty.

The lower stone, in grinding, girds,
"Cease not, ye Poor, from toil!"
The stone above for ever groans,
"With quaking shall ye moil!"

This mill that never rests, grinds out Tears, blood, and broken lives, And teeming Wealth, that whelms the Class That labours not, yet thrives.

THE AUTHOR'S STUDIED MODERATION.

Mr. Kenworthy, in his "Anatomy of Misery," but proceeded on the well-known lines of all those who have devoted attention to the study of the maladies of the body Wherein he differs from those who have preceded him is that there is an appearance of studied moderation even in his denunciation of the existing evils. Probably there is nothing in what he has written which is so terrible an indictment of the existing social order in Britain, as the fact to which Mr. Horsfall called the attention of the Charity Organisation Society last month. He said that last year in Manchester 11,000 young men tendered themselves for enlistment in the British Army. The physical standing of that army is not very exacting. Neither in stature nor in physique do they apply very severe tests. All that the recruiting sergeant asks is that the recruit should be, like a horse, guaranteed sound in wind, limb, and eyesight. Of these II,000 recruits 8,000 were rejected as physically defective, and of the 3,000 who were accepted only 1,072 could be passed into the army, 2,107 being sent into militia regiments. From this it would seem that in the great urban population of the North only one in ten of the workingnen sufficiently robust to feel a desire to enter the army, has retained a sufficiently healthy body to comply with the requirements of the recruiting sergeant. This is the result of City life, lack of physical exercise, absence of pure air, clean water, and the ordinary conditions of healthy human existence. The savages whom we spawn in our slums are growing up a rickety, scrofulous, stunted race who are not even fit to be food for powder. The Spectator declares that, unless we can in the next twenty years tackle seriously the slum question, we shall be physically no less than morally undone as a great nation. And with this canker eating into the hearts of our people the Spectator and its allies have squandered the wealth, resources and interests of the nation in waging war in Africa to smooth the crumpled roseleaf under the head of a handful of Outlanders. The number of Outlanders petitioning for redress was only twice as large as the number of would-be recruits in Manchester in a single year, who were unable to comply with the minimum standard of physical capacity laid down in the British

Imagine the whole nation for ten months absorbed in a campaign against the slumland of London alone, with £60,000,000 at its disposal and an army of 240,000 ceaselessly employed in carrying out the necessary works, and every newspaper discussing day by day the progress that was made.

OUR "SYSTEM" OF DISTRIBUTION.

Yet our means of production are efficient to turn out all that is wanted—our resources are am le beyond measure, yet our system of production fails in every direction. Equally faulty is the system of di ribution which Mr. Kenworthy thus summarises:—

Rich people idle or work at their leasure, and receive a wasteful superfluity of Wealth; the Por drudge on at nameless and dishonoured tasks, earning at m it a bare subsistence for their broken lives, and not always that. There is a Governing and Organising Class, whose power not schemes bring profits and "honours" to themselves; there is a Criminal Class, whose efforts and schemes bring them to poson and disgrace. At the bottom of the social scale are creatures sunk in misery, in huge degradation, unspeakable, heart-breaking to those who know it. At the top is an aristocracy of birth and property, whose historical characteristics are self-shness, injustice, ignorance, pride, and corruption. Agitations, strikes, riots, rebellions, witness to the relations between the two Classes.

THE MALTHUSIAN BOGEY FACED.

One of the first principles which ought to guide a community is to provide for the support and comfort of the aged and infirm, the young and helpless. Something is done, he admits, to provide for these classes, but more than half the funds raised for the purpose are spent in administering the relief. He charges the production of the so-called vicious and criminal classes solely to destitution, ignorance, and misery. Mr. Kenworthy touches incidentally upon the Malthusian problem, and deals with it with courage not often visible in those who discuss the problem of population. After saying that the overpopulation of the world is by no means a certainty, he frankly faces the possibility by admitting his readiness when the time comes to suppress the surplus population if necessary. He says:—

Even were it a certainty, it would seem desirable that we should all, meanwhile, live as full and happy lives as possible; until the time comes when the surplus population must be suppressed. Because the world might some day become overpopulated, is no reason for our practising injustice and foolishness, and living miserably, at present.

PROPERTY LAWS ATTACKED.

Mr. Kenworthy then proceeds to examine the present methods of production and of distribution, and finds them, as might naturally be expected, very faulty. But with the best will in the world I am not able to discover in his diagnosis any evidence that he could, if given a free hand, devise a better system:—

The means of production and distribution, without which men cannot labour, and therefore cannot live, are in the absolute control of a small class, who use their monopoly to divert to themselves the whole product of Labour, except the portion which is necessary to keep the labourers alive and working.

This is brought about through the property laws, which are made and maintained by the monopolist class, who control the social organisation. This class is able to maintain its position and privileges by force, in the name of Law.

If we desire to bring about a reformation of society, clearly our attack must be directed upon the existing property laws; in

OR

he same

. Any

e of our difficult

tomy of

of the

its tone

writes

t when ciples,

e only eacher

are to curse The mainment.

leads

n with hester

ne of lindly

down

ntelli-

Ken-

ciple

love

did.

his

o his not bout

in-

live

By

ures

ings

Mr.

ty in rder

ndaono-

e in alth

d to ose

as ell-

sks.

He

ffi-

ion.

this

place of which we must create a property system that shall be established in the goodwill of the community, and enforced by peaceable means.

He is quite clear in his mind that while violent revolution is to be deprecated private property itself must be destroyed; but how this is to be done without violence does not appear. He says :-

Laws to control Property-owners are inoperative while Private Property remains. Passing such Laws is like trying to get rid of an octopus by disengaging one of the creature's many arms at or an octobus by discingaing on the state of the next; while you work at that, the keepend arm regains its hold. The whole work at that, the kosened arm regains its hold. body must be dealt w h; the vital part must be attacked.

" FORC : NO REMEDY "-MAYBE,

The significance f the pamphlet lies not so much in the remedies which he prescribes as the fact that he presents his indictm nt of the present social order in a religious guise, and it stead of attacking the institution of private property from the standpoint of an anarchist or an atheist he maintains that its abolition is indispensable preliminary to the exablishment of the Kingdom of Heaven on earth. What is to be expected is that those whom he addresses will eagerly accept his exposition of the injustice of things as they are, and take their own short cut to what they ought to be. Mr. Kenworthy himself holds a candle to the devil in one very significant passage in which, after saying that violence begets violence, and that no violent revolution has ever ended oppression, says that nevertheless the steps of history have hitherto been through blood and struggle, and it may be that Progress has not yet entered the better way of peace. Mr. Kenworthy's "maybe" will certainly become in the mouths of other men a positive affirmation that as it has been so it must be in the future, and that there is no hope for the world in waiting for the peaceful birth of the new era, and that our only hope is in a Cæsarian operation. This of course conflicts directly with the principle to which Mr. Kenworthy is deeply committed.

BEGIN WITH YOURSELF!

The following passages from his last chapter, while they express his own conviction, will nevertheless be scouted by the more ardent spirits as a most lame and impotent conclusion. He says :

Not by violent revolution, nor by mere political action, can actual reform be accomplished. The property laws, which we attack, are rooted in the thoughts, habits and beliefs of the majority of men; rich and poor, oppressor and oppressed. Not until these thoughts, habits and beliefs are changed will reform come. Ignorance and selfishness together are the two upholders of the property laws.

What is to be done then? There is at least one thing you can do, thoroughly, infallibly. Reform yourself.

In the Society that is to be, which we idealists imagine, certain rules of conduct must needs be observed by each individual. For our own, and for our neighbours' sakes, the laws of health must be followed-temperance, cleanliness and activity. To the same end, the true principle of economy must be obeyed —"Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself,"—"From each according to his capacity, to each according to his need." Only persons who are simple, truthful, kind and unselfish, can obey these laws. Through disobedience to these laws, our Society is perishing; the only hope of salvation is in returning to them. There is one person—yourself—whom you can at once bring to that allegiance. In your own person you can set an example of the true life. By example and precept you can win others to the truth.

PROFESSOR WALLACE'S PROGRAMME.

This is the objection which Professor Alfred Wallace makes in a letter addressed to Mr. Kenworthy, which certainly lacks nothing in the clearness and precision of its proposals. Writing on July 4th, Professor Wallace

I look upon Tolstoy as the greatest social reformer of the century, and the most Christlike man,

I have read through your articles upon "The Anatomy of

They are admirable, forcible and clear. I agree fully with them except the conclusion, which I find unnecessarily weak and

Surely there are two modes of action, either of which would bring about the "Co-operative Commonwealth"—the abolition of the rule of capitalists-the abolition of private property in the nation's industry.

The first is by the systematic extension of the co-operative movement, the workers and trades unions devoting all their savings and accumulations of capital to establishing all kinds of productive industries themselves for their own consumption, thus absorbing first, all unemployed labour power, then withdrawing labour from the capitalists. This, if systematically pursued, would, I believe, in fifty years transfer the whole production of the necessaries and comforts of life to the workers themselves.

The next method is by the whole body of workers using their voting power to return representatives who would carry certain great reforms:

(a) Nationalise the railways and the land, paying all existing owners a life income only.

(b) Adopt the principle that the unborn have no property rights and abolish inheritance.

(c) Give to all children in future equality of opportunity to its fullest extent.

Voluntary universal co-operation would inevitably follow. Both these methods are possible with men and women as they are.

It only wants systematic education, and a body of energetic leaders to bring them about.

I prefer the latter as the more direct and immediately practicable.

I feel sure that you must see the practicability of these or some modification of them. Why not adopt some such scheme of your own, not the weak and utterly useless plan of each one trying to live up to an ideal which you admit only a very small minority can ever attempt-and even they will effect practically nothing.

I see in your book, "From Bondage to Brotherhood," you do in the last chapter propose or suggest co-operation, but just looking at it seems too vague. To me any exposition of evils without showing that there is a real thorough practical remedy is all waste of time. Hundreds of such books have been written, and where are they, and what good have they done? "The Bitter Cry" and "Darkest England," and Booth's statistics of London, "The White Slaves," "Life in West London," etc.

None of them propose a remedy, and they are all a nine days' horror and then forgotten !

What we want is to write upon a definite programme "like the five points of the charter," and then in season and out of season keep it before the public (as the Alliance have done with drink), and especially by debates in Parliament. agitate, agitate! Never cease, but let it be for definite legislation, demonstrably leading one step toward the Co-operative Commonwealth, and the abolition of want. I tried the proposal of "Free Bread" in the last chapter of my "Wonderful Century," and I am sure it is a good proposal, since it would demonstrably abolish actual starvation, but nobody has a good word to say

I myself would advocate free bread, free coals and free house— the minimum essentials of life, and far cheaper in the end than poor laws-all to be paid by the surplus wealth of the rich-by a progressive tax on all property above £ 100,000 till it would absorb all surplus above a million. Then we should have breathing time for education, agitation, and remedial legislation.

But while we talk and dream the poor starve, and worse than ALFRED R. WALLACE. starve.-Yours very sincerely,

I turn would sa the root " From ing little England

Cease f Laws, ne -vote. let it die. come up public op Imagi

Kenwort workers for new . thing the will be 1 worthy's agreeme with the forth, w discover Six to popular o

> tion of a beginning however, agitation which sha in the ma our direct 1. The lands. 2. The posals of and distri

Wa callings u If eve spoken system w them up programi myself-But th defence

Through perceived epends To achie under th who are truthfuln force, no functions so well explain a ecision of Wallace

natomy of fully with weak and ch would abolition rty in the operative all their kinds of tion, thus hdrawing pursued, luction of selves. sing their y certain existing property

low.

energetic rediately

these or scheme each one ry small actically

d," you but just of evils remedy we been done!

Booth's n West ne days'

e"like I out of ne with Agitate, slation, mmon-"Free y," and strably to say

e than

ACCEPTED BY MR. KENWORTHY.

I turn with some interest to see what Mr. Kenworthy would say in reply to a criticism which strikes directly at the root of the doctrine which he has stated in his book, "From Bondage to Brotherhood." In that interesting little volume he thus addresses the workers of England:—

Cease from following after those who dangle before you new Laws, new Acts of Parliament, who ask you to do nothing but—vote. The Law has been framed by oppressors; neglect it, let it die. In place of it, by the Power of Brotherhood, will come up the true Democratic means of Government—unfettered public opinion, which is the will of the people. . . .

Imagine, then, my astonishment on turning to Mr. Kenworthy's reply to find, that instead of exhorting the workers to cease from following after those who clamour for new Acts of Parliament, he accepts holus bolus everything that Dr. Wallace says. That I am not exaggerating will be proved by the following extracts from Mr. Kenworthy's letter. After expressing his whole-hearted agreement with Dr. Wallace's position and his sympathy with the immediate practical legislative proposals so set forth, which are quite the best his own mind can discover, he continues:—

Six to ten years ago, during the then existing semi-crisis of popular discontent and socialist agitation, I stated and advocated broadcast in the press and from the platform exactly these proposals of yours for the development and extension of productive and distributive co-operation, and nationalisation or municipalisation of all material social resources and functions, necessarily beginning with the land . . . The first step in that programme, however, must necessarily be such agitation as you plead for; agitation upon the moral and economic aspects of the question, which shall arouse such enthusiasm and clearness of perception in the masses that the authorities shall be compelled to move in our direction. Inquiry must be instituted as to—

 The present conditions of ownership of all agricultural lands.

2. The conditions of the unemployed in various trades.
3. Ways and means of organising men in their proper sellings upon the land of the senter.

callings upon the land of the country.

If ever the judgment of God was spoken in history it is spoken to-day, prophesying quick ruin upon the infamous system which has drained the land of its inhabitants and heaped them up in cities . . . For the practical politician this is the programme of the future, as I see it, and one to which I commit myself—body, soul, and spirit.

But there is one further consideration. This I may state as defence of the conclusion of "The Anatomy of Misery." Through years of every kind of labour for these very reforms, I perceived that the effectiveness of a man, whether leader or led, depends fi.st, last, and wholly upon his personal character. To achieve any of our Socialist proposals, as much as to live under the society that would result from them, men are needed who are first of all men of goodwill, and with that, men of truthfulness at all cost. Such men will concentrate their whole force, not upon the Coercive forces, but upon the Administrative functions of Government, in that spirit of the Christian Gospel, so well understood by Tolstoy, which I have endeavoured to explain and spread among my fellow-countrymen

THE HALLOWING OF SOCIALISM.

I am not careful, however, to convict Mr. Kenworthy of inconsistency. His consistency or inconsistency matters very little. What is important is to note that his book is an attempt to present in a Christianised form the extreme proposals of the Socialists who deny the right of private property, and demand the repeal of every law authorising the enforcements of debts and contracts. For the last year or two his teachings will have fallen upon deaf ears. But in the stormy and troubled time upon which we are entering there is reason to believe that the teachings embodied in this little book will find eager acceptance from many who would have turned a deaf ear to the more violent and irreligious teaching of the materialists. Those who scoff at Socialism and profess to believe that it is a mere craze which will pass off, have taken little pains to read the signs of the times. I say nothing here of the steadily increasing strength of the Socialist vote in nearly every European country. Neither do I insist upon the probability that the Liberals in their distress at the coming election will go far in the way of purchasing the allegiance of the Socialists and the Independent Labour Party. I would rather point to the significant declaration of Mr. Morley at Oxford, when he declared that if he had to choose between Militarism and Socialism, he would without hesitation throw in his lot with Socialism. Now, Mr. Morley is one of the strongest and most advanced advocates of the Individualism of the Manchester School that is to be found in politics. For such a man to make such a declaration at such a time ought to give the most cheery of optimists pause when he calculates upon the maintenance of the existing order.

WHITHER?

One more word and I have done. Mr. Kenworthy concludes his remarkable little book with the following sentences:—

"But," you ask, "must I cease to struggle for Money and Property, as other men do? Must I refuse the aid of the Law, in defence of my Rights and Property?"

The answer you will give to these questions will depend upon your conception of the purpose of your life. Economic principles are, as we have seen, governed by Moral considerations. Morals are, finally, dependent upon our conception of the solution of the great mystery—What is to become of us hereafter? That is, Morals are based upon Religious Belief. Which is as much as to say, that Economic questions are, finally, Religious questions.

That is a very remarkable declaration:—To Mr. Kenworthy everything depends upon the question—What is to become of us hereafter? But as no one knows better than Mr. Kenworthy himself the great majority of those who are at present engaged in propagating the doctrines of Socialism have convinced themselves rightly or wrongly that there is no hereafter. What then becomes of moral considerations? That is a grave question, the answer of which is still to seek.

Some Notable Books of the Month.

MAN'S EVOLVING DESTINY.

MR. JAMES LANE ALLEN'S NEW STORY.

A NEW novel by Mr. James Lane Allen is something to look forward to. When read it is something to ponder over and glance back at with a recollection of pleasure. Of few writers can this be said. But Mr. Allen never writes unless he has something to say which is well worth reading and remembering, and he clothes his thoughts in such musical prose that merely to read his pages is a delight. Those who read his "Kentucky Cardinal" and the "Choir Invisible" will need no recommendation to induce them to purchase Mr. Allen's latest book, "The Increasing Purpose" (Macmillan, 63.). It is a novel with a purpose, but that purpose is so intimately connected with the evolving destiny of man, and is so beautifully and delicately developed that the reader, while conscious of the writer's purpose, is not over-conscious of it. As in all Mr. Allen's stories the scene is laid in the State of Kentucky. "The Increasing Purpose" is a life sketch and the story of the soul struggle of a man whose lot is cast at one of the critical turning points of the life of the human race. He lives at the moment when the old order is changing, giving place to the new.

ALWAYS MAN, MAN, MAN.

David is a Kentucky farm lad, in whose veins runs the blood of ancestors whose revolt against dogma in matters theological had cut them apart from the majority of their fellow-men. Living in a little country village, tilling, tending and harvesting the hemp which constituted the wealth of the countryside, David grew up looking at the world and man's place in it with the eyes of David the Psalmist, and of Job the patriarch. Man to him was the centre of the universe. It was created and fashioned for him. He was the pivot around which everything revolved. To him the most important among the worlds swung in space was the Earth, because it was inhabited by Man:—

Its shape had been moulded, its surface fitted up, as the dwelling-place of Man. Land, ocean, mountain range, desert, valley—these were designed alike for Man. The sun—it was for him; and the moon; and the stars, hung about the earth as its lights,—guides to the mariner, reminders to the landsman of the Eye that never slumbered. The clouds—shade and shower—they were mercifully for Man. Nothing had meaning, possessed value, save as it possessed value and meaning for him. The great laws of Nature, they, too, were ordered for Man's service, like the ox and the ass, and as he drove his ox and his ass whither he would, caused them to move forward or to stop at the word of command, so Man had only to speak properly (in prayer) and these laws would move faster and less fast, stop still, turn to the right or the left side of the road that he desired to travel. Always Man, Man, Man, nothing but Man! To himself measure of the universe, as to himself a little boy is sole reason for the food and furnishings of his nursery.

THE DOGMAS OF THE CHURCHES.

Filled with this belief, and thinking nearly always of his Bible, when he heard of the establishment of a Bible College at Lexington, David determined to become a student. But in that larger world he soon discovered that things were not as he had dreamed. He had left the solemn, cloistered fields, and been introduced to the wrangling, sarcastic, envious creeds. He became doubtful and distressed, finding that the dogmas of the churches did not fit in with the facts of science and the actualities of life. He passed through the various stages down the road of unbelief. First he tried to convince himself that all the churches were true, then he endeavoured to ascertain which of them proclaimed the truth, and finally he ended by turning his back on them all. With the mind of a devoutly religious man, he was antagonised by the excessive and unreasonable claims so confidently put forward by those who labelled themselves Christians. David, in his extremity, eagerly read the new literatures, the voices of which filled the world—literatures proclaiming the Old Faith, the New Science, and the New Doubt. This untrained and simple lad began to listen to them, one after another: reading a little in science, a little in the old faith, but most in the new doubt. For this he was ready; towards this he had been drawn.

THE TRIAL OF DOUBT BY FAITH.

The time came when the professors of the Bible College expelled David from the school. It was not done roughly or unkindly, but as Mr. Allen points out, it was a repetition of that old, old scene in the history of man—the trial of his Doubt by his Faith. One half of the human spirit arraigning and condemning the other half:—

Behind David, sitting solitary there in the flesh, the imagination beheld a throng so courtless as to have been summoned and controlled by the deep arraigning eye of Dante alone. Unawares he stood at the head of an invisible host, which stretched backward through time till it could be traced no farther. Witnesses all to that sublime, indispensable part of man which is his Doubt—doubt respecting his origin, his meaning, his Maker, and his destiny. That perpetual half-night of his planet-mind—that shadowed side of his orbit-life—for ever allocated and held in place by the force of Deity, but destined never to receive its light. Yet from that chill, bleak side what things have we reached round and caught the sun! And of the earth's plants, some grow best and are sweetest in darkness. What strange blossoms of faith open and are fragrant in that eternal umbra! Sacred—sacred doubt of man. His agony, his searching, which has led him always around from more ignorance to less ignorance, from less truth to more truth; which is the inspiration of his mind, the sorrow of his heart; which has spoken everywhere in his science, philosophy, literature, art—in his religion itself; which keeps him humble, not vain, changing, not immutable, charitable, not bigoted; which attempts to solve the universe, and knows that it does not solve it, but ever seeks to trace law, to clarify reason, and so to find whatever truth it can.

Across the room sat the professors, and behind them one seems to see, tier upon tier, row above row, a vast shadowy colosseum of intent judicial faces—Defenders of the Faith.

David, excommunicated by the orthodox religious authorities of his day, takes up the first duty which lies nearest to his hand. He returns to his father's farm, to hard, ungrateful work, in his endeavour to pay back the money he has spent on his college education.

CHILDREN OF TWO REVOLUTIONS.

At this dark period of his career his life is moulded by the hands of a woman. Gabriella does not alter the course of his life, but she smooths away its roughnesses, and brings to it the softening influence of a woman's love. Gabriella herself is the product of a revolution, social effect Souther War. mistre home. tions a facing manking She, had far earth;

could l

been b

befalle church

him had of the which which "TI inspire who hand the it is doubt reader

A SI
To

a mar

take a

Beaco

make his ow is dis goes ' the h little Saint nowa Oran suppo unsat altho very a de order we re to me lady ' very ' lay fi autho work

embr

TH.

churches ctualities down the self that to ascerinally he the mind d by the ntly put ristians. eratures, res prothe New to listen science, doubt. drawn.

ble Colot done
it was a an—the human imaginamed and nawares ed back-7itnesses is his Maker, et-mind llocated lestined ak side e sun! weetest n and oubt of always ruth to sorrow cience, a keeps ale, not we that reason, them a vast igious h lies rm, to k the ers of

ed by r the esses, nan's ution, social not moral, but one which is not without a profound effect upon the community. She belongs to the old Southern slave-holding aristocracy ruined by the Civil War. In order to earn a living she becomes the schoolmistress of the little country village which is David's home. These two children of vast and distant revolutions are guided by Mr. Allen into one life—a young pair, facing toward a future of wider, better things for mankind:—

She, living on the artificial summits of a decaying social order, had farthest to fall in its collapse ere she reached the natural earth; he, toiling at the bottom, had farthest to rise before he could look out upon the plain of widening modern thought and man's evolving destiny. Through her fall and his rise they had been brought to a common level. But on that level all that had befallen her had driven her as out of a blinding storm into the church, the seat and asylum of religion; all that had befallen him had driven him cut of the churches as the fortifications of theology. She had been drawn to that part of worship which lasts and is divine; he had been repelled by the part which passes and is human.

"The Increasing Purpose" is a novel which is inspired by profound thought, and is written by a man who has a keen insight into life, a great love of nature and the ability to express his thoughts in language which it is a pleasure to read, so musical is it. There is no doubt that Mr. Allen's latest story will have many readers, but it cannot be read by more than it deserves.

A SEQUEL TO THE "SCHOOL FOR SAINTS."

"ROBERT ORANGE," BY JOHN OLIVER HOBBES.

To say that this is a clever book is only to say that it is by the lady who prefers to call herself by the name of a man. But to say that it is a satisfactory book is to take a liberty with the truth. It is an ambitious book, for what can be more ambitious than to bring Lord Beaconsfield into a story as one of the characters, and make him speak and write letters in his own name and in his own peculiar style? But nevertheless "Robert Orange" Nothing turns out right, everything is disappointing. goes wrong. The plot of the story is of the slightest, and the heroine is too young to be interesting. She is a little older, it is true, than she was in the "School for Saints," but it is impossible to work up much interest nowadays in pretty chits in their teens. As for Robert Orange, who gives his name to the title, and who may be supposed to be the hero of the story, he is a very unsatisfactory gentleman. He is a bit of a prig, and although he is a Catholic, his Catholicism is not of a very interesting variety, although it affords the authoress a definite opportunity of shunting him into a religious order at the end of the book. The only real person whom we remember with pleasure, or whom we would have cared to meet in real life, is the young half-Russian, half-English lady whose nervousness, restlessness, and excitability are very well painted. Robert Orange is little better than a lay figure who is created for the purpose of enabling the authoress to display her jewels of epigram and her embroidery of wit. In the "School for Saints" we are promised an account of Orange's experiences when he enters the Church. Therefore we may suppose that there is to be yet a third volume devoted to the analysis of the character of this not particularly interesting young man. There are some pretty things in the book, some eloquent passages, a good deal of sauce piquante of one kind or another; but on the whole it does not thrill us, neither does it maintain the high level which previous works of its authoress had led us to expect. (Unwin, 6s.)

HOW TO MITIGATE INDIAN FAMINES.

BY AN INDIAN.

THE terrible calamity which has overwhelmed large portions of India this year has attracted comparatively little attention in England. Death in the more dramatic form in which we have witnessed it in South Africa and in China has fully occupied the public mind, which is so constituted as to be incapable of taking an interest in two things at the same time. Hence the sufferings of the Indian peasants in the famine-stricken districts have for the most part been passed over in silence. But the present famine, following so close upon that of 1897, ought to arouse the conscience of the people of the Empire, and lead them to seriously inquire whether they have done all they can to prevent these terrible scourges. Those who are interested in the question will find a mass of useful information on the subject in the volume which Mr. Romesh Dutt has just published entitled "Famines in India" (Kegan Paul).

TEN FAMINES IN FORTY YEARS.

British administration of India has brought internal peace, but it has not banished famine. Within the last forty years there have been ten famines in India. At a moderate computation the loss of life in starvation and disease may be estimated at fifteen millions. The periodical recurrence of famines has been accounted for, among other reasons, by the assertion that the population of the country has increased more quickly than the produce of the soil. This, Mr. Dutt points out, is not the case. The increase in the population of India is slower than in England and Wales, and is slower than in eighteen other countries out of the twenty-eight for which figures are available. The immediate cause of famine is the failure of the rain. This cause can only be combatted by a more extensive system of irrigation. Mr. Dutt's main purpose in publishing this book, however, is to call attention to the other causes which, if they do not occasion famines, do profoundly influence their intensity and frequency. Famines, he says, are greatly due to the resourceless condition and the chronic poverty of the cultivators, caused by the over-assessment of the soil on which they depend for a living. The peace which British administration has given to India has not brought with it a reduction in the public expenditure or in the public debt. One-third or one-half of the net revenues of India are sent out of the country annually. Land revenue is the most important of the Indian revenues, and so it happens that the taxation falls heavily upon the cultivators of the soil. They can save nothing in years of good harvest, and consequently every year of drought is a year of famine.

THE ROOT OF THE EVIL.

In Bengal and in Northern India the cultivator generally pays rent to private landlords. The demands of the landlords and the State's demands from the landlords are both restricted by law. The land revenue realised is between five and ten per cent. of the gross produce of the soil. In Bombay and Madras the State itself is virtually the landlord. The cultivator has no adequate protection against over-assessment. The land revenues realise between twelve and thirty-one per cent. of the gross produce in Madras, and probably more in Bombay. In the Central Provinces the cultivators pay rents to private landlords. These rents and the proportion of the rent demanded by the Government as revenue are fixed by the State. In recent settlements the rents have been raised from two to twenty per cent., and the revenue from twenty to one hundred per cent. Mr. Dutt says:—

If we examine somewhat closely the death-rates of the famines which have occurred in India in this generation, i.e., within the last twenty-five or thirty years, we shall find that deaths have generally been most numerous, and famines have been more intense and fatal, in those places where the cultivators are least protected against over-assessment. In 1874 there was a famine in Bengal which caused no loss of life; in 1877 there was a famine in Madras, and over five millions of the population perished. In 1892 there was a general famine in various parts of India; there was loss of life in Madras, but in Bengal "there were no deaths from starvation." In 1897 there was also a general famine; in Bengal and Northern India the relief operations were successful in preventing loss of lives; in the Central Provinces the deaths were more than double the normal rate. And in the present famine the distress is most severe, and the deaths most numerous, in Bombay and the Central Provinces.

Mr. Dutt is confident that a great deal might be done to mitigate the ravages of famine if the land tax were moderated; if a million tens of rupees were annually spent in the construction of irrigation works, leaving the cultivator the option of using the water when he requires it and paying for it when he uses it; if the public debt and the expenditure of India were reduced; and, lastly, in the matter of assessment, if an appeal were allowed to an independent tribunal.

THE DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY.

A MONUMENT TO BRITAIN'S DEAD.

THE illustrious dead of England are buried in Westminster Abbey. To few, however, is that honour reserved. But the man who cannot aspire to this English equivalent of canonisation need not despair. Mr. George M. Smith, of Smith, Elder and Co., has generously provided the nation with a second Walhalla, in which there is room enough for every man who rises above mediocrity to hope to find a niche. In "The Dictionary of National Biography," now at last completed, are entombed the 30,000 men and women who have, by their life work and achievements, made the British people what it is to-day. Throughout the historic ages one person in every five thousand has gained sufficient distinction to obtain admission to the dictionary. The sixty-three volumes, which one by one have regularly for the last fifteen years been issued every quarter, compiled under the editorship of Mr. Leslie Stephen and Mr. Sidney Lee, are a truly national monument. All phases of Anglo-Saxon life are represented in the persons of those who have achieved any reasonable measure of distinction in their respective walk of life. In this vast gallery of pen-pictures of England's distinguished men are to be found portraits of statesmen, lawyers, divines, painters, authors, inventors, actors, physicians, surgeons, men of science, travellers, musicians, soldiers, sailors, printers, sportsmen, and leaders of society. Criminals, too, whose crimes have brought them notoriety, if not fame, have their deeds recorded. The darker as well as the brighter aspect of our national life may be traced in this many-paged monument to a nation's life. Vast as it is, "The Dictionary of National Biography" does not represent the whole of Anglo-Saxon activity. The great men of the race who happen to have been born across the Atlantic within the confines of the Union find no place in the Dictionary.

THE EBB AND FLOW OF NATIONAL GREATNESS.

The classification of the memoirs by date gives some indication as to the ebb and flow of our national life as it is expressed in the lives of individual citizens. Mr. Lee, in his statistical account, which prefaces the final volume, says:—

Leaving out of account the dark periods that preceded the sixth century, it will be seen that the ninth and tenth prove least fruitful in the production of men of the Dictionary's level of distinction. The seventh century was more than twice as fruitful as the ninth, and the tenth was far less fruitful than the sixth or eighth. Since the tenth century the numbers for the most part steadily increase. The eleventh century gives twice as many names as its predecessor, and supplies no more than half as many as its successor. The successive rises in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries are proportionately smaller, and there is a well-marked decline in the fifteenth century for which it is difficult to account. The sixteenth makes a notable bound, the aggregate memoirs belonging to that era being three times as many as those of the previous century. The upward progress is continued, although not at quite so high a rate, in the seventeenth century, which supplies more than twice, but less than thrice, as many names as the sixteenth. In the eighteenth the number remains almost stationary: only a slight increase of 115 names is on the record. In the nineteenth century the advance recommences at a very rapid pace, the total number of nineteenth century names more than doubling those of the previous century, In mental and physical activity the nineteenth century resembles the sixteenth; but the advance of the nineteenth century upon the eighteenth in the total of memoirs is relatively far smaller than the advance of the sixteenth upon the fifteenth.

Mr. Lee does not think that the large number of names which represent the nineteenth century in the Dictionary is an unfair estimate of the claims of that century on its merits, and apart from its proximity to the present generation. He points out that opportunities of distinction have been greatly augmented. The multiplication of intellectual callings, the specialisation of science and art, and the improvements in educational machinery, have all made the path to distinction easier.

THE MOST DISTINGUISHED NAMES.

The initial letter B has been honoured by more distinguished names than any other letter of the alphabet. It can claim 3,078 names in the Dictionary. C comes next with 2,542, followed closely by S and H, with 2,420 each. M yields 2,310 names. P, W, G, R, L, D, F and T all have over a thousand names to their credit. Their popularity is indicated by the order of their arrangement. X alone of all the letters is without a representative. Smith, as might be expected, claims the largest number of memoirs; 195 persons bearing that name or its variants are noticed in the Dictionary. The nation is indebted to the following family names for many distinguished men and women. Jones, 132; Stewart, 112; Hamilton, 106; Brown, 102; Clark, 99; Moore, 88; Taylor, 86; Douglas, 85; Scott, 83; Gray and Williams, 81; Gordon and Wilson, 80; Thompson, 78; Campbell, 72; Murray, 71; Davies, 68; Howard, 66, and Robinson, 63. The figures show the number of memoirs in the Dictionary. There are also 389 names beginning with the prefix "Mac," 220 with the prefix "O," and 133 with the prefix "Fitz." In conclusion, it need only be said that 658 persons

In conclusion, it need only be said that 658 persons have contributed to the compilation of this monument to Britain's dead, of whom a hundred did the bulk of the work. The cost of the undertaking has been heavy. The expenditure has considerably exceeded £100,000, while the receipts have lagged far behind that figure.

THE August number of the Young Woman contains two articles on music—an interview with Liza Lehmann (Mrs. Herbert Bedford), the song composer, by Mr. Arthur Lawrence; and a short account of Theodor Leschetizky, the great piano-teacher, who numbers Paderewski among his famous pupils.

BOOK the Chi some a Mr. and " ( amount ment, a Questio but wh practic His ju with a his " O Two tion in Norma before "The Unwin The se interes bound China ever, a reader collect 1898-9 Chines hand i Charle militar apt pu who ha Mr and H has be eye v

their i

Chang

of the ground

with w

For

especi There many Two have "Intr accou ways comm the Co accou trousl travel Yants intere

"E a residescr peans gover ports reliab

China

BOOKS FOR THE CHINESE CRISIS.

Books innumerable have been written on China and the Chinese. My readers will find the following notes of some assistance in the task of selection.

enth prove ary's level

twice as

I than the

ers for the es twice as

than half thirteenth

and there

which it is oound, the times as rogress is eventeenth thrice, as

e number

15 names

ce recom-

ineteenth

s century.

resembles tury upon

r smaller mber of

in the

of that ty to the

nities of e multi-ation of cational easier.

y more alpha-

ary. C

and H,

W, G, names

by the ght be

rs; 195

noticed follow-

en and 1, 106;

ouglas,

on and ray, 71;

figures

There

"Mac,"

Fitz."

persons

nument

bulk of heavy.

00,000,

ontains

hmann

heodor umbers

re.

Mr. Colquhoun's two books, "China in Transformation" and "Overland to China" (Harpers, 16s.), contain a vast amount of information about Chinese life and government, and also upon the later phases of the Far Eastern Question. Mr. Colquhoun is a useful recorder of facts, but when he strays into the regions of prophecy or of practical statesmanship he is a very unreliable guide. His judgment is prejudiced by fear of Russia combined with a dread of the Yellow peril. We noticed last month his "Overland to China."

Two useful books on the political and personal situation in the Far East are from the pens of Mr. Henry Norman and Lord Curzon. Both visited the Far East before the problem had become acute. Mr. Norman's "The Peoples and Politics of the Far East" (Fisher Unwin, 21s.) is well written and excellently illustrated. The section devoted to China contains two extremely interesting chapters of personal impressions of Li Hung Chang and Sir Robert Hart. Lord Curzon's "Problems of the Far East" (Longmans) covers much the same ground in a somewhat more detailed fashion.

For the latest account of the commercial situation, with which so many of the questions in the Far East are bound up, Lord Charles Beresford's "The Break-up of China" (Harper's) will be found most useful. It is, however, a volume for the student rather than the general reader. In it he brings together the information he collected on his mission of inquiry to the Far East in 1898-99. The views of consuls, viceroys, merchants, and Chinese officials are recorded at length, and there is firsthand information on Chinese armies and arsenals. Lord Charles Beresford preached with diligence the gospel of militarism to the Chinese. They appear to have proved apt pupils, and we are now face to face with the armed men who have sprung from the dragon's teeth he helped to sow.

Mr. Alexis Krausse's "China in Decay" (Chapman and Hall) is a handy volume in which the information has been well arranged. Those who wish for a bird'seye view of the situation will find it admirable for their needs. Apart from Mr. Krausse's speculations as to the future, his book is a clear and useful guide, especially as to Chinese dealings with foreign nations. There are maps, index, bibliography of authorities and many illustrations. A new edition has just been issued. Two of the best descriptions of Chinese life and habits have been written by women. Mrs. Archibald Little's "Intricate China" (Hutchinson) is a brightly written account of the Chinese people, their ideas, habits and ways of living. She describes the every-day life of the common people as she saw it during her long sojourn in the Celestial Empire. Mrs. Little also gives a detailed account of the reform movement, which ended so disastrously for the reformers. Mrs. Bishop is an indefatigable traveller and a trained observer. Her book on "The Yantse Valley and Beyond" (Murray) is a valuable and interesting description of the great central portion of China bordering the Yantse River.

"European Settlements in the Far East," by D. W. T. a resident in Hong Kong (Sampson Low), contains brief descriptions of all the cities in the Far East where Europeans have settled in any numbers. The appearance, the government, and the principal industries of all the treaty ports are condensed into a few paragraphs. The latest reliable figures as to commerce and population are given. The volume will be found invaluable in elucidating the telegrams from the Far East.

FOR CLIMBERS AWHEEL AND AFOOT.

WHEN the days begin to lengthen and the sun asserts itself as lord of the day the thoughts of the climber instinctively turn to the mountain peaks of Switzerland or of more distant lands. The publishers this year have not been backward in supplying the mountain climber with literature, although for the most part it consists of new editions of old books. Messrs. A. and C. Black have republished James D. Forbes's classic work "Travels Through the Alps," revised and annotated by Mr. W. A. B. Coolidge. If I recollect rightly, Mr. Ruskin included Forbes's volume in the list of the Best Hundred Books which he contributed to the Pall Mall Gazette many years ago. Another new edition is Sir W. M. Conway's "The Alps from End to End" (Constable, 6s.), which now is issued in a cheaper form. Even those who are content to look at the snowy peaks of the Alps from the villages which nestle at their feet will find his record of a mountain journey from one end of Switzerland to the other full of interest. Those who prefer the more adventurous climbs in the mighty Himalayas will find the new edition of Major Waddell's "Among the Himalayas" (Constable, 6s.) a useful and inexpensive addition to their mountaineering library. To those who cycle I would recommend Mr. G. L. Freeston's little book on "Cycling in the Alps: A Practical Guide" (Richards, 5s.). It ought to induce many cyclists to choose the Alpine passes for their holiday tour. Mountain cycling as it can be practised in Switzerland is one of the most exhilarating and at the same time one of the safest pleasures open to the cyclist. There are one or two chapters of useful hints to cyclists who wish to follow his example in Mr. Freeston's little guide book, which is profusely illustrated.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

BIOGRAPHY.

Elson, George. The Last of the Climbing Boys. cr. 8vo. 288 pp. (Long) 6/0 Moody, W. R. Life of Dwight L. Moody. s. roy. 8vo. 592 pp. ...... (Morgan and Scott) 10/6

ESSAYS AND BELLES LETTRES.

Clarke, Sir Edward. Public Speeches 1890-1900. cr. 8vo. 302 pp. ... (G. Routledge)

FICT ON. Boothby, Guy, A Prince of Swindlers, cr. 8vo. 2c2 pp. (Ward, Lock)

| Farjeon, B. L. The Mesmerists. cr. 8vo. 400 pp (Hutchinson) Glasgow, Ellen. The Veice of the People. cr. 8vo. 444 pp. |     |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|
| Gray, Annabel. The Mystic Number Seven. (Heinemann)cr. 8vo. 313 pp.(Simpkin Marshall)                         | 6/0 |
| Hobbes, John Oliver. Robert Orange. cr. 8vo. 410 pp (Unv in)                                                          |     |

Hume, Fergus. The Crimson Cryptogram. cr. 8vo. 255 pp. J. Long) 3/6 Mohamed, Khwaja Ali. Ram D. i. cr. 8vo. 268 pp. (G. Blackwood) Oppenheim, E. P. A Millionire of Yesterday. cr. 8vo. 315 pp.
Ward, Lock 6/0
Preston, E., M.D. An American Venus. cr. 8vo. 370 pp. (Drane) 6/0 Shorter, Dora Sigerson. The Father Confessor. cr. 8vo. 287 pp.
Ward, Lock 3/6

HISTORICAL AND GEOGRAPHICAL.

Bell, F. W. The South African Conspiracy. demy 8vo. 248 pp. (Heinemann) 10/0 NEW EDITIONS.

Caxton, Wm. The Golden Legend. vols. 2 and 3. 306 pp. and 274 pp. net each Edersheim, Alfred. The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah. m.d.

REFERENCE.

Geden, A S. Studies in Eastern Religions. cr. 8vo. 378 pp. (Kelly) 3/6
Jones, Mary C. European Travel for Women. cr. 8vo. 3c2 pp. .....
(Macmillan) 4/6
Professional Papers of the Co.ps of Royal Engineers. Vol. XXV.
demy 8vo. 294 pp. .......(Mackay, Chatham) net 10/6 Rosenstock, Rudolph. Text-Book of Zoology. Translated by G. T.
Cunningham. med. 8vo 138 pp. ..........(A. and C. Black) 3/6

PICTURES FOR THE WALL AND BOOKS FOR THE BAIRNS.

AM glad to

for the Portabate. Port-

has been reprinted, and is about to be second time. Portfolio No. 2. with Raphael's

Madonna as a presentation

plate, and six double - size plates repro-

ducing the hitherto inaccessible Prodigal Son-six pictures by folios

be able to report that demand

shows no tendency to Raphael's Madonna.

(Presented with Portfolio No. 2.)

Murillo - promises to be even more popular. The Madonna has been reproduced so admirably that it may easily be mistaken for an original autotype. The detail of the picture as we have reproduced it is shown in this little illustration.

The letters which reach me with orders for copies of the Portfolio rather surprise me from the evidence which they afford as to the very extended range, both geographical and social, over which the knowledge of their existence has extended. It is still more surprising to see that they are chiefly in demand, not so much among the masses for whom they were primarily designed, as among persons in the highest social position. Our order book contains evidence that the Portfolio has found favour in Royal palaces, and for a month past we have received more orders from titled persons at home and abroad than we have received for a long time.

We have already sent out folios to every part of the world. Officers in Her Majesty's Navy (especially in the Mediterranean Squadron) have purchased copies with which to adorn their cabins; military officers in distant camps of India and Burma have been equally enthusiastic in their praise; medical officers in penal settlements as distant as British Guiana have ordered copies, presumably to brighten and ennoble the lives of the convicts; clergymen at home and missionaries abroad have written welcome letters of commendation, all of which it is impossible to acknowledge individually. Many of the suggestions made by my correspondents are being tabulated, and although no acknowledgment may yet have been sent, these suggestions are by no means overlooked.

Although the facts noted in the above paragraphs may be welcomed as showing that our Portfolios have received the imprimatur of those who are least under no pressure to prefer what is cheap, but whose means enable them to select what is best, the chief purpose of the publica-tion of the Portfolios was not for the cream of the classes, but for the multitude of the masses. Knowledge of the existence of such good and cheap pictures spreads slowly; but when once the charm of the series is recognised, the sale of the Portfolios ought to increase tenfold. This indeed is already apparent. So many people write for one Portfolio, and then write again to say that they are more than delighted with the pictures, and want two, three, or four additional sets. Scores of such letters could be quoted if space permitted.

Portfolio No. 3 is specially designed for enlivening the walls of schoolrooms. The French Minister of Education issued last year a circular to the schoolmasters of France specially urging upon them the importance of making efforts to brighten their class-rooms by putting pictures on the walls. Some day Sir John Gorst may issue a similar circular in this country. Pending the arrival of that day, I would draw the attention of teachers and managers of schools to Portfolio No. 3, which is specially prepared for the purpose of providing what is wanted in this direction. It includes reproductions of some of the most famous paintings of the best animal painters of the world-among others, Landseer, Rosa Bonheur, Douglas, and George Morland. I am glad to be permitted to include in the series the beautiful picture "Lost Sheep," by Mr. H. W. B. Davis, R.A. (by permission of the owner), and also three of Madame Ronner's admirable studies of cats and kittens-the kind of fauna with which the infant scholar is best acquainted and therefore most interested.

This Portfolio, No. 3, will, however, not be published until August 22nd, before which time no orders can be executed. There will be no presentation plate in No. 3; but instead a series of eighteen pictures in various tints and in each packet will be found a coupon, entitling the possesser, on payment of 1s., to a really fine collotype reproduction (large size) of Sir Joshua Reynolds's "Angel Choir," in the National Gallery. There will be no extra charge for packing and posting this picture, and never before has it been published in this style for so small a sum.

The Art for Schools Association, which has been doing good work with very limited means, held its meeting recently, when the importance of familiarising the eye of the scholar with objects of beauty was insisted upon by several eminent speakers, of whom the Bishop of London was the chief. In the United States of America, notably in the State of Massachusetts, the cultivation of the artistic sense of the scholar in the elementary schools is carried much further than it is in this country. In an early number I hope to give some account of the efforts that have been made in the United States to realise the magnificent ideal of giving an artistic training to a whole nation; but for the present I content myself with thanking those who have co-operated with me so far, and appealing to all who are interested in the humanising of the life of the masses of our people, to do what they can to promote the success of this enterprise.

As the Portfolios enable the poorest to have a picture gallery in every room, so "The Books for the Bairns" enable cottagers to have a library for their children at the cost which they would otherwise often have to pay for a single book. Parents who are taking their families to the seaside will find that 5s. spent in the Box of Books for the Bairns will supply an inexhaustible store of reading and recreation for the largest family of youngsters that ever was kept indoors on the wettest of wet holidays.

ORDER FORM.

IF you have any difficulty in obtaining from your local newsagent or bookseller the publications mentioned below (fuller particulars of which are set forth in our advertisement pages), kindly fill up this form—which can be easily detached without interfering with the paging or the binding of the magazine—and send it up to this office, enclosing the necessary remittance. Postal orders are preferred, but British postage stamps may be remitted. Foreign and colonial stamps cannot be accepted.

Please send by post to | Name    |         | ••••• |  |

|---------|---------|-----------|--|
| Address | in full |       |  |

the following publications (draw your pen through those which are not wanted):—

PORTFOLIO No. 1.—Twelve Pictures; with Presentation Plate, "The Golden Stairs."

1s. 4d., including postage to any part of the United Kingdom.

(If the Portfolio is to be sent abroad 1s. 6d. must be enclosed.)

PORTFOLIO No. 2.—Murillo's Six Pictures on "The Prodigal Son," and Raphael's "Madonna." 1s. 4d. (including postage).

PORTFOLIO No. 3.—Eighteen pictures of Animals; by the best Animal painters. Price 1s.; by post 1s. 3d.; or 1s. 4d. if posted to foreign or Colonial addresses.

BOX OF BOOKS FOR THE BAIRNS.—Fifty Books with 3,000 Illustrations. Sent carraige paid to addresses in the United Kingdom only, for 5s.

THE PASSION PLAY AT OBER AMMERGAU, 1900. With Eighty-nine Illustrations. Price 2s.; by post 2s. 3d.

(The full German text with English translation.)

ANNUAL INDEX TO PERIODICAL LITERATURE FOR 1899. 10s.
WAR AGAINST WAR IN SOUTH AFRICA. Cloth bound Vol., pp. 450. 5s.

The following can only be obtained direct from the "Review of Reviews" office :-

Please send me a SET OF THE THIRTEEN PICTURES IN PORTFOLIO No 1, gelatined and framed, for 15s., carriage paid.

Please send me the SET OF SIX MURILLOS "THE PRODIGAL SON," gelatined and framed, together with the Presentation Plate (unframed), for 7s. 6d.

For the Books, &c., ordered above I enclose &

N.B.—Address all Post Orders to THE MANAGER, "Review of Reviews" Office, Mowbray House, Norfolk Street, London, W.C.

XUM

NS.

is recogrease teniny people o say that and want ich letters vening the Education of France of making pictures y issue a arrival of hers and specially vanted in ne of the Douglas, nitted to Sheep," of the dmirable una with therefore ers of the sublished s can be n No. 3; us tints; ding the colletype "Angel no extra d never ll a sum. en doing meeting ye of the several was the y in the artistic carried n early ts that ise the whole anking

r, and anising

picture airns" ren at to pay amilies Books ore of young-of wet

LE

"K

We lout of "Fin you lithat ibit. anoth imita Georgi becaubut r And to coo are of dogg stanc scien Yet, service that matter And dogg."

fallace the He cannot exper differ application of the effect and them subject two costudes Perhadeser second in Ge Münstime here work sham mates ceived accourage of the effect of the work sham mates accourage of the effect of the work sham mates accourage of the effect of the effec

canno

LEARNING LANGUAGES BY LETTER-WRITING.

"KEEP up to date; use more scientific methods; observe those in use in other countries. and observe those in use in other countries, and utilise the experience of others." "Rubbish! We have always muddled through somehow and come out on top, and we shall continue to do so, of course."
"Find out if other people do things better." "How can you be so unpatriotic?" But does a mother talk like that about the clothing of the child she loves? Not a bit. Her eyes are always keen to see the pretty dress of another woman's child, and to plan how it may be imitated or adapted so as to suit better her own little George or Nellie. She makes not the least difficulty because the persons observed are not of her own family, but rather glories in carrying off other people's ideas. And as a nation we must observe and adapt if we are to continue to keep our place in the world. For times are changed. We used to get through partly because of dogged determination, partly because of the circumstances of other people—their methods were no more scientific than ours; and "it was dogged that did it." Yet, if there be dangerous illness in a house, is the service of a persevering but ignorant helper preferred to that of the trained, skilful nurse? Especially in the matter of education there should be no wasted effort. And we must not turn perseverance into a fault by doggedly going on in the old path.

FALLACIES.

A writer to the Morning Post aptly says :- "The fallacy that Germans have the gift of languages, and that the English are incapable of mastering a foreign tongue, cannot be too soon done away with. From personal experience in both countries, I find that there is very little difference in lingual and mental ability. To the incredible application and perseverance of the Teuton is due the high position he occupies in the world's commerce. He would not be content to sit in a class of thirty or forty, as the English lad does, with hardly a chance of uttering a syllable of the language he is learning, while the master explains the niceties and difficulties of the definite and partitive articles. A class to be effective should not have more than ten or twelve pupils, and the way to interest them is to place before them a list of words connected with a certain subject-say, a railway station-with the present tense of two or three verbs, regular or irregular, and to launch the students into phrase-making out of those elements." Perhaps Miss St. Maude's scheme of picture-teaching deserves to be more widely known in this connection. A second fallacy is that the satisfactory result of education in Germany is brought about by over-pressure. Professor Münsterberg says: "I reached the end of my school time as a pupil of average standing. I was then eighteen; here (America) the average bachelor of arts is at least three years older. How did the difference come about?" The professor goes on ironically to explain that "over-work" accounts for it, and continues: "But it was so shamelessly concealed from us that neither my class mates nor I, nor our parents, nor our teachers ever per-ceived the slightest trace of it." The rest of his interesting account of his "overburdened" schooldays, and his reasons for the difference, will be found in the School World for July.

Yet another fallacy. "English schoolboys and girls cannot be induced to write letters." Our own experience, that of Mr. Sidney Mead of Faversham, and of Miss Johnson of Sumpting, disposes of this. Some time ago we published Mr. Mead's plan for binding together the Mother Country and the Colonies by an organised exchange of scholars' letters. The editor of Schooldays was then willing to receive names, but the editress of Home Notes, Henrietta Street, W.C., is ready to publish lists of any willing writers. Letters should give name and address, and should state if any particular part of the British Empire is preferred. We all enjoy descriptive letters from relations separated from us by the silver streak; all children, however, have not relations in far countries, and so I call the attention of teachers to this scheme.

A SCHOOL LIBRARY.

Many years ago a French schoolmaster, troubled about the poverty of his school library, conceived a quaint idea. We give large money in prizes every year, he thought, and it seems to me that our children do not always use their books. One reason for giving a prize is to promote emulation; most people have sufficient vanity to like their names immortalised. So he assembled the scholars, explained about the library and the lack of means to enrich it, and proposed that in future the prize-winner should for one whole year have his book for himself to read, show and lend. Then at the year's end he should bring back his book to the school, the book should have a label affixed to the back-Prize for . . . . . obtained by . . . . . . . . given to school library. In France such large numbers of prizes are given that soon the library possessed 500 volumes. Not only that, but the books were read and discussed. parents and a few friends only heard of and read a boy's prize; with the new plan many would know about the honour he had received. Truly the scholar lost the pleasure of sole possession, but then he was enriched otherwise, for instead of one he had five hundred, and each of his comrades was enriched in like manner. By the same rule the greatest benefit is received from the international correspondence in the schools where the letters are shared, talked over and discussed. A lady who lived near Rugby for the sake of her sons' education, and who had a somewhat large family, suggested that they should start a journal. It was written entirely in French, and had for motto, "Le travail fait passer le temps—mais l'oisiveté est la mère de tous les vices." The contributors were eight in number, the eldest child being thirteen. The journal was issued weekly and illustrated. some of the pen-and-ink sketches being very good. It had its notes of the week, descriptions of places and of the holiday afternoons, translations, botany papers, and riddles. The tone of the whole was so happy and free that I pass on the idea, with this fact as a comment-Mrs. Tucker's children have been very successful in the way of language scholarships and high passes in examinations.

NOTICES.

Will those who desire foreign correspondents remember that during the two months of holidays it is not often possible to arrange for them, and therefore kindly excuse delay?

A Danish gentleman desires a German correspondent.
A French science teacher would like to exchange letters with an English science master.

ART IN THE MAGAZINES.

Antiquary.-August.

John Hazlitt the Miniaturist. W. Carew Hazlitt.

Architectural Review .- Effingham House, Arundel Street, STRAND. IS. July.

Supplement :- " Perseus and Andromeda" after Sir E. Burne-Jones.

The Chapel of St. Peter the Martyr, Milan. Illustrated. A. Melani.

Art Journal.-H. VIRTUE. is. 6d. August.

Frontispiece:—"Marsh Lands" after Cecil Lawson, Joseph Pennell. Illustrated. Arthur Thomson, Dunkeld. Illustrated. Rev. Hugh Macmillan. Celia Levetus; an Illustrator of Blake. Illustrated. H. W. Bromhead.

Monteo Circeo. Illustrated. Alicia C. Taylor.

The Story of the Jewel Tower, Westminster. Illustrated. Continued. S. Fisher.

Art in the Nursery, Illustrated. R. Davis Benn, Diamonds, Illustrated. G. W. Thornley.

Artist.-Constable, 18. August.

Degas, Illustrated, Prof. Max Liebermann,

Dresden China. Illustrated.

Architecture and Exterior Decoration at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. W. Fred.

The Home Arts and Industries Association. Illustrated. Mabel Cox.

British Art at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. B. Kendell. Design for Stencil-Work. Illustrated. G. R. Rigby.

Atlantic Monthly .- July.

Impressionism in Criticism. Lewis E. Gates.

Bookman.-July.

Punch as a Literary Chronicler. Illustrated, Literary Pictures of the Year. Illustrated, G. K. Chesterton and J. E. Hodder-Williams.

Bookman.—(AMERICA.) July. Literary Pictures of the Year. Illustrated. G. K. Chesterton and J. E. Hodder-Williams.

Critic.-July.

Queen Victoria as an Etcher. Illustrated, Concluded. C. Brinton.

Representative American Women Illustrators. Illustrated. Miss Regina Armstrong.

Edinburgh Review .- July.

Pictures at the Paris Exhibition; the New Movement in Art.

Educational Review .- July.

Art in the School. J. J. Findlay.

Fortnightly Review.-August.

The Art of Mr. G. F. Watts. Arthur Symons.

Girl's Own Paper.-July.

Art Students and Some Art Schools. Florence Sophie Davson. Sketching and Painting Birds from Life. Illustrated. Fred Harmsworth Magazine.-July.

Pictures worth Fortunes. Illustrated.

House.-"QUEEN" OFFICE. 6d. August.

The House at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. The Wallace Collection. Continued. Illustrated.

Baron Ferdinand Rothschild's Gift to the Nation. Illustrated. Silversmith.

Hogarth and House-Furnishing. Illustrated.

Humane Review .- July.

The Art of the People. William Morris.

Humanitarian.-August.

Smoke and Ast; Interview with Sir William Blake Richmond.

Journal of Education.-July.

Art in Everyday Life. Continued. T. C. Horsfall.

Leisure Hour.-August. Dartmoor; a Favourite Sketching-Ground. Illustrated.

Ludgate.-August.

S. H. Sime; the Carlyle of Art. Illustrated. W. C. Purcell. The Poster Academy. Illustrated. Austin Fryers.

Magazine of Art.—Cassell. 18. 4d. August.

Frontispiece :- "The Ages of the Labourer," after Leon Frédéric.

The Musée du Luxembourg, Illustrated. Léonce Bénédite. The Portraits of Geoffrey Chaucer, Illustrated. Continued. M. H. Spielmann.

The seventh portrait described is the Fairfax Murray (or Seddon) portait—Mr. John P. Seddon being the former owner, and Mr. Fairfax Murray the present owner. It was first exhibited to the public in 1866 at a loan exhibition of national portraits at South Kensington Museum.

Triumphal Arches. Illustrated. Arthur Fish.

The Romney Exhibition at the Grafton Gallery. Illustrated. Lionel Cust.

Recent Acquisitions at Our National Museums and Galleries. Illustrated

The Art Buildings at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. H. Frantz.

Mr. C. D. Richardson; an Australian Sculptor. Illustrated. E. S. Smellie.

The New Bronze Doors of the Florentine Duomo. Illustrated. Leader Scott. Month.-July.

Catholic Art. A. Streeter.

Pall Mall Magazine.—August.

With Constable. Illustrated. F. Wedmore. Portraits and Prints at Eton. Illustrated. Blanche W. Cornish.

Poster .- i, Arundel Street, Strand. 6d. June.

Starr Wood. Illustrated. Quintin Waddington, The Posters at the Advertisers' Exhibition, Illustrated, C

Poster-Hanging at the Crystal Palace. Illustrated. E. Wenlock.

Miss Mary Watson. Illustrated.

English Magazine Covers; Symposium. Illustrated. Mellin's Food. Illustrated.

Review of Reviews .- (Australasia). May. The First Fifty Years of Punch; 1841-1891. Illustrated.

Review of Reviews,-(AMERICA). August.

An American National Art Exhibition. W. O. Partridge. Saint George.-ELLIOT STOCK. IS. July.

Ruskin's "Nature of Gothic" and Its Relation to Modern Handicrafts, C. Holme.

Strand Magazine.-August.

The World's Greatest Pictures. Illustrated. F. Dolman.

Studio .- 5, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden. 15. July. John White Alexander. Illustrated. Gabriel Mourey The Home Arts and Industries at the Albert Hall. Illustrated. Esther Wood.

The Exhibition of Auguste Rodin's Works in Paris.

The Royal Academy and Architecture. Illustrated.

François Maréchal, Etcher. Illustrated. F. Khnopff Supplements:—Reproductions in Colours of "The Divan" by . W. Alexander, and Decoration for Dining-Room by M. H. Baillie Scott.

Windsor Magazine, -August.

A Group of Battle Painters and War Artists. Illustrated. R. Machray.

Ame

Penitenti Ri ual in Rise of t A Summ An Essa A Centu Sir Thor The Sac The "C

The Sto An The Cri Chathar Territor The Jud Presider Letters

One As Social C The Social A Social Public Ang

> Had B J. A Prob Joseph Modern The Br Roman

Prison Arc New S William

Over-0

Co-ope The H Will t New The H Turke The U Railro Benev Manu Perni Rasti Wom

> Are Rapio Its Me Ste Tu Paup Old . The Priva

> Deve

LIST OF THE LEADING CONTENTS OF CURRENT PERIODICALS.

BRITISH AND AMERICAN.

American Catholic Quarterly Review.—Burns and Oates, 4 dols. per annum. July.

Penitential Discipline in the Early Church. Rev. John Hogan. Ri ual in the Reign of Maximin. Rev. J. Rickaby.
Rise of the Christian Schools de la Salle. C. M. Graham.
A Summer: in Sicily. A. E. P. R. Dowling.
An Essay in Physiological Psychology. Dr. J. J. Walsh.
A Centur; of Irish Immigration. H. J. Desmond.
Sir Thomas Move and the Persecution of Heretics. Rev. H. G. Ganss. The Sacrifice of Misses. Rev. J. F. B. Sast:
The "Council of Ten" System in Irish National Education. J. J. O'Shea. The Story of the Scottish Reformation. Dom M. Barrett.

American Historical Review .- MACMILLAN. 3s. 6d. July. The Critical Period of English Constitutional History. G. B. Adams. Chatham's Colonial Policy. H. Hall. Territory and District. M. Farrand. Th. Judiciary Act of 1801. M. Farrand. President Buchanan's Proposed Intervention in Mexico. H. L. Wilson. Letters of Ebenezer Huntington, 1774-1781.

American Journal of Sociology.-Luzac. 35 cents. July. One Aspect of Vice. E. C. Moore.
Cross-Sections from Comte, Spencer, L'lienfeld and Schaeffle. B. H. Meyer.
Social Control. Continued. E. A. Ross.
The Scope of Sociology. Continued. A. W. Small.
A Sociological Visw of Sovereignty. Concluded. J. R. Commons.
Public Outdoor Relief. C. A. Ellwood.
Eccentric Official Statistics. Continued. H. L. Bliss.
The Quincy Method in Education. F. W. Parker.

Anglo-American Magazine. - International News Company. is. July. Had Britain the Right to interfere in the Internal Affairs of the Transvaal? Had Britain the Right to interfere in the Internal Affairs of the J. S. Buchan.

A Problem in Gravitation. E. McLennan.

Joseph Arch; the English Labour Leader. S. J. MacKnight.

Modern Japan. David Glass.

The Bridge of Opportunity on Mining. W. H. Lynch.

Romantic Muskoka. Illustrated. W. R. Bradshaw.

Modern Fiction. Continued. E. Ridley.

Antiquary.—ELLIOT STOCK. 6d. August. King Alfred as Man of Letters. Continued. W. H. Draper. St. Katharine in Art, L. g.nd, and Ritual. Illustrated. J. L. André. Prisoners of War in England a Century Ago. Rev. G. N. Godwin.

Architectural Review.—Effingham House, Arundel Street, Strand. is, Jul/. New Sessions House for London. Illustrated.
William Butterfield. Illustrated. Continued.
The Real Impedments of British Architecture.
H. Wilson.

Arena,-GAY AND BIRD. 25 cents. July.

Arona.—Gay and Bird. 25 cents. July.

Over-Capitalised Industrial Corporations. Edward Godwin Johns.
Co-operative Business v. Trusts. Duncan MacArthur.
The House and the Election of Senators. Boyd Winchester.
Will the Chiness migrate? J. M. Scanland.
New England's Fi st President. Rev. E. P. Powell.
The Referendum in America. Edwin Maxey.
Turkey and the United States. Justin S. Kirreh.
The United States in Cuba. Leonora Beck Ellis, Rail-cad Control in Japan. Keikichi Abe.
The Non-Existence of the De il. Rev. Charles Caverno.
Benvolent Loan Associations. Katherine Louise Smith.
Manual Training in Mental Development. Henry W. Hetzel.
Pernicious Maxims and Ideas. Arthur H. Holmes.
Restitution to Victims of Crime. J. Albert Stowe.
Women as Criminals. H. Harrell.

Arena Quarterly.—Life Building, New York:
Rapid Transit in New York:
Its Aid to Commerce and Finance. H. Clews.
Method of Its Inc.piion. A. H. Lew's.
Steps toward City Ownership. J. Whalen.
Tunnel Construction. C. W. Standiford.
Pauperism and Municipal Charity. J. W. Keller.
Old Age Pensio s. H. H. Lusk.
The Water-Front of New York. B. Sommer.
Private Ownership of Franchises. C. T. Yerkes.
Development of Æsthetics in Cities. Jane Long Boulden.
Criminal Sociology:
The American v. the Latin School. F. A. Kellor.
Criminality among Women. F. A. Kellor. Arena Quarterly .- LIFE BUILDING, NEW YORK. 35 cents. June.

Argosy.-George Allen. 18. August. Brittany of the Pardons. Edith Wingate Rinder.
Grant All.n. Andrew Lang.
Siena. A. J. C. Hare.
Henry Lawson, Poet. A. Maquarie.
Letters from the North. Illustrated.
Christ Church, Oxford. Illustrated.
Rev. C. M. Blagden.

Atlantic Monthly .- GAY AND BIRD. IS. July. The Independence of the Executive. Continued. Grover Cleveland. Life Assurance. J. W. Alexander Cuba—To-day and To-morrow. J. D. Whelpley. The Meditations of an ex-School Committeewoman. M. B. Dunn. Missouri. Charles M. Harvey. Ermenonville; a Bit of Old France. Harriet Monroe. Content in a Garden. Continued. Candace Wheeler. The In-asion of Journalism. Arthur. Reed Kimball. Dr. Funness's Va.iorum Edition of Shakspeare. Henry A. Clapp.

Baiminton Magazine,-WM. HEINEMANN. 18. August. The Grouss. Illustrated. Alex. Innes Shand.
A Climb in the Dolomites. Illustrated. H. B. Money-Coutts.
The New Croquet. G. H. Powell.
From the Solent to the Zuyder Zee in a Four-Tonner. Illustrated. Mrs. Spe.d. Orange River Game in Old Days. Illustrated. F. H. H. Guillemard. A Month in Norway. Illustrated. Hon. W. A. Ords-Powlett. The Rules of Golf as They are understood. W. Pigott. The Chase of the Wild Red Deer. Illustrated. A. Heinemann. Bicycling to Bloodhounds. Illustrated. C. H. Wilson.

Bankers' Magazine, -WATERLOW. 38. July. Variations in the Rate charged by the Bank of France, 1844-1809.
Token Money of the Bank of England. Illustrated. M. Phillips.
The Centenary of the Bank of France. Illustrated. J. Macbeth Forbes

Bibliotheca Sacra. - KEGAN PAUL. 75 cents. July. Limi ing Saloon Territory; the Minneapolis Plan. J. N. Cross.
Oberlin's Contribution to Ethics. W. E. E. Wright.
The Period of Doubt among the Friends of Jesus. E. I. Bosworth.
President Finney and an Oberlin Theology. A. T. Swing.
The Economic Interpretation of the Fall of Man. T. N. Carver.
The Ideals of Christian Education. J. H. Barrows.
The Present Status of the Biblical Theology of the Old Testament. G. S.
Burroughs us of the Biblical Theology of the Old Testament. The Present Status of the Biolical Libology of the Old Lestament Burroughs.

The Catholic Counter-Reformation in Bohemia. L. F. Miskovsky. Religion as a Personal Relation. H. C. King.

The Lesson of the New Hymnals. E. Dickinson.

Bossuet; the Making of a Great Preacher. A. H. Currier.

Blackwood's Magazine, -BLACKWOOD. 28. 6d. August. How We escaped from Pretoria. With Plan. Capt. Haldans. A Glimpse of Erin; Sorley Boy's Town. W. J. Hardy. Mor. about Retrievers. Li.ut. Col. Sir Henry Smith. General John Jacob; the Warden of the March. The Elder Brother of the Sháh. W. Sparroy. The War Operations in South Africa. Continued. Military Contributor, Distracted China. Continued. Their Sixth Session.

Bookman .- HODDER AND STOUGHTON. 6d. July. Dr. George Macdonald. With Portrait. W. R. N.

Bookman.—(America.) Dodd, Mead and Co., New York.
July. Algernon Charles Swinburne. Illustrated. J. Douglas. Scandinavian Newspapers. D. K. Dodge. The German Theatre in New York. Illustrated. Norman Hapgood. The Virginia Dialect. S. D. McCormick.

Canadian Magazine. - ONTARIO PUBLISHING Co., TORONTO. CARAGIAN MAGAZINO.—UNTARIO PUBLISHING CO., TORC 25 cents. July.

The Hull-Ottawa Fire. Illustrated. F. Gadsby.
The Pagan Indians of Canada. Illustrated. M. O. Scott.
St. Stephen's, Walbrook. Illustrated. H. C. Shelley.
Twenty Years on the War Path. Continued. Frederic Villiers.
The Future of Imperialism. John Lewis.

Captain.-George Newnes. 6d. August. The South Sea Islanders; a Chat with Mr. Louis Becke. Illustrated. A. Lawrence. Some Obstacle Races. Illustrated. Bicycle Brakes. Illustrated. H. Perry.

ed.

C. Purcell.

fter Leon

Continued. or Seddon) Mr. Fairfax

in 1866 at a lustrated.

Galleries.

ted. H.

lustrated. ustrated.

che W.

ed. C.

. Wen-

ρ. Iodern

y. rated.

I11u3-

" by y M.

R.

nédite.

Cassell's Magazine,-Cassell. 6d. August. The Highest Railway in Europe; the Summit of the Jungfrau. Illustrated.
A. H. Atteridge.
A Holiday Party at the Danish Court. Illustrated. A. De Burgh.
Some British War Medals and How They were won. Illustrated. T.

Hopkins.
The Wives and Womenkind of Our Officers at the Front. With Portraits.
Mrs. Leily Bingen.
The Battle of the Nile. Illustrated. W. Westall.
The Volunteers. Illustrated. D. T. Timins.

Cassier's Magazine, —33, Bedford Street, Strand. rs. July.
Making "Best Yorkshire" Iron. Illustrated. Ewing Matheson.
Ural, Trans-Ural, and Siberian Railway Construction. Illustrated. L. Ural, Tran

Lodian.

Electric Power for Factories, William S. Aldrich.
Invention as a Factor of Ame ican National Wealth. W. C. Dodge.
Machine Tools in the Mechanic Arts. Dr. Coleman Sellers.
Foundry Cranes. Illustrated. Joseph Horner.
Economies in Machine-Shop Work. Oberlin Smith.
The Development of Fly-Wheels Illustrated. Charles H. Benjamin.
Andrew Laing. With Portrait.

Century Magazine.-MACMILLAN. 18. 4d. August. Palace of the Dance at the Paris Exposition. Illustrated. J. Schopfer. Schopfer.
The Riverside of East London. Illustrated. Sir Walter Besant.
The Decadence of Manners. Amelia Gere Mason.
In the Woods with the Bow. Illustrated. M. Thompson.
Treasures of the New York Aquarium. Illustrated. C. L. Bristol.
Memories of a Musical Life. Continued. W. Mason.
Summer Holidays in Alaskan Waters; the Harriman Expedition. With Illustrations and Map. John Burroughs.
Oliver Cromwell. Illustrated. Continued. John Morley.
The Montgomery Race Conference. B. T. Washington.

Chambers's Journal .- 47, PATERNOSTER Row. 7d. August. A Chat about L'ghtships.

The Finsen Institute in Copenhagen. Miss Edith Sellers.

Eycle-Touring Adventures. A. Candler.

"Jerome" of Nova Scotia.

Orange-Culture in South California. D. Wingate. Eccentric Testators. Health and Ill-Health in India. Mrs. M. Turnbull.

Chautauquan .- Chautauqua Press, Cleveland, Ohio. 20 cents.

July.

Indian Corn. Illustrated. Prof. C. F. Millspaugh.

Making Kansas a Free State. With Map and Illustrations. Col. R. J.

Hinton.

Story of the Little Big Horn; the Indian Version of Custer's Last Buttle.

Dr. C. A. Eastman.

Memorials of the American Revolution. Illustrated. Linda De K.

Old Ironsides as Sailors saw Her. Illustrated. J. R. Salt in Early American History. Prof. E. E. Sparks. Historical American Plays, A. E. Lancaster.

Church Missionary Intelligencer.—Church Missionary Society.

6d. August.

The Panchamas, or the Lower Classes of South India. Rev. J. E. Padfield.

Jubilee of the Fuh-Kien Mission. Rev. L. Lord.
An Arabic College in India. Dr. H. M. Clark.

Church Quarterly Review .- Spottiswoode. 6s. July.

Twenty-Five Years of the Church Quarterly Review,
Dr. Pusey as a Correspondent and a Spiritual Guide.
Ambrose Philipps de Lie.
Evolution, Biology, and Human Guidance.
Memorials of Dr. Johnson.
Church Dedications. The Bishop of Ripon on the Church of England. Mr. Leighton Pullan on the Book of Common Prayer. The Eve of the Reformation.
Lights and Shadows of a Long Episcopate.
Jacopone da Todi.

The Archbishops on Reservation. Conservative Review.—Neale Co., 431, Eleventh Street Northwest, Washington, D.C. 50 cents. June. Autobiography of Col. Richard Malcolm Johnston.
Theory and Practice of the Spoils System. H. T. Newcomb.
The "Passionate Pilgrim" Affair. A. Morgun.
The Catholicism of France. Dr. T. J. Shahan.
The Youth of Goethe. J. A. Harrison
The South African War—From the Point of View of International Law.

The South African War—From the The South African War—From the T. P. Ion.

Elements of Unity in the Homeric Poems. E. Farquhar.

Edward Livingston. C. H. Peck.

Commercial Possibilities of the North Polar Region. T. F. Van Wagenen.

Raview.—Columbus Co. 2s. 6d. August.

Contemporary Review.—Collamus Co. as Sir Alfred Milner and his Work. F. Edmund Garrett. China and the Powers. Emerson Bainbridge. The Urited States in China. Josiah Quincy. Eleonora Duse. Arthur Symons. The War and the Drill-Book. Staff-Officer.

Sharks. Matthias Dunn.
Municipal Trading; a Defence. Robert Donald.
Tolstoi's Theory of Art. Aylmer Maude.
Who's Who in China. D. C. Boulger.
Australasia: Her Resources and Foreign Trade. Sir Robert Stout.
Salaries in Secondary Schools. W. H. D. Rouse.
Lord Curzon; a Progressive Viceroy. Civilis.
Hospital Scandals in South Africa. Sir Walter Foster.

Cornhill Magazine.-Smith, Elder. 18. August. With a Boer Ambulance in Natal. Continued. G. O. Moorhead. Mr. Firth's Cromwell. Frederic Harrison. Mr. Frederic Harrison, Mountaineering, Francis Connell.
Women's Suffrage: In Time of War. By Lady Grove.
Dorset Humour. Sir Robert Edgcumbe.
New Mexico; a Far-away Corner. Mrs. E. M. Nicholl.
The Black Books of Lincoln's Inn. Urbanus Sylvan.

Cosmopolitan .- International News Co. 6d. July. First View of the Exposition of 1900. Illustrated. F. A. Kidder. Henley Week. Illustrated. Mrs. B. Harrison, Is Russia to control all of Asia? With Illustrations and Maps. A. H. Ford. Herbert Spencer's Essay on Education. David Starr Jordin. Women in Turkey; Their Rights and Wrongs. Illustrated. Miss Lucy M. J. Garnett.

Kansas; the Central City of the West. Illustrated. C. S. Gleed. Organised Thrift. Illustrated. Vance Thompson.

Critic .- G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, NEW YORK. 20 cents. July. College Literature and Journalism. Illustrated. C. F. Bacon. Puritanism and the Theatre. W. Archer. Thoreau. F. M. Smith. Gambetta; a Great Tribune. Ex-Attaché.

Dial .- 315, WABASH AVENUE, CHICAGO. 10 cents. July 1. Certain Characteristics of the I-Novel, Katherine Merrill.

Dublin Review .- BURNS AND OATES. 6s. July. The Justice of the War.
Scottish Benedictine Houses of the Past. Continued. Rev. M. Barrett.
Edmund Burke and the Revolution. Rev. W. B. Morrie
A Russian Champion of the Church. Rev. W. H. Ken..
The Catacombs of Syracuse.

Reconomic Journal.—RIVINGTON. 38. June.
Poor People's Music-Halls in Lancashire. C. E. B. Russell and E. T. Campagnac.
A Significant Chapter in the History of Currency. W. W. Carlile, Poverty and the Poor Law. Mrs. C. M. Toynbee.
Fifty Years of British Industry from the Workman's Point of View. Fifty Years of W. Greenwood. The Glasgow Family Home. F. W. Moore, Wage-Earning Children. Mrs. E. F. Hogg. A Footnote to Ruskin. H. W. Blunt.

Edinburgh Review .- Longmans. 6s. July. Goldwin Smith's United Kingdom, Chevalier's History of the French Navy,
Knights Templars—Soldiers, Monks, Heretics, Progress in Ireland.
The Life of Wellington. The Lute or weilington.
Paris in 1900.
A History of Northumberland.
The Hudson's Bay Company.
Some Recent Novels of Manners.
The South African War and Its Critics.
Colonial and Imperial Federation.

Educational Review .-- 2, Exeter Street, Strand. 4d. July. Vernacular Schools in Siam. Ernest Young. Educational Reform in Italy. E. C. Robinson. Boys and Newspapers. J. L. Paton.

Engineering Magazine .- 222, STRAND. 38. July. The Coming Engineering Development of the Far East. Illustrated.
W. B. Parsons. W. B. Parsons.
The Ship-building Yards of the United States. Illustrated. Waldon Fawcett.
Commercial Organisation of the Machine Shop. Continued. Hugo Dirmer.
Settlement of the Machinists' Strike in the United States. Editor.
Utilising Waste Heat from the Gas Engine. Alton D. Adams.
Power Fratures of the Paris Exposition. Illustrated. W. H. Donner.
History and Progress of Mining in British Columbia. Illustrated. H. M.
Lamb.
Electrical Measurement of Work and Energy. G. L. Addenbrooke.
The Iron Situation from a British Point of View. J. S. Jeans.

Engineering Times.—P. S. King. 6d. July.
Gas Engine Progress. C. V. Kerr.
The Disposal of Sewage. Illustrated. Concluded. Dr. A. Wynter Blyth.
Coke Plant in Gasworks. Illustrated. C. E. Brackenbury.
Electrically Propelled Carriages. Illustrated. W. Fletcher.

English Historical Review.-Longmans. 5s. July. The Scottish Parliament Before the Union of the Crowns. Continued. R. S. Rait. The Regulation of Wages in the Sixteenth Century. Miss E. A. McArthur. Humanism under Francis I. A. Tilley.
The Foreign Policy of England under Walpole. Continued. B. Williams. The Laws of Breteuil. Continued. Miss Mary Bateson.

Engl Israel in G. A. Pompeii U Distinguis Woman at English

Freedom e omen in John Nor ssex Par A Relic of

> A Second Herod. The Argu E The Early On the Q

Girder Co The Posi Great No Gree The Inter Pneumati Amo

> Wasps. Whimsic Snakes. Two Th Pre-anim

For What Im Peking-An Inter Papers o Settlers : Our Na Cole A Few I The Dec The Cru From La Contemp Have W

Our Rel Social R The Shi The Pas Hawaii' essons Kiaocho Chinese Is Crim The Un Does G America Frank

Rapid ? Our Sar Sarah I Photogr 239, Ai Women Miss M

Unhera From I The A Aitken Ge The R The M

George The F Villaga

English Illustrated Magazine. - 198, STRAND. 6d. August. Israel in London: How the Hebrew lives in Whitechapel. Illustrated, G. A. Wade.

O. A. Wate.

Distinguished Donk-ys. Illustrated. F. Dolman.

Distinguished Donk-ys. Illustra'ed. W. A. George.

Woman and Her Work; the 1900 Exhibition at Earl's Court. Illustrated.

Englishwoman's Review .- WILLIAMS AND NORGATE. IS. July.

Freedom of Labour Defence. Essex Review .- SIMPKIN, MARSHALL. 15. July.

John Nordon. With Portrait. E. A. Fitch.
Old Chelmsford and Some of Its Surroundings, Illustrated. E. Durra
Essex Parish Register Books. Rev. O. W. Tancock.
A Relic of King Richard II. at Pleshey. Illustrated. Miller Christy. Illustrated. E. Durrant.

Expositor.-Hodder and Stoughton. 18. August. A Second Fixed Point in the Pauline Chronology. Prof. W. M. Ramsay. Herod. Rev. W. M. Macgregor.
The Argument from Silence. Prof. D. S. Margoliouth.

Expository Times .- SIMPKIN, MARSHALL. 6d. August. The Early Visits of St. Paul to Jerusalem. Prof. R. A. Falconer. On the Question of the Exodus. Prof. J. V. Prásek. The Missionary Methods of the Apostles. Continued. Rev. J. Reid.

Feilden's Magazine. TEMPLE CHAMBERS. 18. July. Girder Construction in Small Racing Yachts. Illustrated. Linton Hope. Great Northern Railway Widening between Finsbury Park and Wood Green. Illustrated.

The International Exhibition at Paris. Illustrated. Prof. J. Boyer. Pheumatic Tools and Appliances. Continued. Illustrated. Ewart C.

Amos.

Fireside.—7, Paternoster Square. 6d. August. Wasps. Illustrated. J. W. Cole. Whimsical Wills. E. Preston. Snakes. Illustrated. Rev. J. Isabell.

Ford.

Lucy

.

E. T.

lew.

er.

М.

Folk-Lore. - DAVID NUTT. 58. June. Two Thousand Years of a Charm against the Child-Stealing Witch. M. Gaster.
Pre-animistic Religion. R. R. Marett.

Fortnightly Review .- CHAPMAN AND HALL. 2s. 6d. August. FORTINIGNLY REVIEW.—CHAPMAN AND HALL. 2s. 6d. August. What Imperialism Means. J. H. Muirhead. Peking—and After. Demetrius C. Boulger. An International Wheat Corner. J. D. Whelpley. Papers of the Scottish Reformation. Andrew Lang. The Armaments of Seven Navies. John Holt Schooling. Settlers and Settlements in South Africa. H. A. Bryden. Our Naval Arrangements in the Other Hemisphere. Sir John C. R. Colomb.

Colomb.
A Few French Facts. Richard Davey.
The Decrease of the Salmon. Horace Hutchinson.
The Crux of Foreign Policy.
From Ladysmith to Standerton. With Map.
Contemporary Ireland. Judge O'Connor Morris,
Have We a Policy in China? Diplomaticus.

Forum.-GAY AND BIRD. IS. 6d. July. Forum.—GAY AND BIRD. 18. 6d. July.

Our. Relations with Germany. W. C. Fox.
Social Reform and the General Election. T. Burke.
The Shipping Subsidy Bill. E. T. Chamberlain.
The Passion Play in Oberammergau. H. Devrient.
Hawaii's Real Story. F. L. Clarke.
Lessons of the 175,000,000 dols. Ash-Heap. W. J. Boies.
Kiaochou; a German Colonial Experiment. C. Denby, Junr.
Chinese Civilization; the Ideal and the Actual. D. Z. Sheffield.
Is Crime Increasing? R. P. Falkner.
The United States a: a World Power. C. A. Conant.
Does Government Service Pay? A. M. Low.
American Outdoor Literature. H. L. West.

American Outdoor Literature. H. L. West.

Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly.—141, Fifth Avenue, New York.

Rapid Transit in Great Cities. Illustrated. G. H. Johnson.

Our Samoan Station. Illustrated. A. de Lautreppe.

Sarah Bernhardt; the Greatest Living Actress. Illustrated. L. Strachy

Photography as a Sport. Illustrated. W. Nutting.

239, Arch Street, Philadelphia; the Birthplace of the American Flag.

Illustrated. John Quincy Adams.

Women in Philan'hropy. With Portraits. May Wilkinson Mount.

Miss Mary E. Wilkins at Home. With Portrait. Katharine Hill.

Genealogical Magazine. - ELLIOT STOCK. IS. August.

Unheraldic Charges. Illustrated.
From King Orry to Queen Victoria; a History of the Isle of Man. Illustrated.
E. Callow.
The Arms of Caps Town.
Aiken of Thornton. Marquis de Ruvigny and Raineval.

Gentleman's Magazine.—Chatto and Windus. 18. August. The Russian School of Opera. A. E. Keeton.
The Mourne Mountains. Chas. Edwardes.
George Sand in Her Old Age. T. L. L. Teeling.
The Fingalian Legends. W. C. Mackenzie.
Village Life in Mediaval Arcadia.
Shenstone. Lennox Morison.

Geographical Journal .- EDWARD STANFORD. 28. July. woographical Journal.—Edward Stanford. 28. July.
Address to the Royal Geographical Society. Sir Clements R. Markham.
The Patagonian Cordillera and Its Main Rivers. Dr. H. Steff.n.
In the Heart of Borneo. C. Hose.
A Journey from Chestrefield Inlet to Great Slave Lake, 1898-9. D. T.
Hanbury.
A Journey from Lake Naivasha to the Victoria Nyanza. Capt. G. H.
Gorges.
Geological Magazine.—Dulau. 12. 6d. July.

Goological Magazine.—DULAU. 1s. 6d. July.
Colonel Feilden's Contributions to Glacial Geology. Prof. T. G. Bonney.
Order of Consolidation of Minerals in Igneous Rocks. Prof. W. J. Sollas.
A Word on Geological Hypothesis. Prof. H. Macaulay Posnett.
Woodwardian Museum Notes; Salter's Undescribed Species. Illustrated. F. R. Cowper Reed.
Foraminiferal Limestones from Sinai. F. Chapman.

Girl's Own Paper,—56, PATERNOSTEE ROW. 6d. July.
Cycle Polo. Illustrated. Miss N. G. Bacon.
The Passion Play at Oberammergau. Illustrated. Rev. F. W. Newland.
My Museum of Eastern Curios. Illustrated. Continued Mrs. Brightwen.
How to visit Norway. Illustrated. Rev. T. B. Willson.
How to grow Apples and Pears. Illustrated. Continued. B. Wells.

Girl's Realm .- 10, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND. 6d. August. The Playhours of Royal Children, Illustrated, Mrs. S. A. Tooley, Some Novel Summer Retreats. Illustrated, H. Shepstone. Through the Siege of Ladysmith. Illustrated, Miss A. Corkran. The Girls of the Passion Play. Illustrated, Mrs. C. N. Williamson, Good Words.-ISBISTER. 6d. August. Lord Lister. With Portwaits, Sir H. C. Cameron.

An Irish Experiment. Illustrated. Rosa M. Barrett.
Mrs. Gladstone. Illustrated. Dean Wickham.
The Siege of Kimberley. Concluded. A Sergeant in the Town-Guard.
Memories of George Square, Edinburgh, Illustrated.
Hermits and Their Friends. Illustrated. Edward Step.

Harmsworth Magazine.-HARMSWORTH. 6d. July. HAPMSWOFTH MAGAZING,—HARMSWORTH. 6d. July.
A Posy of Roses. Illustrated. W. J. Winde.
Floating Palaces; Millionaires at Sea. Illustrated. Phil'p Astor.
To the Clouds by Rail. Illustrated. Isabel Marks.
Inside the House: Where Your M.P. spends His Time. Illustrated.
H. Howard.
Seven Days' Hard; the Food of Convicts. Illustrated. 666 B.
Some Splendid Cats. Illustrated. Tabitha.
Some Municipal Curiosities. Illustrated. H. Knight.
The Princess of Wales. Illustrated. B. Owen.

Harper's Monthly Magazine .- 45, Albemarke Street. 15. HAPPET'S MONTHLY MAGAZING.—45, ALBEMARLE STREET. ES.
August.
English and American Elections. Illustrated. S. Brooks.
A Journey to the Abyssinian Capital. Illustrated. Continued. Capt. M. S.
Evidence of Life after Death. Thomson Jay Hudson.
A Century of Church Methods. J. H. Ecob.

Home Magazine.-NASSAU STREET, NEW YORK CITY. 10 cents.

The Coming War. Illustrated. H. Maxim.

A Woman at the Paris Exposition. Illustrated. Zoe Anderson Norris.

Possibilities of Porto Rico. Illustrated. Capt. J. C. Burnes.

Freak Tornadoes; Interview with Prof. Moore. Illustrated. W. A. Page.

The Real Situation in China. Illustrated. R. Van Bergen.

Homiletic Review .- 44, FLEET STREET. 18. 3d. July. The Ecumenical Missionary Conference of 1900. Dr. F. F. Ellinwood. Effective Preachers. Dr. Joseph Parker.
The Illumination of the Sermon. Dr. D. J. Burrell.
How to win Men to Christ. Dr. Camden M. Cobern.

Humane Review .- ERNEST BELL. 18. July. The Culture of Cowardice. Ouida. The Psychical Kinship of Man and the Other Animals. Prof. J. H.

Moore,
Is Vivisection Logically Justifiable? Mona Caird,
The Appellate Jurisdiction of the Home Office. Appellant,
The Claims of Uncivilised Races. H. R. Fox-Bourne. Humanitarian-Duckworth. 6d. August.

Humanitarian—DUCKWORTH. 6d. Augu South Africa; the Coming Colony. Dr. H. de B. Gibbins. The Tramp's Children. T. W. Wilkinson. The Women of Central Africa. Dr. G. D. Gray. The Source of Genius. I. Hooper. Women and Remunerative Labour. D. M. Gane. The Main Memorial Home. Caritas. Wives and Daughters of Ancient Rome. A. R. Cleveland. The "Political" Almanac. Helen C. Gordon.

Ideal Review .- GAY AND BIRD. 18. 3d. July. The Great Awakening. C. Johnston.
The Metaphysics of Matter. A. Wilder.
The Making and Decaying of the Creed.
Guy de Maupassant. C. H. A. B.

Index Library .- 172, EDMUND STREET, BIRMINGHAM. 215. per annum.

Prerogative Court of Canterbury Wills. Continued. Dorset Wills. Continued. Lincoln Wills. Continued. Gloucester Inquisitiones Post Mortem. Continued.
Devonshire Wills. Continued.
Wiltshire Inquisitiones Post Mortem. Continued.

Indian Review.-G. A. NATESAN, MADRAS. 108. per ann. June. Indian Review,—G. A. NATESAN, MADRAS, Our Underground Water Supply. A. Chatterton. The Indian Cotton Industry. C. D. Panday. Cashmiri Pandits and Social Reform. M. Zutshi July. University Examinations, H. V. Nanjundayya, The Waste of C.tton Seed in India. Mercantilist. The Malabar Drama. T. K. G. Pan kar.

International Journal of Ethics, -Sonnenschein. 28. 6d. July. The Treatment of Subject Races. Mary A. M. Marks.
Liberty and Government. H. E. S. Freemantls.
The Source of Moral Obligation, J. S. Mackenzie.
The Relation of Ethics to Religion. W. G. Everett.
The New Psychology and the Moral Training of Children. H. D.
The First International Congress of History of Religions.

Morris Jastrow, Jun.

The Nature of the Creative Imagination. Concluded. T. Ribot. American Literary Criticism and the Doctrine of Evolution. W. M. Payne. Popular Histories; Their Defects and Possibilities. J. H. Robinson. Origin of Life and Heredity. E. B. Wilson.
The Bubonic Plague. Dr. C. Edsen.

International Socialist Review. -56, Fifth Avenue, Chicago. 10 cents. July.

Plutocracy or Democracy. W. 1. Brown.
England and International Socialism. H. M. Hyndman.
French Political Parties and the Recent Elections. Jean Longuet.
Karl Marx and the Money Question. Marcus Hitch.

Irish Ecclesiastical Record.—24, NASSAU ST., DUBLIN. 18. July.
ves From My Egyptian Diary. Rev. M. Sheehan.

Leaves From My Egyptian Diary. Rev. M. Sheehan.
The Douay Bible. Rev. T. J. Butler.
Alleluia's Thought Sequence. Rev. T. J. O'Mahony.
Strafford and Censors. T. Fitzpatrick.
The Gospels in the Early Church. Continued. Rev. J. MacRory.

Irish Rosary .- 47, LITTLE BRITAIN. 3d. August.

A Glimpse of China. Father B. Cothonay.
The Trappists. Illustrated. A Refugee.
Miracle Plays. Illustrated. A. M. Huntley.

Jewish Quarterly Review .- MACMILLAN. 38. 6d. July. The Jewish Sunday School Movement in the United States. Miss J. Richmann.
An Introduction to the Arabic Literature of the Jews. Continued. Prof.

M. Steinschneider.

Liberal Judaism in England; Its Difficulties and Its Duties. C. G.

Montefiore.

Montefiore.

Fragment of an Aramaic Text of the Testament of Levi. H. L. Pass and Dr. J. Arendzen.

Jews and the English Law. H. S. Q. Henriques.

Karatitea. E. N. Adler.

A New Fragment of Ben Sira. Dr. M. Gaster.

The Jews in Jamaica and Daniel Israel Lopez Laguna. Dr. M. Kayserling.

A Jewish Legend of the Finding of the Cross. Dr. S. Krauss.

Journal of Education .- 3, BROADWAY, LUDGATE HILL. 6d. July:

The Democrat in Literature. Geraldine Hodgson.
The British Army and the British Schoolboy. J. J. Findlay.
Conscription in Schools.
What is Music? C. F. Abdy Williams.

Journal of the Manchester Geographical Society. — 16, Sr. Mary's Parsonagr, Manchester. June.

A Thousand Miles up the Amazon. Illustrated. J. Jones.
Barrage of the Nile. Ald rman Isaac Bowes.
Hungary and the Carpathins. S. Wells.
The Carlile Institute at Meltham. Illustrated.

Journal of Political Economy.-P. S. King. 75 cents. June.

Recent Monetary Legislation. J. L. Laughlin.
The Place of the Service Tax in Modern Finance. J. H. Hamilton.
The Building-Trades Conflict in Chicago. S. V. Lindholm.
The Pooling of Railway Freight Cars. J. R. Cavanagh.
The Housing of the Poor in Chicago. Frances Buckley Embree.

Journal of the Royal Colonial Institute,—Northumberland Avenue. 6d. July. The Outlook in South Africa. Lionel Phillips.

Journal of the Royal United Service Institution, - J. J. Keliher.

What are the Best Types of War-Vessels for the British Navy, including Armour, Armament. and General Equipment for Ships of all Types ! War Maps. Sir T. H. Holdich.
The Intendantur System of the German Army.

Juridical Review .- STEVENS AND HAYNES. 38. 6d. June. Constitution of the Commonwealth of Australia, Prof. Kirkpatrick.

Contraband consigned to Neutral Ports. R. C. Henderson.

The Court of Session in 1623. H. P. Macmillan.

Shipowners' Liability for Collisions under International Law. J. B.

Sutherland.

The Patty Customs. Continued. G. Law. The Petty Customs. Continued. G. Law. Criminal Procedure at Stornoway.

Ladies' Home Journal.—Curtis, Philadelphia. 10 cents. August. The Haunted Houses of New England. Illustrated. S. S. Kingdon.

Lady's Realm .- HUTCHINSON. 6d. August.

The Duchass of Fife. Illustrated.
The Queeu's Gardens. Illustrated.
Croquet. Illustrated. Mrs. G. W. Willock.
The Art of Pressing Well; Symposium.
Some Royal Love-Stories. Illustrated. Minka von Drachenfels.

Leisure Hour. -56, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. August. The Jungfran Railway. Illustrated. J. P. Hobson, Rustic Wit and Wisdom.
Land's End to John o' Groats on a Bicycle. Illustrated. A. R. Quinton,
The High Crosses of Ireland. Illustrated. G. H. Orpen,
Mr. Frederick Treves. With Portraits, G. A. Hutchison.

Library Association Record .- HORACE MARSHALL, 18. July. The Philosophical Classification of Literature as compared with Practical Schemes of Classification. A. Clarke.
French Fiction and French Juvenile Literature for the Public Library.

Henry Guppy.

Library Journal .- KEGAN PAUL. 25. June. The Institut International de Bibliographie. R. R. Bowker.
The Public Library and the State. W. C. Ford.
Open Shelves and Book Theft. A. E. Bostwick.
American Library Association Meeting at Montreal.
July.
The Public Library in Its Relations to Literature. Lindsay Swift.
Some of the Dangers of Technical Knowledge and Training, particularly in Library Work. A. C. Thomas.

Library World.—4, Ave Maria Lane. 6d. July.
The New Library Bill. W. E. Doubleday.
History and Description of Library Charging Systems. Concluded. J. D.
Brown.
The Stock Register. E. A. Savage.
Sequel Stories. Continued. T. Aldred.

Lippincott's Monthly Magazine.—Lippincott, Philadelphia. is.

Emilie Schaumburg. With Portrait. Virginia Tatnall Peacock.

London Quarterly Review .- C. H. Kelly. 25. 6d. July. London quarterly Review.—C. H. Kelly. as, 6d. July.

The Characteristics of Bible Portraiture. G. Matheson.

The late Duke of Argyll. J. R. Gregory.

The Praise of Gardens. R. C. Cowell.

Recent Studies in the Life and Teaching of Jesus. R. M. Pope.

"The Celtic Twilight." Dora M. Jones.

How does It stand with the Bible? A. Brown.

The Imperial Influence of the Poor. Lady Watkin Williams.

Can We see any Preparation for the Second Advent? Mrs. Agnes Smith Lewis. The Present-Day China. Dr. W. Muirhead. Naples and the Gospel. Anne E. Keeling. The late Miss M. H. Kingsley. Dennis Kemp.

Longman's Magazine.-Longmans. 6d. August. English Midshipmen and French Prisons, 1807. Eveline C. Godley. A Naturalist's Rumbles. G. A. B. Dewar.

Ludgate.-F. V. WHITE. 6d. August. H. S. Maxim; a Dealer in Death. Illustrated. C. Moore.
At the Front of the War. Illustrated. A. Nomad.
Normandy; In the Land of the Conqueror. Illustrated. C. C. Strand.

McClure's Magazine,-10, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND. 10 cents. July.

The Saa-Builders. Illustrated. Ray Stannard Baker.
Railway Development in China. With Map and Illustrations. W. B. Parsons.
An Unwritten Chapter in American Diplomacy in the War with Spain.
A. Maurice Low.
The Star-Spangled Banner. Illustrated. Marion Hill.

Macmillan's Magazine, -MACMILLAN, 18. August, A Subaltern in the Bush. Capt. Slessor.
The Sins of Lord Salisbury.
Shakespeare's Henry the Fifth. J. L. Etty.
The Domestic Problem. Mrs. Major.
Witwatersrand; the Richest Goldfield in the World. S. C. Norris.

Manchester Quarterly .- SHERRATT AND HUGHES, MANCHESTER. 6d. July.

Miss Jessi: Fothergill.
E. Mercer.
Lancashire Humour.
T. Newbigging.
A Visit to the Engelberg. Illustrated.
W. E. A. Axon.
Creative Literature.
J. Wilcock.
Heinrich Heine.
A. Schumacher.

Medical Magazine .- 62, King William Street. 18. July. Deviation in Nature and Its Clinical Bearing. J. Foster Palmer, Medicine a Science. S. W. MacIlwaine.

Re the State versus the Criminal—ex parte the Criminal. A. R. Whiteway. The Health Resort in History.
The Development of Our Modern Health Resorts,

Meteorological and Hygienic Notes on the Choice of a Health

Necessity The Dou Bryan Vitalism. The Abso Logical T Dr. Ward Dr. Ward The Doct Mission

The Prese The Stor The Source Mission W

On the Vo

St. Paul a The Perso Probl On the McCo The Person The Stati La Trapp Jowett's A Relic o Saint Ten

The Cath Kneller F Pilgrim 1g Ailen

N The Gove An E The Sick The Ecor Walter B The Piou American The Gove The Judi acts and Is the Br New

Notable ' Province Some Fea A Gallan The Ran What Fr A Seven St. Steph Ne

Montaler Industria Newfou St. John Newfoun Bear and

Ganesis o

The Batt

The Les Ord nary Our Infa How to Missiona The Nev The Slov The Imp Notes or The Sma An Ame Some Un In the B The Nev

Vengean Nor Mutual August.

inton. fuly. ractical

Library.

larly in J. D.

. IS.

Smith

l. its.

7. B. pain.

ZR.

way. alth

Mind.-WILLIAMS AND NORGATE. 4s. July. Necessity. Dr. G. E. Moore. The Double Effect of Mental Stimuli; a Contrast of Types. Mrs. S.

The Double Exect of Mental Standar, a Contrast of Bryant.
Vitalism. Concluded. Dr. C. S. Myers.
The Absolute of Hegelianism. A. K. Rogers.
Logical Theory of the Imaginary. Prof. G. J. Stokes.
Dr. Ward's Refutation of Dualism. Miss E. E. C. Jones.
The Doctrine of the Summum Bonum. H. Sturt. Missionary Review of the World .- 44, FLEET STREET. 25 cents.

Missionary Review of the World.—44, FLERT STREET. 25 cents.
July.
The Present Opportunity. Rev. M. B. Babcock.
The Story of Eromanga, New Heb-ides. Illustrated. Rev. H. A.
Robertson.
The Source of Power. Rev. J. H. Taylor.
Mission Work in South Africa. Illustrated. Rev. W. Searle.

Monist.-KEGAN PAUL 25. 6d. July. On the Voluntary Trance of Indian Fakers. Pof. R. Garbe. St. Paul and Apostolic Succession. Rev. William Weber. The Personifying Passion in Youth, with Remarks upon the Sex and Gender Problem. Prof. J. H. Laeba.
On the Nature of Scientific Law and Scientific Explanation. T. J. McCormack. The Personality of Jesus and His Historical Relation to Christianity. Dr. Paul Carus.

The Stations of the Cross. Rev. H. Thurston.

La Trappe in England. Rev. J. Rickaby.
Jowett's Biographical Sermons. Continued. Rev. J. Rickabj.

A Relic of the Times of Persecution. Rev. J. H. Pullen.
Ssint Teresa; a True Daughter of St. Francis of Sales. Rev. R. F. Clarke.
The Catholic Conference, 1700. James B-itten.

Month.-Longmans. 18. July.

Musical Times,-Novello. 4d. August. Kneller Hall. Illustrated.
Pilgrimage to the House of Jacob Stainer. Illustrated. Edw. Haron

National Review .- EDWARD ARNOLD. 25. 6d. August. The Government and the National Defences; Having Eyes They See Not. The Government and the National Defences; Having Eyes They See Not.
An Englishman
The Sick and Wounded in South Africa.
Hon. Arthur Stanley.
The Economic Revolution in Germany.
Ernest E. Williams.
Walter Bagehot. Leslie Stephen.
The Pious Pilgrimage. Author of "Eliz both and Her German Garden."
American Aflars. A. Murice Low.
The Government and the Army; a Case of Paternal Desertion. Lord Newton.
The Judicature Acts at Work. Rollo F. Graham-Campbell.
Facts and Fancies about the Press-Gang. Vide-Admiral Sir Cyprian Bridge.
Is the Broad Church Party Extinct "Canon Page Roberts.
Some Lessons of the Boer War. Military Critic of the Westminster Gazette.

New England Magazins.—5. PARK SQUARE, BOSTON. 25 cents.
July.
Notable Trees about Boston. Illustrated Abbie Farwell Brown.

Notabl: Trees about Boston. Illustrated Abbie Farwell Brown. Provincetown; the Tip of Cap: Cod. Illustrated. E. J. Carpenter. Some Features of Old Connecticut Farming. C. N. Hall. A Gallant Silken Trade in Virginia. Alice Morse Earle. The Rangeley Lakes. Illustrated. A. L. Golder. What France do:s for Education. J. C. Bracq. A Seven Vears' Outing. Illustrated. Frances Beecher Perkins. St. Stephen's, Walbrook. Illustrated. H. C. Shelley.

New Ireland Review .- BURNS AND OATES. 6d. August. The Battle of Two Civilizations in Ireland. D. P. Moran.

Montalembert and the Education Question. J. J. Trome O'Connell.

Industrial Regeneration through the Rural Councils. M. J. Magee.

Newfoundland Magazino.—Newfoundland Publishing Co., St. John's, Newfoundland. 20 cents. July.
St. John's; Newfoundland's Chief Town. Illustrated. P. T. McGrath. Newfoundland; an Island with some of Its Humours. Dt. W. Prowse. Bear and Caribou. R. L. Mare.
Genesis of the French Shore Question in Newfoundland. E. P. Morris.

Nineteenth Century.—Sameson Low. 28, 6d. August. Nineteenth Century.—Sam2son Low. 2s. 6d. August.
The Les-ons of the War: a Proposed Association.
Ord nary Business Principles; Symposium.
Our Infantry. Earl of Northbrook.
How to breed Horses for War. Wilfrid Scawen Blunt.
Missionaries in Egypt. Arnold Ward.
The New Commonwealth. Albert Gruham Berry.
The Slow Growth of Moral Influence in Politics. Bishop Percival.
The Slow Growth of Moral Influence in Politics. Bishop Percival.
The Imperial Note in Victorian Poetry. J. A. R. Marriott.
Notes on Players and Old Plays. Frederick Wedmore.
The Small Industries of Britain. Prince Kropotk n.
An American View of the Boer War. Edward J. Hodgson.
Some Unseen Stars. Key. Edmund LedgeIn the Bye-ways of Rural Ireland. Concluded. Michael MacDonagh.
The Newspapers. Sir Wemysk Red.
The Chinese Revolt. Frederick Gresnwood.
Vengeance and Afterwards. Edward Dicey.
North American Review.—W. HEINEMANN. 2s. 6d. July.

North American Review .- WM. HEINEMANN. 25. 6d. July. Mutual Helpfulness between China and the United States. Wu-Ting-Fang. The Struggle for Reform. C. Johnston. Missions and M'ssionaries in China. Poultney Bigelow. A Republican View of the Presidential Campaign. Gen. C. L. Grosvenor. Notes on Spencer, Buckle and Comte. Léon Gambetta. Gambetta's Methods of Study. J. Reinach. Lord Playfair. Mayo W. Hazeltine. Lord Playfair. Mayo W. Hazeltine.
Our Opportunity on the Pacific; American Control of Ocean Transportation.
E. T. Chamberlain.
The Projected Cable-line to the Philippines. Chandler Hale.
A Forecast of the Twelfth Census. M. G. Mulhall.
The Plague at Oporto. Dr. A. Calmette.
State Care of Dependent Children. Henrietta C. Wright.
The Settlement after the South African War. S. C. Cronwright-Schreiner.
The Ultimate Triumph of the Boers. Cesare Lombroso.

Open Court .- KEGAN PAUL. 6d. July. Copernicus, Tycho Brahe, and Kepler. With Portraits. Illustrated. C. Sterna.

The Notion of a Continuum. Prof. E. Mach.
The So-Called Mystery Plays. Illustrated. E. F. L. Gauss.
The Old and the New Magic, Illustrated. Concluded. Dr. Paul Carus. Our Day .- 112, LA SALLE AVENUE, CHICAGO. June.

Mrs. Stanford; the Educator. E. C. Cleveland.
The Territory of Hawaii. C. Holdridge.
Th: Negro and the Franchise. W. A. MacCorkle.
Fresh Air Work in Boston. Jane A. Stewart.
The Situation in the Philippines. G. Ade.

Overland Monthly .- SAN FRANCISCO. 10 cents. June. Guad.lup: the Sacred City. Illustrated. G. Conyogham Cunningham. The Torrey Pine. Illustrated. Belle Sumner Angier.

Some Afternoon Amusements at the Paris Exposition. Illustrated. Josephine Tozier.

What shall Society do to be saved? Symposium.

Trout-Culture in Mendocine. Illustrated. E. D. Ward.

San Francisco's First Post Office. Illustrated. Hester A. Benedict.

The Wheel in the West. Illustrated. Rottler.

Pall Mall Magazine .- 18, Charing Cross Road. 18. August. How to popularise Our A-my. Searchlight.
Oxford. Illustrated. A Son of Oxford.
Some Famous Collaborators. Illustrated. G. A. Wade.

Parents' Review .- KEGAN PAUL. 6d. July. The Old Grace and the N.w Intellect. Mrs. Steinthal.
Authority. Mrs. Dowson.
Talk to Nurses. Dr. Helen Webb.
School Books and How They make for Education.
Training of Nurses. Dr. Laing Gordon.
Cookery for Children. Miss Firth.

Philosophical Review.-MACMILLAN. 38. July Prolegomena to a Theory of Laughter. Prof. J. Sully. Practical Procedure in Infe ence. Prof. J. G. H bben. Butler's View of Conscience and Obligation. Dr. A. Lefevre. What constitutes a Thing. H. M. Stanley.

Physical Review, -MACMILLAN. 50 cents. July. hermodynamics of the Voltaic Cell. H. S. Carhart. A New Form of Electrical Condenser having a Capacity capable of Con-tinuous Adjustment. L. J. Briggs.
On the Theory of the Coherer. K. E. Guthe and A. Trowbridge, Electrical Resistance of Thin Films deposited by Kathode Discharge. A. C. Longden.

Poet-Lore. - GAY AND BIRD. 65 cmts. June. Georg: Mcredith on the Source of Destiny. Emily G. Hooker. The Trag dy of Ophelia. D. A. McKnight. Clues to Emerson's Mystic Verse. Continued. W. S. Kennedy. A Defence of Browning's Later Work. Helen A. Clarke.

Political Science Quarterly.—Oxford University Press. 3s. 6d. June.

Trusts. Prof. J. B. Clark.
Money and Prices. Prof. R. Mayo-Smith.
Di ect Taxes under the Constitution. Prof. C. J. Bu
Ci y Government in Canada. S. M. Wickett.
Aunerican Governmental Methods. C. R. Woodruff.
The Politics of Aristotle. Prof. W. A. Dunning. Prof. C. J. Bullock.

Practical Teacher .- 33, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. August. Magnetism and Electricity. Illustrated.
St. Saviour's, Southwark.
The Elements of School Hygiene. A. Newsholms.

Presbyterian and Reformed Review. - MACCALLA AND CI

Presbyterian and Reformed Review.—MACCALLA /
PHILADELPHIA. 80 cents. July.
William Henry Green. John D. Davies.
Symbolo-Fideisme. Andrew C. Zenos.
The Documents of the Book of Exa. J. O. Bo. d.
The Holy Spirit in the Early Apostolic Age. R. A. Falconer.
The Ethics of the Natural Man. N. M. Steff:ns.
Ecclesiasticus. Robert Dick Wilson.

Psychological Review. - MACMILLAN Co., New York. 3s. July. On Relations of Time and Space in Vision. J. M. Cattell.

Judgments of Magnitude by Comparison with a Mental Standard. R. S.

Woodworth and E. Thorndike.

A New Explanation for the Illusory Movemen's seen by Helmholtz on the Zöllner Dingram. A. H. Pierce.

Elements of Conscious Complexes. Mary W. Calkins.

Public Health .-- 12), SHAPTESBURY AVENUE. 16. July. The Abattoir of Biarritz. Alice L. Cumming
The Sale of the Flesh of Tuberculous Cattle for Human Food. H. E. Armstrong.
Sanitary Condition of Warrington a Hundred Years Ago. J. Guest

Public School Magazine, -131, TEMPLE CHAMBERS. 6d. July.

Rossall School. Illustrated. C. A. M. Fennell.
August.
Sherborne School. Illustrated. Upper Fifth.
How to keep a Public School Lib-ary. W. Kennedy.
Bisley, 1900. Illustrated.

Quarterly Review .- John Murray. 6s. July. Dr. Theal on South African History. Dr. Theal on South African History.
Lord Byron.
The Ethics of Cremation.
Japanese Literature.
The Country Mouse.
Gabrisle D'Annunzio.
Rome and Byzantium.
The Conditions of Great Poetry.
A British School at Rome.
New Creatures for Old Countries.
John Donne and his Contemporaries.
Domestic Parties and Imperial Government,
The War in South Africa. Continued.

Quiver .- CASSELL. 6d. August. Tommy Atkins at Church. Illustrated. An Ex-Army Chaplain, Curious Village Customs of To-day. Illustrated. G. A. Wude. Some Last Letters. Illustrated. E. Clarke.

Railway Magazine .- 79, TEMPLE CHAMBERS. 6d. July. Mr. Matthew Holm's, Locomotive Superint ndent, North British Railway. Interview. Illustrated.
The British Railway Exhibit at the Paris Exhibits. Illustrated. D. T. The Furness Railway and Its Connection with Morecambe. Illustrated. S. S. Lord.
Railway Facilities for Cyclists. Illustrated. Brunel Redivivus.
The 5.40 Vestibule Express, ex Marylebone. Illustrated. R. H. Cocks Railway Goods Traffic du ing the Queen's Reign. Illustrated. G. A. Wade.

Wade.
A Railway Journey through Wales. Illustrated. A. J. Chisholm.
The Rother Valley Railway. Illustrated. V. L. Whitechurch.
The New Great Western Routs to Weymouth. Illustrated. H. Rake.
The Clyde Steamboat Trips of the Scottish Railways. Illustrated. R.

August.

John Sylvester Hughes, General Manager, Festiniog Railway; Interview.
Illustrated.
The Esat and West Yorkshire Union Mineral Railway. Illustrated.
The Bodmin and Wadebridg: Railway; a Link with the Past. Illustrated.

I. Bospham. J. Bospham.

A Further Chapter of Railway Accidents. Illustrated. H. D. Anderson.
The Pretoria-Pietersburg Railway. Illustrated. H. H.ydeman.
The Whitby and Pickering Railway. Illustrated. G. W. J. Potter.
King's Cross Railway Station. Illustrated. J. Medcalf.
The Portpatrick and Wigtownshire Joint Railways; the Shortest Sea
Passage to Ireland. Illustrated. J. F. Walker.
The Listowel and Ballybunion Railway. Illustrated. F. Goodman.
What Ou: Railways pay in Wages. Illustrated. G. A. Wade.

Reliquary,-Benrose. 2s. 6d. July. Some Monmouthshi e Sketches. Illustrated. J. R. Larkby. Some Notes on Lace Bobbins. Illustrated. R. E. Heid. Round about Padstow. Illustrated. Rev. S. Barber.

Review of Reviews.—(AMERICA.) 13, ASTOR PLACE, NEW YORK.
25 cents. August.

Volcanic Scenery of the Northwest. Illustrated. R. E. Strahorn.
The Embellishment of a Michigan Town. Illustrated. A. Hadd.n.
The New Appellate Court-House in New York City. Illustrated. E.

Knauff.

Rosevelt's Work as Governor. Illustrated.
Theodore Roosevelt. Illustrated. Jacob A. Riis.
The Kansas City Convention, W. Wellman.
The Chinese Revolution. S. Bonsal.

Review of Reviews,—(Australasia). Queen Street, Melbourne. gd. May.

The Fighting of the Month. Illustrated. Dr. W. H. Fitchett.

The Fighting of the Month. Illustrated. Dr. W. H. The Opening of the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. French Descents on England. Dr. W. H. Fitchett. All about Kitchener. Concluded.

The Fighting of the Month. Illustrated. Dr. W. H. Fitchett. Battle Stories.

The True Land Stories. The True Imperialism, W. T. Stead.
Napoleon Bonaparte. Dr. W. H. Fitchett.

Royal Magazine.—C. A. Pearson. 4d. August. The Art of the Camera. Illustrated. Continued. R. Grey. Royal Children and Their Toys. Illustrated. F. Nevill Jackson. The Medals Our Generals wear. Illustrated. C. Winter.

A Dog's Toilet Club. Illustrated. F. Foulsham.
How an Army crosses a River. Illustrated. C. Ray.
The Achilleon, Corfu; a Future Rival of Monte Carlo.
Illustrated.
Mrs. E. M. Lynch.
Tackling an Enemy: How the Navy is run. Illustrated. A. S. Hurd.

St. Martin's-le-Grand .- GRIFFITH AND SONS. 9d. July. The Army Post Office. Illustrated. A. G. Ferard.
With the "Telegraph Squad" in Besieged Kimberley. Illustrated. Continued. J. E. Symons.
C. V. Boys; an Old-Time Intelligencer. R. W. J.
Archibald Forbes. R. W. J.
Under the South Downs. Illustrated. J. A. J. Housden.
The Liverpool Post Office. Illustrated. Continued. F. Salisbury.

St. Nicholas.-MACMILLAN. 1s. August. Some Literary Cats. Illustrated. Helen M. Winslow. Hunting with a Camera. Illustrated. A. H. Verrill.

School Board Gazette,-Bemrose. is. July,

The Secondary Education Blil. Higher Elementary Schools.
Board of Education Consultative Committee, School-Planning. Continued.

School World,-MACMILLAN, 6d. August, A Chat about Headmasters. Canon Fowler. Some Century-Ends, C. S. Fearenside. The Social Status of Women School-Teachers. Camilla Jebb.

Science Gossip. - 110, STRAND. 6d. August. The Photography of Colour. Illustrated. E. Sanger Shepherd.
Palæolithic Man in Valley of the Wandle. J. P. Johnson.
Butterflies of the Palæarctic Region. Illustrated. Continued. H. C.

Notes on Spinning Animals. Illustrated. H. Wallis Kew. Desmids. Illustrated. Continusd. G. H. Bryan. British Freshwater Mites. Illustrated. Continued. Charles D. Soar.

Scottish Geographical Magazine. - EDWARD STANFORD. 18. 6d. July.

Botanical Survey of Edinburgh District. Robert Smith.
The Chaco Boreal; the Land and Its People. W. B. Grubb.

Scottish Review .- 26, PATERNOSTER SQUARE. 4s. July.

ecent Scottish Historians, A. H. Millar. The Kelmscott Press.
Sir Walter Scott and the Blair Adam Antiquarian Club (1817-31.) W Stephen Viddish Literature.

Recent Hittitle Discoveries. Col. C. R. Conder.

Admiral Baillie. F. P. Badham.

The Redundancy of Spinster Gentlewomen. T. P. W.

The Future of South África.

Ari Thorgilsson; a Father of History. W. A. Craigie.

The Third Chapter of the War. Colonel U. U.

Scribner's Magazine. - Samison Low. 15. August. Pretoria in War Time. R. H. Da is. Loches. Illustrated. E. C. Peixotto.

Strand Magazine. - George Newnes. 6d. August. The Cleverest Child in the World. Illustrated. Prof H. Olerich.
Deeds of Daring and Devotion in the War. Illustrated. A. T. Story.
The Structure of the Sidereal System. Illustrated. Sir Robert Ball.
The Topsy-Turry House at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. Meta Secrets of the Zoo. Illustrated. A. H. Broadwell.

Sunday at Home. -56, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. August. A Sunday in Dunkerque. Illustrated.

Notes of a Tour with Mrs. Fry. Illustrated. Miss E. M. Symonds.

St. Margaret's, Westminster; the M.P.'s Church. Illustrated. A. Wallis

Myers.

Myersalsim. Illustrated. Continued. Ella E. Overton.

Reminisc-inces of Lakeland; the Poets' Sexton. Illustrated. Isabel Maude Hamill, Bishopsgate, Illustrated, Mrs. Isabella Fyvie Mayo. A Woman's Hospital in Rajputana, Illustrated, Grace Hamilton.

Sunday Magazine.-Isbister. 6d. August.

The Spirit of Amusement. Lady Battersea.

A Commonwealth of Waifs at Chicago. Illustrated. H. J. Shepstone. Charity versus Smok., Illustrated. H. Macfurlane.

The Religious Element in Edmund Spenser. Bishop Boyd Carpenter.

Tragedy and Romance in the Milanesian Mission. Illustrated. Rev. A. R. Buckland.

Sunday Strand.—George Newnes. 6d. August. The Keswick Convention. Illustrated. G. Clarke.
The Life of Jesus Christ. Illustrated. Continued. Ian Maclaren.
The Trail of the War. Illustrated. May Bateman.
The Crisis in China and Its Cause. Illustrated. C. B. A.
Sir William MacCormac at the Seat of War. Illustrated. Mrs. S. A. Tooley.
From the Slums to the Sunshine. Illustrated. Harry How. Songs of t St. Evren Dr. Johns Squaring An Indian

With the How the Hymns at Prince Ru Smith Paternoste

Cham The Oddi Mistakes Some Fan Th

The Natural The Wise The Life: The Ideal Apolloniu G. R. Some Mis The Philo

Notes on Compulso The Educ The Orga T. W The War Our Arm Mounted Mars The Cons U

Pope Leo What I the Sidelights Peeps into The Amu A French Mr. F. R Physical

Alte Rome. The New

Paris Ex How Pla

Josef von Under th Frederick Bren The Pari

From Tie Doutsch In the D

ecret So Driburg. Paris Ex Hall, Ty Deu

The War Poul Graf Ott Deaf-Mu Gentz an Energy a Heinrich Illustrated. Hurd.

ted. Con-

uly.

y.

H. C.

oar. zs. 6d.

ly. 31.) W

Meta

. Wallis

Maude

ne. er. v. A. R.

Tooley.

Temple Bar.-MACMILLAN. 18. August. Songs of the Sea. Alan Waters.
St. Evremonde and the Duchess Mazarin. F. C. Hodgson.
Dr. Johnson as Lover and Husband. C. C. Molyneux.
Squaring the Circle. J. R. H.
An Indian Famine Relief Camp Twenty Years Ago.

Temple Magazine.-Horace Marshall. 6d. August. With the Blue Boys. Illustrated, D. Waterson.
How the London Poor feed. Illustrated, E. J. Darlington.
Hymns and Hymn-Singing, Illustrated, Rev. H. R. Haweis.
Prince Rupprecht of Bavaria; the White Rose King. Illustrated. L. A.
Smith.
Paternoster Row; the Holiest Street in England. Illustrated. J. E. Paternoster Row; the Arones South Chamberlain.
The Oddities of Railway Travelling. Rev. C. H. Grundy, Mistakes in the Bible. Illustrated. H. W. Strong. Some Famous Choirs. Illustrated. A. E. Hanscomb.

Theosophical Review. -3, LANGHAM PLACE, 18. July. The Nature of Theosophical Proofs. Concluded. Mrs. Annie Besant.
The Wise Men and the Wisdom of the Talmud. Moses Levene.
The Life and Work of Madame d Krüdener. Concluded. A Russian.
The Ideal Philosophy of Leibnitz. Concluded. Prof. E. M. Chesley.
Apollonius of Tyana; the Philosopher and Reformer of the First Century.
G. R. S. Mead.
Some Misconceptions about Death. Continued. C. W. Leadbeater.
The Philosophy of Bruno. Concluded. W. H. Thomas.

United Service Magazine,—William Clowes. 25.
August.
Notes on the Evolution of Cavalry. Continued. Lieut.-Col. F. N. Maude.
Compulsory Military Service in England. T. Miller Maguire.
The Education of Naval Officers. A. C. D.
The Organisation of Howitzers with Field and Mountain Artillery. Major
T. W. G. Bryan.
The War; the Commencement of Hostilities. Capt. C. Holmes Wilson.
Our Army. Continued. Rex.
Mounted Troops; Random Notes from Ancient History. William W.
Marshall.

United Service Magazine.-WILLIAM CLOWES. 28.

Marshall. The Conspiracy of Catiline. W. B. Wallace.
The Forces arrayed against Us in North China. E. H. Parker.

Universal Magazine.-Horace Marshall, 6d. July. Pop: Leo XIII. With Portrait. Justin McCarrhy.
What I think of the English, Michael Davitt, Sidelights at the Theatre of War. Illustrated. Irving Montagu, Peeps into the Home of J. H. Choate. Illustrated. C. Colquhoun.
The Amusements of the Parisian. Illustrated. Cosmopolitan,
A Frenchman's View of War with England. Illustrated. Major C. Field.
Mr. F. R. Benson; the Phelps of To-day. Illustrated. Helen Thimm.
Charterhouse College. Illustrated. Verite,

Werner's Magazine.—43, EAST 17TH STREET, New York.
25 cents. July. Physical Training in Women's Colleges in America. Illustrated.

Wesleyan Methodist Magazine. - CHARLES KELLY. 6d. July. Burslem; the Potteries Conference Town. Illustrated. R. F. Broomfield. Old and New Madrid. Continued. Illustrated. F. G. Smith.

Westminster Review.-F. WARNE. 2s. 6d. August. Westminster Review.—F. Warne. 2s. 6d. August.
John Morley. T. Bowran.
Radicalism and Labour. W. Diack.
Labour v. Landlordism. Continued. T. Scanlon.
Land Nationalisation. F. Thomasson.
Factory Acts and State Employees. S. W. Belderson..
The West Indies in Their Relation to England and the United States.
J. P. de Putron.
A New Light on Egypt. G. St. Clair.
The Limits of Experimentation. J. Oldfield.
The Hard Case of the Irish Landlords. D. S. A. Cosby.
What are Immoral Plays? A. Laidlaw.
The Imaginative Faculty. R. C. Witt. Wide World Magazine, George Newnes. 6d. August. The Miraculous "Little Doctor" of Rome. Illustrated. Mrs. Herbert

The Miraculous "Little Doctor" of Rome, Industrated. Sirs, Reform Vivian.

An Elephant Drive in Siam, Illustrated. H. Hillman.
The Hermit of the Pyrenees, Illustrated. A. Anderson.
Lost in an Argentine Dust Storm. Illustrated. A. Beaumont.
With a Camera in Somaliand. Illustrated. Victor Goedorp.
Some Curiosities of the Indian Post Office. Illustrated. Mrs. W. J. O'Gradining Spiders of Madagascar, Illustrated. J. E. Whitby. In Search of the Galagan Hills. Illustrated. W. D. Wade. The Fire-Dance of the Navahoes. Illustrated. G. W. James.

Windsor Magazine.-WARD, LOCK. 6d. August. Some Notes about Morocco. Illustrated. S. L. Bensusan.
The Favourite Quotations of Literary People. Illustrated. F. Klickmann.
In the Footsteps of Cupid. Illustrated. F. Dolman.
A Traveller in the Air; a Chat with Mr. Percival Spencer. Illustrated.
F. A. Talbot. The Present Popularity of Polo. Illustrated. B. Tozer.

Woman at Home.-Hodder and Stoughton. 6d. August. Major-Gen. Baden-Powell; the Hero of Mafeking. Illustrated. A. Mackintosh. Lord Rosebery as Leader of the Liberal Party. Illustrated.

Womanhood .- 5, AGAR STREET, STRAND. 6d. August. The Englishwoman in Hong Kong. Illustrated. Mary Ryan.

Young Man .- Horace Marshall. 3d. August. Leonard Courtney. Illustrated. W. Clarke. Heredity as a Witness to Faith. Rev. G. Jackson The Tyranny of the Drink Traffie; Symposium. Spider Decoration. Illustrated. James Scott.

Young Woman .- HORACE MARSHALL. 3d. August. The Queen's Life at Balmoral. Illustrated.
The Tragedy of Fashion.
Women and Musical Composition; a Chat with Liza Lehmann. Illustrated.
Leschetikky; the Greatest Piano-Teacher on Earth. Illustrated.

THE GERMAN MAGAZINES.

Alte und Neue Welt.-Benziger, Einsiedeln. 50 Pf. July. Rome. Illustrated. Eremos.
The New German Civil Code. Continued. E. Burla.
Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. F. von Matt.
How Plants are distributed. Illustrated. Dr. J. M. Ledroit.

Daheim.-Poststrasse 9, Leipzig. 20 Pf. July 7. Josef von Brandt. With Portrait. Prof. E. Heyck. Under the Officers in Kiau-Chou. Illustrated. J. Wilda. Frederick the Great and the Prussian Army. Illustrated. W. von The Paris Exhibition. Continued. Illustrated. H. von Zobeltitz.

July 14.
From Tientsin to Peking. Illustrated. P. Lindenberg.
The Thaler. Illustrated. E. Niemann.

Doutscher Hausschatz .- F. Pustet, Regensburg. 40 Pf. Heft 14-In the Dolomites. Concluded. Illustrated. J. Odenthal. Secret Societies in China. L. K. Driburg. Illustrated. Dr. L. Lünnemann. Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. T. H. Lange. Hall, Tyrol. O. von Schaching.

Deutsche Revue.—Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, Stuttgart.

6 Mks. per qr. July.

The War in South Africa, etc.; the Fighting Animal of the Apocalypse.
Poultney Bigelow.

Graf Otto von Bray-Steinburg. Continued.
Deaf-Mutes and Their Language. Prof. Passow.
Gents and Women. Eugen Guglia.
Energy and Inactivity in Nature. Dr. B. Weinstein.
Heinrich von Angelis. Ilka Horovitz-Barnay.
Dancing and the Philosophy of the Ballet. Camille Mauclair.
The Diplomacy of the Powers and the Crisis in China. M. von Brandt.

Deutsche Rundschau.-Gebrüder Paetel, Berlin. 6 Mks. per qr. July. Letters by Blücher in 1809. Alfred Stern.
Reforms in Islam in the Last Century. J. T. von Eckardt.
Biblical Knowledge in Pre-Reformation Times. E. von Dobschütz.
The Paris Exhibition. A. Schricker.
The Berlin Academy of Sciences. Continued. W. Dilthey.
Romance Literature in France. H. Schneegans. Gutenburg. O. Hartwig. German Colonial Questions. M. von Brandt.

Gartenlaube. - ERNST KEIL'S NACHE., LEIPZIG. 50 Pf. Heft 7. Gröden. Illustrated. J. C. Platter.
Tragedies and Comedies of Superstition. Continued. G. Klitscher
The Eruption of Vesuvius, May, 1900. Illustrated. A. Kellner.
The Electric Railway in Berlin. Illustrated. H. Krieger.
Gold and Diamonds in South Afr.ca. Franz Ritter von Le Monnier.

Gesellschaft .- J. C. C. BRUNS, MINDEN. 75 Pf. July z. The Æsthetics of World Politics. S. Lublinski.

The Goethebund and the Heinze Law. M. G. Conrad. World Politics. Concluded. S. Lublinski. Hans Pfitzner. P. N. Cossmann.

Grenzboten.-F. W. GRUNOW, LEIPZIG. 1 Mk. July 12. Cinna.
The Prussian Forestry Academies.
Military Notes on the Boer War. Continued. C. von Bruchhausen.
Haarlem and Frans Hals. Concluded.

England and North America. July 26.
Eight Years of Saxon Politics. O. Kaemmel.
Italian National and Religious Festivals. H. Ehrenberg.

Kultur,-Jos. Roth, Vienna. 8 Mks. 50 Pf. per annum. July. August Reichensperger and Gothic Architecture. Dr. V. Kienböck.
Ancient Greek Music. Dr. R. von Kralik.
German Literature in Austria-Hungary. Prof. A. Salzer.
The Melk Benedictines. Dr. E. E. Katschthaler.
The Postal Union. L. Katscher.
Viennese Art in 1300. J. Neuwirth.

Kunstgewerbeblatt.-E. A. SEEMANN, LEIPZIG. 1 Mk. July. Van de Velde and Berlin Decorative Art. Illustrated. A. L. Plehn.

Monatsschrift für Stadt und Land.—E. Ungleich, Leipzig. 1 Mk. 25 Pf. July.

Karl Ernst von Baer and Darwinism, Continued. W. von Nathusius. Sculpture at Berlin in 1900. H. Lobedan. Ulrich Bräker; a Swiss Weaver of the 18th Century. Dr. W. Busch. Ernst Ludwig von Gerlach and Heinrich Leo. Dr. Lothholz.

Neue Deutsche Rundschau.—S. Fischer, Berlin. 1 Mk. 50 Pf. July. Culture, Subjective and Objective. G. Simmel. Friedrich Nietzsche and Hein ich von Stein. Elisabeth Förster-Nietzsche. Tendencies in Art. O. Eckmann.

Neue Zelt.-T. H. W. DIETZ, STUTTGART. 4 Mks. 55 Pf. per qr. July 7.

Edwin Markham and "The Man with the Hoe." R. Theodor. The Neutralisation of Trade Unions. Continued. K. Kautsky. Socialistic Union in Holland. W. H. Vliegen. A Swiss Trade Union Movement. D. Zinner.

The Crusade against Vivisection. E. Sokal.
The Neutralisation of Trade Unions. Continued. K. Kautsky.
Micius; a Chinese Forerunner of Christian Communism. F. Frey.

The Economic Development of China. H. Cunow.
The Neutralisation of Trade Unions. Concluded. K. Kautsky Reform of the Insurance against Sickness Law. E. Gräf.

Nord und Sud. - Schlesische Verlags-Anstalt, Breslau. 2 Mks.

Nord und Sud.—Schlesische Verlags-Anstalt, Breislau. 2 Mk July. July. Johann von Mikulicz-Radecki. With Portrait. G. Reinbach. Letters by E. M. Arndt, Wihlelm Hunboldt, and others. M. Grunwald. Michail Nikiforowi: ch. Katkoff. E. Maschke. Women-Emancipators. H. Dohm. Recent Theodor Körner Literature. A. Kohut.

Oesterreichs Illustrirte Zeitung.-Jacques Philipp, Vienna 35 Pf. Heft 19.

Gasthaus Life in Vienna. Illustrated.

Stein der Weisen.-A. HARTLEBEN, VIENNA. 50 Pf. Heft 24. The Whitehead Torpedo. Illustrated. German Machinery at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. C. Lahn.

Classicism and Germanism. V. von Heidenstam.
Natural History Museums. Illustrat.d. J. von Pleyel.
Langen's Suspension Railway. Illustrated.

Veber Land und Moer.—Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, Stuttgart.

1 Mk. Heft 12.

Naval Life. Illustrated. Conclud.d. R. Schn ider.
The Paris Exhibi ion. Illustrated. Concluded. Dr. S. Epstein.
Johann Gutenberg. Illustrated. L. H.
Life in Persia. Illustrated. R. Wischin.
Italian Sculptors. Illustrated. Dr. H. Barth.
China. Illustrated.

Vom Fels zum Meep.—Union-Deutsche-Verlags-Gesellschaft, Stuttgart. 75 Pf. Heft 19. The Palace of Costumes at the Palis Exhibition. Illustrat.d.

Zeit.-GÜNTHERGASSE 1, VIENNA IX./3. 50 Pf. J. J. 7.

Proportional Representation in Belgium. P. Hymans.
England in Khaki. E. Berns ein.
The Crusade against the For igner in China.
The Zepsein Air-Ship. H. H. Hoern.s.
Symbolism in France. C. Mauclair.

July 14. The Crisis in China. A. Charpen ier. Czech Social Democracy. Dr. F. Sonkup. Edmondo de Amicis. B. Wiese.

July 21. The Crisis in China. E. Oppert.

Zeitschrift für Bildende Kunst.—E. A. SEEMANN, LBHPZIG
26 Mks. per annum.
July.
French Art in 1900. Continued. Illustrated.
The Goya Exhibition at Madrid. Illustrated.
The Municipal Palace at Brescia. Illustrated.
P. Eichholz.
Maximiliana Brentano. Illustrated. R. Steig.

Zeitschrift für Bücherfreunde.—Velhagen und Klasing, Leipzig.

24 Mks. per annum. July.

Wilhelm Fichet and Gutenberg. Il'ustrated. Dr. R. Ehwald.
The Illustrated Vitruvius Publications of the 16th Century.

Illustrated. Max Bach.

Emil Orlik as a Book-Illustrator. Illustrated. J. Leisching.

Zeitschrift der Internationalen Musikgesellschaft.—Breitkoff und Haertel, Leipzig. 10 Mks. per ann. July. J. P. E. Hartmann. W. Behrend. The Handel Festival at Bonn. M. Seiffert.

Zukunft.-Maximilian Harden, Berlin. 50 Pf. July 21 Anthropology. M. Hoernes.

The Boer War in England. Dr. Alexander Tillc. Art and Capitalism. Leo Berg. The German Language in Belgium. H. Bischoff.

THE FRENCH MAGAZINES.

Annales de Géographie.—5, RUE DE MÉZIÈRES, PARIS. 5 frs. July 15.

Maps at the Paris Exposition. E. de Margerie and L. Raveneau.

The Geological Structure and Hydrography of the Paris Basin. With Maps.

G. F. Dollfus.

The Growth of Paris. With Maps. P. Dupuy.

The Glacial Period in the Balkan Peninsula. With Maps. J. Coijic.

Annales des Sciences Politiques,—108, BOULEVARD-SAINT-GERMAIN, PARIS. 3 frs. 50 c. July.

Government in England and Its Home Functions. E. Boutmy. The English Navy. X.
Australasian Federation. A. Viallate.
The Hague Conference. C. Dupuis.

Association Catholique. -3. Rue de L'Abbave, Paris. 2 frs. July 15.

A Professiona' Senate in France and Its Organisation. E. Duthoit. Catholic Associations for Workmen in France. V. de Marolles. The Economic Rôle of Secondary Education. Ch. Le Cour-Grandmaison.

The Economic Rôle of Secondary Education. Ch. Le Cour-Grandmaison.

Bibliothèque Universelle.—R. Kino William Strret, Strrand.

205. per annum. July.

The Boers of South Africa. J. Villarais.

The Literary Ideas of Victor Hugo and His Satire of Pedants. P. Stapfer.

Dr. F. G. Haas. Concluded. M. Reader.

The Paris Exposition. Continued. H. de Varigny.

Correspondant. -31, RUE SAINT-GUILLAUME, PARIS. 2 frs. 50 c.

Correspondant.—31, RUE SAINT-GUILLAUME, PARIS. 2 frs. 50 c. July 10.

A Year of Dreyfusite Government in France. Ch. Descotay. The Magistracy and the Theatre in France. A. Desjardins. The English Navy.

Is Chateaubriand's Voyage to Ame ica a Fiction? G. Bert:in. July 25.

China, Europe and the Holy See. E. Lamy.

China and the French Government. Bon. D. Cochin. The Chinese. Marquis de Nadaillac. The Japanese Navy.

The Magistracy and the Theatre in France. Continued. A. Desjardins. A Vear of Dreyfusite Government in France. Concluded. Ch. Descotay.

Journal des Économistes,—14, RUE RICHELIEU, PARIS. 5 frs 50 :. July 15.

The Heritage of the Nineteenth Century. F. Passy. Co-operative Societies at the Paris Exposition. G. de Nouvion.

Ménestrel .- 2 bis, RUE VIVIENNE, PARIS. 30 C. July 1, 8, 15, 20. Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy in Switzerland, from His Correspondence Continued, H. Kling.

Marguerite in Goethe's "Faust." July 23.

A. Boutarel. Mercure de France.—15, Rue de L'Echaudé-Saint-Germain, Faris. 2 frs. July.

The Bovaryism of Maurice Barrès's "Dér.cinés." J. de Gaultier. Finland and the Tsar. J. Leclercq.
The Centennial Exhibition of French Painting. Continued. A. Fontainas.

Monde Moderne. -- 5, Rue St. Benoît, Paris. 1 f. 50 c. July.

Monde Moderne. — 5, Rue St. Benoît, Paris. 1 f. 50 c. July.
The Court of Napoleon III. Illustrated. V. du Bled.
The National Theatre in Switzerland. Illustrated. J. Carrara.
Georges Meunier. Illustrated. Octave Uzanne.
The Chiffonniers of Paris. Illustrated. C. Lancelin.
Westminster Abbey. Illustrated. A. Barthélemy.
Bangk. R. Illustrated. F. Mury.
The Cavalry of the Future. Illustrated. Commandant Picard.
The Anglo-Saxon Race in the Last Five Hundred Years. Illustrated
H. Nogressau.

Nouvelle Revue, -18, King William Street, Strand. 55 frs. per annum. July 1.

The Literature of the Pyrenees, G, Compayré. A propos of the Boxers. A. de Pouvourville. Cheap Living and Commerce. C. M. Limousin. Foreign Politics. Madame Adam.

The Literature of the Pyrenees. G. Compayré. Towards Japan. F. Regamey.
The South African War. Capt. G'lbert.
Paris Opera Comique. A. Bernheim

Nou rell

The French The Preside

Urban Ratt The Americ Assurance a Public Aid Social Pro!

Revus The Fren Inture : Silverwo:k Revu

The Fallo Eternal Y Snicide. The Cathe

Retrosp.c The Chin Mrs. Glad

Japan To The Fore Lady Ha The Itali Lamartin The Fren

Credulity A. Vinet. Reva

The Neu France a The Psy The Mu The Poe Du ing Throug'

Revu The Ela The Cri

Rev The Ch Organis China.

Alfred o B /zant China.

Hotels. Electri Revu The E

Korea. Rev

The E

Nou relle Revue Internationale.—23, BOULEVARD POISSONIÈRE, PARIS. 2 frs. 50c. June 15. The Frenc's Salon of 1300. Marie L. de Rute. The British Empire. O. Malagodi.

The British Empire. O. Malagodi.
June 30.
The Presidency of the French Republic. P. Denis.
Urban Ruttazzi. Continued. Mme. Rattazzi.
The American Revolution. C. Mouhot.

Réforme Sociale .- 54, RUE DE SEINE, PARIS. 1 fr. July 1. Reforme Socialie.—34, RUE DE SEINE, PARIS. 1 II. JUI Assurance ag inst Unemployment and Mutual Aid. E. Rostand. Social Problems in Russii. Continusd. H. Primbault. Julic Aid and Private Charity. L. Rivière. Pensions. R. de Kéralain. Social Problems in Russia. Continued. H. Primbault.

UTTGART.

SCHAFT,

7.

PZIG

LEIPZIC

ontinued

EITKOPE

S 50 2.

, 20. nda ce

PARIS.

ainas. ly.

rated

21

Revue de l'Art.—28, RUE DU MONT-THABOR, PARIS. 7 frs. 50 c.

Th: French School of Painting at the Paris Exposition. Illustrated. Continued. L. de Fourcaud.

Sculpture at the Exposition. Illustrated. M, Demaison.

Medils at the Exposition. Illustrated. Continued. A. Hallays.

Silverwo:k at the Exposition. Illustrated. H. Havard.

Revue Blanche, -23, Boulevard des Italiens, Paris. 1 fr. July 1.

The Falloux Law. R. Dreyfus. July 15.

Eternal Youth. Dr. J. de Nittis. Suicide. Count Leo Tolstoy.

Revue Bleue.-Fisher Unwin. 6d. July 7. The Catholic Priest. M. Stainville.

The Galliff: t Ministry. Col. Patry.

Retrosp. citve French Art at the Paris Exposition. P. Flat.

The Chinese Crisis. A. Moireau.

Mrs. Gladstone. C. Giraudau.

The French Language. P. Foncin.

July 21. Japan To-day. G. Burghard. The Foreign Pavilions at the Exposition. P. Flat. Lady Hester Stanhope. E. Pariset. July 28.

The Italian Elections. H. Mereu.
Lamartine and Peace. F. Passy.
The French Generalissimo. Col. Patry.

Revue Chrétienne.-11, Avenue de L'Observatoire, Paris. 6 frs. per ann. July.

Credulity. H. Draussin. A. Vinet. W. Monod.

A. Vinet. W. Monod.

Revas des Deux Mondes,—18, King William Street, Strand.
30s. per annum. July r.

The Neutrality of Belgium; the Monachy's Last Gift. Due de Broglie.
A Visit to Pascal. M. A. Suarès.
France and the Anti-Slavery Movement. M. G. Bonet-Maury.
The Psycholog; of Sport. Baron de Coubectin.
The Muni: jpal Socialism. M. J. Bourdeau.
July 15.
The Poet Martial. M. G. Boissier.
Du ing the Emigration. M. E. Lamy.
Through Indo-China. J. Massicu.
Patriotism and Humanitarianism. M. de Goyau.
The French Colonial Navy. Contre-Amira de Penfentenyo.
Revue du Proft Public.—20. Rurs Sourgelor. Paris. 3 frs. 50 G.

Revue du Droit Public.—22, Rue Soufflot, Paris. 3 frs. 50 c. May—june.

The Electorate in France and Algerian Delegates.
The Crisis in Political Science. Continued. M. Deslandres.

Revus Encyclopádique,—18, KING WILLIAM STREET, STRAND.
78. per qr. July 7.

The Church of Chaise-Dieu, Haute-Loire. Illustrated. C. de Néronde.
Organisation of the French Colonies. R. Demogue and P. Gouvy.
China. Illustrated. C. Saglio.

Alfred de Musset. Illustrated. Octave Uzanne.

Byzantine Institutions. Illustrated. Ch. Diebl. China. With Maps and Illustrations. Ch. Saglio July 28.
Hotels. Illustrated. Dr. Galtier-Boissière. El:ctric Locomotives. Illustrated. G. Dumont. Ch. Saglio.

Revus Française de l'Étranger et des Colonies,—32, Rue de La Victoire, Paris. 2 frs. July.

The Empress Teze Hsio f China. J. Servigny.

Korea. With Map. A. A. Fauvel.

The Transval at the Paris Exposition. C. Cilvanet.

The Submarine Cables. G. D.

Revue Générale.-16, Rue Treurenberg, Brussels. 12 frs. per

The Elections in France. Ch. Woeste.
J. V. de Scheffel. H. Francotte.
Foreign Diplomacy and Old Franch Society. Continued. V. du Bled.
Mme. de Duras and Chateaubriand. H. Bordeaux.

Revue Internationale de Sociologie.—16, Rue Soufflot, Paris.
18 frs. per annum. June.

Ethics and Elementary Sociology. E. de Roberty. The Sociological Essays of Winiarsky and Pareto. A. Groppali.

Revue pour les Jeunes Filles. - 5, Rue de Mézières, Paris. 1 fr. 50 c. July 5.

Happiness. Louise Chasteau.
Delhi. A. Clayton.
The Position of Women in Denma.k. Mme. R. Rémusat.
The Japanese. Tony d'Ulmès.
July 20.

Conversation in the Nineteenth Century. Continued. V. du Bled. Jeypora. A. Clayton. The Pa is Exposition. G. Colomb.

Revue de Métaphysique et de Morale.—5, Rue de Mézierès, Paris.
3 frs. July.

Finality in Intelligence. Ed. Goblot. The Mathematical System. G. Sorel. Prolegomena to Aestheticism. L. Dimier.

Revue du Monde Cathollqua.—76, RUB DES SAINTS-PÈRES, PARIS.

I fr. 50 c. July 1.

The Weakness of Human Reason. J. Fèvre.
Freedom of Education and the First Empire. R. P. Laveille.
Recent Babylonian Discoveries. V. Ermoni.

Victor Hugo versus Bossuet. Canon Delmont. Devotion to the Pope. J. Fèvre. Gluck's "Orphée" and "Iphigénia." A. Pavie.

Revue de Paris.—Asher, 13, Bedford Street, Covent Garden.
60 frs. per annum. July 1.
The Roman Question in 1862. L. Thouvenel.
The Prince de Joinville. A. Laugel.
The Sports of Old France. J. J. Jusserand.
The Veneration of Relics. A. Luchaire.
In Russian Turkistan. H. Kr., fft.

From Canton to Yun-Nan-Sen. A, Francois.
The Moors and the Esterel Mountains. P, Foncin.
France and Alsace. C. Pfister.
Mysterious Japan. L. Hearn.

Revue Politique et Parlementaire.—5, Rue de Mézières, Paris.
3 frs. July 10.
Philosophy and the University. A. Fouillée.
The Social Democratic Party in Germany. G. Sorel.
The New Belgian Electoral System. M. Vanlaer.
The Alge.ian Delegates. F. Grivaz.

Revue des Revues.-12, Avenue de L'Opéra, Paris. 1 fr. July.

Women in Modern Sports. Symposium.
The National American Institute at Paris. Sully Prudhomme.
Politics in Modern French Literature. G. Pellissier.
The Constitution of the World. J. H. Rosny.
Recent German Literature. Alb. Richter.
The Work of Albert Besnard. Illustrated. Jules Bois.
The Therapeutics of the Future. Illustrated. Dr. L. Caze.

Secret Societies and the Government in China.
Protestantism and Art. E. Müntz.
The Italian Statuary-Moulders in France.
Calboli.
The Work of Albert Besnard. Illustrated. Continued. Jules Bois.

Revue Scientifique.-Fisher Unwin, Paternoster Square. 6d. July 7.

M. de Lacaze-Duthiers and the Sorbonne.

The Distribution of Plankton on the Surface of the Sea G. Buchet.

The New Agriculture. Filippo Virgilii. The Teaching of Languages. H. Laudenbach.

July 21.
The New Radio-active Substances. Mme. Curie.
Opotherapy. Louis Delmas.

French Colonial Products, J. de Cordemoy. Opotherapy. Continued. Louis Delmas. The Disaggregation of Comets. A. Muller.

Revue Socialiste.—8, Galerie du Théâtre Français, Paris. 1 fr. 50 c. July.

Religion and Socialism. E. Berth.
Pierre Lavroff. Continued. Ch. Rappoport.
Universal Suffrage and the Elections in Belgium. P. Deutscher.

Revue Universitaire.—5, Rue de Mézières, Paris., 10 frs. per ann. July 15.

The Congress on Secondary Education, 1900.
The Antiquities of North Africa at the Paris Exposition. Ch. Dichl.
The Neo-Philological Congress at Leipzig. C. Schweitzer.

Revue de l'Université de Bruxelles.-4. Rue du Frontispiece Brussels. x fr. 50 c. July.

Political Parties. M. Vauthier.
Freedom of Education. P. Heger.
Social Troubles in Flanders in the Middle Ages. Concluded. G. Des Marez

Université Catholique,-Burns and Oates, 20 frs. per ann. July 15.

Public Opinion and Judicial Errors in France. E. Voron. Modern Home Life. Abbé Delfour. Our Lady of St. Brizuc. Religious Art in the Salon of 1900. Abbé Broussolle.

THE ITALIAN MAGAZINES.

Civiltà Cattolica. -VIA DI RIPETTA 246, ROME. 25 frs. per annum. July 7.

The Canonisation of Blessed G. de la Salle. Recently Discovered Inscriptions in the Forum. Christian Marriage and the Italian Senate.

A New Cry of Pan; a Reply to the Nava Antologis.
The Birthday of St. Ignatus Loyola.
The Plenary Council of the Latin-American Churches.
The Moral Problem for Unbelievers.

Cosmos Catholicus .- VATICAN PRESS, ROME. July. Rome and Loretto. Illustrated. J. Fraikin. H. E. Cardinal Sancha y Herias, With Portrait. Work among Sailors. Illustrated. Ives de Clouree.

Flegrea.-Plazzetta Mondragone, Naples. 20 frs. per annum.

The Three Wild Beasts of Dante's Wood. F. d'Ovidio.

Notes on Edgar Poe and Baudelaire. Renny de Gourmont.

Nuova Antologia. - VIA S. VITALE 7, ROME. 46 frs. per annum.

Memories of my Youth. Continued. G. de Amicis.
-China of To-day. A. Pratesi.
-Secret Societies and the Chinese Dynasty. Prof. L. Nocentini.
Diplomatic Incapacity and the Chinese War. Prof. C. Lombroso.
The War in the Transvaal. General L. dal Verne.

July 16.

The Monument to Galileo in Paris. Prof. G. Sergi.
The Financial Situation of Italy in 1900. L. G. de Cambray Digny.
Lawful Associations and Secret Societies in China. F. Cerone.
The Germans in China. E. Fossataro.

Rassegna Nazionale.-Via Della Pace 2, Florence. 30 frs. per ann. July 1.

The Experimental Method in Archaeology. S. Ricci. The House of Savoy and the Triple Alliance. G. Grabinski. Brunetière's Critical Studies. Ida Luisa. A New Interpretation of a Cippus in the Forum. X.

July 16. The Chinese Army. G. Senzapaura.
The Eruptions of Vesuvius in May, 1900 G. Mercalli.
Father Hecker, Founder of the Paulists. L. C, Vigodarzere,
The Character of Savonarola. G. Guerghi.

Riforma Sociale.—PIAZZA SOLFBRINO, TURIN. 12 frs. per ann. July z.

German Social Legislation, G. Macchioro. University Autonomy. E. Presutti. A New Census in the United States, A. Contento. English Municipalities. Professor R. Bacchi. The System of History according to Karl Marx. G. Sorel, The Economic Constitution of To-day. Prof. A. Graziani. The Italians in England. G. Prato.

Rivista Internazionale,—Via Torre Argentina, Rome.
July.

The Russian National Debt. Professor E. Lorini. The University of Louvain. G. Toniolo.

the Russian Che University of Louvain.

Che University of Louvain.

Rivista Politica e Letteraria.—Via Marc July 16.

Laborate Far East. X. X. X. -VIA MARCO MINGHETTI 3, ROME,

The Mi-sion of Italy in the Far East. X. X. X. Parliamentary Incompatibility. A. Ferracciu. The Political Spi:it among Italians. P. Orano. Clericalism in the Italian Universities. G. Pittaluga,

THE SPANISH AND PORTUGUESE MAGAZINES.

Cludad de Dios.—Real Monasterio del Escorial, Madrid. 20 pesetas per annum. July 20. The Rational and Historical Conception of Religious Music. E. de Uriarte. Criticism in Psychology. Marcelino Arnaiz.

Criticism in Psychology. Marcelino Arnaiz.

The Progress of Research in Magnetism and Electricity. Justo Fernandez.

España Moderna.—Cuesta de Santo Domingo 16, Madrid. KSPANA MOGERIA, — CESTA DE SANTO DOMINGO TO, 40 pesetas per annum. July. Spanish Dominion in the Low Countries. Francisco Barado. Our Educational Policy. Adolfo Posada. Alice Pestana, Portuguese Novelist. T. Braja.

Revista Portugueza.—Rua Nova do Almada 74, Lisbon. 25 frs.

Madeira, according to an Old Chronicler. Gabriel Pereira.
Wiveless Telegraphy. G. Coutinho.
The Anglo-Boer War and Portuguese Neutrality. Dr. C. de Moura.

Revista Contemporanea.—Calle de Pizarro 17, Madrid.
2 pesetas. July 15.
The Greek Novel in Spain. J. L. Estelrich.
The Chinese Question. J. G. Acuna.
The Teaching of Philosophy in our Institutes. S. Fonte y Salva.

THE DUTCH MAGAZINES.

Elsevier's Geillustreerd Maandschrift.-Luzac and Co., 46, GREAT RUSSELL STREET. IS. 8d. July.

Isaac Israels. Illustrated. F. Erens. The Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. Eugene Bunge. Spitzbergen in 1899. Illustrated. L. J. van Voorthuijsen.

De Gids .- Luzac and Co. 35. July. Heredity and Pessimism, Prof. C. H. Kuhn. Albert Verwey's New Poems. Dr. Byvanck. Constantyn Huygens and Seventeenth Century Society. Prof. G. Kalff.

Vragen des Tijds .- LUZAC AND Co. 18. 6d. July and August. The Colonial Reserve; a Question of Finance. C. van der Pol. The Condition of Seamstresses in Groningen. Anna Polak. Continuation Schools. G. A. C. van Goor.

General Wupperman. With Portrait. F. Smit Kleine.
What Holland has sent to the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated
The Troost Pictures. Illustrated. Johan Gram.
"The Grif and the Soup," by Reynier Hals, in the Haarlem Museum.
Illustrated. Woord en Beeld,-ERVEN F. BOHN, HAARLEM. 16s. per annum.

THE SCANDINAVIAN MAGAZINES.

Kringsiaa .- Olaf Norli, Christiania. 2 kr. per quarter. July 15. The Redtail. H. Cock-Jensen.
The Famine in Russia. Serg i Garjuschin.
The Paris Exhibition. Illustrated.

Tilskueren. - Ernst Bojesen, Copenhagen. 12 kr. per annum. July. Tax Reforms. N. C. Frederiksen. Woman as Breadwinner and House-mother. Adolf Jensen. English Instrumentalists at the Court of Frederic II. Ad. Hansen.

THE RUSSIAN MAGAZINES.

Istoritcheski Vyestnik .- St. Petersburg. A. S. Savorin. July. Recollections of Zagoskin. Continued. Eight Years on Saghalien. Concluded. I. P. Mirolyabof. Great Russian Popular Poetry. A. K. Borozdin.

Mir Bozhi, -St. Petersburg. Ligovka, 25. July. Technique as a Factor of Modern Culture. P. Engelm.ier.
Anthropological Skétches. Continued. Prof. A. F. Brandt.
F. A. Lange and Critical Philosophy. Nicolai Berdazef.
Workmen's Mutual Aid Societies in Riga.

Russkoe Bogatstvo. - St. Petersburg. Spasskaya i Bakayaya ST. July. Literary Factors of the American Revolution. Continued, P. G. Mizhuyef. Types of Capitalist and Agrarian Evolution. V. M. Tchernof, Paris and Her Amusements. N. Kudrin.

Vyestnik Yevropui.—St. Petersburg. July." Labour of School Children in Germany.
Antisemitism in the West and in Russia.
Prince Droutzkoy-Sokolninsky. Japan and China in 1899. Popoff.

ann.

. per ann,

r ann.

MR.

, Rome,

z5 frs.

a. RID.

igust.

nnum.

Museum.

. July.

AVAYA

izhuyef.

nsky.

VIINA

[See article on p. 237.

THE CHERUB CHOIR.

From the painting by Sir Joshua Reynolds, P.R.A.

The 7

till th asters and bl it is show countr constit our ser unable countr is hard to the mentsefficier it is no in Sout and lef and co seem t their so achieve

A Kha

they sta

may ha war two Man in General resistan Buller v and aft ascende South A trouble, was what they are out accethe job to

to steam already

THE PROGRESS OF THE WORLD.

September 1st, 1900.

The Threatened Dissolution.

The Threatened Dissolution.

The Threatened Dissolution.

The Threatened Dissolution and persists. But the probability increases that this Dissolution of Despair will be postponed till the New Year. By that time, if no further disasters have come to us as the result of the fumbling and blundering of Mr. Chamberlain and his colleagues, it is possible Ministers may have some success to show somewhere upon which they may go to the At present the proposal to go to the constituencies upon a khaki issue appeals strongly to our sense of humour. A Government which has been unable to finish in twelve months a war which the country was assured would be finished easily in three, is hardly in a position to make a triumphant appeal to the electors on the score of its military achievements—even if elsewhere it had done wonders for the efficiency of the "men in khaki." But inasmuch as it is now undisputed that the Government by its policy in South Africa has denuded the country of its army and left us exposed—but for the Navy—to be overrun and conquered by either France or Germany, it would seem that they had better appeal to the country on their social legislation-such as it is-than upon the khaki issue. As social reformers Ministers have not achieved brilliant success. But as a Ministry of War they stand convicted of failure.

Ministers will be judged not solely upon their merits, but by the contrast between the popular expectations and the Ministerial performances. It may have been very absurd, but the eager advocates for war twelve months ago succeeded in convincing the Man in the Street that he had only to send out General Buller with 70,000 men to crush all the resistance of the Boers like a steam-roller. General Buller was to eat his Christmas dinner in Pretoria, and after a short and brilliant campaign British ascendency was to be so decisively vindicated in South Africa that we should never again have any trouble, military or political, in that quarter. That was what the electors expected last October. To-day they are waking up to the fact that nothing has turned out according to contract. Ministers have not put the job through. 250,000 men have not been sufficient to steam-roller flat the resistance of the Boers. We have already lost in one way or another 50,000 of our best soldiers and have "swattered away" seventy millions of money. The net result of all this strain and waste is that the Transvaal is not yet conquered, and Ministers calmly tell us that as the reward for our unparalleled exertions we shall have to keep a garrison of 45,000 men locked up in South Africa for an indefinite time. Instead of strengthening our position in that part of the world, their policy has weakened it so much that it requires nine armed men to keep the flag flying where one would have been ample before the war. Surely never in recent times has there been so cruel a popular disappointment, so complete a falsification of all expectations, so exact a confirmation of the warnings of the Opposition, as this war, for the making and the waging of which the electorate is expected in sheer gratitude to make Mr. Chamberlain Prime Minister.

What the Men in Khaki Think. As for the khaki issue, it is safe to say that if we could but bring back our lost legions now Ladysmithed in Africa and distribute them throughout the constituencies so that the electors could have a fair chance of hearing what the men in khaki think of Mr. Chamberlain and his administration, the defeat of the Government would be overwhelming. Even now the men in khaki who have come back are the most effective electioneerers against the Ministry; for they have seen how Mr. Chamberlain wages war. They know the kind of country for which he has spilt so much of British blood, and they know, too, that the men whom our great manslaying machine is cumbrously endeavouring to exterminate are quite as good fellows as ourselves, as civilised, as Christian, and a good deal more humane. "I never had a bit of home feeling all the time I was in Africa," said one returned Tommy, "excepting when I was taken by the Boers. They did me up proper, I can tell you." And the men in khaki have much to say also of the hideous callousness with which they were treated when down with sickness-how they were left for weeks unwashed, their eyes tormented with flies they were too weak to brush away, their bodies swarming with vermin, stinted in medicine, cheated in food. These escapees from the Hell which we have let loose in South Africa are just the kind of witnesses whose presence in a constituency would confound any Ministerial candidate who dared to appeal to the people on a khaki issue.

Kladderadatsch 1

A German View of the British Lion!

CHORUS OF POWERS: "But you are no lion!"

What has the Government Africa, where they have shattered our done with the Army?

military prestige and Ladysmithed our only available force of trained soldiers, is not the only material upon which the electors voting on a khaki issue would have to take into account. In what condition have Ministers left the heart of the Empire? Is the country capable of standing four-square to all the winds that blow, from whatever hostile quarter they may come? Are our arsenals full? Have our men got guns, or our guns cartridges? Mr. Chamberlain's brother has had big orders for high explosives-that is true, but the Ministry that came in on cordite may go out on lyddite, if, despite the favouritism shown to Kynoch and Co. of Birmingham, it should be proved that we have been left practically defenceless against an invader! Our barracks, they say, are full of men-and boys. But you cannot improvise an army out of a mob. Have we an army at this moment capable of taking the field if, in the temporary absence of our fleet, a force of fifty thousand disciplined and well-equipped soldiers

The record of the Government in were thrown upon our shores? That is the first question the constituencies have a right to ask, and if it is not answered satisfactorily any Government standing on a khaki issue is self-condemned. The more these questions are weighed by the nation the more clearly will it appear that to dissolve on khaki will be strategy as mad and as suicidal as the reckless frontal attacks with which our generals courted disaster in the early stages of the South African war.

There is alas! no lack of adequate Lord Wolseley's evidence as to the alarming condition Testimony. of our second line of defence. Lord Wolseley, our veteran Commander-in-Chief, now on the eve of retiring from his high office, has placed publicly on record his gravely considered verdict upon the present state of our home army. We have a miscellaneous crowd of undrilled and imperfectly armed men and boys in our barracks, and a vigorous effort has been made within the last few months to bring the Aldershot division into fighting shape. Aldershot is our chief military camp. There, if anywhere, we might expect to find the best our ru stand? see on availabl on grou fectly f not one He car write fo Aldersh incapal force! we car The fac the eve do not results

Arm ley, wh admiss

results in the shape of military efficiency which our rulers have to show. But how do things stand? Lord Wolseley went down to Aldershot to see on a field day how the Best Best of the troops available for home defence could acquit themselves on ground with every inch of which they were perfectly familiar, in sham manœuvres against enemies not one of whom had a ball cartridge in his pouch. He came, he saw, and he went home dismayed, to write for publication an explicit declaration that the Aldershot division—our Best Best—was absolutely incapable of taking the field as an organised military force! If this be the state of affairs at Aldershot, we can imagine how things stand in other places. The fact is, we are in the same position as France on the eve of Sedan, and we shall be lucky indeed if we do not suffer a similar disaster.

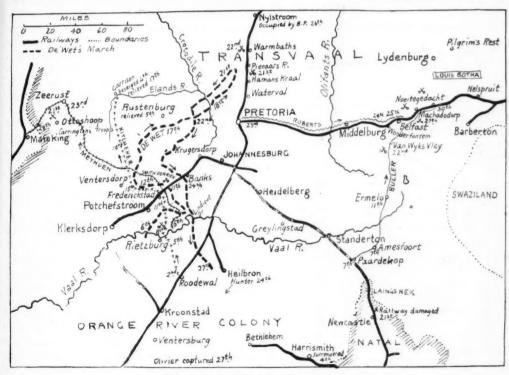

The State of our

Of course, if Ministerialists were of the school of Mr. Shaw-Lefevre, who ridicules the danger of foreign invasion, or of the school of John Morley, who would live peaceably with all men, this ghastly admission of the total breakdown of the only military machine available for the defence of our shores might be overlooked. But at the head of the Ministry we have Lord Salisbury, who has warned us that the heart of our Empire is in imminent peril from a blow which would give the coup de grâce to our very existence, and his policy is poisoned by the presence in his councils of a colleague whom every foreign Power regards as the embodiment of reckless and insolent aggression. Under these circumstances an appeal to the country on a khaki issue compels the electors to judge Ministers primarily upon their military record. To Cæsar they have appealed, to Cæsar they must go. And to add to their condemnation the Times publishes from "an Indian officer" a statement on "Our Armaments in India," which the Ministerialist National Review thus summarises :-

The long and the short of it is that the armaments of our Indian Empire are hopelessly inadequate and largely obsolete, and that the Indian Government are totally unprepared for the struggle for which they were supposed to be preparing for many years, and on which they have admittedly spent many millions. The personnel of the Army is clearly insufficient for a first-class war, while the matériel is conspicuous by its deficiencies. The supply of transport is miserable, our guns are too few, and the first

Map illustrating the War during August.

, and

ment

The n the khaki kless urted

war.

quate lition

Lord

nder-

high

con-

ome illed

icks,

last

into

mp. best

General Christian de Wet.

C.H. delvet

few there are would be hopelessly outclassed by the superior weapons of any European foe they are likely to come in contact with.

A Case for Root and Branch Reform.

The crisis is far too serious for indulgence in the arid tu quoques of party. We are face to face with the same phenomenon that confronted France at the close of the Second Empire. An era of prolonged material prosperity has sapped the soundness of our governing classes. Society has gone rotten at the top. The Army, which is most closely connected with the smart set, suffers most. There is no personal corruption. but there is little professional capacity. We have all been more or less spoiled by luxury. The time has come for a clean sweep. Hitherto we have but tinkered at Army Reform. The task will now have to be taken in hand in grim earnest. axe will have to be laid to the root of the tree. Hitherto the officering of the Army has been practically confined to the sons of the rich-and a pretty mess they have made of it. The note of the new order of things in the Army will be a free career for all who are able—even though they are poor. A great military disaster such as would at this moment inevitably overwhelm us if we were to be involved in war with any first-class Power may be necessary before we can democratise our Army. At present it is a preserve, if not of the plutocracy, at least of the handful of well-to-do people who assume that, as they possess the wealth, they monopolise the capacity of the country. It would be odd if the Socialist régime were to be established viâ the Army.

The War in South Africa.

The probability of an early Dissolution has been increased by the successes which have been achieved by Lord Roberts and General Buller in the Transvaal and by General Hunter in the Orange Free State. General Olivier has been captured and about 4,000 Boers, and the last organised fighting force in the Orange Free State have been made prisoners and despatched to Ceylon. In the Transvaal General Roberts, advancing along the railway, compelled the retreat of General Botha from the carefully prepared positions which he had taken up to defend Machadodorp, and placed himself in occupation of the railway to within twenty miles of Koomati Poort. It is not very difficult to turn a position when there are only 5,000 men opposed to 50,000, and Botha's retreat seems to have been compelled by the turning movement of General French. But although the Boers have been worsted and are apparently very much discouraged, there is no evidence that either Botha, De Wet, or President Kruger has yet decided to throw up the sponge.

The Transvaal Annexed. Lord Roberts has felt sufficiently encouraged by the retreat of General Botha to proclaim the annexation of the Transvaal to the British Empire, in accordance with a Royal Warrant dated July 4thof all days in the year! But although annexed, one half of the country is still outside the pale of British occupation. Even while Lord Roberts was winning his victory at Dalmanutha, Theron's scouts had seized a railway station close to Johannesburg and captured and burned a convoy train of thirty-eight trucks. General De Wet has eluded all attempts to capture him, and has returned to the Orange Free State, where he is still at large and capable of doing as much mischief as ever to our ways and communications. Reports are current as to the exhaustion of the Boers' supplies of ammunition and food. After the defeat of Dalmanutha they voluntarily released the private soldiers, some 3,000 in number, whom they had taken prisoners, and the Boers in the Transvaal are beginning to use MartiniHenry resista desire old rebe runtion vicaim side band a we ar

Fire

been

to be espec

Gene thems house endea the p the sa he is that t repris cation had cut t in a which facilit intere the I that t as rej had 1 there of th tion a home the s In co repor long had r foe b

home

to the

neigh

comfe

were

oor. A Henrys with black powder. Of course, if the Boer moment resistance were suddenly to collapse, Mr. Chamberlain's nvolved desire to hurry on an appeal to the country under an ecessary old register would be greatly increased, but it would ent it is be running a great risk to force a premature Dissoluof the tion with the chance that the Ministerial speeches as they claiming a renewal of public confidence might appear city of side by side with the reports of fresh British reverses régime and a continuous increase of the savagery with which we are waging war in the Transvaal.

> The attempt on the part of our officers to wage war on civilised Fire and Sword. and humane principles, which was persisted in for a little time, has now been definitely abandoned. Looting wholesale seems to be practised without any attempt at hindrance, especially by the South African Colonials under General Brabant, who appear to be establishing for themselves a reputation like Kirke's Lambs or Claverhouse's Dragoons. General Roberts, who had first endeavoured to carry on the war in accordance with the principles of international law, has succumbed to the savage colonial sentiment in the midst of which he is living. One of the latest despatches proclaims that thirty homesteads must be given to the flames in reprisal of an interruption of the railway communi-That the owners of these homesteads cations. had anything to do with the roving band who cut the railway is not even alleged. This is accord with the blind policy of vengeance of all others least calculated facilitate the pacification of the country. I had an interesting conversation in Paris the other day with the Dutch Minister of the Colonies. He told me that the practice of burning down houses and villages as reprisals had been tried by Holland in Atchin, but had proved a total failure. Experience proved that there was no method so certain to reinforce the ranks of the insurgents and extend the area of the insurrection as the burning of houses and the destruction of homes. Hence any Dutch officer who supplemented the sword by the torch would be instantly cashiered. In confirmation of this it may be noted that it is reported in South Africa that General De Wet would long ago have laid down his arms if Lord Kitchener had not wreaked an unworthy vengeance on a brave foe by giving orders for the destruction of De Wet's homestead. These orders, it is said, were carried out to the letter under the eyes of De Wet who, from a neighbouring kopje, witnessed the burning of his comfortable farmstead. All the trees in the orchard were cut down or torn up, his live-stock was butchered, and, when the process was complete, the famous commander, feeling that he had nothing left in the world save the clothes in which he stood, abandoned all thought of making terms and fought on with the resolution of despair.

It is noted with gloating satisfaction

War on Women that since the surrender of Pretoria we have succeeded in killing outright Children. 411 Boers, whose dead bodies were found on the various battlefields. So that the process of reducing the personnel of the Boers by continued military attrition has made some progress. Our own losses have mounted up, according to the official reports, to more than 40,000 men, to which additions must be made for the sick and wounded not enumerated, which brings up the total to more than 50,000. Of course we can better afford to lose 50,000 men than the Boers 500. But notwithstanding this the spirit of the people is so far from being broken that Lord Roberts, borrowing a leaf from the policy adopted by General Weyler in Cuba, is now making war upon women and children, We read that:-

Lord Roberts has issued a proclamation declaring that all burghers in districts occupied by British forces, except those who have sworn the oath of neutrality, will be regarded as prisoners of war and transported; and all buildings, structures, and farms where the enemy's scouts are harboured will be liable to be razed to the ground. All fines under the former proclamation will be rigorously exacted, and prisoners are warned to acquaint her Majesty's forces of the presence of the enemy upon their farms, otherwise they will be regarded as aiding and abetting the enemy.

Hans Cordua.

Dissolu-

y the

hieved

Buller

in the n cap-

anised

been

In the

g the

from taken

elf in les of urn a

ed to

com-ench.

dare

no

ident

ently

neral

on of pire,

th-

one itish

ning

ized

ured

cks.

nim,

e is

f as

are

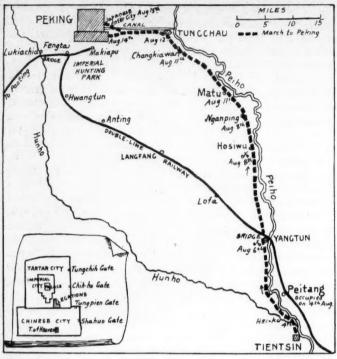

s of

tha

me

and

ini-

The March to Pekin.

But according to the Hague Convention, to which England is a party-

Art. XLIV. Any compulsion of the population of occupied territory to take part in military operations against its own country is prohibited.

Art. XLV. Any pressure on the population of occupied territory to take the oath to the hostile Power is prohibited:

Art. XLVI. Family honours and rights, individual lives and property, as well as religious convictions and liberty, must be respected. Private property cannot be confiscated.

Art. L. No general penalty, pecuniary or otherwise, can be inflicted on the population on account of the acts of individuals, for which it cannot be regarded as collectively responsible.

It is clear, as Mr. Massingham has pointed out, that Lord Roberts's proclamation does compel the population in the Transvaal to take part in operations against their countrymen; puts direct pressure upon them to take the oath to the hostile Power; confiscates their property; and imposes general penalties for individual offences. We therefore stand before the world as the violators of the humanities of the international code of warfare to which we were parties.

The Judicial Murder of Cordua.

The whole story of the plot and the execution of Cordua will long be remembered as one of the most shameful of the minor incidents that have distinguished this disgraceful war. Cordua, a young man of two-and-twenty, who, having given his parole, was allowed to live at large in Pretoria, was approached by a Spanish halfbreed detective in our service of the name of Gano, who appears to have encouraged him in an absurd plot to kidnap Lord It was a harebrained piece of nonsense, but Cordua appears to have been fascinated by the idea, and accepted the assistance in the shape of advice and uniforms furnished him by Gano in order that he might compromise others beside himself, and to secure evidence of the complicity of General Botha in the plot. In this latter enterprise he failed, nor does Cordua appear to have done anything beyond indulging in silly dreams and sillier conversation as to what might be done. When it was evident that they could get no further with their precious plot they arrested Cordua, and caused to be telegraphed to Europe a blood-curdling story of a plot to assassinate British officers and kidnap Lord Roberts. Of this there was absolutely no foundation in fact, excepting Cordua's vagaries. however, to still further excite prejudice against the Boers, and gave occasion for the proclamation of a policy of increased severity against the unfortunate In common gratitude they might have spared the life of their innocent tool, but in order to play the bloody farce to the end he was made the victim of judicial murder. He died bravely, feeling perhaps that his death might add a touch of dignity to a story which otherwise would have had no redeeming feature. That Lord Roberts consented to the sacrifice of the life of Gano's victim has created an outburst of amazement and horror from the American and European Press.

by our

beyon

plot t

absolu

The (

the le in act in put him c lain. was h sition. of th the the ' which to gi policy only utterl makin any o Krug lain berla into repud that e renev

> Joh into majo

forci

migh

been has prop the vand com. The nativand to atter

The Captured Letters.

story

t and

on of llong

f the

or ind this young aving

ed to half-ce of pears

n an

Lord

ained

ordua

nated

the

dvice

by night

him-

ence

neral

this nor

rond

ersa-

was heir

be of a

ord

tion

red.

the

fa

ate

ave

to

the

ing

ity

re-

to

ed

he

by Mr. Labouchere, Dr. Clark, Sir H. de Villiers, Mr. Merriman, and Mr. Te Water, which were captured by our army in the Orange Free State, has been opportune - for the pro-Boers. For they prove beyond all gainsaying that the alleged Afrikander plot to oust the British from South Africa was so absolutely mythical that the Radicals at home and the leading representatives of the Cape Dutch were in active co-operation with the British Government in putting pressure upon President Kruger to make him concede all the just demands of Mr. Chamberlain. In fact, this famous correspondence, which was held in terrorem over the heads of the Opposition, turns out to be invaluable first-hand evidence of the fact that the pro-Boers who were in the most intimate confidential relations with the Transvaal Government used the opportunity which such intimacy gave them to urge the President to give in. We all seconded Mr. Chamberlain's policy of pressure to the utmost of our power. We only failed, firstly, because Mr. Chamberlain was so utterly distrusted by the Boers that they shrank from making concessions to him they would have made to any one else; and, secondly, because after President Kruger had made concessions which Mr. Chamberlain said were nine-tenths satisfactory, Mr. Chamberlain went back on his own offer of a Commission into the seven years' franchise law, and by that repudiation confirmed every Boer in the conviction that every concession would be made the basis for a renewed demand, until a pretext was found for forcing them into war in order that their territory might be seized.

In the Cape Parliament Sir Gordon Politics Sprigg continues to hold office. He at Cape Town and has had two great victories. Mr. Merriman's motion for an inquiry into the working of martial law was rejected by a majority of eight, and the so-called Treason Bill has been carried by a majority of nine. Mr. Sauer, who has been somewhat erratic in his motions, is now proposing to move a resolution in favour of stopping the war. Mr. Rhodes has received leave of absence and remains in Rhodesia, where the mining companies are at their wits' end for labour. The African Review cynically remarks that the native is an agriculturist and not a miner, and therefore it is necessary to take measures to prevent his easy acquisition of land! attempt is being made to import Asiatics. There is

The publication of the letters written , no prospect of any early resumption of the mining industry at Johannesburg. The Outlanders, who brought all this trouble upon the world, are growling angrily at their continued exclusion from the goldreefed city. But as there would be nothing for them to eat if they were back on the Rand to-morrow, they had better stay where they are until the land, which has been blasted with fire for their dear sake, has been permitted to bear other crops than that of commandoes.

Russia and

I have dealt elsewhere with the relief of the Legations at Pekin; but here I Future of China. must note the somewhat startling development which has taken place in the Chinese problem by the publication of the Russian Note. The ease with which a small expeditionary force cut its way to Pekin, and the safety of the Legations thereby secured, has given Russia a chance of which she has promptly availed herself. The basis of the international march on Pekin-which was accepted by "almost all the Powers"-originally put forward by Russia was fourfold, viz.:-

(1) Maintenance of a common agreement among the

(2) Maintenance of the former State organism in

Photograph by]

[Bieber, Berlin.

Field-Marshal von Waldersee.

(Commander-in-Chief of Allied Forces in China.)

President Loubet bidding Farewell to the Officers of the China Expeditionary Force at Marseilles.

(3) Removal of everything that could lead to a partition of the Celestial Empire.

(4) The establishment with united powers of a legal central Government at Pekin, able unassisted to preserve order and tranquillity in the country.

The relief of the Legations having been accomplished, Russia announces that she will withdraw her Minister from the capital to Tientsin, whither he will be accompanied by the Russian troops. As for the occupation of Manchuria, that was a temporary measure exclusively prompted by the necessity of protecting the railway and warding off the aggressive attacks of the Chinese rebels. . "As soon as lasting order shall have been established in Manchuria, and indispensable measures taken for the protection of the railway," Russia will not fail to recall her troops from these territories, "provided that the action of the other Powers does not place any obstacle in the way of such a measure"; which means, of course, that Russia is free to do as she pleases, and will be able to remain in occupation of Niuchwang or any other part of Manchuria if any of the other Powers do not in all things adjust their policy according to her wishes.

What will the Powers do? This declaration of the Russian intention has created no small sensation among the Allies. The American Government, which was first approached, appears to have been somewhat startled at the bold Russian initiative, and intimated their strong preference for the alternative of all the Powers remaining in Pekin until a stable Government was established in China. But if this unanimous agreement could not be arrived at, they were willing to follow the Russian example. Writing at this moment it is impossible to say what line will be taken by the other Powers, notably by Germany. If the Russian Government, which seems to be acting in cordial agreement with that of Japan, insists upon retiring from Pekin, it will be very difficult indeed for the other Powers to persist in the occupation of the Chinese capital. A situation would be created so critical that at any moment the Powers might find themselves face to face with the danger of an alliance between China and Russia, in which they could not count upon the assistance of Japan. From the text of the Russian Circular it would seem as if the Russians were quite content to wait an indefinite time for the establishment of the authority of the Chinese Government. The next few days will put to the test the statesmanship of Europe, and in particular it will test the capacity for self-control on the part of the Kaiser. After all his high-faluting speeches as to what the Germans were to do in avenging their Ambassador, it would be rather humiliating to acquiesce in the dispersal of the International forces before the German generalissimo reaches Chinese waters.

The Sultan's Jubilee. Abdul Hamid to-day celebrates his jubilee, which reminds the world that he has been Sultan for twenty-five years. All the Ambassadors have waited upon him with congratulations, including Sir Nicholas O'Conor, who is said to have presented him with an autograph letter from Her Majesty the Queen. His newspapers are full of his praises, which means nothing. They would have been equally enthusiastic in praise of Nero. Last month was in the new has a Than Emp mane sweet other.

celeb

Thre

whic

The purp the was appeared in I their they The celebrated in Turkey by fresh massacres of Armenians in the province of Sassoun, and an order for eight new ironclads and two torpedo boats. The Sultan has at least one great merit in the eyes of the Faithful. Thanks largely to Prince Lobanoff and the German Emperor, he has vindicated the right of the Commander of the Faithful to massacre the infidel at his sweet will and pleasure, all treaties, capitulations, and other diplomatic cobwebs notwithstanding.

other

their

the

has ation

The

first

ome-

tive,

the

g in

was

hey

ple.

ible

the

the

be

of

will rers

ese

SO ers the ind on of the an ity vill in on ng in er he 10

ld yrs ig

While the Sultan is receiving the con-Threatened War gratulations of his fellow-sovereigns on his jubilee, the peace of the East the Danube. is threatened by a curious dispute which has sprung up between Roumania and Bulgaria. The Macedonian Committee, which exists for the purpose of realising the ideal of the big Bulgaria by the expulsion of the Turks from the province which was given back to them by the Berlin Congress, appears to raise its funds by means of blackmail. Well-to-do Bulgarians and Macedonians, whether living in Bulgaria or Roumania, are ordered to contribute their quota to the revolutionary treasury. If they refuse they are removed by the simple process of assassination. The easiest way to understand the quarrel would be to imagine a Clan Na Gael in the United States, levying blackmail by threats of assassination upon Irish residents in Paris. If the Clan Na Gael assassinated three Irishmen resident in France, and if the French Government then made representations to the American Government asking for the prosecution of the Clan Na Gael, we would have the situation as it is in the Balkans to-day. The Macedonian Committee is accused by the Roumanian Government of having killed three Macedonians living in Roumania because they refused to pay blackmail. The Roumanian Government therefore asked the Bulgarian Ministry to prosecute the Macedonian Committee. This they refused to do, for the members of that Ministry are themselves alleged to be terrorised by the Committee, which finds shelter in Sofia. It is, however, difficult to think that Austria and Russia will allow war to break out on the Danube.

Almost immediately after the murder of King Humbert an attempt was made to assassinate the Shah of Persia in the streets of Paris. The attempt failed, and the assassin, an Anarchist of the usual type, was arrested. The incident, however, was a nasty one, and it probably had its influence, together with the death of the Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha,

Photograph by]

The Funeral of the late King of Italy.

[Louis Piston.

in leading the Shah to abandon his promised visit to London. He went to Ostend, and will return to Teheran without visiting England. This is to be regretted on many grounds. Among others, because Persia is likely before long to become, equally with China, the arena in which rival European Powers will contend for the mastery. Sufficient, however, unto the day is the evil thereof, but the present drift of events bodes ill for the peace of those who dwell in Buffer States.

The Sentence on Bresci.

Bresci, who murdered King Humbert, has been sentenced to seven years' solitary confinement, and then to spend the rest of his life in a convict prison. Whether it is more merciful to doom a man to this living death than to hang him outright is a question upon which the Italians and the English differ. It is curious that a nation which is of all others most prolific in homicides, should shrink so morbidly from vesting the State with the liberty to kill, which is exercised every day by the private citizen. Beyond the abortive attempt on the life of the Shah there has been no fresh exploit on the part of the Anarchists; but rumour is busy with the names of their intended victims, and it will be surprising if the month closes without some other attempt which will probably be announced a the avenging of Bresci.

The New King.

So far as can be seen at present, Bresci has strengthened the cause of monarchy in two ways. First, he has created a great reaction in favour of the dynasty, and secondly, he has replaced a somewhat negative figure-head by a young man who, if we may judge from his inaugural, will run the Kaiser hard as a royal orator. The speech of Victor Emanuel III., which created an extraordinary impression, contains some really fine passages. He said:—

"From this plébiscite of sorrow I draw the best augury for my reign. Holding high my head, and aspiring to the greatest ideals, I dedicate myself to my country with all the warmth, all the vigour within me, all the strength derived from the examples and traditions of my House." Italy would continue to be an influence for peace abroad.

"But external peace suffices not. We need internal peace and the concord of all men of goodwill to develop our intellectual forces and our economic energies. Senators, Deputies! unabashed and steadfast I ascend the Thone, conscious of my rights and of my duties as a King. Let Italy have faith in me as I have faith in the destinies of our country, and no human force shall destroy that which with such selfsacrifice our fathers builded. It is necessary to keep watch and to employ every living force to guard intact the great conquests of unity and of liberty. The serenest trust in our liberal charter will never fail me, and I shall not be wanting either in strong initiative or in energy of action in vigorously defending our glorious institutions, precious heritage from our great dead. Brought up in the love of religion and of the Fatherland, I take God to witness of my promise that from

Photograph by]

[Louis Piston.

King Victor Emanuel III. in the Funeral Procession of King Humbert.

this day forward I offer my heart, my mind, my life, to the grandeur of our land." (Cries of "Viva il Re!" "Viva la Regina!" "Viva Casa Savoia!" lasting more than five minutes.)

Francis Joseph celebrated his seventieth Birthday last month amid general rejoicings, in which all the Emperor of Austria. various races composing his polyglot realm appear to have taken part.

He has been so long so conspicuous a figure on the European stage that it is with some relief we are reminded that he is only seventy years of age. He ten pear be r long be Aus work work both in t

Zie

effic

pregree und Dr reco

13

the

lan Ch An Jer fai din

the un me sp

ste fir Pa

sy

d

vho, if we ne Kaiser of Victor y imprese said :-- st augury spiring to intry with strength House. abroad. al peace We need ce and f all men develop al forces conomic Senators abashed I ascend onscious nd of my

h in the country, n force that ch selffathers necestch and y living intact uests of liberty. rust in

ng. Let th in me ter will and I vanting initiargy of orously lorious recious rgreat up in on and and, I ness of t from to the Viva in five sevenamid ll the yglot part.

e on e are age.

The Plague ceeded in effecting a lodgment in the British Isles. How, no one Scotland. knows; but there seems to be no doubt as to the fact that it has appeared in a low

The much dreaded plague has suc-

He ought to be good for at least five and possibly ten years yet, and providing that no great European cataclysm convulses the Continent, he may be relied upon to hold Austria-Hungary together as long as he lives. After him everyone says there will be the Deluge. But the old saying is true, that if Austria had not existed, she would have had to be invented; and the forces of things may be as efficacious in preservation as they would be in creation. Both Hungary and Bosnia are so well represented at the Paris Exhibition as to give the Western World a fresh conception of the elements of strength, both intellectual and material, which are to be found in the Eastern Empire.

The contemplation of the Old World should not prevent us considering Zionist Congress. the romantic effort to refound a kingdom older than any of those at present existing in Europe. The fourth Zionist Congress, which was held at the Queen's Hall in London, under the presidency of the handsome and eloquent Dr. Herzl, would seem to show that the ideal of reconstituting the kingdom of David and Solomon has taken firm hold of the Jewish mind. There are now over 100,000 Zionist Societies in Russia and 135 in America. As might be expected, Zionism has the least hold in countries where the Jews are most comfortable; but in the English-speaking lands Zionism will probably appeal more to the Christians than to the Jews, for the British and American public cherish the hope of the return of the Iews to Palestine as a kind of re-inforcement of their faith in the Bible. Most of the criticisms that are directed against the movement are based upon a misconception. No one proposes forcibly to export all the Jews of the world to Palestine, but no one who understands anything of the spirit of nationality can marvel that the Jews, scattered, oppressed and despised, should wish to create for one of the great historic races of the world a local habitation where it could realise its own ideals and have a family home-When Zionism captures a Rothschild, the financial difficulty in the way of the redemption of Palestine will easily be surmounted. Dr. Herzl is a fine type of an enthusiast, and there are few international movements which I regard with more sympathy and interest.

district in the city of Glasgow, where a member of a dock labourer's family fell a victim to the mysterious pestilence; and in spite of all the efforts of the sanitary authorities to isolate those infected, it seems to be spreading with a somewhat alarming rapidity. At the present moment from ten to a dozen persons are said to have been attacked, and some eighty or ninety have been segregated and placed under observation. There is no reason for panic. The plague which appeared some time ago in Egypt seems to be dying out there, and the visitation in Australia does not seem to have been very alarming. Probably the plague will save more lives than it destroys. Fifty years ago the Asiastic cholera was the most efficient promoter of sanitary reform. It has lost its power to scare, having done its work. Possibly the plague may be equally useful in directing attention to the conditions in the midst of which multitudes of our people live.

The Plague

For four years the plague has been raging in India, and the Anglo-Indian, Political Educator, being armed with autocratic authority. has used his power ruthlessly in order to cope with its ravages. He has failed, and confesses it. In the official notification of the abandonment of the measures hitherto in force to prevent the spread of the plague there is a very valuable admission, which all those who hanker after autocratic power will do well to bear in mind. The Indian Government declares that the experience of four years has established it as an axiom that it is hopeless to carry out effectively any system of plague administration which runs counter to the feelings, susceptibilities and prejudices of the people. It has taken the Anglo-Indian four years to find that out. In that period he has inflicted infinite misery upon hundreds of thousands, possibly millions of our fellowsubjects. The natives, by every method that is open to them-through the press, by memorials, by petitions—have protested against the attempt to save them from the plague by doing violence to all their most cherished domestic and social prejudices. The natives distinctly prefer to die of plague rather than endure the misery of the medical police despotism by which our doctors imagined they could stem its As a matter of fact, it is very doubtful whether the methods which we adopted would really have been efficacious, even if all the population had been in sympathy with them. As it is, they have failed conspicuously, and the Government last month publicly confessed its mistake, and abandoned an attempt to force upon the population a sanitary supervision which did violence to their feelings. It would be well if this axiom were written up at large in every Government office. The ideal of beneficent despotism fascinates many minds, but it is necessary to educate people as well as to police them.

Some Notable Deaths.

Death has been busy this last month, and has removed some notable figures from our midst. In this country we have lost Lord Russell, the Lord Chief Justice, and Professor Sidgwick, of Cambridge, whose death creates a void in his University similar to that which was created in Oxford by the death of Mr. Green. From Germany two notable figures have disappeared in Liebknecht, one of the most famous of Social Democrats. and Nietzsche. Nietzsche was a mad man of genius, who formulated with uncompromising dacity what may be regarded as the ultimate development Darwinism politics and morals. The assumption that the strongest or the fittest are necessarily the best, is one which cuts at the root of disputes between employers and employed can be, as all ethics so far as they have been hitherto in New Zealand, referred to recognised courts of arbiunderstood; but although very few would be tration. What threatened at one time to be a very prepared to accept Nietzsche's extreme views, the principle which he enunciated finds acceptance among many of our modern Imperialists. Nietzschism > pure and simple would probably not do much mischief. Nietzschism in solution may well prove to be the most dangerous enemy with which Christianity has to deal.

ugly

adju

adjo

to l will refus

The Coming Depression in Trade.

The rise in the price of coal is occasioning considerable alarm among all those who realise the extent to which the cost of fuel governs the price of almost every commodity. The present rise in price will cost the railways alone some £,3,000,000 a year; and many people are discussing remedies. Meanwhile the rise in price tends to create confusion. and necessitates rearrangement in almost our industries. These rearrangements are seldom effected peaceably, and already there are signs that it will require much patience and much wisdom if we are to avoid considerable trouble and widespread disturbance, owing to the lack of any system by which

President McKinley. (A Recent Sketch.)

views, ptance schism would much schism y well the tianity

ion

price oning alarm who nt to t of the every prewill alone o a any ssing while ends sion, remost tries. ents ected eady gns

quire

and we idervidence, a of hich e, as arbivery ugly dispute on the Taff Railway has been amicably adjusted, but the dispute on the Great Eastern is adjourned and not settled. One thing it is earnestly to be hoped the railway directors and managers will set their faces against, and that is any attempt to refuse to recognise the representatives of trade unions.

Experience has shown that a well organised union under responsible officials is not only a valuable, but almost an indispensable agency for the amicable settlement of disputes. If employers should persist in the opposite policy they will go further and assuredly fare worse.

Wahre Jacob)

(Stuttgart.

The Tree of Militarism in Bloom.

DIARY FOR AUGUST.

Aug. z. A heavy poll in favour of Federation is the result of the Referendum in South Adistrali. 2. A man in Paris attempts to shoot the Shah. Rain continues to fall in the worst famine dis-tricts of India.

The Viceroy of India inspects one of the largest famine works in the Bombay Presidency at Broach, Gujerat District.

International Parlamentary Congress meats in Paris.

mets in Paris.

3. King Victor Emmanuel III. addresses a proclamation to the Italian people from Monza, Queen Wilhelmina reviews a Dutch fishing fleet of 2,000 sailing bot so on the Zuyder Zee.

4. The funeral of the Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha takes place at Coburg.

The result of the referendum in Western Australia is that the Commonwealth Bill is adopted by a large majority.

The Official Caxette of Canada announces that the landing of pauper immigrants to any part of Canada is prohibited, except under special rule.

5. The Marriage of King Alexander of Servia to Madame Draga Maschin takes place at Belgrade.

About 4,500 cabmen in Paris go out on strike, Serious anti-Jewish outbreak at Odessa.

6. The Russian Government announces an increase of import duties of from 10 to 50 per cent, to of import duties of from 10 to 50 per cent, to meet the expenses of the operations in China. A sitting of the Italian Chumber is held in Rome on the death of King Humbert. An agreement is reached between the Royal family of Italy and the Pope regarding the religious ceremony to take place at the funeral of King Humbert.

The Government of India decides to employ Imperial Service troops in China. The Turkish Minister of Marine signs the contract with Herr Krupp for the armament of eight ironclads and two torpedo-boat estroyers

There is a Conference at Berlin between Count von Bülow and the British and Russian

8. Count Lamsdorff is appointed Russian Minister for Foreign Affairs.

for Foreign Affairs.

The King and Queen of Italy and Queen Marghenta arrive in Rome.

The funeral of the late King Humbert takes place in Rome.

The Prince Regent of Saxe-Coburg issues a proclamation in which he announces the devolution of the Government upon Duke Charles Edward and his own regency.

An extensive strike accurs in the shinward of

An extensive strike occurs in the shipyard of Messrs. Blohn and Voss at Hamburg. News arrives in Constantinople of recent 11. News arrives in Constantinople of recent massacres of Armenians in the district of Sassun.

Victor Emmanual III., before the Senators and public, reads the oath of allegance to the Constitution and the Italian nation in the Palazzo Madama in Rome.

Palazzo Madama in Rome.

3. A serious railway accident takes place in the Campagna, near Rome, in which 15 persons are killed and 47 injured, some of whom were Senators and Deputies returning from King Humbert's funeral.

Lord Salisbury leaves England, under medical advice, for a month at Schlucht in the tree of the serious results.

advice, for Vosges.

The French to nedo-boat destroyer Framée, off Toulon, sinks immediately after collision with the battleship Brennus; 42 men and officers are drowned.

14. The Boer delegates leave Berlin for St. Peters-

Five thousand dockers and ship-stokers strike at Marseilles.

15. The Government at Jamaica takes over the railway and assets from the trustees of the bondholders.

The French Minister of Foreign Affairs purchases a plot of ground at Bushire on the Persian Gulf for the erection of a French Consulate House there.

The Bonapartists and Royalists have their annual banquets at Paris.

annual banquets at Paris.
The Boar delegates receive a popular reception at St. Petersburg.
Admiral Fournier reports on the loss of the torpedo-boat destroyer Framée.
Mr. Rhodes obtains leave of absence for the Session from the Cape Parliament.
A general convention of Franch Arcadians of the maritime provinces of Canada is held at Cape Breton

It is reported from Simla that the rainfall during the current week has been heavy all over the famine districts, prospects greatly improved, nearly 500,000 persons having left the relief

Mr. Barton and Mr. Dickson are welcomed by 6,000 citizens of Sydney in a monster meeting in Sydney Town Hall, on their return from England.

18. The Kaiser receives Count von Waldersee and the officers of his Staff at Cassel.

the officers of his Staff at Cassel.

The Emperor Francis Joseph's birthday is celebrated by Austrians at home and abroad.

A Festival takes place at the Paris Exhibition when prizes to exhibitors are distributed.

Count von Waldersee with his staff leave Berlin en route to: China.

King Prempsh and King Asibi are deported by the British authorities from Ashanti to Savchellas Seycheries.

The fourth International Congress of Psychology is opened in Paris under the presidency of Professor Ribot.

A strike on the Taff Vale Railway commences.

Astriks of the Lair vale Kallway commences.
The 13th Conference of the International Law Association opens at Rouen. Papers are read by Dr. Evans Darby on arbitration, and by Mr. Alexander on the abolitio 1 of Slavery.

The Indian Government is compelled to remove the Maharaja of Bharaspur from power owing to his victous and intemperate habits. The trial of twenty-five prisoners concerned in the Cawnpore plague riots takes place at Allahabad.

Animanautrican Fari Santa Sant

arrangements being concluded to the satis faction of the men. he numerous strikes continue in France; at Marseilles the Trans-Atlantic Company and its sailors come to terms. its saiors come to terms.

there are scrious floods in the Madras Presidency. A mail train runs off the line near Baripada owing to the softening of the embankment by the flood; 11 persons are killed bankment by the nood; it persons are killed and 25 injured.

The final returns on the voting in Western Australia on joining the Commonwealth are announced as follows: 44,704 affirmatives and 19,691 negatives. The Indian Foreign Department issues a circular letter directing that all applications for leave to visit Europe by native chiefs shall be submitted to the Government of India.

25. The Tsar receives Dr. Leyds in audience at Paterhof

The Marquis Ito issues a manifesto at Yokohama

The police in Rome arrest the Vicar of the Church of St. Sebastian for sedition.

At a meeting in the Labour Exchange at Marseilles between the delegates of the shipowners and the men an arrangement is Marselllas b:tween the delegates of the ship-owners and the men an arrangement is arrived at which brings the strike to an end, the dockers consequently return to work. at a mass meeting of the strikers on the Taff Vale Railway hed at Cardiff, it is unani-

At a mass meeting of the stress of the fair Vale Railway he d at Cardiff, it is unanimously decided by the men to reject the terms offered by the company, and to give the men's committee plenary powers.

The delegates of the men in the Great Eastern Poilland in the company of the company of Railway dispute meet at Stratford to consider the reply to the Company. It is agreed to wait for the company's answer till the second week in September.

EVENTS OF THE MONTH.

15. There is a sailors' strike at Dunkirk, and a 28. Dr. Leyds pays visits to the Diplomatic Corps stokers' strike at Bordeaux in France.

15. There is a sailors' strike at Dunkirk, and a 28. Dr. Leyds pays visits to the Diplomatic Corps at St. Petersburg; the other Boer delegates arrive at the Hague.

28. ( 29. I 30. I

Aug.

6

T

11. W

12. T

13. T

14. T

15. A

16. T

17. A

18. B

Bresci, the assassin of King Humbert, is tried before a jury at Milan, and sentenced to penal servitude for life, with solitary confine-ment. Padre Volponi, the Vicar of the Church of St. Sebasti n, in Rome, is sentenced to eight months' imprisonment for expressing opinion that regicide is occasionally ustifiable.

At Dunkirk and Havre, in France, the strikes extend.

The negotiations between the Taff Vale railway men and the company result in a settle-ment of the dispute.

War in South Africa.

August z. Commandant Olivier, with five guns and a number of burghers, breaks through the cordon in the direction of Harrismith.

The debate on the second reading of the Treason Bill is resumed in the House of Assembly at Cape Town. Lord Kitchener goes to Rhenoster to direct the operations against De Wet.

In the House of Assembly several Dutch Members oppose the Treason Bill.
 General Ian Hamilton continues his movement towards Rustenburg. Harrismith surrenders to General MacDonald.

De Wet's wagons cross the Vaal. Sir F. Carrington endeavours to relieve Elands River, but his force being too small retires to Mafeking to concentrate.

A plot to seize Lord Roberts at Pretoria is reported: the ringleaders are arrested.

Lord Dundonald occupies Ermelo.

Lord Undonald occupies E-melo.
Lord Kitchener and Lord Methuen press on De Wet east of Ventersdorp.
The debate on the Martial Law is finished in the Cape House of Assembly. Mr. Merriman's resolution is negatived without a division, and Mr. Theron's amendment rejected by 45 votes to 41.

e Wet eludes his pursuers; he is last heard of near Rustenburg. Lord Kitchener relieves Colonel Hore at Elands

River after a forced march.

The trial begins of Lieutenant Hans Cordua before the Court Martial at Pretoria.

18. The trial of Lieutenant Hans Cordua is continued.

The debate on the Treason Bill is resumed in the Cape House of Assembly.

De Wet makes a cross march and encamps 15 miles north-east of Pretoria. The House of Assembly continues the debate on the Treason Bill. The Royal Hospital Commission begins i's work instantly on landing at Cape Town

to-day.

At Kimberley the trial of Carter's Ridge rebels takes place. Two leaders of the band are fined $125 each, the rest are detained until the rising of the Court.

Sir J. Gordon Sprigg makes his financial statement in the Cape House of Assembly.

General Buller's column moves to Van Vyk's

Vlei

22.

Viet.
The debate on the Treason Bill closes. The second reading is carried by 48 votes to 38.
All the members of Mr. Schreiner's section except two follow him to the Ministerial verdict of guilty is found against Lieutenant Hans Cordua for conspiring to abduct Lord Roberts at Pretoria.

The House of Assembly at Cape Town goes into Committee on the Treason Bill. The sentence of death passed upon Li utenant Hans Cordua is confirmed by Lord Roberts, Hans Cordua is commissing by Bond, and he is shot at seven this morning.

General Bruce Hamilton captures General Olivier and his three sons at Winburg.

Olivier and his three sons at Winburg.

General Buller's troops capture Bergendal, a strong position west of Dalmanutha Railway

28. General Buller marches on Machadorp, which he occupies.

re-equip.
30. Lord Roberts reports that 1,800 British prisoners were released at Mooitgedacht.

ic Corps

delegates

, is tried

confine-r of the entenced

e strikes

ale rail-

a settle uns and of the ouse of rect the Dutch

ovement

Donald Elands

retires toria is ress on shed in Merrinout a t heard Elands

Cordua is con-

med in mps 15

hate on gins i's rebels

and are d until l state-

Vyk's The

to 38. section

it mant t Lord n goes tenant oberts.

Jeneral

ailway

pres asionally

The Crisis in China.

lug. 2. Admiral Seymour visits the Viceroy of Nanking, who agrees to the landing of 3,000 British troops for the defence of Shanghai. Official report of the execution of Hsu Chingcheng and Yuan Chang, at Pekin, by order of the Dowager-Empress.

New South Walss Legislative Council decides to send a contingent of troops to serve in China.

to sen

China.

Severe fighting between the Russians and Chinese is reported from Niu-chwang; the Russians capture Sakhalin.
The Government accepts the offer of a gunboat from South Australia for service in China.
The Russian force in Manchuria captures the town of Aigun, opposite Blagovestchenk, after severe fighting.
The foreign community, including customs officials and consuls, leave Chung-King on board the Pioneer.

board the Pioneer.

Engagement at Pei-tang between the Chinese and Allies, the latter lose 1,200 in killed and

Admi:al Seymour arrives at Shanghai from

5. Admital Saymour arrives at Shanghai room Nanking.

The advance to Peking begins.

6. The Allies, about 12,000 strong, attack the Chinese intrenched position at Hsi-Ku, two miles outside Tien-tsin; the Chinese retreat northward.

7. The British and American Governments receive cipher messages from Sir Claude MacDonald and Mr. Conger respectively, dated Peking, August ard.

Pei-tang taken by the Japanese, supported by British and American troops.

Count von Waldersee is appointed to the command of the Allied forces in China.

command of the Allied forces in China. Several cipher message sa re received by various European Governments from their representatives in Peking, undated.

The Chinese merchants at Shanghai protest against the landing of European troops the e., the French Consul states that 3,000 Annamite troops will arrive and land for the protection of French interests.

of French interests.

The Peking relief force reaches Ho-ss-wa, half way to Peking from Tien-tsin, Admiral Alexeiff notifies that a provisional Russian administration will be established at Niu-chwang.

Niti-chwang.

II. Wu Ting Fang delivers a request from the Chinese Viceroys to the American Government to use their good offices to preven the ment to use their good offices to prevent the landing of foreign troops at Shanghai. The American Government replies that it is outside their province to interfere. The Allied forces reach Chang-k i-wun, about 15 miles from Peking.

12. The British Government undertakes to lend the Wu-chang Viceroy £75 000 at 44 per cent.

13. The British Government postpones the landing of British troops at Shanghai till further orders.

14. The Japanese troopstoccupy Tung-Chan within

The Japanese troopstoccupy a ung-chain visual romines of Peking.
 After 14 hours fighting, and storming of the gates, the Allied troops enter Peking, and relieve the Foreign Ministers, the Legations, and foreigners, all of whom are safe. The Empress and Emperor have previously left to the Chain of the Ch

Empress and Emperor have previously left Peking, protected by Chinese troops.

16. The United States Government is appealed to by Li Hung Chang to prevent the Allied iorces from shaking the Chinese Empire to its foundations. A special meeting of the American Cabinet is held to consider the Chinese situation. The Japanese guard the Imperial Palace at Peking.

17. A joint note from the Viceroy of Nanking and Wu-Chang urges that proper consideration be shown to the Dowager-Empress by the Allied Powers.

18. British Indian troops are landing by degrees at

18. British Indian troops are landing by degrees at Shanghai. Under orders from the French Consul-General 60 bluejackets are also landed from the French Cruiser Pascal.

18. As a result of an exchange of telegrams between the Powers, it is agreed that the Yang-tsze river will be in the charge of the Admirals of all the Powers, instead of being undertaken solely by the British Admiral.

The City of Peking is divided into districts for police supervision by the Allied forces. The Chinese army had fled.

20. The Chinese through Li Hung Chang ask that Mr. Conger or some other American in authority be appointed to open up negoti-attentity of appointed to open up negoti-ations for p.ace.

A Russian cruiser and a gunboat arrive at Shanghai to assist in preventing hostile action on the part of the Chinese Squadron.

Li Hung Chang's peace proposals are rejected by the American Government.

The Russians having destroyed the lock-gates on the In-Tai canal, river transport is seriously impeded. The cable between Chifu and Ta-ku is working, but the line from Ta-ku to Tien-tsin and beyond is not. The Japanese alone have an effective mail service

Photograph by]

[Elliott and Fry.

The late Mr. T. Faed, R.A.

23. The Indian Government give extensive contracts to Canadian manufacturers for supplies to the troops in China, as the Canadian Pacific Ra'lway saves over a fortnight in transport of goods.

An important letter is addressed by Yang Yu, Chinese Minister to Russi , to Baroness von Suttner on the question of Missionaries in

The Japanese hold the wall round the inner-most part of the Forbidden City in Peking; they have not forced their way into the Palace.

24. Mr. Fraser, the British Consul, returns to Chung-King on board the Pioneer.

Chinese villagers are flocking into Tien-tsin at the rate of 1,000 daily, food supply is bad, there is every prospect of a famine.

The Japanese protect the Palace at Peking, the Japanese Government renews its assurances to protect the persons of the Emperor and Empress. and Empress.

General Chaffee sends a telegram to Washing-ton, says he has offered assistance to Baroness von Ketteler to furnish her with means of transport and an escort to Tien-tsin.

General Creagh reviews 3,000 troops at Shanghai, Admiral Seymour being present.

Ta-ku.
The Chinse Legation at St. Petersburg states that peace negotiations with China will begin in a few days.
The United States Government addresses a note to all its representatives in Europe and Tokio protesting against the reported resolution to prevent Li Hung Chang from communicating with the Chinese authorities in the event of his arrival at Ta-ku.

PARLIAMENTARY RECORD. House of Lords.

August 2. Vote of Condolance to the Queen on the death of the Duke of Saxe-Coburg. Second death of the Duke of Saze-Coburg. Second reading of the Companies Bill.

3. Third reading of the Elementary Education Bill and the Companies Bill. The Military Measures of the Government; speeches by Lord Wemyss, Lord Rosebery, Lord Lansdowne, and Lord Salisbury.

6. The Supplemental War Loan Bill and other Bills pass through all their stages.

8. The Appropriation Bill passes through all its stages. The Lord Chancellor reads the Queen's Speech closing the session until October 27th.

House of Commons.

August r. Supplemental War Loan; speeches by Sir William Harcourt and the Chancellor of Sir William Harcourt and the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

The Situation in China; speeches by Sir E. Grey, Mr. Brodrick and others.

Report on Supply Vote agreed to. Administration in West Africa, condition of Jamaica; speech by Mr. Chamberlain.

Bills advanced. Second reading of Appropriation Bill; speeches by Mr. Channing and Mr. E. Robertson. African Hospital Inquiry; speeches by Mr. Burdett-Coutts and Mr. Balfour.

The Appropriation Bill passes through Committee, other Bills advanced. Lord George Hamilton informs the Housa of the improvement in the famine districts of India.

ment in the tamine districts of India.
The Appropriation Bill, third reading; speeches by Sir W. Lawson, Mr. Chamberlain and others, the House is then prorogued till October 27th.

SPEECHES

Aug. 3. Mr. Balfour, at Cambridge, on the history of the ninsteenth century.
6. The Emperor of Germany at Bielefeld on the Dreams of the great Elector.
Mr. Solomon at Cape Town on the Treason Bill.

8. Mr. Bryan at Indianapolis on the Policy of the United States. Sir Michael Hicks Beach on the forthcoming

Election.

Election.

2. The King of Italy in the Senate hall in Rome on the ideals and destiny of Italy.

The German Emperor at Cassel on Germany and China, and congratulations on Count von Waldersee's appointment.

19. M. Delcassé at Foix on the Policy of France both at home at d in the world.

23. Mr. Bryan at Topeka on currency,

OBITUARY.

OBITUARY.

Aug. 7. Herr Wilhelm Liekhnecht, 74.

10. Lord Russell of Kiflowen, 67.

12. Dr. Steinitz Great Chess Master), 54.

14. Mr. Collis P. Huntington (Great Railway Magnate).

16. Dr. John Anderson, M.D., 66.

17. Sir Henry Simpson, 52.

Sir Malcolm Fraser, 64.

Thomas Faed, R.A., 73.

18. Sir William Stokes (Surgeon), 60.

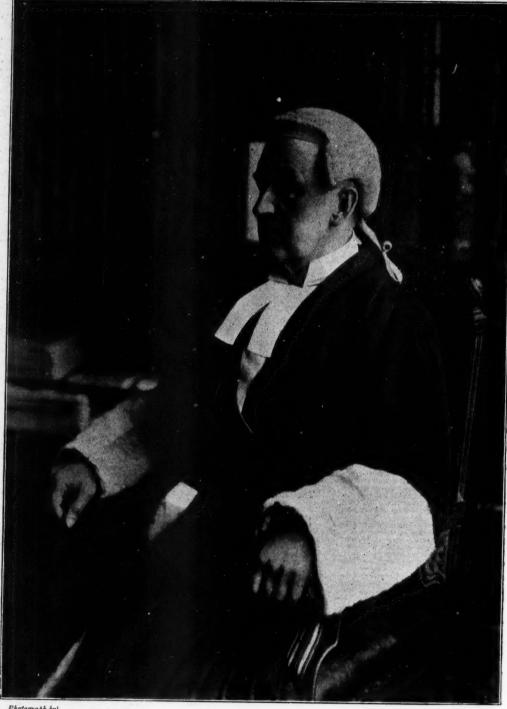

29. Professor Nietzche (Weimar), 55.

26. Sir John Adye, 80.

29. Professor Henry Sidgwick, 62.

29. Sir Saul Samuel, Bart., K.M.C.G., C.B., 79.

31. Sir John Bennet Lawes, 86.

Photograph by

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN.

[Russell and Sons.

men has Justi time the Irish Briti more Russ they then

Irish

CI ence legio popu reser cario a fla less king stan

cond the b was was the r the v attri Englus th of a Ther well. wear thrus all t their

Ye Engl an Ir in de for the England Irelation The disag argur super Lord swelle abate ously repre

CHARACTER SKETCH.

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, LORD CHIEF JUSTICE OF ENGLAND.

THE sudden and unexpected death of Lord Russell of Killowen has brought forcibly to every mind the familiar characteristics of one of the best-known men in the British Empire. But to how many, I wonder, has the contemplation of the career of the Lord Chief Justice suggested the obvious remark that it is about time the public readjusted its conventional conception of the Irish character? In the last ten years two great Irishmen occupied foremost positions in the arena of British law and British politics. No two men differed more absolutely than Charles Parnell and Charles Russell, but both of them agreed in this: that although they were the foremost Irishmen of their time, neither of them had even the faintest resemblance to the typical Irishman of the English populace.

TWO NOTABLE IRISHMEN.

Charles Parnell, silent, austere, commanding the obedience rather than inspiring the love of his well-disciplined legions, was the very antithesis of the Irishman of popular fiction and of the stage. Cold in aspect, more reserved than the conventional Englishman of Continental caricature, without even a gleam of humour in his eye or a flash of wit upon his tongue, Mr. Parnell was nevertheless as much as O'Connell ever had been the uncrowned king of Ireland.

Charles Russell, a man genial, full of bonhomie, constantly mingling on equal terms with all sorts and conditions of men-a man who never moved his lips from the beaker of life until the vessel broke in his eager graspwas quite as little of a stage Irishman as Mr. Parnell. He was not devoid of humour, but he was totally devoid of the rollicking carelessness with which the idle Celt confronts the world and its cares. The tributes paid to him at his death by the Bench, the Bar, and the Press, concur in attributing to him just those qualities on which the English particularly pride themselves. He stands before us the typical Chief Justice of England, a splendid figure of a man-stately, dignified, a worthy personification of Themis, a terror to evil-doers, a praise to them that do well. His magnificent power of concentration, his unwearying industry, his impatience of rhetoric, his direct thrust to the very heart of things, his intense practicality, all the traits which the English most desire to see in their great judges were embodied in Charles Russell.

"SO ENGLISH, YOU KNOW."

Yet he, the Lord Chief Justice of England, was not an Englishman. He was not even a Scotchman. He was an Irishman through and through—Irish in birth, Irish in descent, Irish in politics and Irish in religion. But for thirty years Russell was almost as supreme in the English Bar as Parnell was over the Nationalists of Ireland.

The conceit of race, which so often makes Englishmen disagreeable to their fellow-subjects, is proof against all argument. It will be affected as little by the demonstrated superiority of Charles Russell at the Bar as by that of Lord Roberts in the field. But it may be hoped that the swelled-headedness of the Englishman may be somewhat abated by the fact that of late he has been as conspicuously outclassed both in peace and in war by the representatives of the race whose claim to the right to manage their own affairs he still contemptuously ignores.

So much has been written in all the papers about the late Lord Chief Justice's career that I will chiefly confine myself in this Sketch to the modest task of recalling a few of my own personal recollections of Lord Russell. By a curious coincidence, interesting only to myself, I was closely connected with both the first and last great cases with which he made his fame in the Criminal Court, and between the two there were many occasions on which we were brought into such proximity as was possible between two men, one of whom was leader of the Bar and the other the editor of a daily paper.

MY LAST INTERVIEW.

The last occasion on which I met him was at the Law Courts in the Strand a few months before the famous Trial at Bar. It was the only time I ever saw him in his robes as Chief Justice. It was not then known who was to try the Raiders, and I went to discuss with him the legal possibilities and judicial difficulties in the way of the trial. It was at the end of a long day in the Court, and Lord Russell was somewhat tired, but he received me with his wonted affability, and we discussed the matter for half-an-hour and more. There is little of the talk worth recalling now except for one pregnant observation which fell from him in discussing the complicity—then suspected and now abundantly confirmed—of the Colonial Office in the conspiracy which culminated in the Raid.

A SIGNIFICANT QUESTION.

"I know nothing about that," he said pointedly. "But this I know. In the month that preceded the Raid, X.' (naming a friend in the City) "used to tell me that everyone in the City was on the tiptoe for something to happen in the Transvaal. Day after day he used to bring me home stories of preparations going on, of guns going out, and of what was going to happen in South Africa. Does it not seem to you very strange if all these stories were current in the City, that not an inkling of them should ever have reached Mr. Chamberlain at the Colonial Office?" How often since the Lord Chief Justice put to me that significant question-to which, of course, there is only one answer-have I not lamented that he was not a member of the South African Committee! Mr. Chamberlain would have stood as little chance as poor Pigott if he had been under crossexamination by Lord Russell.

IF LORD RUSSELL HAD CROSS-EXAMINED MR. CHAMBERLAIN!

Just imagine how the great judge would have dealt with the Jack-in-the-Box apparitions of the Colonial Secretary on the witness-stand, whenever any hint of the real truth had to be explained away or whenever a red herring had to be drawn across a scent so strong that even the Committee was getting upon the trail! If Lord Russell had been on that Committee and had been given a free hand, the Colonial Office would never have been allowed to hold back documents and suppress correspondence. Mr. Rhodes would have been compelled to produce the incriminating cablegrams. Mr. Chamberlain would have disappeared from public life, and the world would have been spared the horrible conflict which is devastating South Africa. All our present disasters have come upon us because a Committee nominally appointed to ascertain, the facts converted itself into a machine for stifling all investigation into the essential point at issue, and permitted, nay, absolutely encouraged and suggested the hushing up of all evidence that tended to put the saddle on the right horse, and to reveal the truth about the complicity of the Colonial Office in the Rhodes-Jameson conspiracy.

THE TRIAL AT BAR.

I never saw Lord Russell to speak to again; but I am much mistaken if some such reflections did not occur to him in the bitter moment when, in the hour of our Empire's humiliation, the War Office, in desperation, spread its net over all possible recruits, and despatched, among other mere boys, Lord Russell's son, who is a junior officer in the Royal Artillery. No one who listened to his famous summing-up in the Trial at Bar can doubt what were the private opinions of the Lord Chief Justice upon the war, which is but a magnified and infinitely more criminal enterprise than the Raid out of which it grew. His Irish instinct of sympathy with the threatened independence of weaker nations carried him on that occasion far beyond the limits usually observed by British judges. His summing-up was a more severe, more passionate invective against the Raiders than the speech of the prosecuting counsel. His famous definition of the Transvaal as a foreign State with which our Government was in friendly treaty relations has too often been forgotten in the controversies that preceded and followed the war. At a meeting of the Hardwick Society, which I had the honour to attend, I heard the statement that the Transvaal was a foreign State treated with outbursts of ridicule and indignation by members of the profession which had Lord Russell as its head.

THE WHY AND WHEREFORE OF THINGS.

There was much comment at the time upon the contrast between the Demosthenic vigour of Lord Russell's charge to the jury and the more or less perfunctory fashion in which the Attorney-General discharged his duty. Possibly the obvious explanation was the true one. The Attorney-General had seen the incriminating cablegrams; Lord Russell had not. If the Attorney-General had ventured to lash the Raiders in Lord Russell's style the worm might have turned, and the truth might have come out even at the Trial at Bar. But as the Raiders heroically resolved to go to gaol en masse rather than give away their pal at the Colonial Office, Lord Russell, who probably had a shrewd suspicion how the land lay, would not have broken his heart if the severity of his animadversions had goaded the innocent victims of the conspiracy into revealing sufficient of the truth to enable him to put Mr. Chamberlain into the cart.

MY FIRST CONNECTION. WITH CHARLES RUSSELL.

It is a far cry from the Trial at Bar to the first famous criminal trial in which Lord Russell (then plain Mr. Charles Russell) was engaged; but, oddly enough, I was even more closely engaged in that than I was in the affair of the Raid. In the early seventies, before Russell had taken silk, the Northern Echo, which I was editing, achieved no small local reputation by the success with which it had unearthed a terrible story of systematic murder. An Auckland woman, Mary Anne Cotton by name, who now enjoys the posthumous notoriety of a niche in Madame Tussaud's chamber of horrors, had been for a series of years in the habit of supplying her modest needs by the somewhat original but ghastly method of breeding children, whose lives she insured and whom she then punctually poisoned. She insured her husband's life, and poisoned him as well as his child; then replaced him by a succession of paramours whom she served in the same way after her liaison had effected its purpose in providing another child for the slaughter. I forget how many lovers and children she had poisoned. I think there were some seven or nine in all. The Northern Echo, in whose district this gruesome poisoner lived, worked up the case with energy and persistence. We had the bodies of her victims unburied and the arsenic detected. She was arrested, and for some months the West Auckland poisoning case was the great cause célèbre of the North Country. Mary Anne Cotton, who was then enceinte with the only child of hers that was permitted to live, was arrested and sent to the assizes for

THE WEST AUCKLAND POISONING CASE.

Neither the Attorney-General nor the Solicitor-General was able from prior engagements to undertake the prosecution. The ordinary course was departed from, and Lord Selborne (then Lord Chancellor) sent Mr. Charles Russell, who had not even attained the position of Q.C., to lead the case against her. It was an easy case. The facts had long been carefully pieced together in the press, but Mr. Russell did what he had to do in good style. Mary Anne Cotton was convicted and sentenced to be hanged. She claimed the privilege of her condition. A jury of matrons was impannelled, and on their report she was reprieved until her child was born in the condemned cell. Then, in due course, the grim sentence of the law was carried out. I remember as if it were yesterday beginning the "leader," after her execution, with the sentence: "Hanged! Yes. It might have been worse. She might have been boiled alive"—the ancient method of disposing of female poisoners. It was immediately after this trial that Mr. Russell attained to "silk."

HIS EARLY CAREER.

But here I must intermit my personal reminiscences briefly to glance at the early career of the famous advocate. His claims to silk were universally recognised in the profession. He had even then come to be looked upon as the coming man of the Northern Circuit, the future leader of the English Bar. It was no small achievement for the Irish solicitor, who, at the prompting of the young and ambitious lady who afterwards became his wife, burnt his boats in Ireland and came to England without friends or influence of any kind, to push his way in a strange land. Born at Newry in 1832, when eighteen years old he gained the prize for an essay on "The Age we Live in, its Tendencies and its Exigencies." He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and then articled as attorney's clerk in Belfast. He soon afterwards decided to go to London and try his fortune. While still studying law and making a living by desultory journalism, he married in 1858 Miss Mulholland, a step which had everything to do with his success and happiness in life.

Long after he had attained the summit of his career Lord Russell contributed to a London magazine a paper on "The Bar as a Profession," in which he gave the world the benefit of his wide and varied experience.

HIS STUDIES FOR THE BAR.

He advised every one who aspired to the Bar to regard a career in Parliament and on the Bench as the legitimate outcome of the success they set out to gain. "All who can ought to have University training and a University degree, and those who are not able to obtain

the

or l offi

owi

beca

Lav

day

Lav

Aft

Ro

of I

de

rep

am

un

the

th du qu

ta

po le

B

in

to

as 0 ared and ared her s child; s whom effected

aughter.
oisoned.
ll. The ooisoner
istence.
and the months at cause on, who nat was

izes for

General prosen, and Charles of Q.C., The in the n good tenced dition. report e con-nce of t were

"—the "—the s. It tained cences advosed in l upon future future ement young wife, ithout in a thteen e Age e was led as cided dying n, he had fe. areer paper

the

or to s the gain. nd a otain these advantages will find the want of them in a greater or less degree throughout their public lives."

After leaving the University a year spent in a solicitor's office is almost indispensable and most useful. Of his own studies he said:

One special subject in reading for the Bar I would name, because, in my experience, I have found it invaluable, and that is a study of the "Corpus Juris," or the body of the Civil Law. I had the signal advantage of being a student in the days when the late Sir Henry Maine was Professor of Civil Law to the Inns of Court, and under him, as in University class-rooms, we read no inconsiderable part of the Civil Law. After all, a great body of our law finds its source in the Roman law; and in the "Corpus Juris" law is systematised in a way for which our English law has no parallel. Its reading gives to the attentive student a knowledge and a grasp of principle, hardly otherwise attainable, which he will always find useful throughout his life.

What, he asks, are the considerations which should determine the choice of the Bar as a profession? He replies—a love of the profession in the first place, and ample physical health and energy in the second:—

Its pursuit involves long hours of close confinement, often under unhealthy conditions; and the instances of long-continued success at the Bar, and of lengthened usefulness on the Bench in the case of men of weak physique, are few and far between.

THE SECRET OF SUCCESS AT THE BAR.

The quality which most of all commands success at the Bar is clear-headed common sense:—

I place this far above grace of imagination, humour, subtlety, even commanding power of expression, although these have their due value. This is essentially a business, a practical age; eloquence in its proper place always commands a high premium, but the occasions for its use do not occur every day; and the taste of this age (like the taste for dry rather than for sweet champagne) is not for florid declamation, but for clear, terse, pointed, and practical speech. Common sense and clear-headedness must be the foundation, and upon these may safely be reared a superstructure where imagination and eloquence may fully play their part. In fine, business qualities, added to competent legal knowledge, form the best foundation of an enduring legal fame.

A LEGEND OF THE NORTHERN CIRCUIT.

Ability to wait he also included in the conditions of success. He had not long to wait. He was called to the Bar in Lincoln's Inn. From 1859 to 1865 he led the life of a struggling barrister, often briefless, who utilised his leisure in studying law. He went down to Liverpool and began to build up a practice in the Northern Circuit. There is a pretty legend, which as Lord Russell told it is true enough, but which has been twisted in the telling of it so as to make it quite untrue. Here is the correct version:—

I myself recollect, when I was a struggling junior of four years' standing on the Northern Circuit, dining in frugal fashion as the guest of two able young men of my own age, members of my Circuit, in one of our assize towns. They were almost in the depths of despair, and one of them was seriously considering the question of migration to the Straits Settlements; the other was thinking of going to the Indian Bar. Where are they now? One of them, as I write, Lord Herschell, has held twice the highest judicial office in the land; the other, Mr. Gully, became the leader of his Circuit, and is now Speaker of the House of Commons.

HIS EARLY SUCCESS.

It is a very pretty story, but in the newspapers of last month it was quoted as if Lord Russell himself had been in the depths of despair. That this could not be true is evident from Lord Russell's own story of his early earnings. Speaking to an interviewer from Cassell's Saturday Journal, who asked him how he was able to push his way at the beginning, he replied:—

By devilling for men in good practice. By the way, the fee for my first consultation I never got paid. It was a knotty point connected with a will made before the Statute of Wills, a opinion now, and I fancy the man who came to me with it made a chance hit. I had just come out first in the certificate list of the year, and he took me just because I stood first, and he didn't mean to pay for it. However, it led to a valuable introduction—Mr. Yates, of Liverpool—and the late Mr. Aspinall, Recorder of Liverpool, a very able man, for whom I did a great deal. My first year I made 240 guineas, and in each of the two succeeding years I doubled my income—that is to say, the second year I made 480 guineas, and the third year just about a thousand

Sir Charles Russell in a Moment of Inspiration.

A "struggling junior" who is making £1,000 a year in his third year can hardly be regarded as in such a parlous case as to justify his accompanying Herschell and Gully to the "depths of despair."

HIS FIRST HIT.

It was four years before the alleged conversation in the North Country inn that he first made his mark at the Guildhall, when before Mr. Justice Compton he persisted in defending a client after his leader—Mr. Edwin James—had thrown up his brief. "Don't you know, sir, that your leader has left the Court?" "I do," said Russell; "but there are some points which I think it my duty to lay before the jury." "Oh! go on," said the judge. "What is your name?" "Charles Russell," said the young barrister quietly, and proceeded with his speech. He did not win his case, but he extorted from the judge a confession in his charge to the jury that he had thought

Mr. Russell at first guilty of great impertinence in putting himself forward to address the jury after his leader had abandoned the case, but that he had entirely justified himself by his ability and skill.

He was not as overwhelmed with work at first, no doubt, as he was afterwards. He referred in his last speech in London to the time when he had ample leisure for the study of the fine arts, and utilised it by a punctual attendance at the theatre. In those early days he made the acquaintance of Sir Henry Irving, and declared that he preferred him in the Jeremy Diddler parts of forty years ago to the rôles which have made the Lyceum famous.

IN PARLIAMENT.

When Mr. Russell was thirty-six, he attempted to enter Parliament as Liberal candidate for the Irish borough of Dundalk. He was defeated. In 1874 he renewed the attempt, and was again defeated. It was not till 1880 that a third effort landed him in the House of Commons. He had declined a County Court Judgeship in 1872, and he refused a Puisne Judgeship which was offered him in 1882. His mind was set on higher things.

HIS "LETTERS FROM IRELAND, 1880."

His first notable political success was not parliamentary, but journalistic. In the autumn of 1880 he contributed to the Daily Telegraph a series of letters on the Land Question in Ireland, which did much to facilitate the Amendment of the Land Act in the following year. I well remember the joy that reigned in the Pall Mall Gazette office in Northumberland Street when "Charles Russell" began writing in the Daily Telegraph in support of the cause of which, up to that time, Mr. Morley had been the most distinguished journalistic advocate. Before the publication of these letters, Russell's contributions to the press had been chiefly anonymous.

HIS ARTICLES IN THE MAGAZINES.

When at Liverpool he had published a small legal book on "The Court of Passage;" but that and his "Letters from Ireland" remain his only contribution to the world of books. In his late years he contributed occasionally to the English and American magazines. In September, 1894, he published in the North American Review an eloquent tribute to his predecessor in the Lord Chief Justiceship, Lord Coleridge. He published another article—the report of an address, I believe—on "International Arbitration" in the same periodical. In the Strand of April, 1896, he wrote on "The Bar as a Profession," from which I have already quoted. To the Irish Monthly he contributed his reminiscences of John Mitchel, of '48. As a boy, Russell had once travelled from the north of Ireland to Dublin with the famous revolutionary leader, whose combination of the journalist and politician inspired him with admiration. He wrote:—

I still think him the most brilliant journalistic writer I have ever known. Occasionally in a sentence he could condense a world of argument. For instance, "The Pope may be Anti-Christ, but, Orangemen of the North, he serves no ejectments in Ulster."

It was with the spirit of Mitchel, and with much of his literary capacity, that Russell descanted in the columns of the Daily Telegraph upon the wrongs of the Irish tenant

Returning to Westminster, he found himself the most conspicuous Irish Liberal in the House of Commons. He opposed Mr. Forster's Coercion Bill, and as warmly supported Mr. Gladstone's Land Bill; but as he was not a Parnellite, his position as M.P. for Dundalk was somewhat precarious.

It was in the last months of the famous Gladstonian Parliament that I first had the privilege of meeting the famous Queen's Counsel. The occasion was so me what peculiar. I was engaged in the investigation into the criminal vice of London, the result of which was the passage of the Criminal Law Amendment Act of 1885, which raised the Age of Consent for girls from thirteen to sixteen, and materially strengthened the legal safeguards with which youth and innocence were protected against the designs of evil men. In the course of these investigations I came upon evidence as to the existence of a system of procuration, the details of which I subsequently published in the "Maiden Tribute of Modern Babylon." Before beginning my investigations I had fortified myself by taking into my confidence the late and the present Archbishops of Canterbury and Cardinal Manning. As the magnitude and infamy of the system began to unfold itself before me I communicated the essential facts under investigation to leading politicians of all parties. I told Lord Carnarvon, Mr. Morley, Mr. Balfour, Mr. Labouchere among others, and some one advised me to see Sir Charles Russell.

Sir Charles Ruisell Cross-Examining in the Pigott Trial.

He dence and : unfole sure, tell y move enter doub procu be leg own appo o'cloc assig is as at th

playi

the

"who

that gave are surpi could a hou I thi pleas Th hand Parli decid confi have I wo anon mist rely inqu secu in agen girls omit evide men most inclu were myse havi custo to w

wher

£6,0 I def Math whomafter Payr

It

and I m exan

A CHALLENGE AT HARLEY STREET.

as a o the

John

velled

nalist

e ever world

ts in

of his

umns

Irish

most

Irish

the

Com-

Mr.

rcion

as orted

one's ut as ot a

his

M.P.

was pre-

MET

ELL.

the

f the ad-

rlia-

first

lege

the

en's

The

was

at

was

e of

the

ised

een,

vith

the

ons

n of hed

fore

by

ent

As

old

der

old

ou-

Sir

He

He gave me an appointment at his well-known residence at Harley Street, and he was a deeply-interested and sympathetic listener to the story which I had to unfold. "What I want," I said, "is to make things quite sure, and I come to you as the leader of the Bar to tell you how far I have got and to ascertain what move should be done to make the case complete." He entered very kindly into the discussion, but expressed some doubt as to whether it could actually be proved that the procuration of girls under sixteen for immoral purposes could be legally proved. "If you want actual evidence with your own eyes," I said, "take my place to-night! I have an appointment with a procuress in Oxford Street at ten o'clock. She is to bring me such a girl to a place of Take my place and satisfy yourself that it assignation. Take my place and satisfy yourself that it is as I say." Sir Charles Russell was somewhat startled at the offer, and demurred that they might only be playing a game, and that there might be no intention on the part of the girl to submit. "Surely," I replied, "when you are alone with her you can satisfy yourself on that point." Sir Charles took a pinch of snuff and then gave me his answer. "Only by going to extremities, which are out of the question for me," he said. I was not surprised at his refusal. The leader of the English Bar could hardly be expected to play the rôle of a detective in a house of ill-fame. But the directness of the challenge, I think, pleased him, and from that time I had the pleasure of counting Sir Charles Russell as my friend.

THE ARMSTRONG TRIAL.

The publication of "The Maiden Tribute" forced the hand of a reluctant Government and an exhausted Parliament. The law which a Cabinet had formally decided it was impossible to pass was passed to the confusion of all its adversaries. No one would ever have known how the investigations were conducted, and I would probably have remained to this day an unknown anonymous conductor of the Pall Mall Gazette, but for a mistake committed at the very beginning of the inquiry when, in my utter inexperience, I found it necessary to rely upon agents instead of conducting the whole inquiry myself. This mistake was the omission to secure legal evidence as to the payment of money in the first case of a long series in which the agents of criminal vice had undertaken to provide girls for immoral purposes. The case might have been omitted altogether without in the least weakening the evidence as to the evils for which we had forced Parlia-ment to provide a remedy. But as things happened most fortunately for me-it had not been omitted, and its inclusion gave the enemy an opportunity of which they were prompt to avail themselves. My assistants and myself were prosecuted under the criminal charge of having conspired to abduct Eliza Armstrong from the custody of her lawful guardians, Mr. and Mrs. Armstrong to wit. The trial that followed cost the defence about £6,000, all of which was raised by public subscription. I defended myself. Sir Charles Russell, with Mr. Charles Mathews as junior, defended Rebecca Jarratt, the agent whom I had employed in the matter, while Mr. Matthews, afterwards Home Secretary, Mr. Waddy, and Mr. Horne Payne were all retained on the same side.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL IN CONSULTATION.

It was in this case that I had the best opportunity I ever had of seeing Sir Charles Russell at work in court and in consultation. We had several consultations, and I must honestly say that I would much rather be cross-examined by any Queen's counsel I ever knew, not excepting Russell himself in open court, than be in consultation with him as counsel on my own side. In court his temper was always more or less under restraint; but a consultation at the end of a long day, when he was weary and worried, was another affair. To me personally I must say he was always kindly and civil. He was not enthusiastic, but he was very direct. He clove his way to the main points like a Berserker hewing with his battle-axe through a host of foes. But when solicitor or witness would not or could not be made to see the point he was aiming at, he bridled his wrath for a moment, and then, if they continued obdurate, it burst in fury upon the unfortunate delinquent. If you have ever seen a very powerful terrier seize a very small rat and shake the life out of it, you can imagine Russell in consultation when handling some poor wretch who had got across him in some way. I shall never forget one occasion when something had not been done by a solicitor-not Sir George Lewis-in the case which Russell thought ought to have been done. Russell's brow clouded, his eye flashed, and before we knew where we were he was storming at the luckless man. I don't exactly know why, but I never see a picture of stallions fighting, with their ears laid back, their white teeth tearing at each other's flesh, their eyes flaming fire, that I don't think of Russell in consultation. He simply "savaged" the poor man amid the awed silence of the witnesses of the process. In a few minutes it was all over. The storm had spent its fury and the atmosphere became human once more. It was delightful to watch Sir George Lewis in such scenes. He was used to them. To him it was only "pretty Fanny's way." He never turned a hair, and went on with the business quite unperturbed. Russell would fume and protest, but in the end Sir George Lewis usually had his way.

HOMER SOMETIMES NODS.

When the case came on I had the opportunity for days together of seeing Sir Charles Russell side by side with the leading counsel of the day. The prosecution was led by Sir Richard Webster, assisted by Mr. Poland. Nothing either in his cross-examination or in his address to the jury could be compared for a moment to his famous demolition of Pigott before the Parnell Commission, and his six days' oration in defence of the cause of Ireland before the same body. His heart was not in the task. He was absent one day altogether from the Courts, and when he came to make his final appeal-which the foreman of the jury is said to have remarked he would not have missed hearing for half-a-crown-I was horrified to hear his eloquent demonstration that a certain thing could not have happened, in sublime unconsciousness of the fact that one of his own witnesses on the day of his absence had sworn in her evidence that it had actually taken place. Homer sometimes nods, and Sir Charles Russell was not always on the spot.

THE LICENSE OF CROSS-EXAMINATION.

I remember one passage with Russell which I always recollect as very honourable to him, although it resulted in my conviction. I asked him whether in cross-examining Mrs. Armstrong I might ask her for her marriage lines? I had admitted that in taking over Eliza from the professed procuress I had not had the father's consent. My case depended solely upon the consent of the mother, which the judge ruled was insufficient. If Eliza were illegitimate I should probably have won the case, for the consent of Mr. Armstrong would not then have been required. I asked Sir Charles Russell if I might ask Mrs. Armstrong for her marriage lines. "Have you," he replied, "any evidence that would justify you in casting such a slur upon her character?" "Nothing," I said, "except the admitted looseness of morals which prevails in that region." Then said Sir Charles sternly, "I will never be a party to putting such a question to a witness." As I have very strong views as to the evils of the license sometimes extended to cross-examination, I cheerfully acquiesced in his decision. Months afterwards, after I came out of gaol, investigation at Somerset House brought out the fact that Eliza had been born out of wedlock, and that although Mrs. Armstrong had subsequently married, Mr. Armstrong had no status as her parent or guardian. Hence the chief count against me in the judge's summingup would have disappeared, and I might have had the misfortune to escape the experience of a brief sojourn in Her Majesty's gaol. If Sir Charles erred in this matter he erred on virtue's side. On another occasion, speaking on this subject, he said:—

VIIM

Counsel are commonly supposed to revel in an opportunity of turning a witness inside out, and blackening his character, and raking up everything they can possibly find against him. It is all a mistake. No counsel who knows what he is about would think of going a single step beyond what is absolutely necessary in this way. It is wrong; it is unpopular with the Bar; and the judges are very much against it, and juries very apt to resent it.

AT THE OLD BAILEY.

I was cross-examined by Sir Richard Webster. I never was cross-examined by Sir Charles Russell. I came very close to it shortly after my liberation, when John Burns, Mr. Hyndman and others were prosecuted for their alleged share in the Trafalgar Square riots. I was a witness for the defence, and Sir Charles Russell was prosecuting counsel. I mention this in order to recall what he said to me as to his status as a cross-examiner. He had to leave before I was called. "I must go," he said to me, "and I leave you in the hands of a far more formidable cross-examiner, Mr. Poland." When I expressed my incredulity, thinking he was joking, he said, "No; Poland is far keener and closer in cross-examination than I, and so you will find it."

Mr. Poland may have been the sleuth-hound of the Treasury. Sir Charles was its Goliath of Gath. His qualities and even the defects of his qualities made him a "holy terror" to his adversaries. He was not overbearing, but he could be as imperious as Jove. His fellows at the Bar stood in awe of him. It was regarded as a terrible thing to rouse the wrath of the sleeping lion. Mr. Gill first won his laurels by daring to defy his wrath. It was an old trick of Sir Charles when he wished to embarrass an opposition counsel to pretend to go to sleep, as if the other man were too tedious to be heard. Mr. Gill, then a comparatively unknown man, laid the foundation of his present reputation by shouting across the court: "Now, Sir Charles, don't pretend you are asleep. We know that dodge and are tired of it!"

HIS REPUTATION AT THE BAR.

Mr. Justice Wills, after his death, bore witness that with all the power which the late Lord Chief Justice had wielded at the Bar and on the Bench he never used it tyrannously. He said:—

He was a most faithful colleague and most loyal to those who had to act with him. His desire to do right was beyond all praise, and if he was at times a little impatient, either with his colleagues or with his friends at the Bar, it was from his extreme quickness of comprehension; and if he ever thought he had hurt anybody in that way there was nobody so quick and so candid to own it or to regret anything of that sort, and so manly and considerate in making everything right again. There never was any real friction, either between himself and his colleagues or between himself and the members of the Bar.

HIS METHOD WITH JURIES.

As a counsel he was often eloquent, but his chief strength lay in the directness and lucidity of his exposition:—

Sir Charles Russell (said an interviewer) is of opinion that mere eloquence is of less importance than is commonly supposed. There are cases in which eloquent advocacy has its value; but he is inclined to think that the importance and the power of it are very much overrated. It is a mistake, in his judgment, to suppose that juries are very easily dazzled by oratorical freeworks. He has a great respect for juries, and he declares his emphatic belief that upon an average the ability of juries to arrive at sound judgments upon facts before them (apart from cases in which strong prejudices may exist), is quite as high as that of judges, and that it is not so easy to throw dust in their eyes as is often assumed. They don't want oratorical flourishing; they want facts put before them in a clear, telling, forcible way; and the power of thus putting facts, Sir Charles Russell believes, is of much greater importance than the ability to make a fine speech.

"And here, by the way, I may give you a very simple rule, which is really a great secret of success, in making a jury grasp the facts of your case. However intricate and complicated it may be, if you will just lay your facts before the jury in the order of their dates, you will find it will all become plain sailing."

"But, after all," declared Sir Charles Russell—and I thought it showed very strikingly the clear-headed, impartial judgment of the man—"far less depends on counsel than the public generally suppose. Verdicts generally go by the weight of evidence; and I can hardly recall a single case of any importance in which the result would have been different if other men had been engaged in it."

"THOUGHTS, THOUGHTS, THOUGHTS."

Quite recently Lord Russell delivered himself of his own judgment on the matter in the following significant sentences:—

For his own part the person who made the least impression upon him was the person who talked the most glibly. He infinitely preferred, so far as it had an effect upon his mind, to listen to a man who first stammered and hesitated for the choice of a particular word to express the particular shade of meaning which he desired to express, but who showed that thought was accompanying his attempted utterance. He would rather hear such a man than one who, never pausing for a word, gave the idea that he was washed away before the flood of his own eloquence. What was wanted was not words, words, words, but thoughts, thoughts, thoughts. A well thought well digested was worth a dozen speeches in which there was a cloud of words, but in which thought bore about the same proportion to the volume of words as in the celebrated classic case the bread bore to the quantity of sack. Thought was the first essential, and when they had achieved that position, then he thought facility of speech was a matter of comparative easy acquirement.

On another occasion he said :-

I always had a high opinion of the force of breyity in advocacy. Since I became a Judge I have had to listen. My faith in brevity is greater than it ever was before,

Nevertheless, when Lord Russell pleaded before the Parnell Commission he spoke six days on end, and the report of his speech occupies six hundred printed pages.

THE PIGOTT EXPOSURE

During the Pigott exposure it was my good fortune to meet Lord Russell almost daily. I sat on the bench immediately in front of him, Mr. Parnell sitting on one side of me, and Mr. Walter, of the Times, on the other. I had a close personal interest in the affair, for Mr. Houston

e never leagues

chief expo-

on that oposed. he; but er of it tent, to al firetres his ries to tt from high as an their ishing; e way; elieves, a fine

e rule, y grasp ated it in the plain hought lgment public ght of ortance en had

of his ression. He ind, to choice eaning th was r hear we the s own words, speech igested words, to the id bore al, and facility

vity in e the d the ages.

bench ne side er. I

THE WITNESS BOX. PIGOTT IN COMMISSION: MR. THE PARNELL INQUIRY

(Vide Key on next page.)

had tried to plant the forgeries upon me. It was therefore with no ordinary feeling that I heard the great advocate demolish the fabric of falsehood and forgery, constructed of such flimsy materials by Pigott, behind which the Times and the whole Unionist party had taken shelter for months past.

It was a thrilling moment when Sir Charles Russell, standing up to begin his cross-examination, startled every one by handing Pigott a piece of paper, saying, "Take

th

re

de

m su B ig W ex th to ga th le m he cr of T th Ja ch th Si 0 th the of les th

SO aff int he

Sp

thi

ar

Spe

box

int

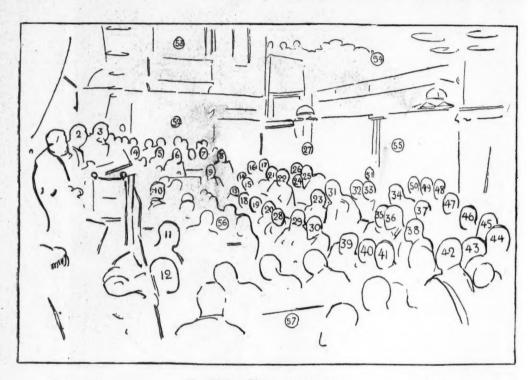

wh

the

Ch

was his

Pigott took it (says Mr. Lucy)—gazing the while at Sir Charles in blank bepuzzlement. Everybody in court glanced at every other. "He has him," a barrister whispered, turning round to me. "Write down 'livelihood,' 'likelihood,' your own name, 'proselytism,' 'Patrick Egan' and his initials, and 'hesitancy.'" Which Pigott did, smiling the while, foolishly, Key Plan to Picture on page 231.

- w. Mr. Justice Day.
- 2. Sir James Hannen, President.
- 3. Mr. Justice A. Smith.
- 4. Lord Castleross
- 5. Captain Plunkett, R.M., Chief of Irish Con- 24. Mr. Graham. stabulary.
- 6. Richard Pigott.
- 7. Mr. Callan.
- 8. Chief Superintendent of Police.
- 9. Chief Usher.
- to. Mr. Cunynghame, Secretary.
- wz. Usher.
- 12. Mr. H. D. Labouchere, M.P.
- 13. Mr. Beecham,
- 14. Mr. Shannon, Dublin Solicitor to the Times.
- us. Mr. Atkinson, Q.C.
- 16. Mr. Wheeler, Q.C.
- 17. Sir W. Phillimore, Q.C.
- 18. Mr. Buckle, Editor of the Times.
  23. Mr. Macdonald, Manager of the Times.
- 20. Mr. Soames, Solicitor to the Times.

- 21. Mr. Murphy, Q.C.
- 22. The Attorney-General, Sir Richard Webster, 40. Mr. Matthew Harris. Q.C., M.P.
- 23. Sir Henry James, Q.C., M.P.
- 25. Mr. Ronan.
- 26. Mr. Murphy, Jun.
- 27. Mr. E. C. Houston.
- 28. Mr. George Lewis, Solicitor to Mr. Parnell.
  23. Mr. C. S. Parnell, M.P.
- 30. Mr. Michael Davitt.
- 31. Sir Charles Russell, Q.C., M.P., Counsel for 49. Mr. Dillon, M.P. Mr. Parnell.
- 32. Mr. T. Harrington, M.P.
- 33. Mr. Asquith, M.P.
- 34. Mr. A. O'Connor, M.P.
- 35. Mr. Reid, Q.C., M.P.
- 36. Mr. Lockwood, Q.C., M.P.
- 37. Mr. Lionel Hart. 38. Mr. Lewis's Chief Clerk.

- 39. Mr. Biggar, M.P.
- 4r. Mr. T. M. Healy, M.P.
- 42. Mr. Redmond, M.P. 43. Mr. Sexton, M.P., Lord Mayor of Dublin.
- 44. Mr. Quinn, M.P. 45. Mr. Justin McCarthy, M.P.
- 46. Mr. H. Campbell, M.P., Private Secretary to
- Mr. Parnell.
- 47. Mr. Ruegg. 48. Mr. T. P. O'Connor, M.P.
- 50. Mr. T. D. Sullivan, M.P.
- 5t. Toby M.P.
- 52. "Specials."
- 53. Ladies' Gallery.
- 54. Public Gallery.
- 55. Press and Witnesses.
- 56. Clerks, Shorthand Writers, etc.
- 57. Reporters and Special Artists.

and with a flushed face. It will be remembered that in one of the forged letters Pigott had spelled the last word "hesitency."

"Take

at Sir

inced at turning

l,' your olishly,

ary to

It was not till the next day that the result of this spelling-bee exercise was made known. Pigott had repeated the misspelling, and had written "hesitancy" with an "e." There was a feeling of surprise and of doubt in the court-a murmur of curiosity and wonderment as we watched the doomed wretch laboriously supply the evidence of his own identity with the forger. But there was a shade of disappointment visible when, ignoring the paper in which Pigott had written the fatal word, the great advocate proceeded with his crossexamination. I described it edition after edition in the Pall Mall Gazette, being warned every now and then that my license of critical reporting would inevitably lead to my being committed for contempt of Court. The to my being committed for contempt of Court. game, however, was up. Pigott was in the toils. Another day or two and the poor wretch was to flee the country and end his existence by a pistol shot at Madrid. Of this we knew nothing; but the sympathetic heart of at least one eminent onlooker winced and shuddered as the merciless unstripping of the masks of a lifetime went on hour after hour. "It is like the Day of Judgment!" she cried. "How terrible to be compelled to confront the gaze of the world with all his lies in his right hand!"

HISTORY REPEATING ITSELF.

Next morning, before the three judges took their seats, I said to Sir Charles Russell, "Does this not remind you of anything?" "Why, no," said he. "Why do you sak?" "Because," I said, "history is repeating itself. The rôles are reversed. It is here now just as it was in the Old Bailey in the Armstrong case; it was Rebecca Jarrett then, it is Pigott now. In 1885 the Attorney-General was the victorious prosecutor; to-day, poor chap, who is so wretched in all the court? The Times is catching it now as the Pall Mall Gazette caught it then. Even in minute details the parallel works out." Sir Charles Russell replied, "'Pon my word, you're right! Only Pigott is much worse than Rebecca Jarrett;" and then, turning to the counsel by his side, he repeated the observation. The judges came in, and the work of demolition went on. His cross-examination was ruthless, searching and masterly. But it must be admitted that Pigott was easy game. He had given himself away so completely. Ample time and opportunity had been afforded the defence to prepare all the traps and pitfalls into which the wretched victim was flung naked and helpless. Sir Charles Russell revelled in the opportunity. Speaking years afterwards, he said:—

Cross-examination rarely hurts a really honest witness. People think that anything can be done by cross-examination; but, as a matter of fact, if a witness is honest, it can do very little. Speaking for myself, I can say that I never rise to cross-examine a witness with any heart or interest unless, from something I know of him from my brief or from his demeanour in the box, I have reason to believe that he is not telling the truth.

He rose to examine Pigott with plenty of heart and interest, for he knew he was confronted with the original liar upon whose forgeries the Times had traded for years.

HIS PLEA FOR HIS COUNTRY.

I did not witness the cross-examination of Le Caron, who was a much tougher witness to handle, but I heard the whole of the famous six days' oration, in which Sir Charles Russell, in calm and measured but occasionally in fervent tones, pleaded the cause of his country. He was at times a little too much of a lecturer on Irish history, but, as even the Times is now constrained to admit, "he crowned his reputation as an advocate, placing himself on the same level as Erskine or Berryer."

"I have spoken," he said, as he sat down amid the murmured applause of the crowded court, "not merely as an advocate, I have spoken for the land of my birth; but I feel—I profoundly feel—that I have been speaking, too, for and in the best interests of England, of that country where many years of my laborious life have been passed, and where I have received kindness, consideration and regard, which I should be glad to make some attempt to repay."

Not much of a peroration perhaps, but spoken from the heart. When Sir Charles sat down he buried his face in his hands as if weeping. He was roused by a note from the Bench. It was a pencilled slip of paper from the presiding judge, on which were written the words, "A great speech, worthy of a great occasion." Sir Richard.

Sir George Lewis.

A Sketch in Court.

Webster looked over his shoulder at the kindly message. "Of course," he said, "and so say we all." It was the culminating point of the forensic career of the greatest advocate of our time.

THE MAYBRICK CASE.

To speak of other cases after the Parnell Commission is an anti-climax indeed. But it would be wrong not to mention the part which he played in the Maybrick case. Mrs. Maybrick, an American lady, accused of poisoning her elderly husband, was tried at Liverpool by Mr. Justice Stephen and condemned to death. Sir Charles Russell, who was her counsel, was scandalised at the verdict. The judge was nearly in his dotage. Strong prejudice had been excited against the accused by the irrelevant fact that she had not been faithful to her marriage vows, and as the result she was condemned to die. Sir Charles Russell did all that he could to secure a revision of the sentence. Mrs. Maybrick was reprieved, and she still lingers in living death in one of our convict prisons. I was somewhat interested in her case, and had occasion to see Sir Charles on the subject. He was guarded in expressing any positive opinion as to her innocence, he was clear and emphatic as to the wrongfulness of her conviction. Over and over again he said to me, "I say nothing as to her guilt or innocence; but I do assert without hesitation that she was wrongly convicted. Even if she was guilty her guilt was not proved. No one ought to have been condemned on such evidence." He did what he could to secure her release. But whether Whig or Tory reigns in Downing Street the door of Mrs. Maybrick's cell has never been unlocked.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS'S Q.C.

Of all the other famous cases in which he was engaged it is unnecessary to speak. He was Sir George Lewis's favourite counsel, he was Mr. Labouchere's doughty champion. He was in every case that was of the first rank. The writer of his obituary notice in the Times well says:—

Each of his cases was for him, whatever might be the verdict, a victory. His courage, his thoroughness, his strenuous devotion to his client, his refentless cross-examination, his mastery of details, his sound sense, were too conspicuous to be ignored;

Lord Russell at the Derby.

one rival after another was caught up and then passed; and for nearly twenty years the history of the common law B1r was his history. In almost every case of magnitude he was engaged; and in libel actions he was indispensable.

POLITICS AND PLAY.

What was more remarkable was that during most of the years when he was crowded with briefs and overwhelmed with legal work, he was constantly busy in the House of Commons and on the platform. Russell would go anywhere to speak in support of his principles or of his party. After long days spent in court and laborious hours passed in consultations he would turn up at an out-of-the-way London meeting, and discourse for an hour on the party questions of the day. No political hack was more ready to rush off to any platform than the leader of the English Bar. He seemed to be made of iron. He crowded two busy lives into one, and then added a third of play as a corrective to the excess of the other two. He made money rapidly and squandered it as quickly. No man made more money at the Bar; very few had less of it available for subscriptions and public munificence. He loved the green table and the green turf, and although he played well and had an Irishman's good eye for a horse, you heard more of his debts than of his savings. How he managed to get through all his work and to combine it with his play only those can understand who have learned how much rest is to be found in complete change of occupation. At five o'clock he shut the door of his mind upon his briefs—put it to sleep, so to speak—and then waking up the section of his mind that attended to politics he began quite fresh to attend to his parliamentary duties. His wife spared him all domestic or business worries. She was his factotum, and she has been appointed his sole executrix.

HIS POWER OF CONCENTRATION.

The great secret of his success was in his faculty of concentration. What his hand found to do he did with all his might. His biographer in the Times says:—

One, and perhaps the chief, of the secrets of his success was the earnestness with which he plunged into every case, trivial or not. "What a fool I am; knocking myself to pieces about a two-penny-halfpenny dispute," he was heard to say as he flung his wig on the robing-room table and threw himself exhausted into a chair. And he returned to Court to repeat, do what he would, the same folly in regard to his next case, perhaps equally trumpery."

He wore himself out before his time, perhaps. But he lived to be sixty-eight, and he died of an internal complaint which had no apparent connection with excessive mental strain.

ON THE BENCH.

Of his career as a judge it is unnecessary to speak. His praises are in every mouth. He was a splendid example of that unflinching integrity which he claimed as the most important element in the character of a judge. He was impatient of the law's delays, and rode roughshod over many time-honoured traditions which impeded the dispatch of business. He was an honest man, and his last crusade was an attempt to extirpate the practice of giving secret commissions which is eating like dry rot into our commercial integrity. He made a famous protest on behalf of integrity in business, even in the business of the financier and company promoter, when he welcomed the present Lord Mayor to the Law Courts. Everywhere on the Bench and off the Bench he was punctual in the discharge of duty and prompt to respond to all appeals There have been few more characteristic s ories told of him than that of his sermon on punctuality to the London Irish Football Club:

In October, 1898, when that club was matched to play Hammersmith Club, Lord Russell was invited and consented to kick off the ball. On arriving punctually at the hour appointed he found that some of the members of the London Irish team were not on the ground. He waited patiently for some ten or fifteen minutes until all the players were assembled, and then called up Mr. Dyas, the captain of the London Irish, and delivered the following homily: "Captain Dyas and members of the London Irish Football Club. I desire to point out to you that one of your cardinal rules in life should be punctuality, Unless you study that rule, whether in business or play, you will never be successful men, and I hope that you will take to heart the lesson I am now reading you." The Lord Chief Justice, with the utmost gravity, then proceeded to kick off the ball.

There was a wonderfully imperturbable expression of utmost gravity about his massive and impressive features. He was as witty as he was wise, and the papers have been printing some of his bon mots, but they cannot recall the genial smile and hearty simplicity which characterised the man.

last s of 180 This does n pass, to Irel on the great a ing for of self munity many life-ble hatefu friends party,

die no men v

rob it of me

necess

Of

sages The f

The great In thi mann which Nev

conjun

to-day

very h

with a centre

librari once o From known earth but, ha -law, well a civilise Oueen Canad moder system in thos law w Spanis Hindu and b possibi hope th a great first ar fame o flock, and to dignity In thi

> Tham He ignore

is usu

Imper

be to

A HOME RULE PERORATION.

Of his oratory not much will survive. But two passages may be quoted as specimens of his different styles. The first is the peroration with which he concluded his last speech on the third reading of the Home Rule Bill of 1803. He said:—

This Bill may fail to-day, but there is not a man opposite who does not believe in his heart of hearts that it must ultimately pass. . . . I do not believe this Bill will bring the millennium to Ireland. Much will depend on the Irish people themselveson their courage, resolution and firmness, on their grasp of the great and noble duties that devolve upon them in the new era opening for their country, to teach all classes to use that priceless gift of self-government, not for a section but for the whole community. The claim of Ireland to self-government has survived many calamities. It has survived emigration, which drained the life-blood of the country; it has survived coercion in all its hateful moods and tenses; it has survived the mistakes of its friends. It is vain to hope that, espoused by a great historic party, the great instrument of popular reform in the past, it will die now; and grave is the responsibility of the party and the men who would delay this settlement, who would by that delay rob it of all its grace, and relegate it to that long category of measures dealing with Ireland which were yielded from necessity and not from a willing sense of justice.

A LAW SCHOOL FOR LONDON.

The other passage is that with which he closed his great plea for the reform of our system of legal education. In this he speaks as a lawyer and as a Londoner, in a manner worthy of his profession and of the great city in which he spent so much of his life:—

Never at any time, in any State, has there existed such a conjunction of circumstances as marks London pre-eminently to-day as the seat of a great school of law. We are here at the very heart of things, where the pulse of dominion beats strongest, with a population larger than that of many kingdoms—a great centre of commerce, of art, and of literature, with countless libraries, the rich depository of ancient records, and the seat at once of the higher judiciary, of Parliament and of the Sovereign. From this point is governed the greatest Empire the world has known. From our midst go forth to the uttermost ends of the earth not merely those who symbolise the majesty of power, but, happily with them, those who represent the majesty of law -law, without which power is but tyranny. It has been well and truly said that there is hardly any system of civilised law which does not govern the legal relations of the Queen's subjects in some portion of the Empire. In parts of Canada French law, older than the First Empire, modified by modern codification, prevails—in other parts, the English system; in Australia, English law modified by home legislation in those self-governing communities; in parts of Africa, Roman law with Dutch modifications; in the West Indian colonies, Spanish law modified by local customs; in India, now the Hindu, now the Mahomedan law, tempered by local custom and by local legislation. Surely these facts suggest great possibilities and great responsibilities. Is it an idle dream to hope that, even in our day and generation, there may here arise a great school of law worthy of our time, worthy of one of the first and noblest of human sciences, to which, attracted by the fame of its teaching, students from all parts of the world may flock, and from which shall go forth men to practice, to teach, and to administer the law with a true and high ideal of the dignity of their mission?

In this passage Lord Russell struck a higher note than is usually found in his oratory. He was no high-fallutin Imperialist; but no man of his imagination could fail to be touched by the position of London—the city on the Thames whose goings out are to the ends of the earth.

ANGLO-AMERICAN ARBITRATOR.

He was stoutly opposed to Anglo-Saxondom, which ignored the Irish, Scotch, etc., and protested vehemently against Lady Randolph Churchill's "Anglo-Saxon" as involving a recognition of the hated fallacy that all English-speaking men were Anglo-Saxon. But he was a good English-speaking man, and one of the few notable Englishmen who are as well known in America as in Britain. He took a leading part in two great international arbitrations—as counsel in the Behring Sea dispute and as arbitrator in the Venezuelan affair. A few months since I met one who had shared with him the responsibilities of adjudicating that complicated dispute. I asked him how he got on with Lord Russell. "He is a very able man," he said, "but very vehement, and sometimes even more than vehement. We had great trouble to arrive at a unanimous award. He was very difficult. On one occasion he slammed-to the atlas in a Lord Russell Speaking at the Lord Mayor's Banquet.

HIS DEVOTION TO ARBITRATION.

He would probably have been nominated as one of the picked arbitrators whose names will have to be placed on the Roster of the International Tribunal constituted by the Hague Convention. He was a warm supporter of the principle of International arbitration, and was the only judge, if I remember aright, who came forward and addressed a public meeting in support of the Peace Crusade. He was much taken with M. de Nelidoff's suggestion of borrowing the institution of seconds from the practice of the duello as a means of averting war. His address to the Law Congress at Saratoga was a noble and eloquent plea for the establishment of peace by mediation and arbitration as the necessary crown of the work of civilisation. He said:—

What, indeed, is true civilisation? By its fruit you shall know it. It is not dominion, wealth, material luxury—nay, not even a great literature and education widespread—good though rotest ess of comed where in the opeals eristic uality play ited to ointed team

ten or d then

, and mbers

out to ality.

u will heart

astice,

on of

tures.

have

nnot

vhich

1.

gh he

for a avings.

o como have change

of his

-and

ded to

amen-

siness

en ap-ulty of

d with

ess was vial or bout a e flung nausted

that he equally

But he

com-

essive

. His

ample s the

He hshod

d the ice of t into

YUM

these things be. Civilisation is not a veneer; it must penetrate to the very heart and core of societies of men. Its true signs are thought for the poor and suffering, chivalrous regard and respect for woman, the frank recognition of human brotherhood, irrespective of race or colour or nation or religion, the narrowing of the domain of mere force as a governing factor in the world, the love of ordered freedom, abhorrence of what is mean and cruel and vile, ceaseless devotion to the claims of Justice. Civilisation in that, its true, its highest sense, must make for Peace.

A GOOD ANGLO-AMERICAN.

Lord Russell was ever strenuous for the strengthening of the friendly relations between Americans and British. In the same speech he concluded by appealing to the English-speaking nations to unite to promote the peace of mankind. He said:—

But if this influence is to be fully felt, they must work together in cordial friendship, each people in its own sphere of action. If they have great power they have also great responsibility. No cause they espouse can fail; no cause they oppose can triumph. The future is, in large part, theirs. They have the making of history in the times that are to come. The greatest calamity that could befall would be strife which should divide them. Let us pray that this shall never be. Let us pray that they, always self-respecting, each in honour upholding its own flag, safeguarding its own heritage of right, and respecting the rights of others, each in its own way fulfilling its high national destiny, shall yet work in harmony for the progress and the peace of the world.

A PAPIST CHIEF JUSTICE.

Lord Russell, it is noted with some satisfaction, was the first Roman Catholic who held the post of Chiet Justice since the Reformation. Statutory disabilities barred the way to the Woolsack. A Papist can be a Prime Minister, but he cannot be Lord Chancellor. But even the bitterest bigot of Orange Belfast would in vain endeavour to discover in the career of Lord Russell, either at the Bench or the Bar, any instance in which the religious faith of the Lord Chief Justice deflected his sense of justice, or had results detrimental to the interests of Britain or of Protestantism.

The papers have teemed with ana about Lord Russell. Journalistic chroniclers have told us about his unique collection of snuff-boxes, and they have also told us where he bought the favourite mixture, how much he paid for it, and the exact number of pounds he consumed every month. He was fond of riding, and attributed much of his robust health to the hour which he was wont to spend on horseback before he went into Court.

TRIBUTES TO HIS MEMORY.

His fellows on the Bench and his former comrades at the Bar have vied with each other in paying tribute to the sterling qualities of Lord Russell. Mr. Justice Wright acclaimed him not only as the greatest advocate of our time, but "as a worthy successor of a great line of Chief Justices of this country, a man of singular force, power, and eloquence, combined with single-minded devotion to duty and the public good. He was in private as in public life the kindliest and most tolerant of men." On the Northern Circuit, said Mr. Justice Kennedy, "a kinder friend, a more generous opponent, and a brighter example of what a leader should be will not be found among those who figure in the records of that circuit." Mr. Justice Darling, who had fought two hotly-contested political elections with him when he was Sir Charles Russell, member for South Hackney, said:—

In those contests I have over and over again recognised how magnanimous an opponent he was. Nobody knew better than himself that he was dealing with a much younger and with a far weaker man, but he never took any advantage of that fact, but, on the other hand, he treated me with a magnanimity which could not be surpassed.

These tributes from the Bench were warmly echoed from the Bar. Sir E. Clarke, the only man left among our advocates with whom he may be compared, said:—

aj

to rep

Colon

althou

conte

whom differs preced

the pr

all se

of sch

as to ferred

of the

st

Lord Russell was for years my companion and my rival at the Bar, sometimes my antagonist, and always my friend. When Charles Russell was at the Bar we were all very proud of him. He was a great advocate, an intrepid advocate, sparing nothing to serve his client, a man of great energy, of inexhaustible industry, a brilliant speaker, and one whose oratory was informed and heightened by literary associations. And when he passed from our ranks and became a judge we were in no way surprised to find that he displayed the even greater qualities required of a judge. There was still the same energy, the same intrepid desire that justice should be done, and he had in him all the qualities of a great judge. His death is a national loss.

HIS RELATIONS WITH JOURNALISTS.

Journalists have vied with judges and Q.C.'s in praising this kindly heart and helpful brain. For my part I ever found him most sympathetic. In the long talks we have had in his chambers and elsewhere he never seemed hurried or worried. He was simple and unceremonious in his ways, receiving visitors in his shirtsleeves, and sharing with them his sandwich or his tea. He was always ready to oblige, and he always seemed glad to see his friends. Many pleasant stories are told of the way in which he rendered kindly services to those who stood in need of help. From the heir to the throne to the crossing-sweeper, the death of Lord Russell of Killowen brought the sense of personal loss.

HIS HATRED OF THE WAR.

Lord Russell's closing years were darkened by the shadow of national crime which has fallen athwart our unhappy land. He was not merely Lord Chief Justice in name, there was in him from his boyhood an ineradicable love of justice—especially of national justice. And it was to him a matter of deep grief and ill-repressed indignation that the country in which he was the foremost representative of justice should have become in the eyes of all men the most conspicuous representative of injustice. His high office sealed his lips. He could not publicly denounce the infamy of the pretexts by which a sophistical press had glozed over the essential villainy of the war now being waged in South Africa. But to those to whom he could speak without the reserve imposed by his high station, he expressed himself with a passion of noble wrath against a shameless crime in terms which bore eloquent testimony at once to his generous enthusiasm and his unerring judgment. Nor was he in this matter without sympathisers on the Bench, where happily the sentiment of justice is not altogether obscured by the clamour of the mob or the cant of the press.

HIS DEATH.

Lord Russell died with the praises of all men surrounding his memory. Bramwell Booth wrote me in heartfelt sorrow expressing his conviction that the Lord Chief Justice, who had always been a good friend of the Salvation Army, was a deeply religious man who sincerely endeavoured to do the right. And on the day after his death Cardinal Vaughan sent round to his clergy the following letter:—

The prayers of the clergy and of the faithful are earnestly requested for the repose of the soul of Lord Russell of Killowen, Lord Chief Justice of England, a faithful son of the Church, who, after a life of distinguished public service, died yesterday fortified by the Holy Sacraments.

Requiescat in pace.

OUR PORTFOLIO OF PICTURES.

I CONTINUE to receive from all parts of the world appreciative letters from correspondents of every station in praise of our portfolios. We have had again to reprint No. I, the demand for which is spreading to the Colonies and to India. No. 2 we have also had to reprint, although no systematic effort has been made to bring its contents before the attention of the Sunday Schools, for whom it was primarily designed. The third portfolio differs in character from either of those which have preceded it. Instead of using six or twelve pictures with the presentation plate, I have published eighteen pictures, all selected with the special object of the decoration of schoolrooms. I thought it well to try the experiment as to whether the six extra pictures would not be preferred to one presentation plate; but to meet the views the pictures in the portfolio, I have issued with portfolio No. 3 a coupon entitling the holder to purchase, if he desires, a beautiful plate of Sir Joshua Reynolds's "Cherub Choir." (See the frontispiece to this magazine.) The pictures in No. 3 portfolio are specially designed for the use of teachers in elementary schools. They consist exclusively of animal subjects. The portfolio contains several of the best-known specimens of Landseer, and three of Mme. Ronner's inimitable cats and kittens, the right to reproduce which was graciously conveyed to me by the artist herself. Besides the Landseers and the Ronners, the portfolio contains pictures by T. Sidney Cooper, R.A., H. W. B. Davis, R.A., R. W. Macbeth, R.A., Paul Potter, J. H. Herring, and F. R. Lee.

Of the whole number, that which is my favourite is the charming picture of the anxious mother, in which the

MATERNAL ANXIETY.

After the painting by Edwin Douglas.

nity which

y echoed eft among said: rival at the id. When id of him, ng nothing exhaustible

nd of him, and nothing exhaustible is informed he passed y surprised quired of a le intrepid im all the second control of the passed the introduced of the passed the second control of the passed the passed to the passed the passed to the passed the passed to the passed to the passed the passed to the passed to the passed the passed to t

2.C.'s in
For my
the long where he nple and his shirtr his tea.
s seemed are told to those he throne his sell of

by the wart our ustice in adicable And it epressed he forene in the tative of ould not which a llainy of to those osed by ssion of s which ous ens he in where bscured s. arroundneartfelt d Chief e Salvaincerely fter his rgy the arnestly illowen, Church, esterday

A STUDY IN BLACK AND WHITE.

After the painting by Madame H. Ronner, R.I.

LANDSCAPE AND CATTLE.

After the painting by T. Sidney Cooper, R.A.

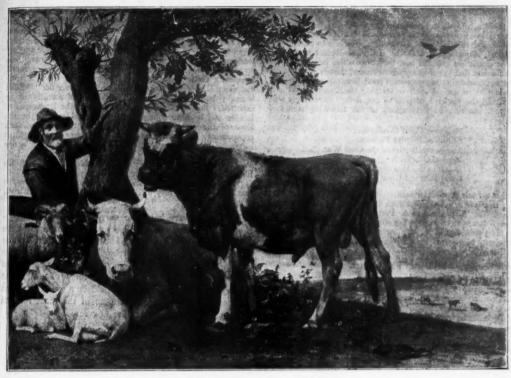

238

sch

rep

mar fed

pict arti whi diffi the al. c son wor Ou Loc inc bea eve Pol is t stu has adı

THE YOUNG BULL.

After the painting by Paul Potter.

mare in the shafts of a cart, from which turnips are being fed to a flock of sheep, watches with anxious solicitude her foal, which is face to face with the bellwether of the flock. The choice of pictures, especially of animal pictures, is one in which people differ widely; and one artistic friend in Paris sent me a list of suggestions upon which I am very sorry not to be able to act. It is a difficult thing to hit the happy mean between the ideal of the artist and the taste of the common people. Artists al: o are often singularly oblivious of the fact that some of the pictures, which they prize most highly on account of their colouring and technique, are worthless for the purposes of reproduction by a p ocess which does not permit of the use of colour. Our Portfolio includes a wide range of animal life. Looking over the eighteen pictures, I find that they include pictures of horses, donkeys, dogs, cats, lions, bears, cattle, sheep, apes, geese, and pigeons. Nearly every picture tells its story. Landseer's picture of the Polar bears desecrating the icy grave of an Arctic explorer is the only one which touches a tragic note. Landseer's study of a lion stands by itself as the only picture which has no story to tell, and even that would afford an admirable text for any teacher who wished to interest his scholars in the king of beasts. Cats are perhaps overrepresented, but the cat is of all animals that with which children first become acquainted. Children as a rule like animal pictures best of all, and for the decoration of rooms, whether children's bed-rooms or nurseries or school-rooms, this series of eighteen pictures will be found invaluable.

Our fourth Portfolio will be devoted to types of female beauty. The presentation plate will be Mr. Edward Hughes's celebrated portrait of the Princess of Wales, and there will be twelve pictures reproducing some of the most famous paintings of beautiful women by English and foreign artists. For the portfolios which are to follow I shall be very glad to receive suggestions from my readers, but I beg my correspondents to bear in mind the fact that very few of the modern pictures exhibited in recent Academies are available for reproduction, as the right is usually sold by the artist to the various photographic or autotype companies, which produce them at prices varying from 5s. to a guinea each. It is therefore impossible to reproduce them in a portfolio in which we sell six or twelve pictures for a shilling. Among other suggestions which I have received is the following one from a school-teacher in Kent, who writes as follows :-

"I was very please I to see the Portfolio of Pictures No. 1. The No. 3 will be very welcome in elementary schools. I hope to have a frame made to display one picture at a time, as my wall space is limited.

"If you will kindly allow me to suggest it, the next thing required is as many historical pictures as possible. By the latest Code of Regulations issued by the Board of Education all scholars in elementary schools are required to learn English history, and this historical knowledge is largely to consist of a thorough acquaintance with the Historical Reader used. No doubt publishers give the best they can for the money, but the fact remains that the ordinary school-reader, though well written, does not contain so many or such good illustrations as teachers would like to see. I shall be teaching the Stuart Period next year, and the reader I propose to use, though exceedingly well written, contains no illustrations of the following scenes or subjects:-

> Hampton Court Conference. Sailing of Pilgrim Fathers. Any of the Battles of the Civil War. Trial of Charles I. Dutch in the Medway. Great Fire and Great Plague and many others of importance.

"If these or a selection from them could be done on cardboard like 'The Masterpiece Portfolio No. I,' I believe they would have a large sale, as there are very few historical pictures published in a cheap form We want a large number of cheap pictures rather than a few expensive ones.-Yours S. MEAD." sincerely.

A Scotch subscriber in Falkirk writes :-

"I have no doubt that you will be receiving many letters of congratulation about your beautiful portfolios, but I feel I must not, on that account, refrain from telling you the pleasure they have been to me. When first I saw No. 1, I thought it was really too good to be true that all these were to be had for one shilling.

For long I had myself wished for the 'Golden Stairs' for my study. Now, thought I, there is no necessity for working people to disfigure their walls and distort their minds with the cheap German trash that is alas! only too common. Here is a chance for them to get specimens of real art. So I took Portfolio No. 1 to my working-men's club, hung a string across the hall, and strung them up to the level of the eye. It was very interesting to go round them with the men and hear their comments. I was a trifle disappointed that they were not in raptures over the 'Golden Stairs'; but, when I think of it, that was scarcely to be expected. But at once they were attracted by the landscapes of Leader and of Constable. These they considered to be the finest of the set; and I was pleased that they showed such appreciation. When the viewing time was over I gave a short lecture on the pictures and their artists, concluding with a few words on the advantages of fine pictures in a house. Last Wednesday I did the same with Portfolio No. 2. I hope to do likewise with the others as they come out.
"I know that some already have purchased the pictures, so that, thanks to you, they will have brighter homes, and, I trust, happier hearts."

I shall be very happy to carry out suitable suggestions in time to come. Several correspondents have suggested a Portfolio devoted to pictures of the most famous statues. Photographs of statues reproduce admirably, but there is a difficulty in the question of drapery. Personally I do not feel this difficulty; but there is no doubt that there would be a great outcry at the reproduction of views of some of the most famous statues in the Vatican or in the Louvre.

MAN PROPOSES AND GOD DISPOSES.

After the painting by Sir Edwin Landseer, R.A.

the the polit

The

but 1

for story

in la

and mar

tran

of th facto

cons

Chri

Pek

of

end

Hol

with they the the puis Tar of who Rep with Rhi Dut Mos stur mis up con and T the con long hen hor the clai Rus to 1 larg held WOL

THE TOPIC OF THE MONTH.

INTERNATIONALISM AT PEKIN AND PARIS.

THE chief event of last month recalls Tasso's famous epic, in which the poetic genius of the sixteenth century commemorated in deathless verse the political and military achievements of the first Crusaders. The world has been thinking, not of Jerusalem Delivered, but the Legations of Pekin relieved. But it is impossible for the thoughtful observer not to be reminded of the story of Godfrey's exploits when following the telegrams in last month's papers. Eight hundred years have come and gone, but the problem before mankind has undergone marvellously little change. The seat of war has been transferred from the extreme West to the extreme East of the Asiatic continent-and that is all. All the other factors remain the same. On one side Asia, heathen, conservative, defiant. On the other, Europe, nominally Christian, temporarily united, and practically piratical. Pekin takes the place of Jerusalem. Kaiser William of Berlin replaces Pope Urban the Second. The endangered Legations are the modern substitute for the Holy Sepulchre.

JERUSALEM EIGHT HUNDRED YEARS AGO.

The first canto in the "Jerusalem Delivered" opens with a description of the allied hosts of the Crusaders as they passed in battle array before Godfrey of Bouillon on the eve of the advance upon the Holy City. First came the French, followed by the valiant Normans and the puissant retainers of Godfrey. After them again came Tancred with the horsemen of Champagne, and Raymond of Toulouse and Stephen of Amboise with infantry, whose descendants are to-day all citizens of the French Republic, one and indivisible. After them came Guelph with his hardy Germans from the lands between the Rhine and the Danube; then Robert with the stout Dutchmen, and their kinsmen from the banks of the Moselle. The English followed, with them a band of sturdy Irish. A small company of Greeks and a miscellaneous brigade of adventurers of all lands brought up the rear of the cavalry division. The foot soldiers consisted of Frenchmen under different banners, Swiss, and lastly the Italians under the standard of St. Peter.

PEKIN TO-DAY.

The international force mustered at the ocean gate of the Chinese Empire is even more heterogeneous in its composition than the First Crusade. The French are no longer so pre-eminent in pride of place. Eight centuries hence they supplied the most of the fighting men, both horse and foot. Theirs was the supreme command and the post of honour in the field. To-day they can only claim a leading place by virtue of their alliance with Russia. The Russians in this march on Pekin correspond to the French under Godfrey.* Their contingent is the largest of the European levies. Their General Linevitch held the chief command, and judging from the killed and wounded on them has fallen the brunt of the fighting. In the Crusades of the West, the Russians, being opposed to the Pope of Rome, took no part. In the Crusaders' camp the Japanese found no place. Eight hundred years ago the Americans were non-existent. But, as of old, the English are there with the sturdy Irish, and so are the Germans and the Italians. The Austrians and Belgians are coming, and how many more who can say?

THE NEW INTERNATIONALISM.

The new Internationalism, it is evident, is more broadly based than the old. No theological or ecclesiastical shibboleth is common to the motley host which is now in occupation of the capital of China. They are men of all continents, of all religions, and of all races. They are not even all white men. England has brought to the field the dusky legions of the land of Aurungzebe. The Mikado sends the swarthy Japanese, who are darker than the Chinese with whom they fight. There are contingents from Australia, and now troops are being hurried up from Africa. South America is the only continent which has not sent its sons to do battle against the Chinese.

A GODFREY OF THE TWENTIETH CENTURY?

The most interesting international event was not the relief of the Legations, but the appointment of Count Waldersee to be commander-in-chief of the Allied forces. Here again the newspapers remind us of Tasso. Before the advance on Jerusalem, Peter the Hermit harangued the Crusaders in terms which might have been quoted without alteration in the German despatch suggesting the appointment of Count Waldersee. "Wise men," said Peter, "learn from past mistakes how to avoid future evils. There have past mistakes how to avoid future evils. been strifes and discords among you, there has been illmanagement, lives and battles have been lost for want of mutual support which could easily have been rendered. How is it that these things have arisen? I believe they have their origin in the fact that power and authority have been divided, instead of being exercised by one. When all command, none obey. An army should be like the body-having many members but one head. Create now a head to rule and govern the rest. Choose one and give him supreme power." Thus adjured, the Crusaders, being moved by Divine Grace, with perfect concord chose Godfrey to be their leader. The choice of Count Waldersee was not quite so enthusiastically unanimous. But he was chosen, and that without a dissenting voice.

HOW COUNT WALDERSEE WAS APPOINTED.

How it came to pass that a Prussian officer was made Generalissimo of the federated hosts of Western civilisation is not quite clear. The Kaiser, who is an adroit and not overscrupulous wire-puller, endeavoured to palm the nomination off upon the world as due to the initiative of the Tsar. The Russians stoutly deny that the Tsar is responsible for the selection of the Prussian, and a lively remembrance of the way in which the Kaiser jockeyed the Tsar about Kiao Chau begets a shrewd suspicion that it was William and not Nicholas who took the lead in suggesting the appointment of Count Waldersee. The French were furious. M. Delcassé could not stand out against all the other Powers, but the relations between the new Generalissimo and the French army in the Far East will not be finally adjusted till his arrival. It is the first time since Sedan that a German officer has had French troops under his command. Count Waldersee will be my study.

ple to disp German e for them o. I to my rung them go round as a trifle Golden ely to be

o be the

wed such

e a short

th a few se. Last

ope to do

ctures, so

l, I trust,

suggests have ne most produce stion of

y; but utcry at famous

* The Allied forces which took part in forcing the entry to Pekin consisted of:—British, 1,832 infantry, 400 cavalry, 13 guns; Russian, 3,700 infantry, 180 cavalry, 22 guns; French, 400 marines and 18 guns; Japanese, 6,600 infantry, 230 cavalry, 430 engineers, 53 guns; American, 1,600 infantry, 150 marines, 43 cavalry, 6 guns.

less than human if he does not allow his consciousness of the difficult relations between Berlin and Paris to influence him in the dispositions which he makes of the international forces under his command. Possibly the Germans and the French may get on together as well as the French and the English did at the Crimea, or as the Russians and the Japaness appear to be getting on now at Pekin. The Sacrament of Blood is often the cement of the alliance of nations.

THE MARCH ON PEKIN.

The appointment of Count Waldersee was announced "in order to put an end to the differences between the Powers with regard to the command in chief." But the allies appear to have been able to compose their differences on the spot sufficiently well to make up a composite force capable of clearing a passage to Pekin and delivering the Legations. At the beginning of August they put together a mixed force of 12,000 men, which began at once an advance from Tientsin for the relief of the Legations. The Chinese mustered in force to resist their advance. The country was flooded. Progress was impeded owing to lack of transport. Some of the Allies appear to have believed that every Chinaman was an enemy to be shot at sight. The result was that the coolies who would have flocked to the camp of the invaders kept at a distance, and the supply and transport service suffered. On Sunday, August 5th, was fought the battle of Peitsang, which terminated in a victory for the Allies. The Chinese made a stout resistance and decimated their assailants. The Allied loss in killed and wounded was returned at 1,130, of whom only 120 were British. The most of the casualties were Russians and Japanese.

THE RELIEF OF THE LEGATIONS.

From Peitsang the relieving force made its way to Yangtsun, where the Chinese made a slight stand, but no more serious fighting took place. Pekin was reached on the 14th. The Chinese had recommenced their attack on the Legations. Food was scarce and shells were plentiful. Relief came just in time. The Allied force Russian, Japanese, Pritish, Indian, French and American—seized the Chinese capital and looted it. The Japanese are said to have prevented the destruction of the Imperial Palace, but the rest of the city appears to have been given up to the plunderer. The Legations were much battered. But, with the exception of the German Ambassador, who was killed in a riot, none of the European Ministers were harmed. The Empress had fled, carrying with her the Emperor, and sacrificing before she left four or five members of the Tsengli Yamen, whom she regarded as being too European. Prince Tuan is reported to have been killed. The Empress-who seems to be as much mistress of the situation as ever-is said to have directed the exodus of the Government from Pekin to Singan or Segan, the ancient capital of China in the days before Christ. At Singan she will be 800 miles away from the coast-practically inaccessible and unassailable. General Gordon repeatedly urged upon the Chinese the impolicy of making Pekin their seat of Government. "Your queen bee," he said, in his quaint, picturesque way, "sits at the mouth of the hive at the mercy of every passer-by." China will never be safe from foreign dictation until her capital is removed to the interior. In view of the escape of the Empress to a practically inaccessible retreat, the discussions about the method of punishing her are somewhat premature, to say the least.

WHAT NEXT?

What is to happen next no one exactly knows. It was probable that Russia from conviction, America by tradition, and Britain from policy, would endeavour to minimise the extent of international interference in China. But no one was prepared for Russia's prompt declaration that the mission of the international force terminated with the relief of the Legations. Lord Salisbury, remembering how our army is Ladysmithed in Africa, is said to have made no secret of his desire to patch up any kind of modus vivendi in China. But these two Powers cannot leave Germany out of their reckoning. A German ambassador has been killed. A German Field-Marshal is on his way out to avenge him. Vengeance in the modern mouth usually means plunder. To avenge two missionaries the Kaiser seized Kiao Chau: to avenge his ambassador he will probably seize something else. Russia, although disposed to argue that there is no more need for international action, has her own particular war to wage with China. The Chinese attacked Russia, declared war against her, and endeavoured to invade her territory. They tore up her railway and brought down upon them the counter-attack, the immediate result of which has been to make the south bank of the Amoor Russian territory, and to establish the Russians as conquerors along the whole line of the Manchurian railway up to and including Niuchwang.

OUR POSITION ON THE YANGTSE.

In Shanghai we have landed troops from India. France is landing a small contingent or kind of corporal's guard in order to maintain her protest against any isolated action by Britain in the Yangtse Valley. So many men-of-war are mustering at Shanghai that their crews alone could furnish an army of 7,000 men. But the citizens still feel unsafe and clamour for a garrison of 15,000 men. There is a general suspicion among the other Powers that John Bull intends to seize the lion's share by appropriating the Yangtse Valley, and as there is an equally general determination to prevent any such arrangement, the note of the International Concert is not exactly that of profound harmony.

THE INITIATIVE OF RUSSIA.

Russia has taken the initiative in endeavouring to minimise the mischief that might result from a prolonged international occupation of Pekin. The Tsar has declared that in his opinion the rescue of the Legations completes the mandate of the international force, and the sooner the Chinese Government is re-established in Pekin the better. This proposal he appears to have submitted in the first instance to the American Government. President McKinley's Cabinet replied that, while for their own part they thought that it would be well if the Powers agreed to maintain the international occupation of Pekin until the new Government was constituted, it was not the opinion of the United States Government that it would be well to insist upon a continued occupation unless the Powers were unanimous. As Russia had definitely declared in favour of retiring, America was not prepared to insist upon the prolongation of the occupation in the face of the impossibility of unanimity on the part of the Powers. America having joined Russia in advocating a retirement from Pekin, the o her Powers were in a difficult position. At the moment of writing the decision of the Triple Alliance is in doubt. The Kaiser naturally dislikes the proposal to declare the campaign ended before the arrival of Count Waldersee. But the members of the Triple

Allia

Pekin No o more filled and and and 1 eces quest for th allied ask one o the s surpr made

The decide in the cerning These n or es

of poi

ment

which

Intespecial
The

It re
The
The far as determ

Article (Article on a sthe pare Perma

Comm deem knowl

Power

Comn

The being charac

Alliance could hardly insist upon maintaining the occupation of Pekin against the wish of Russia.

IS RETIREMENT POSSIBLE?

It is one thing, however, to decree the evacuation of Pekin, and it is altogether another thing to carry it out. No one could have decreed the evacuation of Egypt more honestly than Mr. Gladstone, but he utterly filed to withdraw the English garrison from Cairo and Alexandria. It is doubtful whether the Empress and her Ministers will consent to return to Pekin; and if they refuse, the occupation will almost of recessity be continued for some time to come. The question as to what should be done next is one that calls for the exercise of the combined statesmanship of all the allied Powers. This being the case, it is worth while to ask whether the time has not come for applying one of the recommendations of the Hague Conference to the settlement of the Chinese question. It may be a surprise to many people to hear that due provision was made by the Hague Conference for the amicable settlement of questions such as this which has arisen in China, which do not admit of a reference to arbitration.

WHY NOT APPOINT A COMMISSION D'ENQUÊTE?

The clauses which might be invoked for the purpose of deciding what should be done in China are Articles 9-14 in the third section of the Convention, entitled "Concerning International Commissions of Investigation." These clauses are as follows :-

ARTICLE 9.

In disputes of an international order affecting neither honour nor essential interests, and arising from a different appreciation of points of fact, the signatory Powers consider it useful that the parties which have not been able to arrive at an agreement by ordinary diplomatic methods, should appoint, in so far as circumstances shall permit, an international commission of investigation, whose duty it shall be to facilitate the settlement of these disputes by clearing up, by an impartial and conscientious examination, questions of fact.

ARTICLE 10.

International commissions of investigation are constituted by special agreement between the disputing parties.

The agreement to investigate specifies the facts to be examined, and the extent of the powers of the commissioners.

It regulates the procedure.

The investigation takes place "contradictorily."

The form of procedure and the times to be adhered to, in so far as they are not fixed by the agreement to investigate, are determined by the commission itself.

ARTICLE II.

International commissions of investigation are constituted, unless stipulated to the contrary, after the manner laid down by Article 32 of the present Convention.

(Article 32. The functions of an arbitrator may be conferred on a single arbitrator, or on several, nominated at the will of the parties or chosen by them amongst the members of the Permanent Court of Arbitration established by the present Act.)

ARTICLE 12.

The Powers in dispute undertake to furnish the International Commission of Investigation, to the fullest extent which they deem possible, all the means and facilities necessary for a thorough knowledge and accurate appreciation of the facts in quistion.

ARTICLE 13.

The International Commission of Investigation presents to the Powers in dispute its report signed by all the members of the Commission.

ARTICLE 14.

The report of the International Commission of Investigation, being limited to the declaration of facts, has in no wise the character of an arbitral award. It leaves the Powers in dispute complete freedom as to the consequences they will give to this declaration.

ITS ADVANTAGES.

The advisability of resorting to International Commissions of Inquiry has been already raised by one leading member of the Hague Conference, who brought it before the attention of Mr. Secretary Hay at Washington. It is obvious on the face of it that the Chinese question is one peculiarly suited for the use of this machinery. It is a dispute of an international order, which affects neither the honour nor the vital interests of any of the allied Powers. It arises from a different appreciation of points of fact, and a solution of this difference of appreciation is one which it will be very difficult to arrive at by the ordinary diplomatic methods, for the simple reason that the preliminaries necessary for settling the dispute have not yet been arrived at. The first essential preliminary is that of "clearing up by an impartial and conscientious examination the questions of fact." What are the questions of fact? All the Powers concerned in the recent military operations were parties to the Hague Convention. China was represented at the Conference as well as Japan, and all the signatory Powers agree that, when there is a difference of questions of fact, the machinery of international commissions of investigation is the best that could be adopted to ascertain the truth.

WHAT ARE THE FACTS?

The first question of fact which it is necessary to ascertain is whether or not the Chinese Government, which is at the present moment in process of transference from Pekin to Segan, can command the obedience of the mass of the Chinese people; whether it has sufficient force to execute its orders and to carry out its obligations. This is a matter that cannot be decided at Downing Street or at any number of Downing Streets. It must be ascertained on the spot, and there is no method of ascertaining it which would be so simple and so obvious as that of an inter-Possibly other national commission of investigation. Powers, such as Siam, which also attended the Hague Conference, might be admitted to a seat on this commission. It is obvious that the ambassadors at Pekin are at present not in possession of the necessary information. They were altogether in the dark as to the danger which almost overwhelmed them. The American Government is believed to be favourably disposed to this method of investigation, and Lord Salisbury can hardly demur to a proposal which would have the subsidiary advantage of postponing a final decision as to the course to be taken in China until after the next General Election. Whether the other Powers would agree remains to be seen; but in their present perplexity they might do worse than appoint an international commission for the purpose of discovering the way out of their dilemma.

THE DANGER OF DISCORD.

When Godfrey began the advance upon Jerusalem, Tasso tells us that Satan, the enemy of God and man, summoned a conclave of fiends in order to discuss how best they could prevent Asia from falling a prey to the conquering Crusaders. To them he gave command that they must stir up discontent and mutiny in the Allied camp, and the infernal legions sped forth swiftly to do his bidding. The debates of Pandemonium are not reported nowadays by special telegrams; but Satan being a tolerably permanent factor in the affairs of the world, it is not very difficult to imagine what is now the diabolical objective. To stir up jealousies, to incite envy,

XUM

It was rica by vour to ence in prompt al force lisbury, frica, is atch up ese two ing. A Fieldnge his g else. o more lar war Russia, ide her down sult of Amoor ins as in rail-

ance in

nge two

France poral's st any y. So But ison of ng the lion's s there y such ng to onged has ations , and ned in rs to erican eplied is not would internment the ell to owers clared insist of the wers.

ement sition. Triple es the rrival Friple

to use malice and all uncharitableness for the purpose of setting the Allies by the ears-this is his natural aim and object. Nor does he need to employ fallen angels to do the deadly work. Half the newspapers of Christendom are prompt to do his bidding and eager to seize any and every opportunity of creating bad blood between the co-operating Powers. The extent to which these modern agencies for disseminating falsehood can be used in the service of the worst passions of mankind has been conspicuously illustrated of late in connection both with South African and Chinese affairs. Perhaps the most revolting-although in some respects the most innocentsample of the mischief that can be done by the Press in inflaming the evil passions of nations was afforded by the universal howl for vengeance that rose from the Press of Europe and of Britain on the publication of the infamous concoction about the massacre of all the inmates of the Legations. The savage lust of vengeance is bad enough when it has been provoked by actual facts. To call it up by a clever lie is worthy of Satan himself.

NEWSPAPERS AND SATAN.

We need to be on our guard against every story which is circulated that is calculated to create dissensions in our ranks. The sowers of discord are mischievous enough when they stick to facts. But they do not stick to facts. Lies are their staple commodity. They do business all day long in lies. The combined cosmopolitan genius of lying has a free field in China—whose inhabitants are past masters in the art of mendacity. Men have lied in every age. The new danger is the eagerness of sensational newspapers in every land to seize upon any or every lie for the purpose of creating a momentary excitement—without any regard whatever to the consequences. Peace, union, harmony, good feeling—there is no "copy" in any of these things. Depend upon it there is a profound truth in the dictum of the philosophic Mr. Dooley, "News is sin." Without "sin" there would be little stuff with which to fill the columns of the papers. Sin—

"The snaky sorceress that sat Fast by Hell Gate and kept the Fatal Key"

no longer keeps her ancient seat. She has changed her vocation. "Amid the noise of endless wars" she sub-edits the newspapers of the world.

THE NEED FOR INTERNATIONALISM.

Among the dangers which threaten the growth of Internationalism, second only to the diligent fomenting of national prejudices and misunderstanding is the peril created by the attempt to use this beneficent tendency for the purposes of financial exploitation. We have already to chronicle the formation of a China League with the avowed object of bringing pressure to bear upon our Government to seize the present opportunity for the purpose of "opening up" China. All the forces of grab and greed and insatiable aggression will rally themselves beneath the banners of this or similar associations. International finance will seek to use international armies and navies to achieve its own purposes. It will mask its wolfish appetites behind the lamblike fleece of pious pro-fessions. It will talk unctuously of the Gospel when its heart is set solely upon gold, and plead for missionaries in order to cover the designs of promoters. As the International financier has used the national resources of Britain in order to increase the dividends of the Rand, so we shall see the same potent agent wielding the forces under Count Waldersee's command in order to enable it to wring fortunes out of the Chinese. Finance has become international; military and naval operations are becoming international. Is it not obvious that if anything is to be done for peace and honesty, the forces of peace and righteousness must also become international in their turn?

A NEW INTERNATIONAL.

For some months past correspondence has been actively going on between leading friends of Peace and advocates of justice in various countries, as to the admitted need of the rallying of the scattered forces of mankind making for Peace, justice and right. At present there are two Associations making for International Peace which aspire at least to be International. One is that of the Inter-Parliamentary Conference for the promotion of Peace and Arbitration, which has just held its annual meeting in Paris. The other is the Bureau of Berne, presided over by M. Ducommun. This Bureau is a recognition on the part of the friends of Peace that there should be a central organisation; but also from impecuniosity and general lack of support it is a melancholy illustration of the lack of any adequate appreciation of the needs of the situation. At a meeting held in Paris on August 3 (fully reported in last month's "War against War") the following resolution moved by Dr. C. Richet was carried with enthusiasm :-

That the men and women here assembled decide to and do hereby form an International Union, and that we each and all pledge ourselves to do all that we can to promote its success.

The committee then formed held its first meeting on Tuesday, August 7th, at Professor Richet's house, 15 Rue de l'Université. It consists of the following persons: chairman, Professor Richet; secretary, M. Lucien Le Foyer; Members (France), M. Frédéric Passy, M. Trarieux, M. Moch and Mme. Pognon; (England), Mr. Hodgson Pratt and Mr. W. T. Stead; (America), Dr. Conway; (Belgium), Senator La Fontaine; (Switzerland), M. Ducommun; (Russia), M. de Bloch.

ITS ORGANISATION.

At the two Committee meetings which were held at Professor Richet's house it was decided to describe the new organisation as the Union Internationale, and to suggest as the best method of organisation that groups should be formed consisting of all friends of peace, whether organised or unorganised, in each country possessing an existence as an organised State, including Norway and Hungary, neither of whom have independent diplomatic representation, but which have Parliaments and Ministries of their own. From each national group so organised it is proposed that one member should be elected to a general International Council meeting twice a year, but which could be summoned to consider any grave question threatening peace on the requisition of any three of its members. The primary object of this International Central Council and of the national group in each country would be to secure the prompt and effective application of the recommendations of the Hague Convention, and generally to promote international effort for the avoidance of war. At the close of this month the Peace Societies of the world will hold a congress in Paris, when the subject will be discussed, and the new Union will, it is hoped, secure unanimous support. Such a Union to be effective requires to be financed much more liberally than any of the existing organisations directed to the same end. It is ludicrous attempting to organise a campaign against interests which have millions at their disposal with a treasury that does not contain pence enough to pay for postage stamps. I commend the proposal to my readers, and appeal to them for their sympathy, their counsel and their support.

MR under the Form to show the state of the show the show will no

surpri

young

Wh

It is young weak-income the content of the content of the content on the empire one with the Er in carrier But of a says:

If the Power otherwithere is policy in, and and cosay Frecould of "A necte

Conte
"Whi things procla
Secon
table that a madn would defen great practi
so im
the in

I. I

LEADING ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

WHAT IS TO BE DONE IN CHINA?

REMOVE THE EMPRESS, RESTORE THE EMPEROR!

MR. LUCIEN WOLFF, who continues to masquerade under the misleading name of "Diplomaticus," writes in the Fortnightly Review on the coming settlement in China. He is no partisan of partition, but he is absolutely opposed to showing any leniency to the Empress. He says:—

One thing is indispensable. All the chiefs of the antiforeign movement, including the Dowager Empress, must be removed from the temptation of making further mischief. The Dowager Empress is an old offender. As far back as 1891 it was the common talk of the Treaty ports that she was organising a movement for the expulsion of all foreigners from China. Her complicity in the present outbreak is attested by numerous edicts emanating from her personally. Moreover, unless she is punished the full extent of the victory of the Powers will not be realised by the Chinese.

When we come to ask what should be done, we are surprised to see that Mr. Wolff is inclined to take the young Emperor seriously:—

It is altogether a delusion to imagine that the reforms of the young Emperor were merely the eccentricities of a dreamy and weak-minded prince. I can see no evidence of the thoughtless incompetence ascribed to the monarch by his detractors. On the contrary, there is a distinct note of personal courage, of earnestness, of statesmanship in all his edicts. They represented and still represent a strong national movement which covers, and that not thinly, the whole of the Central and Southern provinces; in other words, the richest and most intelligent centres in the empire. The best gift we can make to China to-day, and the one which will suit our own purposes best, is the restoration of the Emperor with every guarantee that he shall have a free hand in carrying out a policy of Reform.

But if the young Emperor is dead or if he is no longer of a reforming disposition, what then? Mr. Wolff says:—

If this policy should fail—if in spite of their pledges any of the Powers should attempt to secure territorial advantages, or should otherwise block proposals essential to the stability of China—there is one course that we should not hesitate to adopt. The policy of saving Central and Southern China should be persisted in, and steps should be taken to formally guarantee the integrity and commercial freedom of that region. If any other Powers—say France, or the United States, or Japan—like to join us, we could only welcome their assistance.

· INTERNATIONALISE CHINA!

"An Old China Resident," who is apparently connected with the Shanghai newspapers, contributes to the Contemporary Review for September an article on, "What to do with China," which is useful for three things. First, it gives the original text of three of the proclamations to the Boxers, including their Marseillaise. Secondly, the writer has compiled a careful chronological table of recent events in China; and thirdly, he declares that any attempt to partition China would be an act of madness. As soon as it is attempted, every province would rebel, and rally round the Manchu Dynasty in defence of the unity of China, which is the outcome of a great process of evolution lasting 4,000 years. His practical conclusions as to what should be done are not so important, but as they set forth a definite scheme for the internationalisation of China, they may be quoted:—

I. Let a Joint Cabinet be formed consisting of one half foreigners and one half Chinese.

Let those foreign nations which will furnish 10,000 troops and upwards to keep order in China (or the equivalent of 10,000 troops) be entitled to have two men each represented in this new China Cabinet.

3. Let the viceroys and governors of China nominate an equal number of Chinese (say two statesmen each) in whom they have the fullest confidence, so that these, with the foreign members, shall form a New China Cabinet.

4. Let the chief duties of this Cabinet be:

 To preserve the lives and property of all residents in China, both native and foreign.

2. To preserve the integrity of the Chinese Empire.

 To rule China, not in the interest of any one nation, nor any group of nations, but in the interest of all nations alike, without any distinction whatever.

Let the new Cabinet act in perfect independence of the direct control of any foreign Government, as joint control has been proved in Egypt, Crete and Samoa impracticable.

6. Let there be also formed at the same time a Supreme Court of all nations whose duty shall be to settle any international difficulty that may arise out of this joint government, by just decisions instead of by the brute force of arms.

7. Meanwhile let the viceroys and governors be asked to keep order in their respective provinces and cease from sending troops to the aid of Peking, which only uses these troops to attack foreigners and to violate all its solemn pledges and Treaties.

"A QUIET AND SYMPATHETIC WAY."

Another writer in the same review, Mr. E. H. Parker, gives some personal details as to the leading Chinese Mandarins and others who have opposed the Boxers. He has even a good word to say for Li Pin Heng, who is the particular bête noire of most writers on the subject. Mr. Parker says:—

In my opinion, though there may be malicious villains or fools like Yühien and Kangi, at the bottom of this terrible business, the majority of those in 'power, such as the Dowager-Empress, Junglu, the two unhappy men who have been executed, and even the wily Li Hung Chang, have been partly taken by surprise, and in part have given way to the usual Chinese henbrained panic. A Chinese crowd kills as much out of sheer "funk" as out of savagery. If we could only get at Prince Twan in the flesh, and talk to him in a quiet and sympathetic way, we might even yet scotch the monster without great bloodshed.

M. DE BLOCH'S VIEWS.

In the Revue des Revues M. Jean de Bloch, writing of "Illusions about the Conquest of China," sounds a note of serious warning to the Powers. The Chinese have now been forced to open thirty-one ports, besides the half-dozen pieces of territory seized by the Powers as "spheres of influence." But the imports and exports of the twelve ports opened before 1876 are respectively about seven and nine times greater than those for the fourteen ports since opened. Again, the earlier ports showed an excess of exports over imports, but now the case is changed.

China, says M. de Bloch, is not dead; far from it. Instead of being dismembered after her war with Japan, she busied herself in modifying her military system. "The present revolt is but the first movement of a giant believed to be dead, but only asleep; he who wakes him has so many elements of internal weakness that, in spite of his powerful military organisation, he will not succeed." The present crisis has been coming on for many years and has many causes, one of which is the fact that America, Australia and Canada have sent back Chinese emigrants, is to be eace and neir turn?

as been eace and to the forces of tresent mational. One is the proheld its ureau of bureau is acc that iso from it is a and do and all cess. ting on Rue de dequate meeting month's oved by

; Rue de : chair-Foyer ; rarieux, lodgson onway ; d), M.

held at ibe the and to groups whether sing an ay and domatic Minisganised ed to a year, grave

y three ational a each ffective Hague ational ose of ll hold e dissecure equires equires

of the
It is gainst
with a pay for aders, el and while all the time Europeans were invading China. The missionaries have ceased to act with their former prudence, and diplomatists and consuls have not improved matters by being too careless of Chinese susceptibilities, however foolish those susceptibilities may be. Adding all these and many other causes together, and remembering that the Chinese (partly through Li Hung Chang) are well aware of the jealousies and misunderstandings between European Powers, M. de Bloch considers it wonderful that the rebellion has been so long in coming.

FASHIONLESS WOMEN.

The writer then tries to draw up a profit and loss account showing the advantages and disadvantages to be gained from China. Every inch of ground in China being already occupied, it obviously cannot be used as a dumping-ground for surplus European population. The only possible profit might be from exporting goods to China. But the Chinese need very little, and are not likely to need more for centuries to come; and this of Chinese women. "Place the women of other nations in the position of Chinese women, and it will be at once seen that commercial activity is reduced by half." In China there is fashion neither in clothes nor in houses. The many needs which we satisfy by international exchange do not even exist in China.

AGAINST CHINOMANIA.

M. de Bloch calculates that the nations need not reckon on more than £2,600,000 a year from China. But to sell to China, why must we take her ports? Germany has built up a large trade with her without any port till quite recently. It is urged that railways and properly worked mines will cause industry to develop; but there M. de Bloch sees a great danger. China with her cheap labour will soon cease to be a consumer and will become an exporter of the very things Europe is seeking to give her. Nothing can eventually prevent China increasing her tariffs. M. de Bloch's chief dread is a Chino-Japanese coalition. He fears lest China should turn to Japan and say, "Foreigner as you are, you can at least protect us." This is more than possible. Six soldiers at least, M. de Bloch calculates, must be allowed for the protection of a single European. He concludes as follows:—

As soon as Chinomania is reduced to its just proportions, the States will find it advisable to conclude international treaties for keeping the entry into China open to all; and in case of disagreement to submit their differences to the institution established by the Hague Conference. . . Chinomania is justified by no economic reason, and is contrary to all the interests of Europe.

A SOCIETY-RIDDEN EMPIRE.

In the same review M. Francis Mury writes an amusing paper on "Strange Associations in China." No nation has such a passion for societies as the Chinese. When once established, these societies often continue long after all reason for them has disappeared. Eleven centuries B.C. was founded the Society for Deserted Corpses, whose object is explained by its title. Only a few centuries younger is the Brotherhood for Saving the Drowned, the Chinese having a rooted belief that any one whose body is left to the action of the water without burial is inexorably shut out from heaven. More ancient still is the Firemen's Society, the chief qualification for which is to be a thorough rogue. Another society is composed of educated men too poor to bribe the officials enough to be able to obtain any Government post. But the most powerful and most pestiferous society of all is the Beggars' Society, the head of which is the Prince of the Beggars, whose authority is as absolute as his ways are infamous. Everything relating to these beggars is "regulated with mathematical precision; the time of their rising, their departure, their return, the words they must utter to excite the pity of passers-by, the attitude to be observed towards persons who refuse to yield to the most pressing solicitations." M. Mury concludes by remarking that "if the Europeans are still alive, they certainly owe it to the orgies of all sorts in which the populace has forgotten that there were still some white men left to massacre."

AMERICA'S DUTY IN CHINA.

THE first place in the August North American Review is given to Mr. John Barrett's article on this subject. America, he says, more than any other nation is responsible for and capable of influencing China's future. He predicts the speedy assembling of an international conference to discuss the Chinese settlement, in which America should take almost if not quite the leading part. He thus lays down America's policy with regard to China:—

I. The United States desires and should take no port, province or part of China, either as a sphere of temporary influence or as an area of actual sovereignty.

 The United States should oppose, with all its moral, political and diplomatic influence, any partition of China among the foreign Powers, or any delimitation of acknowledged spheres of influence.

3. The United States should insist upon the permanent maintenance of the trade principle of the Open Door, as outlined in the present Chinese treaties, throughout all China, by all the Powers endeavouring to exercise influence within her limits.

She must also insist upon the Open Door and upon proper punishment of rebels and indemnity for harm done by the mob. "Expressed plainly, America has everything to lose and nothing to gain by a divided China; equally true is it that America has everything to gain and nothing to lose by an undivided China." In this world crisis, Democrat and Republican alike must sink all petty party differences and support America in her Chinese policy. Even with China nominally divided into spheres of influence (which Mr. Barrett considers the same as partitioning her), the Open Door can still be maintained, but he insists that—even visions of coaling-stations and a northern rendezvous for our Philippine naval squadron must not tempt us at this hour into an equivocal position on this vital consideration. If we should weaken one jot or tittle, our influence in Asia would lose its healthy force. The confidence of Europe, the trust of Japan, and the respect of China would then be forfeited. Nothing could save the integrity of the Empire, and the hinges of the Open Door would be oiled for the closing.

A PROGRAMME FOR THE POWERS.

Lieutenant Carlyon Bellairs, R.N., writes on "The Responsibility of the Rulers for the Disturbances in China." He blames the mandarins, who have ever been ready to alienate territory rather than open up China, thus paving the way for the success of Russian diplomacy, which has nothing to gain by the opening up of China. The Japanese have understood how to deal with China, and has judged her rightly when all Europe judged her wrongly. The personal responsibility of the rulers is the chief thing to bear in mind. They must be brought to see that the old policy will no longer pay them personally. China cries out for leadership, and seldom gets it. Lieutenant Bellairs thinks none but drastic remedies of any the drea rules the with which thro

poli

of g

says s ry 1. 2. 3. 4. (b) 2

tribi

T

Mar 6. 7. to ca 8.

abor begin prev of H body Ti the g A re peop bond Chin time ence Emp woul and be e serie neith sider " mi

En word Sout she h part, mom rights as F the p

Princ

ful e

has

nce of the his ways beggars he time of ords they attitude to eld to the ludes by live, they which the me white n Review subject. nation is 's future. rnational in which ling part. egard to port, pro-ts moral, na among ed spheres ent mainutlined in y all the mits.

influence

nd upon or harm rica has divided thing to na." In ke must erica in divided onsiders still be us for our ir into an e should lose its of Japan, Nothing es of the The Re-

China." eady to paving ich has . The na, and ed her s is the ught to sonally. ets it. s of any use, and leans to what he calls the "Bag and Baggage policy" of wholesale bundling out of the present system of government. But it must be done by more courageous statesmanship than that of Lord Salisbury. He says :-

To talk about the capture of the Taku forts as "impressing the Chinese mind" is, in the light of history, the vainest of vain dreams. Toops can march to Peking and withdraw, and the rulers will save their "face" by announcing to the people that the foreign devils came as vassals to pay tribute. To this day the greater part of China has probably never heard of the war with Japan. The process of impressing the people is a game at which we can always be beaten unless we impress the people through their rulers.

To the Anglo-Saxon China means trade. He wants trade, and he means to get it. But before he can do so, says Lieutenant Bellairs, the following changes are necess ry-a formidable list :

1. The breaking down of etiquette.

2. Transfer of the capital to the seaboard.

3. Administrative reform.

4. (a) A Revenue-Board under Europeans or Americans. (b) A Board of Communications with departments modelled on the plan of the Suez Canal Directorate. (c) An international tribunal for the settlement of claims against China.

5. The complete opening of all ports under the Imperial Maritime Customs.

6. The abolition of likin or inland duties.

7. The right to be conceded to all races to nold property and to carry on business throughout China.

8. The acquirement by China, under the Board of Communications, of all railways through its territory.

AWAKE, AMERICA, AND DIVIDE THE SPOIL!

Demetrius C. Boulger talks-and talks a little bigabout "America's share in a partition of China." He begins by assuming that China must be partitioned to prevent her from "falling under the exclusive domination of Russia, which would be the gravest menace for everybody," Speaking of the United States, he says :-

They must see the game out, whether it has to be played on the green cloth of diplomacy or "the ensanguined field of Mars." A regretful glance backwards is permissible, but the American people have crossed the Rubicon of imperial responsibility.

The Open Door theory he thinks will be a kind of bond between the Governments in the scramble for China. Each of the great Powers must indicate in good time what it considers would be its best sphere of influence and responsibility in the partition of the Chinese But the writer repeatedly insists that partition would not necessarily mean conquest. The "creative and restorative work" to be done in China is too big to be entrusted to any single State. Only two Powers would seriously think of undertaking it, Russia and Japan, of neither of whom Mr. Boulger will even hear. He considers that England and America co-operating together "might have the strength to bring the work to a successful ending for the common good," but Britain, he remarks, has not the will. The Yangtse Valley has already been declared a British reserve, and-

England is not the only Power that has defined, so far as words go, a sphere of influence. France has acted similarly in Southern China, where, with greater precision but less power, she has laid claim to the provinces of Kwang-se, Kwei-chow, and part, if not the whole, of Yun-nan. It is unnecessary for the moment to inquire how far that claim violates the reversionary rights of India in the hinterland of Burmah. In the same way as France has done, Germany has announced that she regards the province of Shan-tung as specially appertaining to her, and the theory of "the hinterland" is one that the countrymen of Prince Bismarck know how to work for all it is worth. The German appetite is so good that, in any partition of China, one province would scarcely suffice to satisfy it. Japan also, with one paw over on Corea, claims the province of Fuh-keen and its admirable port of Foo-chow. Italy will not resign her hopes of San-mun Bay, Austria has still to be satisfied, and Belgium will claim a "neutral" port, or settlement perhaps, at Hankow, as a mode of adjusting some future Anglo-Russian difference. All these Powers have more or less clearly announced their expectations that a certain piece of Tom Tiddler's ground is to fall to their share.

Mr. Boulger urges the United States that the time has already come for them to decide upon their policy in China, unless they mean to be mere passive onlookers; but, he adds, "they can only stultify themselves in China at the cost of future losses and even dangers, for in the evolution of the Chinese people are wrapped up the destinies of the human race." A joint Anglo-American sphere would, he thinks, be ideal, but it is no longer practicable, American opinion being too much divided. Anyhow, the Chinese Government must go and China must be dismembered. America's standing aloof will hamper England, and help France, Germany and Russia in the exclusive policy after which Mr. Boulger suspects them to be hankering. He concludes with a final appeal to America by telling her that-

She can only refuse her co-operation by taking a lower seat in the family of nations, who will see in her abstention the selfish indulgence of her good fortune in possessing a position of splendid isolation.

SOWING THE WIND AND REAPING THE WHIRLWIND.

A far more moderate and less positive article is that by Mr. George B. Smyth, President of the Anglo-Chinese College at Foochow, who avowedly presents the Chinese side of the case. After sketching the history of the rise of the Boxer movement, he roundly asserts that it is matter not of inference, but of positive knowledge, that it is backed up by the Empress and her party. He then enumerates the causes of the bitter anti-foreign sentiment throughout China, a sentiment which is of comparatively recent origin. The first traces of anti-foreign feeling were seen about the time of the Manchu conquest, and this dynasty has done all in its power to make friendly relations with the West impossible. The result may be seen in Northern China to-day, where the Manchus are making their last desperate stand. The foreigners, Mr. Smyth says, are very largely responsible for the present turmoil. The first Europeans who came to China created a very bad impression. Portuguese, Spaniards, Dutch and English adventurers all came and went, and all behaved equally abominably. Mr. Smyth

The period of unblushing barbarism came to an end at last, and Europe set about entering into relations with China on the principles of international law. But, even then, the claims made to equality, however reasonable and just, gave great offence to the Chinese Government and people. To understand this, it is necessary to consider a peculiarity of Chinese civilisa-tion too often overlooked—its age-long isolation.

This age-long and purely national civilisation of China has never been sufficiently taken into account. the exception of Buddhism, China has borrowed nothing from any other nation, whereas all European civilisations are more or less mixed. Fully conscious of her independent development, she was irritated when the Western nations came claiming not only equality, but even

Other causes of anti-foreign sentiment are the mandarins, and the missionaries, both Catholic and Protestant, this being largely because Christianity is utterly opposed to the most sacred doctrine of the Chinese—ancestor-worship. The peculiar status of converts, who have often special exemptions from taxation, and who sometimes claim these wrongfully, thereby creating widespread ill-feeling, is a fruitful cause of antiforeign disturbance.

"PREACHING PEACE AND PRACTISING MURDER."

Mr. Smyth sums up as follows :-

With Western missionaries preaching peace and Western governments practising murder, it should not surprise us if the Chinese suspect the former as much as they fear the latter. You cannot go to a people with the Bible in one hand and a bludgeon in the other, and expect that they will accept either cheerfully.

Some European governments have been guilty, even in recent times, of the most atrocious conduct towards China. In 1884, a French fleet entered the Min river and anchored ten miles below the great city of Foochow, in South-Eastern China, to frighten the government at Peking into paying an indemnity demanded by the French minister for alleged guilty complicity in helping the people of Tonquin in their fight against the seizure of their country by France. When he failed, the case was given over to the Admiral, the French ships opened fire, and in less than an hour the Chinese fleet, with the exception of one ship, was destroyed and over 3,000 Chinese killed, and all without a declaration of war. The bodies of the dead floated out to sea on the tide, many of them were borne back on the returning current, and for days it was hardly possible to cross the river anywhere between the anchorage and the sea twenty miles below without seeing some of these dreadful reminders of French treachery and brutality. The people of the city were roused to fury, and the foreigners would have been attacked but for the presence of American and English gunboats anchored off the settlement to protect them. If some of us had been killed the world would have rung with denunciations of Chinese cruelty, but the 3,000 victims of French guns would never have been thought of.

Two years ago the French perpetrated an equally atrocious outrage at Shanghai. Wishing to enlarge their settlement, they desired to obtain possession of a large rest house for the dead which belonged to the people of Ningpo. Failing in negotiations, the French Consul proceeded to tear down the surrounding walls. The people opposed; marines were landed from a French cruiser in the river; they fired on the crowd and killed twenty. The people of other nationalities at Shanghai prepared to defend themselves, but they all knew that any riots, if riots occurred, should be laid to the injustice and brutality of

France

"The West," he adds, "cannot sow the wind in the East without having later to meet the terrible necessity of reaping the whirlwind."

"MAINTAIN THE INDEPENDENCE OF CHINA."

A Japanese Diplomat also contributes "A Japanese View of the Situation in China," but he does not say much that is new. Speaking of Chinese merchants, he says their banking systems are perfect, and their honesty is indisputable. But he urges outsiders to become better acquainted with China, the social condition of which he considers—one of the most mysterious phenomena in the world. It is almost hopeless for "Outlanders" to understand thoroughly the manners and customs of China. Before one can speak Chinese, a person must learn by heart a vast number of complicated Chinese characters, to acquire which the whole of a man's life would hardly suffice. Even foreign merchants who have lived in that country a number of years are obliged to have recourse to Chinese interpreters or the "Compradors"; there are very few foreign merchants who really understand the business transactions carried on among the Chinese.

The commercial interest being the most important of all, there is only one possible course open to the Powers, the maintenance of the independence and integrity of China, with the open door. As for governing the Chinese Empire, especially when no one knows anything about it, that idea may be at once put aside:—

There is one very clear instance of the difficulty of governing the Chinese. It is our own experience in the Island of Formosa. This island was ceded to Japan by the Chinese Government after the recent war between the two countries. It is now five years since we acquired this island; but constant disturbances have arisen there, caused by the native rebels, in spite of the strenuous efforts made by the Japanese Government toward the restoration of order and peace in that island.

No Power could face the sacrifices which might be required to carry out the partition of China:—

Even after the continuous victories of the Japanese army in the recent war with China, they would never have dared to enter Pekin unless they were 100,000 strong. This single instance will suffice to show the difficulty of confronting a determined foe.

But the Chinese must understand that the Powers are acting in concert, are resolutely bent on suppressing the Boxers, and seek no territory.

THE LESSONS OF THE BOXER REVOLT.

Mr. Robert E. Lewis describes the "Gathering of the Storm in China." After citing a long list of anti-foreign riots and outrages, upon missionaries and others (some of which are sickening reading), he asks what do we infer from such a state of things? His answer is:—

(I.) The instances cited have occurred in twelve out of the eighteen provinces of China; it is therefore not a local condition. (2.) These attacks have been made on all classes of foreigners. Foreigners were to be killed or driven out. (3) The missionaries suffer most, because, according to treaty, missionaries only have the right to reside in the interior. (4.) Of attacks on missionaries, two-thirds, or more, are directed against Roman Catholics.

ANTI-CHINESE EXCESSES.

Mr. C. F. Holder has a vigorous paper on "American Treatment of the Chinese," which he does not attempt to justify. Surveying the history of the relations between America and China, it cannot be contended that the Republic has treated the Empire either courteously or honourably. In 1863 China was told that America would welcome Chinese immigrants in unlimited numbers, an invitation which was readily accepted, and the Chinese poured into America "in a human river whose flow never flagged." Then, exactly as has happened in Australasia, Labour took fright and clamoured for the immediate exclusion of the Chinese. The Government was thus compelled to demand a modified treaty, which severely checked Chinese immigration. Still the anti-Chinese party clamoured, and Chinese immigration had to be suspended for ten years. The result was that the Chinese retaliated by attacks on American citizens in China. Twenty thousand Chinese certificates were then declared null and void, twenty thousand promises on the honour of the United States Government were broken, which called forth from the Chinese Minister some dignified remarks which the American Ministers hardly knew how to answer. Yet anti-Chinese legislation went on, although Mr. Holder admits that if China were like any European Power, there must have been war before now.

IN the Deutsche Revue for August there is an important article by Max Lautner on Raphael's "Sistine Madonna." It may be taken as a reply to Dr. Ludwig Jelinek, who asserts that the so-called "Sistine Madonna" in the Dresden Gallery was not painted by Raphael. Max Lautner disposes of Dr. Jelinek's statements one by one, and finally declares the world-famed Dresden picture to be a genuine work of Raphael's.

IN Counthe vin Ch very sis ext admir public Engla

perha

patrio

have name

order

the o

which sect of identic Patric correct either recent of Bo secret special Castel the Cl might of Patric Whare of Proving no do of the of two seizur Russianatura North compe were,

provol

According to the power of the power the state of the stat to the In position reverse devils now t of co-

and al

THE BOXERS.

In the first number of the Revue des Deux Mondes Count Boni de Castellane writes an interesting paper on the very topical subject of the Boxers and secret societies in China. He does not profess, however, to have any very special information on the subject, which he admits is extremely mysterious; and practically the article is an admirably prepared compilation from articles and letters published in newspapers, notably those of Germany and England.

The very name "Boxer" is a nickname derived from the gymnastic exercises which these people practise, or, perhaps, from their habit of calling one another "fists of patriotism and of peace." It seems that various writers have described three different secret societies under the name of Boxers. Some say that it is the "Red Parasol" order divided into two sects, one the "Great Water," and the other the "Golden Clock"; another interpretation, which seems to be wrong, identifies the Boxers with the sect of the "Great Knife"; lastly, they have been identified with a third body called the "League of United Patriots." Of these three explanations, if the first is correct then the sect is of considerable antiquity; but if either of the last two is correct, then their origin is more recent. It seems justifiable to conclude that if the name of Boxer can be applied so easily to so many different secret societies, it is probably a fact that it does not specially belong to any one of them in particular. M. de Castellane draws a curious parallel when he observes that the Chinese themselves, if they read the French papers. might identify the Nationalists absolutely with the League

When we come to study the Boxer movement itself we are on firmer ground. It seems to have begun in the Province of Shan-tung; the anti-foreign feeling there—no doubt always latent—came to a head in consequence of the Chino-Japanese war, and culminated in the murder of two German missionaries, and this led directly to the seizure of Kiao-Chau by Germany, of Port Arthur by Russia, and of Wei-Hai-Wei by England. These rebuffs naturally redoubled the anti-foreign feeling among the Northern Chinese by a kind of action and reaction, the compensation exacted for one outrage furnishing, as it were, the necessary force for fresh outrages.

The question arises, how far the Boxer movement was provoked by official agents of the Chinese Court. According to Mgr. Anzer, the Roman Catholic Bishop of Shan-tung, the Court of Pekin specially sent the Viceroy to provoke the anti-foreign feeling. Viceroy, Yu-Shien, is said to have ordered his subordinates to take measures against the Europeans; but the people did not respond with much enthusiasm. It was then that the Viceroy is said to have addressed himself to the secret societies, and particularly to that of the "Great Knife," which consented with alacrity. All this took place in May, June and July of last year; it was then that Mgr. Anzer warned the Chinese Government that the Great Knife Society, whose chief had shown himself to the people dressed in Imperial yellowwas bent upon overturning the dynasty. The Boxer movement, if this view be correct, thus appears as a sort of co-ordination both of the anti-foreign feeling in general, and also of the hostility felt by the great mass of Mongols to the reigning Manchu dynasty.

In conclusion, M. de Castellane points out that the position of the Taiping rebellion has been exactly reversed—then the dynasty appealed to the "foreign devils" for help against the secret societies, whereas now the dynasty has turned against the strangers an insurrection movement fostered by the secret societies. It is as if a European Government were to turn in a moment of crisis for help to such anti-social forces as Anarchism or Collectivism. The result, he thinks, must be to risk the destruction, not only of the present dynasty, but of China herself, although he is convinced that the dismemberment of the Middle Kingdom is only desired by England, Germany and Japan, and would be resisted by Russia and France. Nevertheless, M. de Castellane congratulates himself that England is occupied in South Africa, and he hints not obscurely at the establishment of Russian influence in Pekin of a nature similar to that which the Tsar's Government seems to have already established over Persia.

A SKETCH OF THE EMPRESS OF CHINA.

In the September Royal Mr. Reginald Maingay has a well-illustrated article on "The Slave Girl who Mounted a Throne."

The writer gives the following account of how Tze-hsi was educated. Sold at an early age to General Ti-Du, a distant relative of the Emperor, her singular intelligence soon attracted the General's notice; he hired teachers for her; she learned reading, writing, ethics, astronomy, and other female accomplishments, and, before she was fifteen years of age, was known as one of the cleverest and most desirable young women in Canton.

He pays a very high tribute to Tze-hsi when he says :-

An ideal sovereign she is emphatically not, but better, a thousand times better, than the weak or dissolute young men who have occupied the Celestial throne during the past forty years. Tze-hsi never does things by halves, and when she sees her opportunity, she strikes with ruining force and precision. But, contrary to what is at present believed, she is emphatically not a wantonly cruel and spiteful woman.

When France and England took the Taku forts and marched on Pekin, Tze-hsi's "policy was undoubtedly in favour of the foreign barbarians":—

Not that she loved foreigners then any more than she loves them to-day, but, wiser than her husband and his counsellors, she recognised their power, and felt that no real harm would accrue to China from making a few cautious concessions.

Mr. Maingay does not scruple to hint that both the Emperor Hsien-Fung (her husband), the Emperor Tung-Chi (her son), her daughter in-law, and an indefinite number of minor persons with possibilities of inconvenience about them, had a little external assistance in mounting the Dragon's back, en route to become "guests on high." Tze-hsi never forgets her dutiful servants:—

On one occasion when the army, putting down a rebellion in the island of Hainan, suffered greatly in the malarious climate, she dispatched post haste to the seat of war ten boxes of "Pingan Tan," or "pills of peace and tranquillity."

"Pingan Tan," or "pills of peace and tranquility."
During a severe famine in 1897 she collected funds for the relief of the starving by rigorously cutting down the Palace expenses, and drawing largely from her private purse. That Tze-hsi is not violently anti-Christian is proved by her graceful acceptance on her sixtieth birthday of a New Testament bound in silver covers and costing no less than £200. The book was printed by the Presbyterian Mission Press at Shanghai.

In an interview with Mrs. Tooley in the Humanitarian, Miss Beatrice Harraden contends "that happiness in married life would be more universal if every wife had a separate income—an allotted sum, in accordance with her husband's position, to be at her independent disposal."

XUM

about it,

Formosa, vernment now five turbances se of the ward the dared to is single onting a vers are

g of the foreign s (some we infer

t of the ondition, reigners.
(3) The sionaries tacks on Roman merican empt to between hat the busly or a would bers, an Chinese w never ralasia, mediate nediate is thus everely

Chinese
to be Chinese
China.
eclared
nour of

called emarks low to though ropean impor-Sistine Ludwig lonna " aphael. one by one by picture

HOW JAPAN HAS SCORED.

"IGNOTUS" writes in the National Review. The events of the last few months have, he says, raised the haunting question afresh:—

Where would Europe with its political intrigues and jealousies be if the 400,000,000 of Chinese should put on that armour which has won for 40,000,000 of Japanese profound respect from every one of the Western Powers?

The writer thinks the present panic is extreme, but does characterise as ominous "the appearance of a certain solidarity between the North, Centre, and South, between the East and West of the vast Chinese Empire."

TWO POWERS BADLY "LEFT."

The change has, in the judgment of the writer, seriously affected Russia and Germany. The Chinese struggle has come years before Russia was prepared for it. It threatens to deprive Germany of all she expected to follow on her occupation of Kiao-Chau. No nationality has made itself more disliked by the Chinese than the German. On the other hand—

There is one Power which stands to gain, and to gain enormously, from this new situation in the Far East. That Power is Japan. Had she carefully sorted the hands, the run of cards could scarcely have been better for her interests. Only six weeks ago Count Cassini was declaring that Russia could not entrust Japan with the task of bringing China to order, because so to do would be "to stultify herself, cede her place to Japan, and lose her prestige in the Far East."

PAN-MONGOLISM?

Yet the very thing has been done. The writer thinks that the "Pan-Mongolism," which the Count fears, may prove "a salutary check" on Pan-Slavism. He suggests that the four German battleships have been sent rather to coerce Japan than to intimidate China. All the same:—

From the strength of her force in the field it follows that, whether or no the Powers like to recognise the fact, Japan must take the predominant place. In the eyes of the Chinese it will be Japan, more than any other nation, which has marched to Pekin and discomfitted the Celestial braves. And respect for Japan, already strong in the more enlightened Chinese since the war of 1894-95, will grow.

JAPAN'S POLICY.

The writer thus outlines Japan's fixed purpose:-

For the last ten years Japan has had one great object in view. In face of the ever-growing strength of Russia, she has wished to awaken China to the all-importance of reform and good government, that upon this awakening may be built up the structure of a great defensive alliance. More closely akin to China, understanding her far better than even the Russian diplomatists, and conscious alike of China's weakness and strength, Japan has steadily pursued this aim.

Since 1895 Japan has patiently watched and waited. She has given China her best advice, and even offers of assistance if only the Chinese would mend their ways. She has attracted a large number of young Chinamen to her splendid schools, and has taught them lessons which they can never forget. They have seen that it is possible for the East to take to itself all that is most valuable and vital in Western civilisation without losing the best features of Orientalism—the patriarchal system and the respect for ancestors, upon which the whole fabric of Eastern family life rests.

Whether China is overcome with ease, whether she withstands the first shock of conflict with civilised armaments, the consequences will be much the same. Either way, the tendency is to a Chinese-Japanese alliance, which must assure the position of Japan against Russia. In the first case, Japan's influence will be enormous at Pekin with the prestige of the great success mainly won by her troops. In the second case, the West will have more and more to lean upon her.

IS GERMANY ENGLAND'S ENEMY?

MR. MAXSE'S ASSERTIONS.

ALTHOUGH Admiral Maxse is dead, and Captain Maxse is in the Transvaal, the relations of the Maxse family with Lord Salisbury on the one side and Mr. Chamberlain on the other are sufficiently close to give at least a colourable importance to the opinions expressed by Mr. Maxse in the National Review. In the current number he maintains that the German Emperor deliberately jockeyed Mr. Chamberlain, and led him to believe that Germany really meditated an alliance with Great Britain and the United States. "We feel," says Mr. Maxse, "as positive as if we had been present, that something of this sort was the origin of the luckless Triple Alliance which Mr. Chamberlain adumbrated at Leicester within a few days of the Windsor Conference." Mr. Chamberlain, whom Mr. Maxse describes, with some sarcasm, as an experienced statesman incapable of speaking entirely at random, believed what he had heard, and being taken with the idea repeated it at the first occasion to see how it would strike others. By his honest indiscretion he upset the German apple-cart. According to Mr. Maxse the German Emperor is a veritable Machiavelli, whose one object is to deceive both Russia and Great Britain, and who is really arming against England, although he gives it to be understood that Russia was the real objective of the new German navy. He speaks of this as the "daring explanation" of the Kaiser, from which it would appear that he is writing from knowledge not accessible to the general public. The Kaiser's explanation, daring or otherwise, does not commend itself to Mr. Maxse, who says bluntly that Germany is determined to smash England :-

The German fleet is admittedly not yet strong enough for this task, therefore other European fleets must be requisitioned for the service of the Kaiser. That is the true meaning of his constant grovelling to Russia. Through Russia he hopes to get control of French policy and French ships. We shall certainly court a naval Sedan unless we pull ourselves together.

He maintains that the refusal of British statesmen to recognise the character and purpose of the German Government arises from the same ignorant and indefensible optimism which silenced the warnings Ministers received last year concerning the Boer armaments. He also maintains that Germany and Russia encouraged the Boers to resist, believing that they would succeed in breaking down the British Empire in South Africa. "That there was a conspiracy against Great Britain in South Africa is beyond doubt, but the chief conspirators were in Europe."

appe deals trans colou

Mr The after a native ships, betwee about half to deck,

Over and to often two he bar or ship's position. The the care to bu

On the nu the big slave-c galleri deck. thus be and the but the fitted whad bu deck of the slave of the slave

And be exc head. room feet to backs gallery was se until d beings barely should allowe

The of ear and of forme when That wonder the transport that in twenty during day in

It i

York

position of nce will be cess mainly will have

Captain ne Maxse and Mr. et to give expressed e current r deliberto believe ith Great says Mr. ent, that luckless

brated at

Confer-

describes, tatesman believed with the see how discretion to Mr. Machiasisia and England, a was the speaks of seer, from nowledge Kaiser's

h for this tioned for ng of his pes to get certainly commend rmany is esmen to German indefen-Ministers nts. He raged the cceed in a Africa.

spirators

HORRORS OF THE SLAVE-TRADE.

IN his second paper on "The Slave-Trade in America," appearing in Scribner's Magazine, Mr. John R. Spears deals with the life of the slaves on the ships during transportation. 'He paints his picture in such vivid colours that one shudders to think of the reality.

THE ACCOMMODATION ON SLAVE-SHIPS.

Mr. Spears says of the slave-ships :-

The hold was kept almost filled with barrels and casks, even after all the rum or other trade goods had been sold to the native slavers. So full, indeed, was it at all times, and in all ships, that the greatest space, according to the records, found between the top of the cargo and under the side of the deck was about five feet, while the ordinary space was from two and a half to three feet. And yet in this space, between barrels and deck, the captain had to stow his cargo of slaves.

Over these barrels a rough floor of boards was laid, and this formed the slave-deck of which mention is so often made in books. The slaves were chained two and two by ankle and wrist, besides being all chained to a bar of iron or a long chain running fore and aft on the ship's side. They were forced to lie, without change of position, for incredible periods of time.

METHODS OF THRIFTY SLAVERS.

There being sometimes as much as five feet between the cargo and the deck, it occurred to some thrifty slavers to build a shelf six feet wide all the way round the hold between the deck and the slave-deck:—

On this shelf was placed another layer of slaves, thus increasing the number carried by nearly fifty per cent. The crowding in the big ships, having two decks regularly, was still worse, for a slave-deck was built clear across between these two, and the galleries or shelves were built both under and above the slave-deck. There were ships where four layers of slaves were placed thus between permanent decks that were only eight feet apart, and there are records of cases where smaller ships—ships having but three feet or so of space between cargo and deck—were fitted with galleries, so that the slaves stretched on their backs had but a foot or less of air-space between their faces and the deck or the next layer above them.

SLAVES AT 200 DOLLARS NET.

And yet even the worst crowding known to those days was to be exceeded when the profits rose above 200 dollars net per head. To stretch the slave on his back was to waste stowage room then. Instead of placing the slaves on their backs with feet to the side of the ship, they were compelied to sit in rows, backs to the ship's side. A row having been placed on deck or gallery, shoulder to shoulder, and back to the wall, another row was seated before them. A third row before these, and so on until deck and gallery were covered with a solid mass of human beings in a sitting posture, unable to move bodies or limbs, and barely able to wag their heads, or move their arms over the shoulders of those in front; nor was there any extra space allowed between gallery and deck.

The captain calculated upon losing a high percentage of each cargo by sickness and suffocation. Diarrhoea and ophthalmia were the most common diseases, the former carrying off from 20 per cent. to 25 per cent., when the trade was legal and the conditions improved! That the percentage of deaths should be high is not to be wondered at when one considers that—the trade was not only legal, but as a Liverpool preacher styled it, "very genteel":—the measurements of slavers show that in the best ships each slave was so placed that he had from twenty-four to twenty-seven cubic feet of air-space in the hold during the eighteen or twenty hours he was chained there every day in pleasant weather.

It is interesting to note in comparison that in New York the keepers of cheap lodging-houses are compelled by law to allow 600 cubic feet of air-space for each bed. The condition of affairs when bad weather necessitated a closing down of the hatches can hardly be imagined.

THE SLAVES' DES RE FOR DEATH.

The first care of the slavers was to prevent revolts, but little less was the vigilance needed to prevent suicide. In connection with this vigilance we find further tortures. Because the slave often refused to eat, the tube-like instrument which surgeons use in feeding lock-jaw patients was carried on almost every ship. Hot coals and red-hot irons were used by more cruel shipmasters to open the stubborn mouths.

When the weather was fine the slaves were brought up on deck in gangs. The picture of these airings was shocking in the extreme; the slaver knew that the slaves should not brood—and his chief object in bringing them on deck was to cheer them. He wanted them to sing and dance, and he saw that they did it too—he applied the lash not only to make them eat, but to make them sing. There they stood in rows, and as the brawny slaver, whip in hand, paced to and fro, they sang their home-songs, and danced, each with his free foot slapping the deck.

THE WAYS OF AUTHORS.

In the Cosmopolitan Caroline A. Creevey writes very entertainingly on the subject of how many of the best known authors used to write their books. There was a great contrast between the methods of George Eliot and of Walt Whitman. Says Miss Creevey:—

George Eliot was very susceptible as to her surroundings. When about to write she dressed herself with great care, and arranged her harmoniously furnished room in perfect order. She was slow and painstaking, seldom writing over forty to sixty lines a day. When one of her books was finished, she found herself so exhausted nervously that only a trip to Italy or the south of France could restore her to normal condition.

A LOAFING POET.

In perfect contrast to this is the picture of that dreadful Bohemian, Walt Whitman, who used to lie upon the ground, on his back, staring at the sun in a temperature of 100 degrees Fahrenheit. Coatless, hatless, grey-shirted, with bare neck and swarthy face, there he composed many of his poems. Or the muse came to him on the top of an omnibus, or when he was strolling along that strip of sand which was then Coney Island. "I loaf and invite my soul," he used to say, and those who knew him best could not deny that loafing was an occupation in which he excelled.

DESTRUCTIVE AUTHORSHIP!

Hawthorne, we are told, was in the habit of cutting and whittling while composing a book :-

While writing "The Scarlet Letter," one day he took a garment from Mrs. Hawthorne's sewing-basket and snipped it to pieces, wholly unconscious of the mischief he was doing. He cut up an entire table in this manner, and whittled off the arms of a rocking-chair, which is said to be now carefully preserved among the archives of the family.

Many stories are related dealing with the illegibility of the manuscripts of many famous authors, and the writer expresses her opinion that a monument should be raised to the army of martyrs—the printers.

HOW IBSEN WRITES.

Henrik Ibsen employs a curious aid in his writing, which is thus described :--

Upon his writing-table a visitor saw a small tray containing a number of grotesque figures, a wooden bear, a tiny devil, two or three cats (one of them playing a fiddle) and some rabbits. Ibsen has said: "I never write a single line of any of my dramas without having that tray and its occupants before me on my table. I could not write without them. But why I use them is my own secret."

ENGLAND V. FRANCE.

A POLICY OF PRIVATEERING.

THE Revue de Paris for May is distinguished by two interesting articles, written by an anonymous "Lieutenant X.," on the deficiencies of the French navy, with special reference to a war with England.

A COOL-HEADED FRENCHMAN.

The utterances of this officer appear to be worth consideration principally because he indulges in no violent Anglophobia, nor apparently is he really anxious for a war with England. His desire is that France should no longer find her hands tied in the councils of Europe owing to the weakness of her fleet. If France had fought over Fashoda she would, he says, have been beaten; she lost Egypt for the second time for the lack of fifty cruisers and three hundred small war-vessels. A war with England would be, in his view, an enormous calamity because of the great volume of Franco-English trade, which is twenty times greater than the trade which France does with Russia. It is gratifying to read the rebukes which this cool-headed Frenchman administers to the noisy Chauvinists of Paris. The man who declaims against England, he declares, in order to sell his newspaper goes against the interests of ten millions of Frenchmen who depend upon peace. Nevertheless, he lays it down as the first principle of a sound naval policy that a war with England should be regarded as inevitable; that is, he is convinced, the best way in which it can be avoided.

THE DANGER OF BRITISH IMPERIALISM.

The Lieutenant, who has travelled in England, comments on the frenzy of pride and the worship of brute force which are passing more and more over England, and on the Americanisation of the English people, to which, oddly enough, he attributes the present intoxication of Empire. No doubt he is right, however, in attributing the modern Imperialism-in part, at least-to a kind of sporting instinct, which renders it all the more dangerous. The writer begins with the terrible state of unpreparedness in which France found herself at the end of 1898, when Lord Brassey wrote: "The English squadrons of the Mediterranean and of the Channel possess a crushing superiority over the corresponding French squadrons. Never have the British squadrons been so strong; the English fleet has never been in a better state since the Napoleonic wars." This inferiority of the French fleet was increased by confusion and weakness in the administrative services, and the position is attributed by the Lieutenant to the antiquated methods of the French Admiralty. The position appears more serious still when viewed in the light of the financial situation. The debt of France is thirty milliards, but that of England is not more than sixteen. Moreover, since 1879 England has paid off some two and a half milliards, while France has added some five and a half milliards to her obligations. It follows that England could afford a very costly war which would be absolute ruin to her neighbour.

THE BANE OF POLITICS.

The Lieutenant declares in despair that the French navy seems to him to be made rather for the workers in the arsenals and their Deputies, than the arsenals and their workers for the navy. France squanders millions in defending indefensible ports because they are full of electors, while ports which have no electors are refused necessary provision. It is the old complaint—strategical considerations are ignored for political intrigues, and the French fleet seems to be carefully designed to afford victory to the English fleet in a war of squadrons. The strategy, he thinks, is analogous to the politics by which England is opposed at every point in the world simply that France may yield at every point.

A WAR OF PRIVATEERING.

Against this Lieutenant X. sets up another system, the pivot and central idea of which is what he calls "La Guerre de Course," which may perhaps be translated, a "War of Privateering." This system is primarily based on the powerlessness of the battleship to remain really master of the sea. Every country has its own appropriate strategy; thus, for France, the method of conquering England is not the same as that which England should employ in order to conquer France. The object of all warfare is to reduce the enemy to real, lasting impotence; but the writer of these articles complains that this simple principle has not been understood at the French Admiralty. The naval strength of England, he points out, is based quite as much on the efforts that have been made in other countries to imitate her system of squadrons as on the actual strength of her ships of war. The most striking victory of England on the sea has been that she has imposed her example on the world, for the world cannot really follow her example to any purpose, and therefore England can do as she The chief obstacle in the way of a war of privateering is of course the declaration appended to the Treaty of Paris in 1856. This measure, says Lieutenant X., was entirely to the profit of England. We are then told that treaties do not matter much, and that neutral Powers are only important if they happen to be strong, and the action of Mr. Chamberlain and Sir Alfred Milner with regard to the Transvaal Conventions is cited in support of the argument that treaties have no value of themselves. The object of France in a war with England, he thinks, should be to organise systematically the ruin of our commerce, and the destruction of the ships which bring us the corn and other necessaries which we do not produce for ourselves. Might is right in war, it seems. A war of privateering is justified by its absolute utility. These then are the three principles which the writer lays down as the fundamental bases on which French naval construction should proceed: (1) To destroy the commerce and communications of England; (2) To reduce England to famine; (3) To avoid all set engagements with squadrons, and to rely upon an active defence which should aim at the destruction of the strongest squadrons of the enemy.

A RED INDIAN to whom the Pilgrim Fathers-and consequently the United States-were deeply indebted was Squanto, or Tusquantum, whose claim to fame is set forth by Rev. G. C. Blaxland, M.A., in the September Sunday at Home. Squanto was a native of the place afterwards immortalised as New Plymouth. An English captain named Hunt, touching at the harbour, enticed Squanto and some two dozen members of the same tribe on board his vessel, carried them off to Spain, and sold them as slaves. Squanto managed to get away from his captors to London, where he lived on Cornhill. There he learned to understand and speak English. He was later sent out to Newfoundland, and eventually found his way to his native land. When the Pilgrim Fathers came he offered his services to them as interpreter. But for him and his knowledge of English they would have fared worse than they did in their dealings with the Red Man. Squanto deserves to be gratefully remembered in any history of the expansion of the English-speaking race.

AN paper Hofm Futur the pa but la the ki ill-feel tion o acquic writer war vadvise should great

The biogra-Let like mation Kruge deman though Salisb such emy ow obliter

A s

convir

Iw then Comn Table officer enced Repul Pretor suadin the F ultimo South going or two was th bitter and G only p major most l on the

We opinic about that c and h hates rampa Press, make and F The l chang obnow event this, a

A SINGULAR AFRIKANDER APPEAL.

ns. The

by which ld simply stem, the islated, a ily based ain really

n appro-

ethod of France.

y to real,

articles

ot been strength

h on the o imitate

th of her gland on imple on example

as she war of

d to the s Lieu-

We are

nd that en to be r Alfred is cited

value of ar with natically of the essaries right in d by its inciples

ases on (1) To ngland;

all set

of the

rs-and

ndebted

e is set

e place

English

enticed

ne tribe

nd sold

rom his There

He was

and his

's came

But for e fared

d Man.

in any

AN eager and impassioned and somewhat startling paper is contributed to the National Review by Adrian Hofmeyr, entitled "An Afrikander's Reflections on the Future of South Africa." He begins by reflections on the past. He approves England's abolition of slavery, but laments that Government officials did not then show the kindly, considerate spirit which would have eradicated ill-feeling and prevented the Great Trek. The annexation of the Transvaal in 1878 would have been peaceably acquiesced in, but for the same lack of sympathy. The writer complains of the Bond. It said too little when war was becoming imminent. Bond leaders privately advised Kruger to climb down and avert war: they should have said this publicly. So the Bond made a great mistake.

HOW HE BECAME AN ANNEXATIONIST.

The writer then treats us to an interesting bit of autobiography. He says:—

Let me be candid here. Even after the war had started, I, like many others, never dreamt that it would end in the annexation of the Republics. I believed that as soon as President Kruger expressed himself willing to accept Sir Alfred Milner's demands there would be an end of the quarrel. And thus thought many of us, Progressives as well as Bondmen. Lord Salisbury's answer to the President's proposal extinguished such expectations. But before that I had become convinced in my own mind that the only possible end of the war was the obliteration of the two Republics. Let me say why.

"THE ULTIMATE AIM OF THE TRANSVAAL."

A short stay there [in the Transvaal], even as a prisoner, convinced me that the Kruger idea was elimination of the English factor out of South Africa.

I was taken prisoner on the 15th October, and the battle cry then was "Tafelberg toe" (to Table Mountain). Said the Commandant to me, "Now we will not rest till the flag floats on Table Mountain. This happened on the western border. The officers taken prisoners on the eastern border, in Natal, experienced the very same thing there. During the months of Republican successes this was the common and public boast in Pretoria. This was also the great lever made use of in persuading the unfortunate Colonials to rise in rebellion and join the Federal forces. Notice well! No secret was made of the ultimate aim—the English to be driven into the sea, and one South Africa from the Zambesi to Cape Town. Kruger was going to be the first President, but would resign after a month or two on account of old age, and be succeeded by Steyn. This was the programme. In the meantime I had learnt to know, by bitter experience, the character of the Transvaal Government and Government officials, and came to the conclusion that the only possible end was annexation of the Republics. The vast majority of Colonials I knew, both English and Dutch, would most heartily decline the honour of having Transvaal rule thrust on them.

ELIMINATE THE HOLLANDER.

We prisoners, talking over these matters, were unanimously of opinion that annexation only could end the trouble. But what about consequent race-hatred and animosity? Well, I maintain that only total conquest and annexation can bring about peace and harmony. It is not the genuine Transvaal burgher who hates England and English rule. It is the foreign element rampant in the State, dominating the Government and ruling its Press, that engendered such hatred, fanning it into flame. I make bold to say that, as in the Cape Colony, the Transvaaler and Free Stater any day prefer an Englishman to a Hollander. The latter, therefore, depended for existence on his chance of changing the Transvaal into an English-hating country. This obnoxious and dangerous element could be removed only in the event of annexation. Lord Roberts has become convinced of this, and has sent hundreds of Hollanders out of the country.

Pacification will now very soon follow in the footsteps of annexation, I feel sure.

AFTER ANNEXATION.

The writer then gives "a word about the future." He says: "Bury all your red tape in the bottom of the deep blue sea"; possess all South Africa, and "do it well and quickly." Make large allowances for Colonial rebels and agree to the Treason Bill of the Cape Ministry. "Do not misinterpret the attitude of the Dutch Reformed Church." "There is not a shadow of truth in the allegation that the Church qua Church is disloyal." Let there be "equal rights for the English and Dutch languages." "Make use of as many of the former officials as possible." "In every case appoint only the best men."

The writer, who glories in being an Afrikander, and is proud of the name (though at once suggesting it should be changed to Africanian), concludes by urging England to use her "best opportunity" and "make South Africa a united happy country."

A Land of Sane and Sweet Simplicity.

It is a very attractive picture which Mrs. Hugh Fraser gives of Japan to her interviewer, Mr. Arthur Lawrence, in the September Young Woman. By her showing it is the land of inward peace, where the simplicities of homelife are highly exalted and the sordid, maddening bondage of Mammon excites only contempt. If allies we are to have among the non-Christian nations, we could hardly select better than the sons of such a land as Mrs. Fraser depicts. She says:—

That which Europeans strain after, sensation and excitement, is a foreign element, and one which is carefully avoided in that country. The absence of strain and hurry, the non-existence of "society" as we understand it, and the paramount importance of family ties and family duties, make life simple, calm, patriarchal, dull, and monotonous, if you like; but, at any rate, there is no falsifying of the values, no social ambition, no extravagance, no snobbishness. . . . The absence of snobbishness and kindred vices in Japan impresses itself very clearly upon one, and the picture I have drawn will be refuted by no one who has any knowledge. There are two characteristics of the Japanese which stand out very boldly. Home life is paramount, and the possession of money is but lightly regarded. Any one who would pretend to be richer than he is would be calmly avoided as a fool. Money is not spoken of, the absence of it is not apologised for. A person living in a poor way gives a guest all he has to offer, and is not humiliated at having to show his poverty. The rich man does not overwhelm you with his riches; he shows you one beautiful object from his collection at a time in an empty room, only beautiful through its perfect proportions, colouring and cleanli-ness. These people travel through life so lightly weighted, their requirements are so few in the material order, that they seem as independent as the swallows, and fly where we, weighed down by the commissariat for our artificial wants, can only creep. But they hold invisible things very precious: honour and self-respect, the love of their children, the harmony of the family, the privileges of patriotism, the commonwealth of learningthese are things for which they will sacrifice much, and of whose pre-eminence they would call it impious to doubt.

ONE of the most interesting papers in Good Words is on the chair-making industry of Buckinghamshire, by Sherrington Mills. The rapidity of output is surprising. "A single firm will turn out many gross weekly. Five thousand were made for the Alexandra Palace, in six days; 8,000 for the Crystal Palace. The record order is 19,000 chairs, finished and delivered within a few weeks to the order of Messrs. Moody and Sankey, the American revivalists."

THE OUTGOING GOVERNMENT.

A ROUGH BALANCE SHEET.

MR. H. WHATES sends to the Fortnightly Review of September a paper which he describes as an attempt to provide the electorate with a statement of the successes and failures of the outgoing Administration. He admits that although the Government was omnipotent and the Opposition powerless, Ministers have done little to realise their promises made on the platform of last General Election. I reprint his table, prefacing it with the remark that, Ministers themselves being judges, the annexation of the Boer Republics can hardly be regarded as a success. Minister after Minister declared that he regarded such a consummation with unfeigned alarm. Here, however, is the way Mr. Whates sums up the five years' administration:—

SUCCESSES.

I. The avoidance of war among the Powers or with Turkey, because of affairs in Asia Minor, in Crete and in Greece.

II. The grant of autonomy to Crete.

III. The salvation of Greece from extinction as an independent kingdom at the hands of Turkey.

of Turkey.

IV. The settlement of the Guiana-Venezuela boundary dispute without war with either Venezuela or the United States, and without appreciable less fit torritory.

able loss of territory.

V. The establishment of relations of friendship with the United States Government and people.

VI. Overthrow of the Boer Republics and establishment of British sovereignty.

VII. The avoidance of foreign intervention in South Africa.

VIII. Treaty of amity with King Menelik whereby his neutrality in the Soudan was

IX. Defeat of the Khalifa and recovery of the Soudan.

X. Final rejection of the French pretension to a right to acquire sovereignty in the Nile valley.

XI. Pacification of Uganda and assertion of British authority in the region of Lake Rudolph as far as the Latuka Sultanate. FAILURES.

I. The non-prevention of the massacre of an incalculable number of Armenians, for whose humane government England is, with the other Powers, in part responsible under the Treaty of Berlin.

II. The non-prevention of three years of the war of extermination between Moslems and Christians in Crete.

III. The non-prevention of the war between Turkey and Greece.

IV. Ineffective resistance to the American pretension to intervene, and if intervention is declined, to settle disputes between European Powers and American States.

V. Inability to arrive at a definitive settlement of the Alaskan boundary dispute, the Nicaragua Canal question, and other matters submitted to the abortive Joint High Commission.

VI. Failure to discover and prevent the criminal conspiracy resulting in the Jameson Raid resulting in the Jameson Raid.

VII. Mr. Chamberlain's failure to bring about a pacific solution of the differences with the Transvaal Government.

VIII. Failure to prevent the invasion of Natal and Cape Colony.

IX. Gross miscalculation of the fighting capacity of the Boers,

X. Failure to forestall M. Marchand's expedition to the Upper Nile.

XI. Breakdown of the Administration of Uganda, with the resultant Soudanese rebellion, the delay in the start of the Macdonald Mission to join hands with Lord Kitchener, and the failure of that mission to reach its objective.

XII. Definitive settlement of all rival territorial claims between France and England in Nigeria and other regions of West Africa.

XIII. Overthrow of Prempeh and conquest of Ashanti, and the suppression of subsequent revolt.

XIV. Substitution of Imperial for Chartered rule in Nigeria. The capture of Benin and other extensions of British authority in the Niger Delta.

XV. Avoidance of war with Russia on account of events in China.

XVI. Acquisition of Wei-Hai-Wei.

XVII. Acquisition of Mirs Bay (Hong-Kong extension).

XVIII. Assertion of the principle of the "open door" in China.

XIX. The railway agreement (Spheres of Interest) with Russia.

XX. Establishment of good relations with Germany and finally with Russia in the China question.

XXI. Pledge of the nonalienation of the Yangtsza Valley.

XXII. Various railway and mining concessions in China, opening of inland waters to navigation, opening of new ports, etc.

XXIII. Australian Federa-

XXIV. Suppression of the outbreaks on the North-West frontier of India,

XXV. Financial and other assistance to the West Indies, by which the administrative and economic condition of that region has been much improved.

XXVI. Exaction of Compensation to the relatives of Mr. Stokes, wrongfully executed in the Congo Free State by order of M. Lothaire. XII. Neglect to make good by effective occupation various treaty rights in West Africa, the result being the loss of territory between Say on the Niger and Ilo, the loss of the Gourma region and Nikki, and a large area of the Ashanti hinterland.

XIV. Failure to prevent Port Arthur and Talienwan passing to Russia.

XV. Failure to uphold the right of British warships to visit Port Arthur.

XVI. Failure to make good the protests against French curtailment of treaty rights affecting British commerce in Madagascar.

XVII. Failure for five years to obtain a settlement from France of the claim for compensation on behalf of the relatives of the officers and men killed in the Waima affair.

XVIII. Failure to do anything to relieve Newfoundland from the burden of French treaty rights, beyond appointing a Royal Commission, the report of which has been burked. Mr. I the "C crimes a sort of the ma of his s a few abnorn "neces the 18,

I

abnorm
"neces
the 18,
virtuall
"the c divided which, further
It is c becomin strides

Christer

The of the will no " Duch suzerai on, " n Boerla Johann test a the se agains a thin Engla at one and to But w

power

of Mal

Franc

The p

way t

Franc

of Jing

inevita

A contril article misno that t leader Party argum dolph fibre Electi every Camp reed n

otherwise the Factor the law ould on the He sa

IN VIEW OF THE GENERAL ELECTION.

ke good

Africa,

los of

on the s of the

Nikki.

Ashanti

prevent lienwan

old the nips to e good

French

erce in e years

from

com-

of the

s and

Waima

anyndland French

point-

n, the

SHALL WE HAVE ANOTHER SEPTENNATE OF JINGOISM?

Mr. F. A. WHITE writes in the Westminster Review on the "Coming Dissolution." His indignation with the crimes of the present Government sweeps him along with a sort of apocalyptic fury, which seems to blind him to the matter-of-fact exigencies of practical politics. Some of his sentences run to nearly a page in length, and not a few of his statements and specifics are scarcely less abnormal. He opens by declaring the United States "necessarily a part of us," and by including their area in the 18,300,000 square miles which are "either actually or virtually ours or under our protectorate." Adding to this "the condominium of China and an overwhelming undivided influence in Japan," the writer produces a total which, he thinks, "should satisfy us." If we go in for further expansion, he prophesies ruin. He says:—

It is quite obvious that the nations of Europe are one and all becoming gravely alarmed at our colossal seven-league-boot strides to Universal Empire, and that a little more and all Christendom will turn upon and rend us as it did Napoleon.

The writer denounces the Government for the iniquity of the South African war, but predicts that South Africa will now be the United States of Dutch-Anglia (or "Duchanglia" as he spells it), "a Republic under the suzerainty of Great Britain." The Transvaal, he goes on, "must henceforth be divided into two provinces-Boerland, capital Pretoria; and Transvaal proper, capital Johannesburg." This, he argues, will offer an interesting test as to the comparative happiness to be found in the service of God and of Mammon. He inveighs against our suppression of alien Christian States, a thing unheard of since 1809. What he wants England to do is to make peace with the Boers at once "on as mildly indulgent terms as possible," What he wants and to dismiss the present Government from power. But what he expects from "our party" when returned to power includes, besides peace with the Boers, the cession of Malta to Italy, Cyprus to Greece, the Channel Isles to France (if the people vote for it), and Gibraltar to Spain. The paper concludes with a strong warning against the way the Demon of Jingoism is endeavouring to set France and England by the ears. "Another septennate of Jingo supremacy and war between the two countries is inevitable."

WHAT SHOULD LIBERALS DO?

A writer, who prudently reserves his anonymity, contributes to the Foringhtly Keview for September an article entitled "A Lead for Liberalism." The title is a misnomer, for so far from giving Liberalism a lead, all that the anonymous writer can do is to wail aloud for a leader. It did not need this oracle to tell us that the Party needs "masterly advocates far more than real arguments." It has neither a W. J. Bryan nor a Randolph Churchill. It is under the baronets. "It needs fibre in its leaders. It must look after the General Election elsewhere than to Lord Rosebery, who suggests every cause and shirks every battle; or to Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, whose ideal is to show how the reed may shake gracefully in any wind."

It would be difficult to say how any leader could lead otherwise than by shaking in the wind, and our critic in the Fortnightly only differs from C. B. that while he says the latter shakes gracefully, his shaking is graceless, nor would many of us care for a victory if it were to be won on the lines indicated by the writer in the Fortnightly. He says for instance:—

The brutal truth is that the Liberal party in the immediate future will have no more influence upon the fate of South Africa than upon the phases of the moon. It is precisely with respect to the settlement that the Opposition is unable to oppose the policy of the Cabinet or to offer any intelligible alternative of its own of the Cabinet or to offer any intelligible alternative of its own.

In the present state of Liberalism, to save ten or twenty or thirty seats in the House of Commons by strengthening to the utmost the criticism of the operative statesmanship of the Government and by moderating both the mere abuse of Mr. Chamberlain and the indiscriminate excuses for the Dutch, is the best the party can hope to achieve.

What then does he advise? Merely this, to sit tight and wait for bad times. Then he thinks that Liberals may unite to offer a nation sick of Imperialism with a swagger, an Imperialism with a difference. The demand for administrative reform will be stimulated by foreign competition and bad trade. He says Liberalism will resume its predatory instincts, and after a time Liberals will once more come back to power. Such at least is the prospect dangled before us by this writer who promises a "Lead for Liberalism."

WHAT SHOULD CHRISTIANS DO?

In the August- Puritan Dr. Guinness Rogers contributes a paper headed "After the War," which concludes with this pronouncement:—

Let me say that this has been written by one who has been reluctantly led by the study of the evidence as it has been gradually developed, to the opinion that the war was really the effect of a long series of circumstances in the review of which neither party can escape blame, but that the immediate cause was the unwise action of two Presidents. But, while holding that circumstances thus forced the war on us, I not the less deplore its occurrence, and feel that for Christian men one of the duties of the hour is to repress that militarism which at present is so rampant.

Bygone Women in the Magazines of To-day.

An interesting feature in current periodicals is supplied by the sketches of eminent women in former times. History seems to be read nowadays with a keener eye for womanly distinction. The Cleopatras, the Joans of Arc, the Elizabeths and the Catharines no longer absorb attention. Lesser luminaries in the firmament of fame (or infamy) are studied and described. This month, for example, presents us in Longman's with a charming glimpse of Mdlle. de Lespinasse, mistress of d'Alembert and leader of a brilliant salon: Temple Bar recounts the attractions and (some of) the escapades of Mary Villiers, Duchess of Richmond, at the court of the Stuarts; in Macmillan's, J. J. Cotton traces the winding career of the historic beauty who began life as the daughter of Pierre Werlée, post-officer at Chandernagore, married a Government secretary named Grand, was divorced, came to Paris, married Talleyrand, became a star of Napoleon's Court, and in her fortieth year still bewitched Paris, and ended life as Princess de Benevento. A less world-wide fame belongs to the "girl graduate of Spain," whose one distinction is set forth in another Macmillan article. Donna Maria Isidra Quintina, born in 1768, had by her seventeenth year learned Latin, Greek, French, Italian, philosophy, mathematics, was elected associate of the Spanish Academy in 1784, and next year had conferred upon her by the University of Alcala the degree of "Doctora" in philosophy and litterae humaniores. This honour was bestowed upon her by royal command. The Spanish Government of 1785 seems to have been more enlightened than the authorities of Cambridge of the present day. In the end Donna Maria married a marquess, became the mother of three children, and di d when thirty-five.

PAUL KRUGER.

AN INTERVIEW AND CHARACTER SKETCH.

MR. SANGREE contributes to Ainslee's Magazine for August a very interesting appreciation of the character of President Kruger. Mr. Sangree is an American Journalist who spent some months in the Transvaal during the period immediately before the fall of Pretoria. He left the Boer capital two days before the entry of Lord Roberts. The article in Ainslee's Magazine was written shortly before that event. Mr. Sangree has a very high opinion of Paul Kruger.

ATLAS, SPHINX AND SAINT.

If Paul Kruger died to-day the Boer nation would pass into history to-morrow. No man, or combination of men, could replace him. He alone welds together the chain of humanity that is struggling for liberty in South Africa. It is as though one mighty individual were fighting the British Empire. He is Atlas supporting the world. So long as he lives his people will continue the war. At present he is far from moribund.

After observing Mr. Kruger in Pretoria for three weeks, and conversing freely with him, I am the more convinced that his personality has no counterpart on earth. Enemies may ridicule his religion, slur his principles, and accuse him of hypocrisy, but there he stands, a figure as adamantine as it is animated, which no one here believes will ever be cast down. He is a Sphinx surcharged with wisdom and energy, to whom 40,000 burghers look up as their Saviour. He is already canonised.

HIS MENTAL GRASP.

Not the slightest detail of the campaign escapes Kruger's attention. In his brain he carries the whole war. He is the commander-in-chief. He seems to know-everything. more, he holds it in his memory, and can quote the latest money market in London, the number of Boers lost in every engagement, or the minutest points of the Bloemfontein Conference with equal readiness.

HIS BEDSTEAD.

The war has proved a terrible strain on the old Transvaal patriot's nervous vitality. For the first time in his life he has been compelled to forego the habits of a lifetime, and Pretorians tell with wonderment how they have seen him working at one or two o'clock in the morning with his secretaries.

So exhausted has he been on several occasions that he mounted with great difficulty into the ancient Dutch bed which came out from Holland with the first Jacob Kruger. This bed is five feet from the floor and reached by a stairway. It is a ponderous affair, shaped like a pyramid, broad below and narrow at the top. A wide strip on one side prevents his honour from falling overboard. It has been Mr. Kruger's custom to retire to this couch at seven in the evening and arise at four. But with the arrival of telegrams and couriers from the front, his rest is constantly interrupted.

Not so with his working régime. Though haggard in countenance, he is never one second late in arriving at the Raad House at 9 a.m.

THE PRESIDENT INTERVIEWED.

Mr. Sangree had on one occasion subjected the President to a formal interview with the aid of an interpreter. When questioning the President about the franchise, Mr. Kruger replied:—

"What does the franchise matter, anyhow? It is only a skeleton for the real Beelzebub. By documents which have been captured and which are now in my possession, I know that at the very time we were corresponding about the franchise in 1898, England had decided to wipe us out."
"Mr. Kruger," I asked, "do you hold Mr. Rhodes responsible for this war?"

"Yes," he replied. "I see the shadow of one large head and then two smaller ones near by. I find no traces of Rhodes where Milner and Chamberlain are not. These three made the war. They will not be content until they see all Africa under the British flag."

He then asked the President as to the allegations constantly brought against the Transvaal that the burghers did nothing to encourage education :-

"Tell the young man," he promptly requests the interpreter, to consult our Commission of Education. He will find that this end, Cape Colony expends a little over two pounds. Can I say more?" while our Government spends five pounds per head each year to

WHAT HAS THE WAR COST THE BOERS?

The most interesting statement made in the interview was that concerning the cost of the war. Mr. Kruger was pointing out that the gold industry would certainly be taxed more heavily by the British than ever it had been by the Boers. Mr. Sangree asked whether in the event of the Boer victory the same result would not happen :-

"No," said President Kruger, "our war expenses are very nall. No country on earth can maintain a war so cheaply."
"What has been the cost thus far?" I ventured. small.

Mr. Kruger hesitated at this, but after consulting hurriedly with several advisers, replied: "About four million pounds."
"At that rate, then, you can keep up the conflict indefinitely?

"Yes, with the help of the Almighty. We are getting one million pounds out of the mines every month. With this we can buy all our foodstuffs, and as for ammunition, that we can make right here, everything from a Mauser bullet to a Long Tom shell. Fortunately, the English were kind enough to give us enough supplies at Glencoe to feed our army six months. You see we grow everything here except sugar and coffee, and they come through Delagoa Bay.

President Kruger stated that he had never had more than thirty to forty thousand men in the field of action, ten per cent. were always on leave of absence.

HOW LONG WILL THE WAR LAST?

Mr. Sangree concludes his article by repeating the declaration made by President Kruger that the war would go on so long as he and his burghers survived :-

"How long will this war last?" I inquired of President Kruger, after he had asked me to affirm in his name that he had never contemplated blowing up the mines, nor would such action be taken even in the last extremity.

"I have no idea as to the duration," was his reply. "So long as I and my followers live.

The interpreter explained that Kruger meant, if worst came to worst, he would go to the Zoutpansberg mountains, where the Boer nation will make its last stand. In these crags and valleys the burghers believe they can fight for ever against England. The region is almost inaccessible, and a few good shots could resist an army. It is the home of the very wildest and most provincial Boer who shares habitation there with the leopard, giraffe and jackal. The writer is informed that caves have been hollowed out there, preparatory to receiving the burgher popula-tion, and that ammunition and foodstuffs sufficient for eighteen months have been stored away.

The Transvaal artillery, which is supposed to be managed by Russian and German gunners, is really in the hands of young

TILL THE BITTER END.

In bidding good-bye to Mr. Kruger I asked him if he and his people would accept an asylum in America, to which he replied that it was impossible. "We are a peculiar people," he said, "and if God wills that we lose our independence then it is better we should all pass away. Wherever a Boer would live he must ever brood over his thoughts. The women will never forget that their husbands died at the English hands; the children will grow up to hate the conqueror, and wherever is such bitterness there could no happiness be. No, it is better that we die, for then each burgher can say to himself, "I have fought the good fight." I have finished my course, I have kept the faith."

AN IN Septer interes article on " April No His pla

affectio private The fe becaus the ra soldier profus he is n how fi definit

> He man a a strai bright

chin.

you ha

to voi

death

he lov

giving and in He in an shoes. his ap lives. least.

is thi himse the fa Mi sente Litt world mane

Ber

TH avera Cam "Th to c Holl amus Arch facts grea Ev

the o Since this than " A men the 1 ever

Lord

AN AMERICAN SKETCH OF LORD ROBERTS.

In his article, "The Teuton Tug of War," in the September Harper's Magazine, Julian Ralph deals very interestingly with the South African War. No part of his article is more interesting than that in which he writes on "Bobs." Mr. Ralph, writing in Bloemfontein on April 17th, says:—

No one questions or doubts "Bobs" in the British army. His place is unique there—and in all the world besides.

ROBERTS AND HIS MEN.

In all the world besides no other man has the confidence, affection, and pride of so many men. It is not merely the private soldier who is wholly satisfied simply to be led by him. The feeling is the same among the officers. He has infinite tact, because he is in complete sympathy with every man in or above the ranks. He returns every salute; he talks to every sort of soldier; he knows them by name by the hundreds. He is more profuse in kind words and compliments than in reproof, just as he is most inclined to be gentle and kindly, yet every man knows how firm and severe he can be In those two sentences lies the definition of perfect justice, which he nearly personifies.

HIS PERSONALITY.

He makes so little show and parade that there is no plainer man among his 200,000; and yet he is always as neat as a pin; a straight-built, solidly set up, quick, nervous little man, with bright eyes under a majestic forehead and above a masterful chin. His face is so sad and gentle when it is in repose that you have to look at it again and again—and then only to add to your wonder how that can be the visage of a man who deals death for a profession, and leads to death the flower of the army he loves. Look at the same face again when he is speaking, giving orders. It is just as kindly, but the melancholy has fled, and in its place is the indefinable tracery called "command."

and in its place is the indefinable tracery called "command."

He trusts every man implicitly until he finds himself mistaken in an individual; then it is not comfortable to be in that man's shoes. He is never angry. He controls his temper as he does his appetite, for he never smokes, and drinks hardly at all. He lives, in war, as plainly as any colonel under him, to say the

HIS HUMILITY.

Beyond and behind and above all else that distinguishes him is this: that though he is a general among men, he counts himself, before God, a humble soldier, for, without ever intruding the fact, he is a devout Christian.

Mr. Ralph concludes his article with the following sentences: "There has been but one leader since 'Little Bobs' came. Even a name which filled the world has now been merged in his, for he alone commands—and absolutely."

THE Royal Magazine for September is above its usual average. Mr. Roderick Grey writes on "The Art of the Camera," with special reference to its use in journalism. "The War in Toyland" is an instructive article on how to create international ill-feeling, beginning with the children. "The War on Pictorial Postcards," by Clive Holland, shows one way in which our neighbours have amused themselves by our doings in South Africa. Mr. Archibald Hurd writing on "Feeding a Battleship," gives facts and figures about the victualling of the Navy, of great interest at present. Mr. Hurd says:—

Even in 1892, when there were only 71,000 officers and mer, Lord George Hamilton calculated that on these little "deals" the country made a profit of £45,000 out of its jolly tars. Since then the number of men has been nearly doubled, so that this year these ill-gotten gains will amount to certainly not less than £70,000 or £80,000.

"A Beauty Factory" is another article deserving mention. The "factory" is in America, and performs the most astonishing operations for the removal of almost every conceivable physical defect.

EVANGELISM ON A COLOSSAL SCALE.

A SIMULTANEOUS mission conducted by the united Free Churches throughout the length and breadth of England and Wales is announced for the opening weeks of 1901, and its general idea is vividly set forth by Rev. Thomas Law to a Puritan interviewer. Mr. Law first mooted the project for London only, but as Dr. Guinness Rogers was very doubtful and Mr. Hugh Price Hughes shook his head, Mr. Law with characteristic intrepidity enlarged his scheme to include all South Britain. Mr Hughes now hails it as "the most important practical proposal ever put forward in the name of Christianity:—

to The great object of the mission," said Mr. Law, "is to lay hold of the unreached. We think that the simultaneity of it will be a great object-lesson to the whole country. The whole of the Free Churches of England and Wales will, at the same moment, be engaged in one supreme effort to bring the gospel to the people—or the people to the gospel, if you will; and the fact that they are all so engaged must produce a profound impression on outsiders as well as on the churches themselves. It will do another thing, too—it will emphasise the fact that our work is spiritual. There are many people who persist in stating that the Free Church Federation movement is a political movement, but this union of all the churches in a mission effort will remove that impression once for all."

As the interviewer observes :-

The practical unanimity of the churches is significant. For a whole week, in January or February, every Free Church preacher, from Dr. Clifford and Dr. M'Laren downwards, will be a missioner. Dr. Parker is entering most heartily into the work, and he will preach the opening sermon of the London Mission in the Guildhall. Among those who have already placed themselves at the disposal of the National Committee are Dr. Monro Gibson, Dr. Mackennal, Mr. Price Hughes, Dr. G. S. Barrett, Dr. Horton, and the Revs. J. H. Jowett, Silvester Horne, R. J. Campbell, Archibald Brown, Thomas Cook, E. Davidson, F. B. Meyer, Campbell Morgan, Thomas Spurgeon, and a host of other leaders. They will be allocated to the great centres of population.

The movement is divided into three: a ten days' London Mission beginning January 26th; a ten days' Town Mission beginning February 16th; and a Village Mission beginning March 2nd.

The Secret of Common Dreams.

MR. H. G. HUTCHINSON roused no small curiosity by his first essay towards a "Science of Dreams," published some months ago in Longman's. He called attention to the dreams which are common to most men, such as the falling dream, the flying dream, or the dream of being insufficiently dressed, and suggested the need of explanation for these uniformities of sensation in sleep. In the September number of the same magazine, he supplies "a second essay in dreams," and reports a vast array of correspondence called up by the previous paper. From the experiences described to him, he adds to his list of common dreams, perhaps, "the dream within a dream" the dream that one is dreaming; certainly the dream of strange and beautiful scenery and the dream of hearing distinctly a voice in the room. Coming to explanations of these common elements in dream-life, the writer discards the suggestion that they are reminiscences of our arboreal ancestry or anthropoid life. He says, "We ceased being monkeys some time ago." The falling dream, he conjectures, might be explained "if any quaint trick were to be played by our circulation, or any other influence, on our optic nerves during sleep, so as to give us this impression of things moving upwards past us." A similar trick on the optic nerves might show things passing us horizontally, and so give the feeling of flying.

terpreter, find that ch year to

Can I

ons con-

Kruger certainly it had in the uld not are very aply."

nurriedly ands." flict in-this we we can ng Tom give us s. You and they d more action, ng the would

he had

So long ame to ere the valleys

could d most opard, e been opula-ghteen

young

e said, better must t that grow there then

fight.

. . . . . .

COUNT MOURAVIEFF AND HIS SUCCESSOR.

SOME REMINISCENCES AND AN APPRECIATION.

To the Contemporary Review for September, Mr. W. T. Stead contributes an article upon "Count Mouravieff and his Successor," which is chiefly interesting because of the reminiscences, with which it abounds, of his interviews with the Count in bygone years. Count Mouravieff, Mr. Stead declares, was never the real head of the Russian Foreign Office, and the human mainspring of that great department was Count Lamsdorff, who now reigns as the director of Russian foreign policy at St. Petersburg. Nevertheless, although Count Mouravieff was little more than the titular figure-head, he was a factor always to be reckoned with, if only because he was the official mouthpiece and favourite Minister of the Tsar. He spoke both in 1888, when he was Bismarckian, and in 1899, when he was more Francophile, with a genial abandoh and sometimes with an audacious candour that he learned from his great exemplar the German Chancellor.

HIS VIEWS ON FINLAND.

Count Mouravieff, for instance, did not hesitate in talking with Mr. Stead to ridicule the absurdities of the system of censorship over which his own brother presides, and he appears to have been equally frank as to the lamentable impolicy of the Bobrikoff regime in Finland. Mr. Stead says:—

Count Mouravieff did not in the least attempt to conceal his belief that the attempt to increase the Finnish military contingent on the eve of the Peace Conference was a bitise. Of course he held the doctrine, common to all Russians and most Imperialists everywhere, that the liberties of Home Ruled communities must be and should be subordinate to the supreme interests of the Empire; but he ridiculed the pedantic folly which insisted upon levelling up the Finnish contingent to the exact standard of the military levy that prevails throughout the Empire. "We have too many soldiers already," he said; "our difficulty is not men, but money to pay for them." The Finnish Diet "won't vote the money for the extra levy," and as Russia certainly did not want the men without the money, he spoke cheerfully about the prospect of dropping the whole business. But, of course, it was not in his department, and the Foreign Office is naturally the most sensitive to the universal sentiment of indignation that has been occasioned throughout the world by the Bobrikoff régime in Finland. No theoretical gain in the eyes of pedants of auto-cratic symmetry can possibly outweigh the disadvantages, political, moral and economical, which result from the impolicy of depriving the friends of Russia of what has hitherto been their one great object lesson as to the possibility of maintaining the freest possible political and religious institutions under the protection of the Russian Crown. It may please General Bobrikoff and his backers to describe the Tsar in Finnish official documents as the Emperor of Russia and no longer the Grand Duke of Finland. But the peaceful and contented loyalty of the Finns to their Grand Duke was worth so much to the Tsar that it was no wonder Count Mouravieff regarded with alarm the festering discontent fostered by the régime of Bobrikoff.

A NEW KIND OF OPEN DOOR.

We have also in the same article Count Mouravieff's explanation of the misunderstandings that took place over the cession of Port Arthur, and Sir Ashmead-Bartlett will probably note with shuddering horror the Count's suggestive little dissertation on the art and duty of leaving judicious loopholes by which diplomatists can find a convenient exit from difficult situations. "In diplomacy," said Cour.t Mouravieff, "it is never well to be too absolute, and you should never shut the door quite close. There should always be allowed a little outlet by which you can re-open negotiations. In diplomacy there is a great art in leaving doors open."

THE COUNT AND ENGLAND.

"S

which is wi

that would

Brita

wine,

for a outsi

is property of the property of

wher

the I

of th need pose

torp

wait

turb

mee

dan batt

to f

and free

it h vote

£19

thre

£19

we

Bri

allo

pro

this shi

ade

wo

im

of

ma

COL

is 1

ho

gre fir

lef

m

th

to li

n v c e

Mr' Stead claims for Count Mouravieff no small share in the pacific settlement of the Fashoda question. He was so faithful to Russia's French ally as to point out to the French, with painful accuracy of detail, their unpreparedness for war. The French listened to him as a friend, and his counsel gave them the moral courage to take a most painful step. It is probable that Count Mouravieff would have greatly enjoyed arranging an International Intervention on behalf of the Boers, but this was rendered abortive by the refusal of the German Emperor to fall into line. Two years ago Count Mouravieff told Mr. Stead that sooner or later there would perhaps be in China a complete revolution, and an unexampled smashup of the State. "We stand on the watch and wait events. If only the railway were completed, and Port Arthur converted into a Gibraltar, Russia might await the great catastrophe with comparative equanimity."

COUNT LAMSDORFF.

Of Count Mouravieff's successor, Count Lamsdorff, Mr. Stead says:—

Count Lamsdorff is in the prime of life. For many years past he has had in his hands all the threads of the Russian foreign policy. A friend and pupil of M. de Giers, he resembles his teacher in many respects. He is a man of peace, but he is also a man of iron will, indomitable industry and quiet persistent perseverance. He is unmarried. His only spouse is the department in which he has spent all his waking hours. Society has no charms for him, but he is idolised by his subordinates, who regard him as the incarnation of the tradition and the storehouse of all the information of the Russian Foreign Office. He is a man who appreciates too highly the importance of establishing confidence ever to allow his tongue the liberties indulged in by Count Mouravieff. With M. de Giers, he said to me once, admiringly, a word was a deed. It was Count Lamsdorff who, first of all Russian Ministers, emphasised his conviction of the greatness of the character of the present Emperor. It was Count Lamsdorff who first took up M. Basili's suggestion as to an international conference for the arrest of armaments. And it has been Count Lamsdorff who, during the whole of Count Mouravieff's tenure of office, has been, under the Emperor, the real director of the foreign policy of Russia.

Russian Story of St. George and the Dragon.

RUSSIAN sacred pictures are described by Mr. Ernest W. Lowry in the Sunday Magazine for September. The Chinese trouble, having put new life into the story of St. George and the Dragon, will shed fresh interest on this Russian version of it:—

Another very popular household eikon is that which shows St. George in the act of slaying the Dragon. Its meaning is told in an old legend, passed down among the peasants. The inhabitants of the pagan city of Troy worshipped nothing but gold and silver, we are told, so the Lord made the watercourses to run molten gold instead of water, with the result that these two products were soon transposed in value. After a time He took pity on the misery and thirst of the people, and made a deep lake in front of their town; but as a punishment he placed therein a monster dragon, who demanded from the people a maiden every day in exchange for water. Soon the supply of the former ran short, and all the maids in the place were sacrificed to the monster, except the king's daughter. When her turn came to follow her sisters, and she was placed by the lake side, the dragon came up to devour her, as he had done her predecessors; but St. George descended from heaven on a milk-white horse, and after the exciting conflict depicted in the eikon slew the dragon.

Will the lovers of dark meanings see in the worshippers of gold and silver the modern concessionaires, and in the maidens the missionaries?

XUM

FAULTS IN OUR FLEET.

MR. ARNOLD WHITE'S INDICTMENT.

"SHALL Britain be Ladysmithed?" is the ejaculation which heads Mr. Arnold White's paper in Cassell's. It is written throughout in the alarmist vein. He urges that not invasion, but starvation, is the danger which would follow the defeat of our navy. "Sea power to Britain is only another word for existence-food, corn, wine, and raw material." She "can only exist for a part of six weeks without sustenance from outside." Mr. White goes on to ask how far Britain is prepared to face France and Russia in alliance. (1) The Channel Fleet is not, he says, a Channel fleet when war breaks out; it becomes the second division of the Mediterranean squadron. (2) To prevent the junction of the French fleets hailing from Brest and Toulon, we need a mobile boom across the Straits of Gibraltar com-posed of torpedo-boat destroyers. Yet "not a single torpedo-boat destroyer has been laid down by the Admiralty during the present year." Their plea of waiting for improvements in marine propulsion on the turbine principle Mr. White will not allow. (3) To meet the dash of the Russian fleet from the Dardanelles on Port Said and Alexandria, we have not battleships enough in the Mediterranean; we should have to fall back on light vessels-torpedo-boat destroyers, and second and third class cruisers. (4) Parliament has freely voted money for an increased navy, but millions of it have not been spent. Mr. White's figures are: sums toted in 1897-1899, £23,735,221; sums utilised, only £19,113,281; sums lapsed, £4,621,940. During the same three years France and Russia have together spent £19,440,000 on their fleets, or about £320,000 more than (5) The three admirals' standard required that British battleships should be as five to three, so that allowing for mishaps at least four to three should be the proportion in actual encounter. "We do not possess ships." (6) "The British Navy does not possess an adequate supply of cruisers ":-

Such fleets as we have, however, in the course of a few days would be merely floating iron; floating and futile, because immovable forts, unless attached to them were swift colliers able to steam with the fleet, and with hatches cut to fit the positions of the hatches of the vessels they are required to coal; floating machine and repairing shops; ammunition ships; store, water condensing, refrigerating, hospital, and laundry ships. Where is this fleet of auxiliaries? It does not exist. The politicians hope to be able to improvise it in time of war. No doubt a great deal can be done by the loss of precious days and weeks, but in the next naval war eight and a half minutes during the first twenty-four hours may mean more than thirty years a week

The victualling of our Mediterranean fleet is at present left to the unofficial bumboat men shipped at Malta.

These are six counts selected out of Mr. White's indictment.

"BLACKWOOD'S" CRITICISMS.

Blackwood devotes a long article to the statement of "Some Needs of the Navy." The chief point urged by the writer is the importance of sending more of our ships to sea. Of the 114,000 officers and men on the active list, only 50,000 are in sea-going ships. The officers and men ashore or in harbour ships are in danger of vegetating, and in case of sudden emergencies the newly commissioned ships would be manned by strangers to each other, to their officers and to their ships. This rawness, when a swift blow needs to be struck or parried, a pears to the writer a serious detraction from our naval efficiency. He also deplores with Mr. White the necessity of supplementing the Mediterranean Squadron from the Channel Squadron. He calls attention to the odd arrangement which gives the commanding officer of the sea-going Channel fleet no authority over his base ports, which are under the control of commanders-in-chief who reside ashore. This divided responsibility has one among many results. For instance—the special place of assembly of our seagoing fighting ships at home—Portland—is absolutely devoid of all facilities for repairs of the simplest kind, and the coaling arrangements, both there and elsewhere in home waters, are such as no commander-inchief abroad would tolerate for a moment at a port over which held sway.

The writer recommends that, as at stations abroad, so in the home waters, the active service affoat should take precedence of and exercise authority over the more sedentary service at home.

FRENCH NAVAL POWER

AS SEEN BY A FRENCH NAVAL EXPERT.

In the August Revue des Revues M. Masson-Forestier delivers a discourse on the French Navy, taking as his text the words "Speed is but Weakness." At the height of France's pride in her swift navy, a male Cassandra arises, and pours cold water on her enthusiasm. France stops her ears, but when M. Normand, himself the first authority on and designer of rapid vessels, raises his voice to protest against them, it is hard not to listen. The French fleet, in the opinion of this expert of experts, is so inferior that it is well-nigh impotent. "Speed is not necessary, save to the fleet which aspires to exercise dominion over the seas." Speed, therefore, is of importance to England, and to England alone, because without quick vessels she could not rapidly collect her scattered naval forces. To France speed is useless. Beyond a certain point an additional knot per hour is no wise worth the fabulous sums it costs. "A high-speed vessel like our Feanne d'Arc costs the price of two vessels of equal fighting force but only half speed. On the day of battle, the two would sink the Feanne d'Arc in a twinkling. Victory, in short, belongs to the athlete whose loins and fists are the most powerful, not to him who gets away most quickly." Besides, the mechanism of very fast vessels being delicate as that of a watch, the least thing puts it out. Six reasons are then given why these highspeed vessels should not be of service in the hour of need. We quote the following :-

Speed enables a nation to force battle upon a foe who wants to flee. Well, does anyone seriously believe that in case of a contest with England (and is she not the only foe we have to fear?) we ought to take much into consideration the contingency of English admirals flying in terror at the mere sight of a tricolor?

The speed of a fleet is regulated by the slowest and not by the quickest vessel, and during a naval battle movements must always be slow.

"Only in France," says M. Masson-Forestier, "are M. Normand's ideas despised." The French populace has got speed-at-any-price on the brain.

As for starving England out by capturing her liners, why, for years past, he says, "the English have had regular contracts with certain foreign shipowners, chiefly American, transferring to the latter the full rights of an English ship in case a state of war came about. Should a French cruiser then board a Cunarder, the captain will merely hoist the star-spangled banner. "Now, Sir, fire on the American flag if you dare." "Should we fire?" asks M. Masson-Forestier.

small share stion. He stion. He coint out to teer unpresent as a friend, to take a Mouravieff ernational s rendered ror to fall vieff told taps be in ed smashait events.

rt Arthur the great

amsdorff,

years past ian foreign embles his he is also persistent se is the . Society ordinates, the store ffice. He rtance of liberties he said to int Lamssised his e present M. Basili's arrest of luring the en, under Russia.

Ernest r. The story of h shows aning is ts. The hing but crourses hat these hime He made a e placed maiden to the came to ide, the cessors; horse, lew the ippers in the

TWO PICTURES OF MODERN ITALY.

ENORMOUS PROGRESS.

THERE is a cheerful paper in the Nineteenth Century by Mr. Dalla Vecchia upon the situation in Italy. In everything except in politics Italy is doing well. The nation, he maintains, is richer and more prosperous than ever it was before. Even the assassination of King Humbert has done wonders in waking Italy from a long sleep. It has also given her a king much more resolute and determined than King Humbert. Enormous progress, he says, has been made in thirty years in every branch of national life. Industrial Italy is now almost self-supporting, whilst in other matters he has an excellent report to make :-

As to agriculture there is great progress. Scientific im-ovements are visible everywhere. Lands for centuries left provements are visible everywhere. desolate are now in full cultivation. In some provinces agricultural products have increased to four times their previous bulk. The working classes are better housed, fed, and paid. Parliament has passed several social reforms for their benefit; a pension for old age, and a college for the orphans of workmen killed at their work, are among the reforms passed at the desire of King Humbert himself. I have recently travelled from one end to the other of Italy, after many years of absence from that country, and everywhere I noticed great progress. The aspect of the cities bears marks of great improvement. Milan and Turin can, no doubt, vie with the finest capitals in the world. The only disappointing thing I observed, amid such a marvellous improvement, was the state of political education.

"NO EUROPEAN NATION SO CRIMINAL."

In great contrast to Mr. Dalla Vecchia's article is that which Professor Fiamingo contributes to the Con-temporary Review on "Italian Anarchism." He declares that everywhere in Italy there is profound malcontent, and dissatisfaction with a Government which extracts twofifths of the whole earnings of the country in taxation :-

There is not an Italian who does not attribute the terrible and profound financial calamities of his country to the mistaken action of the Government, and the chorus of condemnation against this Government, which appears to be doing its best to impoverish 35 millions of inhabitants, and to restrict in every possible way their personal liberty, is every day becoming more pronounced, and almost threatening in its intensity. It is difficult now to meet a young Italian of a certain degree of culture who does not style himself a "literary anarchist," or at least a " Marxian Socialist."

This is rather serious considering what the Professor says as to the fact that brigandage is a secular Italian institution. No nation in Europe is so criminal as Italy. For one homicide that takes place in England, twenty occur in Italy. More than one-third of the one hundred and fifty regicides committed during this century in Europe and America were the work of Italians. Italian anarchism is simply a transmutation of the secular Italian brigandage under the influence of modern civilisation. Italian anarchists are men of an epileptoid temperament under the influence of a veritable hypnotic delusion almost amounting to auto-suggestion with regard to their mission as apostles of political murder.

A VIVACIOUS sketch of the "Corsican at Home," by Mr. Charles Edwardes, appears in Macmillan's for September. He reports that the Corsicans, observing the rapid development of Sardinia, are almost sighing for Italian rule in preference to the French. He recommends the employment of honest native functionaries in place of the imported French, and suggests that agricultural industrialism might complete the work, which education "The island has begun, of extirpating brigandage. ought to be one of Europe's most popular playgrounds."

THE PICTURE-BOOK OF THE STARS.

THERE is a very interesting paper in the Nineteenth Century by Mr. E. Walter Maunder, an assistant at Greenwich Observatory, entitled "The Oldest Picturebook of All." It is the picture-book of the stars. Every one who has looked at an astronomical map is familiar with the wildly imaginative figures which are supposed to be represented by the constellations of the stars. It is known that forty-eight of these dated back to very remote antiquity. Mr. Maunder describes the ingenious method by which a Swede of the name of Schwartz living at Baku at the end of the last century, succeeded in locating the place where this earliest of all picture-books was first invented. After describing in detail the various steps by which the origin of this celestial picture-book was discovered, he sums up the result as follows :-

This oldest picture-book of all was designed nearly five thousand years ago by a people dwelling somewhere between the Ægean and the Caspian, which domesticated the bull, the sheep, the goat, the dog, and the horse; which hunted the bear, the lion, and the hare, and used the bow and the spear. Yet a people not merely nomadic, but either maritime themselves or at least acquainted with the ocean and with navigation. They had made not a little progress in Astronomy, for they had determined the length of the year and had carried the science of observation so far that they could recognise the position of the sun relative to the various ecliptic groups of stars. religion involved the erection of altars and the rite of sacrifice. They were acquainted with stories of the Fall and of the Deluge substantially the same as those preserved to us in the early chapters of Genesis, and they devised many of the constellations to give appropriate and permanent record of them, no doubt because they were included, as with ourselves, in their sacred history. The people was an organised one, having some definite and recognised authority, whether king, priest, patriarch, or council does not appear; but of that authority the work of constellation-making received beyond doubt the express sanction.

A "Suppressed Kipling."

THE Young Man for September sketches the life story of Rudyard Kipling. The writer mentions that the poet's Christian name was taken from a little place in the Potteries called Rudyard, where his father and mother became engaged. The following figures illustrate the immense vogue his writings have obtained :-

His books-something like thirty volumes-have had a constant and uninterrupted sale. His last volume of short stories, "The Day's Work," has broken the record for such a book with a sale of nearly 70,000. 40,000 copies have been sold of "The Courtship of Dinah Shadd," 30,000 of "Many Inventions," 40,000 of each of the "Jungle Books," 30,000 of "Soldier Tales," 40,000 of "The Seven Seas," and 30,000 of "Captains Courageous." Every book he writes is a gold mine to Kipling, with a varying output, of course. His short stories bring him from £200 to £400 each, and for many of them he receives ultimately over £1,000....Somebody has reckoned that Mr. Kipling makes £12,000 a year by his books, the sale of which is steadily increasing. It will be surprising news to many people to know that Mr. Kipling has written at least one book which has not been published. It was written after the publication of Plain Tales from the Hills," and was a collection of short stories similar to these, entitled "Forty-Five Mornings. stories similar to these, entitled "Forty-Five Mornings," It was accepted, set up in type, printed, and prepared for binding, when Mr. Robert Barr read it. "It is equal to 'Plain Tales,'" was Mr. Barr's opinion. But this was not enough for Mr. Kipling. "As good will not do," said the author. "It must be better, or it won't be published." And published it never has been. The type was distributed, the printed copies destroyed, and the MSS. probably thrown into the waste-basket, in which, Mr. Kipling himself has told us, a great deal of what he writes finds its cradle and its grave.

MR. article 1 develop

PO

Mr. I railways transpo are not nowher traffic v and the chance suggest island :

First, the inte Second, coast. or Nagu

> The coffee,

conditi

is not s to the ment tobacc would The co best in It is many ti danger groves orange

> ment says N The can on unit of ment f

The

Mr. insula one so be th disap The Spanis the su almost trict s intemp It is change

of onl Mr lovely Tha indust

that it earth. island

PORTO RICO; THE BEAUTIFUL ISLAND.

MR. ALBERT W. BUEL contributes a most interesting article to the Engineering Magazine on the industrial development of the island of Porto Rico.

TRANSPORTATION FACILITIES.

Mr. Buel says that it would be impracticable to build railways in so hilly and small a country. At present all transport from the interior has to be done on roads which are nothing more than mountain trails. As the island is nowhere more than forty miles wide, and the heaviest traffic will always be towards the coast from the interior and therefore down hill, a trolley line would have little chance against good roads. Mr. Buel makes the following suggestions for the improvement of transport in the island:—

First, construct improved highways direct from all points in the interior to the coast by the shortest practicable lines. Second, construct a highway round the island and near the coast. Third, complete the belt-line French railway. Fourth, improve the harbours of San Juan, Ponce, Mayaguez and Jobobs, or Naguabo.

FERTILITY AND PRODUCTION.

The chief products of the island to-day are sugar, coffee, and tobacco. Mr. Buel thinks that with proper conditions the sugar crop could be doubled. The tobacco is not so good as Havana tobacco, but that is chiefly due to the different way in which it is treated. The improvement in handling will follow the introduction of the tobacco in the United States market, after which there would be an increase in the demand and production. The coffee is, in the opinion of experts and epicures, the best in the world:—

It is now a large crop, but the island is capable of producing many times as much. . . . The orange flourishes, and is not in danger from the frosts that have played such havoc with the groves in Florida. It is confidently believed that the Porto Rico orange crop will in a few years be a leader in the orange market.

EDUCATION.

The article is chiefly devoted to the lines of development that would show immediate or quick results; but, says Mr. Buel:—

The eventual and proper development of the island, however, can only be attained by that long line that has a generation as its unit of time—Education. The United States Military Government found the island practically without a school system.

Mr. Buel then proceeds to lament what the American insular board of education has done. They have built one school house, whose only redeeming feature seems to be that it is not fireproof, and may therefore shortly disappear:—

They have accomplished the introduction of American non-Spanish-speaking teachers for Spanish-speaking children, and the substitution of English for Spanish; the appointment of almost illiterate American adventurers to such positions as district superintendents, and the appointment and retention of intemperate men to responsible positions in charge of the schools. It is right and proper enough to introduce English, but the change of language should have occupied several years instead of only one.

Mr. Buel sums up his article, which is illustrated by lovely photos of the island, as follows:—

That Porto Rico is susceptible of wonderful improvement and industrial development is as self-evident to anyone who sees it as that it is one of the most beautiful, lovely, and fertile spots on earth. But nothing can move until the political status of the island is settled.

SICK AND WOUNDED IN WAR TIME.

MR. MURRAY GUTHRIE, M.P., contributes to the Nineteenth Century a paper on the South African war hospitals which embodies the evidence he has already given before the Royal Commission. It is very unpleasant reading.

MR. BURDETT-COUTTS CONFIRMED.

He confirms Mr. Burdett-Coutts' statements and adds others of his own even more gruesome. In Pretoria he declares that practically no attempt was made by the authorities to buy necessaries needed for patients. They were short of everything, indeed, for the successful treatment of typhoid and dysentery cases. Half the men were lying in the clothes they had worn for the last three months, and were covered with vermin. Mr. Guthrie says that the Government and Lord Roberts made no difficulty about supplies:—

I am therefore compelled to argue that the deficiency of doctors, orderlies, and nursing sisters was due to a lack of foresight, and that the blame rests on the heads of the Medical Department in South Africa. This being so, one is reluctantly brought to the conclusion that the local military medical authorities were unfitted for the task they had to perform—a task, I admit, of the greatest difficulty and magnitude, and one which I do not think their previous training in any way fitted them to cope with. There was apparent at headquarters, where most of the sickness prevailed, an obvious lack of energy and organisation; initiative was non-existent. Had the Royal Army Medical Corps had at headquarters some man of capacity and determination who would have grasped the whole problem and worked it out in time, I believe there would have been no occasion for a Royal Commission.

A REVOLUTION NEEDED.

Surgeon-Colonel Francis H. Welch, writing in the Fortnightly Review upon the care of sick and wounded in war, says:—

One point is absolutely certain, and that is that nothing short of a revolution in the attitude and action of the War Office (especially its military section) will avail if future good is to come out of present evil, and the Royal Army Medical Corps to be so organised, systematised, and worked as to render the experience of the years since 1858 but a memory of the past; and we may further dogmatise and assert that nothing but a corps thoroughly prepared for war in every sense, with an efficient reserve, will meet the wants of the sick and wounded during war and reduce their hardships to those which are unavoidable, besides curtailing the great devastating disease factors to a minimum of potency.

HOSPITALS DEFENDED.

Mr. H. C. Shelley writes in the Sunday Strand on "Hospitals on the Veldt." He has but recently returned from the front. He has traversed the whole field from base to the very forefront of the battle line, including Modder River, Magersfontein, Bloemfontein, and Kroonstad. He says:—

My memory of all those scenes is still fresh, and I have no hesitation in declaring that Mr. Burdett-Coutts's charges—though in some very few instances true—are in almost every other sense untrue.

He was at Wynberg base hospital before and after enteric had made its appearance, but there was no fault to find. He has talked with officers and men, wounded and well, but has heard no word of complaint. He argues:—

Is it not a convincing proof of care and attention that the percentage of deaths among enteric patients has been so abnormally low—lower, indeed, than in well-equipped hospitals at home?

He concludes by asserting, "All that was possible for the fallen heroes of war was accomplished."

neteenth stant at Picture-Every familiar cosed to . It is remote method ving at ocating vas first teps by k was rly five between oull, the ne bear,

Yet a

They ey had ence of the Their crifice. Deluge e early lations doubt sacred lefinite ch, or ork of story poet's n the nother e the nction.

book been Many oo of mine stories em he I that which on of short

" It ding, les,'"
Mr. must never

des-

et, in

at he eople

which

AN AUSTRALIAN ESTIMATE OF LORD HOPETOUN.

In the July number of the Australasian Review of Reviews Mr. Fitchett pays high tribute to the character of Lord Hopetoun, who has been appointed first Governor-General of the Australian Commonwealth. dwelling upon the momentous importance of the choice of first Governor-General, Mr. Fitchett says :-

The first Governor-General of the Australian Commonwealth must make his personal influence felt over a continent. He must be trusted by all the colonies, but belong to no one of them. He must be a man of infinite tact, absolutely unselfish, and of perfect equipoise. His personality, in a word, will be or ought to be—one of the subtlest of the forces knitting the States of the Commonwealth into genuine unity. Lord Hopetoun, happily, is known to have all the qualities needed for this great office. His wealth and rank, his high place in the Queen's household, and the personal regard which the Queen is known to entertain for him, give him the social prestige his post needs. His personal character makes him universally trusted. Queen never had a more absolutely unselfish and loyal servant. He has the great advantage of knowing Australia and Australians perfectly, and has pleasant relations with the Australians perfectly, and has pleasant relations with the leading men of every colony. When in Victoria, Lord Hopetoun was regarded with a respect, through which ran a curious note of something like personal affection. His simplicity and naturalness of character, his crystalline sincerity—and even his look of physical fragility—all contributed to produce this feeling. He was held in the profoundest respect; and yet in the popular feeling there was an odd strain of what can only be described as a protecting impulse towards Lord Hopetoun. No caricaturist ever thought of towards Lord Hopetoun. No caricaturist ever thought of sprinkling him with a drop of satiric ink. Lord Hopetoun, it may be added, has really fine intellectual gifts, with a modest unconsciousness, on his own part, of their existence, which gives them an added charm. He does not pretend to be a speaker; yet when he talks, there is a certain thrill in his voice, a directness in his logic, and a look of frank sincerity in his face, which produce all the effects of eloquence without any of its pretensions. Lord Hopetoun, too, is a very wealthy man; and no one need expect to be a successful Governor-General of Australia who is not prepared to spend three times his official salary in maintaining the splendour of his great post.

Query: is it altogether a wise thing or altogether a right thing that the choice of Governor-General should be restricted to the very few persons who are able to incur so large an expenditure out of their own pockets. Is this not merely a somewhat aggravated form of that plutocracy against which democracies are always warned to be on their guard? The only corrective or palliative for such a system would be the formation of a special fund by patriots of the Empire who would supply the wherewithal to employ the ablest statesmen of the Empire to fulfil the higher duties of the State without being disqualified because of an empty purse.

ADMIRERS of De Quincey and his work will be interested in an article on "The De Quincey Collection in the Moss Side Public Library," which Mr. W. E. A. Akon has published in the August number of the Library Association Record. The formation of special collections and especially collections of local interest-in our public libraries is much to be commended. In the present instance, there is a local reason for the choice of the subject, for tradition says that not only was De Quincey born and baptised in Manchester, but that his childhood was passed at The Farm, Moss Side. Most of De Quincey's writings appeared originally in the pages of different magazines; and though the author died in 1859, the publication of his articles extends from 1800 to 1891. The library of Moss Side is therefore to be congratulated on the completeness of its collection, there being only a very few gaps to fill up.

SHALL BRITAIN BECOME A REPUBLIC?

THE Editor of the Cosmopolitan writes in the current number an article entitled "Republic of the United number an article entitied Republic States of Great Britain," in which he forecasts a change States of Great Britain. "Many from Monarchy to a Republic in Great Britain. "Many careful students of affairs," says Mr. Walker, "feel confident that England, shocked by the course of affairs in South Africa and the horrible conditions prevailing under British rule in India, is in process of awakening. again, "It is only a question of time until England the Republic shall take the place of England the Monarchy. But only a great shock, mixed perhaps with such a menace as is found in the international situation of this hour, could induce that mental activity which must precede change." The great shock is to come from the discovery that the British Army can never be a success while it continues to be organised on a social basis, and while promotion is secured by favouritism. Mr. Walker thinks that the investigation of the defects of the Army will lead to a discovery of the weaknesses of a form of government which must be ever "at the disposition of such political adventurers as Chamberlain, Rhodes and Company."

THE QUESTION OF INDIA.

Butthere is another argument in favour of the overthrow of the present form of government. Mr. Walker says :-

While the attention of Englishmen is attracted to the shortcomings of its governmental system in South Africa, a still more terrible governmental tragedy is being enacted in India. The official reports make the deaths of a single week in the Indian Empire greater than those of the entire Boer war. "Not our fault," the apologists hasten to add. But with the granaries of the Americas bursting with overproduction, and the banks of England overflowing with capital, the world will not dismiss the matter so lightly.

The writer continues :-

The verdict of the disinterested historian will be that England should have dropped the attempt at administration when it proved for successive years so disastrous to the common people. There is no more reason for British rule in India than for British rule in Japan. India, if left to herself, would to-day possess a government equal in intelligence to that of Japan.

THE COMING OF THE REPUBLIC.

These are subjects for profound thought by Englishmen. From thought will come dissatisfaction, and from dissatisfaction will spring, in the end, the English republic, just as dissatisfaction with George III. was the prompting of the American republic.

Mr. Walker unfortunately does not give his opinion as to how the new republic should proceed with regard to India, or on the question of the army. As far as colonies are concerned, it must be confessed that up to the present time the two great republics of the world have not been conspicuously successful.

"JUSTICE to England" is the heading Mr. J. Holt Schooling gives to his plea in the September Pall Mall Magazine for a redistribution of seats throughout the United Kingdom. At present Ireland has 103 members in the House of Commons, Scotland 72, and England and Wales 495. The population in 1901 would, Mr. Schooling reckons, require the figures to run: Ireland 70, Scotland 71, England and Wales 529. The number of registered electors would require Ireland to have 73, Scotland 68, Wales 30 (as at present), England 499. Judged by contribution of revenue to Imperial service, Ireland should have only 19, Scotland 68, England and Wales 583. London at present has only 61 members against Ircland's 103, whereas the population-standard would in 190°, by Mr. Schooling's reckoning, assign 80 to London and 70 to Ireland.

IN secret on "1 summ about "chai to-day field neigh as an all th kingd the si The inden the r inden or to Th

Pow

cessi

whic Russ upor Her bird to g Eng " In of h that " be love well

poli whe mor dec new rein wit mei the lan Ru reti tha > iea on Ar al to tit

wit

na di U sl the w

UBLIC?

in the current the United asts a change ain. "Many er, "feel cone of affairs in vailing under ening." And England the e Monarchy. with such a ation of this ca must prene from the be a success al basis, and Mr. Walker of the Army of a form of e overthrow cer says :to the short-, a still more India. The n the Indian " Not our granaries of he banks of t dismiss the isposition of

Rhodes and

nat England on when it non people. for British y possess a inglishmen. satisfaction satisfaction republic. pinion as regard to colonies p to the orld have

J. Holt hout the nembers England uld, Mr. Ireland number have 73, nd 499. service, and and nembers tandard sign 80

AFGHANISTAN AND ITS AMIR.

In the August Forum, Sultan Mahommad Khan, chief secretary of Afghanistan, writes as one having authority on "the present status of Afghanistan." The writer summarises the principal changes which have come about during Amir Abdur Rahman's twenty years' reign, "changes which have made Afghanistan what she is to-day." Formerly, "Afghanistan was not only an open field for the land-grabbing propensities of her foreign neighbours, but every Afghan chief looked upon himself as an independent ruler." The present Amir has changed all that; he rules supreme over a strong consolidated kingdom with well-defined boundaries. He has trebled the size and importance of his dominions :-

The government of Afghanistan owes no national debt or war indemnity to any nation in the world; hence no one can say to the ruler of Afghanistan that he must pay his debts or war indemnities before being allowed to buy or make war materials, or to undertake any military preparations whatsoever.

HIS ANTI-RUSSIAN FEELING.

The Amir has no foreign ambassadors, and "no Power on earth has any right to force him to make concessions for the formation of railways, etc.," a reform to which he has a great objection. In the event of a Russian attack on Herat, much pressure is being put upon him to construct a railway from Kandahar to Herat; but the Amir, "acting upon the principle of a bird in the hand being worth two in the bush," prefers to get as much money and war material as possible from England before any such Russian attack on his country. "In the first place, he is a little doubtful as to the amount of help he would get at such a time!" Also he prefers that his country should be defended by his own troops of "born warriors," and by none other. The Amir does not love his brother Russian :-

He often says that the policy of all Oriental Governments, as well as that of India, is to keep out of the way of Russia; the policy of Russia being to take only that piece of a country where she finds the people are keeping out of the way. Furthermore, when Russia occupies the new province she at once declares peace; but these promises of peace last only till the newly occupied place is strongly fortified and ready to send reinforcements to the next place Russia wishes to annex, with or without treaties. The Amir thinks that his is the only Government in the East which rather prefers the policy of keeping in the way than out of it; holding on strongly to every inch of land, even to the point of death, rather than trying to evade Russia, In other words, his Government stoutly refuses to retreat, or give way to Russian advance. The Amir believes that Russia keeps on massing her large forces near his borders with the idea that he, like the late Amir Shere Ali Khan, fearing the near neighbourhood of vast bodies of Russian troops on his borders, would give way to Russian designs. But the Amir thinks that he knows better.

HIS POSSIBLE SUCCESSORS.

So ably has the Amir ruled that his death—and he has already been at its door several times—is looked forward to with much apprehension by Afghan patriots. The title to the Afghan throne is based upon election by the nation, nomination by the previous sovereign, and hereditary succession; but Abdur Rahman succeeded "simply owing to his own sagacity and the support of the people, and he has every intention of securing that his eldest son shall reign after him. There are other claimants to the throne, but Sultan Mahommad thinks none of them powerful enough to be really dangerous. After her experience with Shah Shujah, he does not think England will meddle again in Afghan succession questions. The Russian candidate, however, cannot be disregarded. Russia "has always been working and intriguing to place her own candidate on the Kabul throne, failing possession of Kabul herself":

The Russians had quite thought that the present Amir, who was sent by them in 1880, would look upon himself as a friend of Russia in preference to England. The Amir, however, is more friendly to his own interests than to those of anybody else; and he is shrewd enough to play his own cards well and to know from which of his two powerful neighbours he can expect the Russia is now keeping another cat to let out of the bag, whenever an opportunity arises, in the person, namely, of Ishak Khan, the late governor and viceroy of Turkestan. Amir's first cousin, son of the late Amir Azam Khan, whose father also ruled Afghanistan, though for a short time only. He rebelled against the Amir in 1888, and ever since his defeat has resided in Russia. The Amir has not certainly succeeded in cutting off and separating Ishak's followers from him, though he is working toward that end. The Russians give these followers a handsome allowance and all sorts of hopes and promises.

To the ordinary observer of the circumstances, three things are in favour of Ishak Khan: (1) his father, Azam, was Amir; (2) he was governor and viceroy over nearly one-third of Afghanistan; and (3) he showed considerable strength in opposing the Amir's armies in 1888

THE AMIR AS SOCIAL REFORMER-

The Amir has greatly improved the social life and conditions of his dominions :

At the present time English, German, and French gentlemen, and English ladies, go about the land in safety without any escort or bodyguard. Every person in the land has some escor or bodyguard. Every person in the land mas some occupation by which he may earn his living; in fact, labour is more expensive at present in Afghanistan than it is in India. There is a saying that Satan finds mischief for idle hands; and it was owing to their lack of occupation that in past times the Afghan people fell into the habit of taking each other's property

So many new industries and enterprises have given employment to hundreds of thousands of people once idle; and crime has consequently enormously decreased. Two reforms are very suggestive :

The Amir made a law that all prisoners of war, prisoners for debt, as well as those imprisoned for some other offences, who were anxious to be released from prison, might learn some kind of work, with the understanding that when they became competent their sentences would be remitted, and they would be employed in the Government service.

The Amir has also made a law, unknown before in Afghanistan, with regard to life imprisonment, sending people who deserve this punishment into such remote parts of his dominions as are sparsely populated, giving them land to cultivate.

-AND EMANCIPATOR.

The Amir has also established Courts of Justice and police stations in every town; but telegraphs, like railways, he will not have, apparently for political reasons. He has greatly raised the status of women, who before his reign were regarded very much as property. In 1883 he passed a law declaring that no widow should be forced to marry any one against her will, whereas formerly she was forced to marry the brother or next male relative of her husband. Girls were also often fraudulently married under age without their consent; but these and other abuses are now stopped. Slavery also is a thing of the past:

Though there are still slaves in the houses of some of the chiefs and of the nobility, yet the slave-trade, which was practised in Afghanistan before the Amir's reign, is entirely

Only prisoners of war and the children of slaves are still in bondage. Some of the highest officials in the Amir's service-his most confidential courtier, for instance are slaves. Even the late treasurer was so till his death. These, Mahommad Khan says, are only a few of the beneficial changes wrought by Abdur Rahman.

OUR BROTHERS IN MID-AFRICA.

POSSIBLE PASSENGERS ON THE CAPE-TO-CAIRO LINE.

The first to go over the Cape-to-Cairo route is, according to the testimony of the President of the Royal Geographical Society, Mr. Ewart S. Grogan, a youth of twenty-five. His narrative of this exploit appears in the Geographical Journal for August, and forms a series of picturesque glimpses of the African interior. He begins with a few words descriptive of the Gorongoza country of Portuguese East Africa. He says:—

The quantity of game in all this country is incredible. Crossing the great plain just as the waters were falling and the new grass growing up, we saw over forty thousand head of game, mainly blue wildebeste, from one point; and during our stay of five months, besides many fine heads of buffalo and various species of antelope, we shot seventeen lions and captured alive five cubs, three of which are now disporting themselves in Regent's Park.

LOWEST IN THE HUMAN SCALE.

But it is the human fauna which supply the most interesting pictures in Mr. Grogan's story. Here is a type of humanity which Mr. Rhodes' railway ought soon to bring within easy access of civilised curiosity, as its home lies to the south of Lake Albert Edward:—

When exploring with a small number of followers, I observed some ape-like creatures leering at me from behind banana palms, and with considerable difficulty my Ruanda guide induced one of them to come and be inspected; he was a tall man, with the long arms, pendant paunch, and short legs of the ape, pro-nouncedly microcephalous and prognathous. At first he was terribly alarmed, but soon gained confidence, and when I asked him about elephant and other game, he gave me the most realistic representations of them and of how they should be attacked. I failed to exactly define their social status, but from the contempt in which they were held by the Waruanda their local caste must be very low. The stamp of the brute was so strong on them that I should place them lower in the human scale than any other natives I have seen in Africa. Their type is totally distinct from the other people's, and, judging from the twenty to thirty specimens I saw, very consistent. Their face, body, and limbs are covered with wiry hair, and the hang of the long powerful arms, the slight stoop of the trunk, and the hunted, vacant expression of the face made up a tout ensemble that was a terrible pictorial proof of Darwinism. The pigmies are of similar build, but have the appearance of full-grown, exceedingly powerful men compressed, and with much more intelligent faces. The pigmies are to these ape-like beings as the dog-faced baboons are to the gorillas. Probably they are, like the pigmies, survivals of former inhabitants of the country, the difference in their type depending on the surroundings in which they have had to struggle for existence. type of pigmy is a magnificent example of nature's adaptability, being a combination of immense strength, necessary for the precarious hunting life they lead, and compactness indispensable to rapid movement in dense forest where the pig-runs are the only means of passage.

A FEAST OF HUMAN VULTURES.

The Mboga country affords the writer a scene which suggests that table manners are in as rudimentary stage as the tailor's art in those regions. Mr. Grogan had shot an elephant:—

The Balegga who inhabit the hills to the north, and who were suffering terribly from the effects of the long drought, looked upon me as a great institution, and swarmed down in hundreds for the meat. A weird sight it was. Stark naked savages, with long greased plaits of hair hanging down to their shoulders, were perched on every available inch of the carcase, hacking away with knives and spears, yelling, whooping, wrestling, cursing and munching, covered with blood and entrails; the new-comers tearing off lumps of meat and swallowing them raw, the earlier arrivals defending great lumps of offal and other delicacies, while others were crawling in and out of the intestines like so many prairie marmots. Old men, young men, prehistoric hags, babies, one and all gorging or gorged, smearing themselves with blood, laughing, and fighting. Pools of blood, strips of hide, vast bones, blocks of meat, individuals who had not dined wisely but too well, lay around in bewildering confusion, and in two short hours all was finished. Nothing remained but the great gaunt ribs like the skeleton of a shipwreck, and a few disconsolate-looking vultures perched thereon.

These African diners may not be desirable messmates, but, after all, the worst horrors reported by Mr. Grogan are the atrocities perpetrated by Belgian troops on British territory, raiding tribes under our protection, killing the men and carrying off women and cattle. The writer has convinced himself by inquiries from neighbouring tribes of the truth of these grave charges.

A RACE OF GIANTS.

As a foil to the pigmies may be set the Dinkas, who occupy the region west of Bahr-el-Jebel, whom the writer thus describes:—

The Dinkas have enormous droves of cattle, which they value very highly; they never kill them for food, but from time to time tap the blood, which they drink greedily. They are of colossal stature; some of the herdmen I saw must have been very nearly seven feet, and in every settlement the majority of the men towered above me, while my boys seemed the merest pigmies by their side. They smear themselves with a paste made of wood-ash to protect themselves from the bites of the mosquitoes, and the long lines of warriors threading their way in single file through the marsh appear like so many grey spectres. They are absolutely nude, considering any sort of covering as effeminate. Their invariable weapons are a long club made of bastard ebony, a fish lance, and a broad-bladed spear, and the chiefs wear enormous ivory bracelets. The southern Dinkas cut their hair like a mop. Both bleach it with manure.

Mr. Grogan and his party narrowly escaped massacre by these Dinkas, who treacherously and without warning

Such are some of the human ingredients in the mid-African crucible, into which will be thrust ere long the mixing rod of the Cape-to-Cairo railway.

The Negro Problem in the Southern States.

THIS is the subject of a moderate and thoughtful paper by General Grosvenor in the August Forum. General Grosvenor says that the practical, though not the avowed, object of a large body of Southerners is undoubtedly the disfranchisement of the negro. "Offices of every kind shall be held by white men alone," and the coloured men shall have no voice in choosing the white men to fill these offices:—

Great art has been used to make it appear that the disfranchisement contemplated in the new formula of political rights is applicable alike to the white and the black; and, literally speaking, that is true.

This disfranchisement movement the writer considers especially dangerous to the South. There the negroes have once tasted liberty and know its value, and resent its removal; "and no men enjoyed citizenship mere deeply than did the enfranchised slaves of the South." Although "no people ever developed the elements of good citizenship with such remarkable rapidity as did the coloured people after emancipation," disfranchisement will probably stop all such progress, and the coloured man will recede much faster than he advanced. White men need never fear the domination of the blacks. The writer's remedies are patience, hope, and the education of the negroes.

LAB

THE

The solve and so I Australitried, v sought determined A wag operation and emicitizen Board under t process a legal of experit it is att workm experit as to it The in othe Board may b appeal

of the

the M

unusu

Assen

arbitr

concil

judge respectivith union The member first to manner is strepena Ne and socia tratic power what cook be a hous Don the be b

exc pro say own gro hol

holpor lan the hui

he intestines , prehistoric aring themals who had dering con-ed thereon. nessmates, r. Grogan on British illing the vriter has they value n time to ey are of nave been ajority of he merest h a paste tes of the eir way in spectres. vering as made of and the assacre warning

ong the

l paper General vowed. dly the y kind d men

lisfranrights iterally egroes resent mere outh.' nts of s did chisel the nced. acks. duca-

Nothing of a ship-

ing tribes kas, who he writer

inkas cut kas train

ne mid-

es. l these

siders

LABOUR AND CAPITAL AT THE ANTIPODES.

MORE COLONIAL EXPERIMENTS.

THE Australasian Review of Reviews for July says :-The statesmen of the colonies are trying with splendid courage to solve the vexed problem of the relations of labour and capital. and so make industrial peace one of the permanent conditions of Australian society. Two different sets of experiments are being tried, with equal courage and skill. In Victoria the ideal sought is to establish a minimum wage in each trade, a wage determined not by the employer and his scale of profits merely. The workman, and the area of his needs, are taken into account. A wages board is elected for each trade brought under the operations of the Act. It consists of representatives of employer and employed in equal proportions, with a chairman—usually a citizen of some distinction—belonging to neither party. The Board fixes the minimum wage in the trade; its rate of wage under the Factories Act becomes legal, and can be enforced by process of law. To pay less than the rate fixed by the Board is a legal offence. This system still belongs, as yet, to the region of experiment. It does not apply to the whole area of industry; it is attended with much incidental cruelty to old, or less expert, workmen. Public opinion is in a mood of doubt about the experiment, and a Royal Commission is to sit and take evidence as to its working.

The New Zealand scheme, which is attracting much attention in other countries, is one of compulsory arbitration. There is a Board of Conciliation in each district to which trade disputes may be submitted, and a Court of Arbitration to which an appeal lies, and whose award has the legal validity of a judgment of the Supreme Court. New South Wales proposes to follow the New Zealand example; and Mr. Wise, in a speech of unusual eloquence and force, submitted to the New South Wales Assembly a Bill which embodies the principle of compulsory arbitration. His Bill omits the New Zealand district boards of conciliation, and creates a Court of Arbitration consisting of a judge of the Supreme Court and two lay associates, nominated respectively by the parties to the dispute. The court is clothed with large powers, and is based on the recognition of the trades

The court will have power to direct an employer to employ a member of a trades union in preference to a non-unionist; the first time in history that trades unions have been clothed in this manner with legal sanctity! Mr. Wise holds that when labour is strongly organised it can be compelled, under heavy financial penalties, to obey an award of the Court of Arbitration.

New Zealand proposes to amend its system at various points and to enlarge its area. Domestic servants, for example, are to be brought under the operations of the Act; and a strange social prospect is opened up by the spectacle of a Court of Arbitration, with a bewigged judge at its head, being clothed with powers to decide how many hours a domestic servant must work, what wages she is to get, and in what sort of a kitchen she is to cook. It is difficult to foresee how the eight hours' system can be applied to family life; unless, indeed, each New Zealand household is to be provided with a double staff of servants. Domestic servants, in a sense, are the class that least of all needs the protection of a court of law. The demand enormously outruns the supply.

MIR AND ARTEL.

"ARCTIC CO-OPERATION" is the rather chill title of an excellent paper in Gentleman's, by Ernest M. Lowry. He provides much salutary reading for the Russophobist. He Arctic Russia is an ideal land for the social reformer; no one owns estates, the land is either Tundra, the free wandering ground of the Samoyede and his reindeer, forest, or communal holding; indeed, in the whole Empire, under 2 per cent. of the population hold land on the strength of any personal title. The land—the basis of a taxation by no means light—is made over by the Government for division among the peasants, to over one hundred thousand self-governing communes. This "Mir," as the commune is called, shows us that the political organisation of the autocratic Empire has, as its base, self-government, and is securely founded upon most democratic principles. All men are, ipso facto, members of their village Mir, and have equal right of speech and vote in its assemblies.

CO-OPERATION IN THE RUSSIAN BLOOD.

Each Mir develops its institutions in its own way. "In one all are hard-working 'Old Believers,' steady and grave"; in another, they will be idle and dissolute:—

Sometimes a commune will maintain a school, but too often the illiterate vote outweighs that of those anxious to introduce so wise a measure, for the educated man has no more powerful voice in the assembly than his unlettered brother. The salaries of an unqualified doctor, "Feldsher," a midwife, and others are generally voted by even a renegade Mir; while some will undertake the sinking of wells, and even the purchase of agricultural implements for the common weal. There is no doubt that the communal system is popular among the mujiks themselves, since settlers on the Free Siberian allotments and convicts adopt it of their own free will, wherever they may find themselves. Co-operation is a part of Russian peasant nature; the mujik cannot act alone, he must always be in common with his fellows.

HOW RUSSIAN WORKMEN COMBINE.

Of this fact the "Artel," or peasant co-operative society, is a good example. Workmen in all kinds of employment unite into these societies, live in one common house, share one common table, elect one starosta, or leader, who chooses the work the rest will undertake, and to whom are paid the wages of all. He pays the outgoings for material, rent, and keep, after which he divides the profits. The Artel, collectively, is responsible to the employer for the default of each and every member; it cannot, therefore, be wondered at that contractors and other employers of labour prefer to deal with the collective Artel rather than with the individual workman.

Mr. Lowry mentions roadmakers, carpenters, snowclearers, women-dockers, fire-watchmen, bank-guards, as formed into Artels.

To its members, such associations guarantee higher and more certain wages, cheaper keep-for all board together-and more assured employment, and some proportionate reward for energy, skill, and labour. To the employer-through direct interest better and more regular workmen, fixed wages for a definite undertaking, and saving in expenses through dealing with one leader instead of with each man. A Russian Artel will, for the sake of its members, accept only a good and steady man; the loafer finds no place in its ranks.

How universal, and how ingrained in peasant character, is this formation of unions, may be judged from the fact, that when a few prisoners find themselves cast together, they straightway form an Artel, and elect a head; and in the old days of marching to Siberia, so great was the faith placed in these associations by convoy officers, that on the starosta promising that no attempt to escape should be made, they have been known to allow the men to take off their leg irons; for if a man did bolt, the Artel managed to find some old runaway to take his place, and so save the officer from blame.

"Each for the other" is "the accepted maxim of every business." Mr. Lowry asks :-

Even in this land of freedom of press and of speech, is there not something in the way of Socialism which we might learn from the frozen north of autocratic Russia?

The effect of Mir and Artel on the social future of the Russian people suggests to the English mind a nobler fear than fills the breast of the Russophobe. In the ethical struggle for existence between rival races, what chance will a people have to which competition has become a second nature, against a people with whom co-operation is instinctive and habitual? Social reformers would do well to ponder all that is involved in these two Russian words.

THE COAL QUESTION.

MR. A. D. PROVAND, M.P., writes on "The Coal Problem" in the National Review. He first seeks the cause of the present famine prices, and finds that "while there was some increase in export and also in domestic consumption, the chief reason of the advance in price and of its maintenance must be ascribed to the increased use for manufacturing purposes." He next estimates the average rise in price to be 6s. a ton, and the output last year to be 220 million tons, which yield a total increase in cost to consumers and exporters of £66,000,000. Of this total he reckons that less than eleven millions and a half went to the miners, and that more than fifty-four millions and a half went to mine-owners and middlemen.

THE DANGER-POINT IN PRICE.

Passing to future prospects, Mr. Provand points out that "nearly the whole of our export trade is based on coal, and when we cease to have it cheap enough for manufacturing purposes the trade will pass from us and go to countries which possess cheaper coal." He does not anticipate serious competition from any country save the United States. In seventeen years (1883-99) production of coal in the United Kingdom increased 40 per cent., in the United States 120 per cent., while in the United Kingdom the pitbank price per ton has risen since 1887 from 4s, 9\frac{1}{4}\text{d}. to 7s. 6d.; it has fallen in the United States from 6s. 8\frac{1}{4}\text{d}. in 1885 to 4s. 8\frac{1}{4}\text{d}. This leads to the next inquiry:—

The real points to ascertain are what quantities can we produce, and for how long, on terms which will enable us to increase our manufacturing industries at such a rate as will secure employment to our population and gradually raise our standard of living and comfort.

NOTICE TO GLASGOW TO QUIT!

Some alarming estimates are quoted :-

Mr. Foster Brown, in a paper read before the Society of Arts last year, looks upon fifty years as likely to see the expiration of our cheap coal. This is confirmed by Mr. Longden in his Presidential Address to the Mining Engineers. On the other hand, men' with practical knowledge speak of coal-fields where a quantity equal to our present total annual cutput may be worked for another 250 years. Claims of indefinite quantities at workable depths are made in regard to Yorkshire, Cannock Chase and other places. The coal-fields of Ireland are referred to as being able to furnish a large annual supply. The most serious of all the statements is made by Mr. R. T. Moore, Mining Engineer, of Glasgow, who has an intimate knowledge of the Scottish coal-fields. He has estimated that the cheap workable coal of Lanarkshire will be practically exhausted in about seventeen years. The industries of Glasgow and the surrounding districts support about a quarter of the whole population of Scotland, and these have been created by this coal.

Touching on proposed remedies for dear coal, he shows that an export duty on coal would be fatal. Coal forms 28½ out of 43 millions of tonnage exported in the year. Railway rates might be cheapened to the American standard. But the estimates of the Royal Commission of 1871 having proved seriously incorrect, Mr. Provand asks for a new Royal Commission to ascertain the facts and prospects as now before us.

TRADE ON THE WANE.

In the Nineteenth Century Mr. Benjamin Taylor, writing on "The Burden of Coal," discusses the problem of what should be done to relieve the excessive pressure of the increased price of coal. He says that the rise in coal is bringing a very bad depression in trade:—

It is crushing the life-blood out of our industries, for we have the fact, more serious than the woes of the householder, that the cost of production is going up, while the prices of finished products are coming down. One cannot imagine a worse economic position than a combination of advancing costs and lowering prices. Trade is on the wane, after a burst of prosperity extending over three years, only temporarily clouded by the great engineering strike of 1897-8.

THE EXPORT OF COAL.

Examining the various proposals put forward to check the drain upon our resources in the way of fuel, he scouts the suggestion to prohibit the export of coal. He says:—

Such a proceeding would be suicidal, for it would destroy the best part of our maritime commerce. Coal is practically the only commodity we have to send away in any quantity sufficient to provide ou ward cargoes for the ships needed to bring foreign foodstuffs and material for our mills and factories. It constitutes something like four-fifths of the entire weight of sttff we export. Without it our ships would have to go away in ballast to obtain supplies of wheat, and cotton, and iron ore and timber. Ballast costs money, whereas coal pays for its carriage. To stop, or even to arbitrarily restrict, the export of coal would be to so ehormously increase the freight-cost of our imports as to raise both the cost of living and the cost of industrial production. We should quickly lose both our shipping and our foreign trade, and without the foreign trade half our factories would be idle.

Nevertheless he admits that something must be done, and he finds the most helpful means of overcoming the threatened coal famine by improved methods of consumption. Only one per cent. of the heat value of coal is used in the ordinary fireplace, and only ten per cent. in the ordinary steam-engine:—

Relief in the future, then, will be obtained in economical consumption, reduced absolute consumption, increased percentage of production, reduced cost of production, and utilisation of deposits at present unavailable. The reduction of consumption will be, as has been said, by economy and by the use of other power generators. One of these is oil fuel, of which comparatively little use has yet been made.

Index to the Periodicals of 1899.

ALL writers and students to whom the Annual "Index to Periodicals" can be of service are reminded that the tenth volume dealing with 1899 is now ready and may be obtained from the REVIEW OF REVIEWS Office, or through a bookseller. An enormous amount of labour has been put into this work to make it a serviceable and reliable book of reference for all who have occasion to get up current and other subjects. Frequent reference to itabsolutely new; it is therefore well to see what has already been written, and what is already known on the subject, whatever it may be -e.g., in the case of the Wallace Collection, which is for the moment to the fore. Quite as much may be learnt from the articles written in 1897 (which have probably been forgotten by the ordinary reader) as from the current articles on the subject. It is to enable all who desire to get together material on any question whatsoever that the Index has been designed, and those who have once used it for such a purpose will find it an indispensable guide. Vol. III. (1892) is now out of print; but Vols. I., II., IV., and V. (1890, 1891, 1893, and 1894) may still be had at 5s. net each, or 5s. 6d. post free; and Vols. VI., VII., VIII., IX., and X. (1895-1899 inclusive) at 10s. post free per volume.

THIS year's edition of Mr. F. T. Jane's "All the World's Fighting Ships" has been improved in many respects. Photographs have largely replaced the old penand-ink drawings of important ships. The number of plans has been largely increased and many minor changes have been made which increase the usefulness of this cosmopolitan naval annual.

A G MISS E tions on combinant tion, con tember, a Denmarl working the evide works we hetter.

Her v a measu, which it the sum made b clearly applies rather or relief gla have a have ne were fift found grahalf the themsel

diminis rities of
In Co
for one
as a rule
£9 Is. 9
for one amount pension gratis, 2
to order

In t

Owin

more The ol per we institu in sor twenti per he than t Age r possib year, systen £120, person them. excep forma added the re and n

Mi

was p

to be

e a worse g costs and rst of prosclouded by to check he scouts e says :destroy the ctically the y sufficient ing foreign constitutes we export. t to obtain . Ballast be to so be idle. be done. ming the onsumpl is used t. in the onomical ercentage

sumption of other

as to raise tion. We

gn trade,

aratively " Index hat the may be hrough as been reliable get up that is at has wn on of the ne fore. tten in dinary It is on any igned, se will 1891. s. 6d.

1895-

ll the many pener of ninor ess of # tions on the Continent occupy a unique position for the combination of accurate information and acute observation, contributes to the Contemporary Review for September, an admirable paper on "Old Age Pensions in Denmark." She has been in Copenhagen, studying the working of the Danish system, and her report, based upon the evidence of the best authorities, is that the system works well, and can easily be amended so as to work still A SUCCESS. Her verdict is that with all its faults the Danish law is

OLD AGE PENSIONS IN DENMARK.

A GOOD REPORT OF THE SYSTEM AT WORK.

MISS EDITH SELLERS, whose writings upon social ques-

a measure that is doing much good in the kingdom in which it is enforced, and has increased very considerably the sum of human happiness. The distinction which is made between Old Age relief and Pauper relief is so clearly defined in Denmark, that no stigma whatever applies to the receipt of the former. Many who would rather die than accept Pauper relief, accept Old Age relief gladly. Under the Danish law the local authorities have a right to grant relief to persons over sixty, who have never been convicted of crime, and who since they were fifty have neither received pauper relief nor been found guilty of vagrancy or begging. The State defrays half the cost of the Old Age Pensions; the pensioners themselves make no contribution.

THE AMOUNT OF THE PENSION.

Owing to the fact that the Old Age relief has diminished the Pauper relief, the net cost to local authorities of the working of the system is practically nil:-

In Copenhagen the average old-age pension is £6 19s. a year for one person, and £8 12s. for a family—the man and his wife, as a rule; in the trading towns it is £7 15s. for one person, and 69 1s. 9d. for a family; and in country districts it is £3 11s. 10d. for one person, and £5 4s. 4d. for a family. In judging of the amount of these pensions it must be remembered that the pensioners, in case of illness, receive in addition medical advice gratis, as well as medicine and whatever else the doctor chooses

WHAT IT COSTS.

In the Old Age homes, the cost per head is rarely more than is. a day, and averages rather under itd. The old people are allowed pocket-money of 4d. per head per week. The expenses of administration in the largest institutions amount to one-fifth of the expenditure, while in some of the Old Age homes it hardly reaches one-twentieth. The cost of Old Age relief and pauper relief per head to the population is 5s. Id. less in Copenhagen than the cost of pauper relief alone in London. The Old Age relief in 1897 rose to £232,747, but this rendered possible the reduction of pauper relief by £111,000 a year, so that the actual cost to the nation of the new system, which has been in operation since 1892, is only 120,000 a year. This sum is distributed among 39,000 persons, who have 15,000 other persons dependent upon them. The result is most satisfactory. With only one exception every Dane to whom Miss Sellers applied for in-formation, official and non-official, declared that it has added materially to the well-being and general comfort of the respectable poor, and that, as a class, they are happier and more contented now than they were before the law was passed. They are no longer haunted as they used to be by the fear of becoming paupers in their old age.

AFTER EIGHT YEARS.

Miss Sellers declares that the worn out workingclasses are undoubtedly better cared for in Denmark than in any other country she knows, and muc's better than in England, France, or Germany. Although the law offers no encouragement whatever to thrift, or places a premium upon unthrift by enacting that the relief granted must be sufficient for the support of the person relieved, so that the less a man has the more he receives, the odd thing is that this appears to have done very little harm, for the working-classes in Denmark are no less thrifty now than they were before the law was passed. Many facts, indeed, point to an increase rather than a decrease of thrift.

HOW IT MIGHT BE AMENDED.

Mr. Jacobi, the head of the Poor-law Department at Copenhagen, has framed an Amendment Bill which, Miss Sellers thinks, affords a right solution of a very difficult problem. Here is her summary of the way in which this Danish expert proposes to amend the law :

The law, as it stands, enacts that, to be eligible for old-age relief, a man must be without the means of providing himself, or those dependent on him, with the necessities of life; but it leaves to the local authorities the duty of deciding what are the necessities of life; and what means a man must have in order to procure them. Herr Jacobi proposes that this shall be changed; that a certain standard shall be fixed; and that all whose means fall below this standard shall be regarded as being without the means of providing themselves with necessities; and therefore, if they fulfil the conditions with regard to age and respectability, as being eligible for old-age relief. He fixes the standard, for a single person, at an income of £20 per year, or property worth £222; and for a married couple, at an income of £26 13s. 4d. a year, or property worth £296. This is for Copenhagen alone; in smaller towns and in the country, the standard would be

Then, the law in its present form leaves the local authorities free to decide the amount of the relief they grant, decreeing only that it must be sufficient for the support of the person relieved. This, too, must be changed, Herr Jacobi insists. In his Bill he proposes that the pensions henceforth granted shall be fixed in amount and on a sliding scale. Should it become law, a pensioner, if a single person, would receive when between 60 and 65 years of age, £3 6s. 8d. a year; between 65 and 70, he would receive £6 13s. 4d. a year; between 70 and 75, £10 a year; between 75 and 80, £13 6s. 8d.; and when above £0, £16 13s. 4d. a year. The pension of a man with a wife would always be 40 per cent. higher than that of a single person of the same age. This scale of pensions, it must be noted, is for Copenhagen alone. These pensions are to be granted inde-pendently of any savings the recipients may have made, providing the pension itself, together with the income derived from the savings, do not amount to more than £22 15s. 6d. a year for a single person. In fixing the minimum pension at £3 6s. 8d. a year, Herr Jacobi is, of course, not blind to the fact that no human being could possibly live, in Copenhagen, on such an income. His contention is, however, that the average pensioner is, at sixty, quite able to do a certain amount of work; and that if he be not willing to do it, and thus eke out his pension, he must accept pauper relief, unless, indeed, he have savings to fall back upon. As for the persons who at sixty are physically incapable of working, he has framed a special clause for their benefit; they are to be allowed to rank five years in advance of their age-to claim a pension of £6 13s, 4d. at sixty, and of £10 at sixty-five. He also proposes to leave intact the pensioners' right to free treatment in case of illness, and to admission to an old-age home when too feeble to live alone.

"MT. CHAMBERLAIN, extinct volcano," is a line which catches the eye in a map of Central Africa in the Geographical Journal for August. Will politicians seeking for a place in charts governmental be tempted to exclaim, Nomen est omen?

A NEW SCHEME OF OLD AGE PENSIONS.

MR. W. D. MACGREGOR advances in the Westminster Review his plea for universal old age pensions. He declares against the attempts at discrimination suggested by the Select Committee of last year. He turns the flank of the criticism that protests against putting deserving and undeserving on the same level by saying that at present we discriminate in favour of the least deserving, and it is time the more deserving had their share as well. He argues:—

The nation would then be virtually acting as an insurance institution, providing for the members who attained old age. The nation might very reasonably say: "We are no longer going to provide only for those who, in the prime of life, waste their substance in riotous living, and who afterwards, in their illness or old age, become burdens on their neighbours. We may continue to provide workhouses for the improvident and unthrifty people, but we shall also provide somewhat for the old age of those who, in their prime, have been providing for others. We shall place all on an equality, so that the unthrifty shall not have an advantage over the thrifty. We shall arrange old age pensions for all. The man who cannot live on his pension supplemented by what he has or can earn, will have to go to the workhouse as at present, and his pension will go to maintain him there; while the man who has saved a little for his old age will get a pension that will help him to live outside the workhouse."

INCREASING WITH AGE.

But while, according to the writer's scheme, pensions should be provided for all, the amount of the pension should vary with the age of the pensioner:—

If pensions of 1s. 6d. per week were payable to all persons 65 to 70 years of age, 2s. 6d. to those 70 to 75, 3s. 6d. to those 75 to 80, and so on, adding 1s. per week for every five years of age, it would mean a great amount of added comfort to aged persons, while the cost of the scheme would be sufficiently great to tax the abilities of a Chancellor of the Exchequer in finding the money.

We fear that the writer would find the working classes disposed to regard 1s. 6d. a week at 65 as a pension pour rire. But the total cost would, he reckons, not go beyond £14,000,000.

HOW TO FIND THE MONEY.

His plan of raising this sum is certainly novel. He objects to imposing a heavy tax on large salaries, or even a light duty on imported corn. This is his suggestion:—

As the pensions would be available by every one who attained the given age, it would be fair that the insurance premiums, as we might call them, should be paid by every one. A tax on foods and drink would be a means of taxation by which every one would pay, and that, too, pretty equally in the proportion in which they would share. It would have this further advantage, that it could be easily collected at a minimum of expense. If taxes of Ios, were levied on each head of cattle slaughtered or imported for consumption, Is, on each sheep and pig slaughtered or imported, Is, on each cwt. of beef and bacon imported, Is, per cwt. on fish, Is, per cwt. on wheat and wheat-flour, both home-grown and imported, and 6d, per ton on all coal mined in Great Britain, you would have a series of taxes to which every one would contribute, and which would be easy of collection. Taxes of these amounts would not appreciably raise the prices of the several commodities, so that people would make their contribution to the pension fund almost without knowing it.

He calculates cattle would yield £2,127,200; sheep, £793,025; pigs, £183,476; imported beef, bacon and hams, £495,805; imported fish, £122,486; wheat and wheatflour, imported and home-grown, £5,578,965; coal, £5,053,248, making a total of £14,354,205.

In the Revue de l'Art for August, the series of articles on "Art at the Paris Exhibition" is continued—painting, metal-work, sculpture, etc.

ANTARCTIC EXPLORATION.

In the first August number of the Revue des Deux Mondes M. Dastre writes one of his informing scientific papers, this time on the popular subject of "Antarctic Exploration."

For various reasons the exploration of the region surrounding the South Pole has not attracted so much general interest as that of the region surrounding the North Pole; nevertheless, the Antarctic offers an extraordinary field for the naturalist, the geologist, the meteorologist, and the geographer. Much was done between the years 1774 and 1843 by Cook, Dumont d'Urville, Bellingshausen, Wilkes, Ross, and others, and then there followed an interval of some duration. The Belgian expedition, under the direction of Commandant Gerlache. has scarcely returned to Europe after two years of exploration than three more expeditions are announced, which will start next year. Of these three the German expedition intends to attack the Antarctic at the south of the Indian Ocean, on the line of the meridian which passes through Siam and Sumatra; the English expedition will make for the south of the Polynesian Sea. while the Scotch explorers will make for Graham's Land. M. de Gerlache's expedition operated to the south of Palmer's Land, so that the Antarctic will have been attacked from four separate sides. All these enterprises are not intended solely to increase our geographical knowledge, but it is proposed to study also the geology and the fauna and flora. A comparison of the magnetic, meteorological, and oceanographic observations of the four expeditions should lead to many new and important discoveries in regard to the circulation of the atmosphere and the pressure of winds and storms. Geographers admit in general the existence of an Antarctic continent, having as its centre the South Pole, which is unlike the North Pole in being the centre of firm ground, which is of course covered with ice. This is mere theory, but so far no fact has been adduced to contradict it

It is curious to observe in the Southern Hemisphere how soon the continents stop towards the South Pole. Africa ends between the 34 deg. and 35 deg. parallel of latitude; Tasmania between the 33 deg. and 34 deg.; and it is only South America which reaches the 56 deg. parallel, and even that is more distant from the South Pole than Scotland is from the North Pole. the 56 deg. parallel the explorer meets with icebergs and small islands as far as the Polar Circle—that is to say, the 70 deg. parallel; beyond that, however, he finds land reappearing, and the further he gets the larger are the areas which appear to be covered by land, so that the hypothesis of a Southern Continent is a very plausible one-indeed, one savant, a Mr. Lothian Green, suggested that the solid part of the globe resembled a triangular pyramid, the apex of which is the South Pole, and the base rests on the glacial sea of the North, while the sides of the pyramid are formed into depressions as the beds of the oceans. He explains this alteration of the primi-tive spherical form of our globe by the theory of progressive cooling, resulting in a contraction. Thus, a balloon when it is being emptied exhibits depressions and upheavals, the effect of which is that of a rough pyramid. However, the validity of these and other theories will, no doubt, be tested before many years are over. Meanwhile, M. Dastre promises us an article on the discoveries of the Gerlache expedition in the domain of Antarctic fauna and flora.

In the Temple Magazine for September the most interesting article is one on "The Working Girls' Clubs in London," contributed by Mrs. Hirst Alexander.

EDW
"Paris
of Har exhibit Britain find no

Som are wo Our enthusi of any harvest hours, it does one fee as our the goo some o severes honour

> the Pa their countr The F women pressec been a public of thei dainty police dared "We she we Frenc that le

> > Mr

Expo

At t

Wh seen : menta blazin with interl makir which is the and v occas washi water light, glean glorio the a heave whos space T

remisay t

EXPOSITION GOSSIP.

EDWARD INSLEY contributes a gossipy article on "Paris in 1900 and the Exposition" to the current number of Harper's Magazine. When dealing with the national exhibits he deplores the apathy which has made Great Britain "the disappointment of the Exposition;" he can find nothing but praise for the German exhibits.

THE AMERICAN PAVILION.

Some of Mr. Insley's remarks on the American Pavilion are worth quoting. He says :--

Our own national pavilion does not arouse much patriotic enthusiasm. Its interior is the barest and most uninteresting of any building in the entire Exposition. A barn before the harvest, an audience-hall at dawn, an empty Bourse after tradinghours, at least suggest the idea of occupancy and utility, which it does not. The exterior, however, is fascinating. It makes one feel at home. It embodies our art and architecture as well as our political entity. It is the happy slapdash combination of the good and the bad which we see in the statuary decoration of some of our beautiful American parks. And as in their case, the severest comments do not come from laymen. But it does us no honour in the eyes of the critical European public.

AMERICAN GIRL v. FRENCH POLICEMAN.

At the opening of the United States pavilion on May 12th, the Paris police made the acquaintance of the American Girl, to their discomfiture. The behaviour of crowds differs in all countries, and in no way more than their respect for authority. The French sergent de ville is accustomed to being obeyed by women at least. Ten thousand persons, mostly Americans, pressed upon the police lines from all directions . . . It had been announced that the ceremonies in the building would be public. What right had these French police to keep them out of their own building anyway? The lines of spring gowns and dainty hats surged more and more upon forbidden ground. The police protested, gesticulated, implored, all but wept. They dared not handle this crowd roughly, and the crowd knew it. "Well, I'm going in," said one young woman resolutely. And she went, The rest followed. The American girl swept the French police out of her way with a disdain and imperiousness that left them helpless and stupefied.

THE EXPOSITION TRANSFIGURED.

Mr. Insley's description of the illumination of the Exposition is very striking:—

When the Exposition is illuminated for a fêtz de nuit, it is seen at its best. Even that artistic perversion the Porte Monumentale may be forgiven when its towers of purple lights are blazing at the entrance to a wonderful embowered avenue aglow with orange lights. Gorgeous colour effects are obtained by interlacing the limbs and boughs of trees with electric wires, making a more beautiful "City of Lanterns" than that of which Lucian dreamed. Encompassing and framing the picture is the azure dome of a starry sky; for background, green verdure and white walls, with hints of towers, spires, and minarets, and occasional glints of gold; cutting it in twain, the dark river, washing past a serried line of grey palaces which rise from the water's edge. An electric lattice-work of pure carboniferous light, like wires strung with diamonds, sews criss-cross lines of gleaming white fire in and out through and through, the whole glorious tableau. The glistening outlines of the Eiffel Tower, the aigrette of a mighty tiara, shoot up gracefully toward heaven, crowned with a single wondrous jewel, a search-light whose broad gliding ray carries the eye far out into limitless space.

The writer makes the following apology for the impossibility of dealing adequately with so vast a subject:—

The limitation of this sketch to the space of a magazine article reminds me at this point most forcibly of what I heard a woman say to her daughter in the Beaux-Arts Palace the other day: "Mary, don't you stop to look at things, or we won't see anything at all."

IS THIS THE LAST PARIS EXHIBITION?

To judge from the opinion of a Frenchman, quoted by Mr. Stead in his Cosmopolitan article on the Paris Exposition, this must be answered in the affirmative:—

There are many reasons—some good, some bad. One which may not occur to foreigners is the extent to which exhibitions increase the mischievous attraction which Paris has always had for the provincial. Whenever there is an exhibition in Paris, special efforts are made to bring to the capital hundreds of thousands of hard-working country folks who but for the exhibition would never have left their native fields. Paris itself is quite powerful enough a lodestone without the added attractions of a great World Fair. The gaiety, the brilliance, the glamour, of the prolonged fâte add a hundredfold to the natural attractiveness of the city. The provincial becomes discontented with the dull round of rural life. Some fine day he leaves his plough or his shop and comes to Paris to try his fortune. What we want is not to increase the charm of the city, but to lessen its fatal fascination for the countryman.

EUROPE'S GAIN, FRANCE'S LOSS.

Then there is yet another reason, which weighs most with the thoughtful who really decide such matters in the long run. How is it, they ask, that each successive exhibition has already resulted in destroying a French monopoly in some industry? Ten years ago French silks commanded the market of the world. But in 1889, the Russians who came to our exhibition conceived the idea of utilising all that we taught them in the art of silk culture. They returned to their native country and set to work to develop silk. What is the result? To-day Russia is beating France in the silk market. Russians are everywhere ousting French silks with their own, and they would never have known how if we had not taught them. You object that other nations send their exhibits and that we can if we choose learn as much from them as they learn from us. But no Frenchman thinks that. It may be conceit. Perhaps also conservatism has something to do with it. a matter of fact, the French exhibits at a Paris exhibition are naturally more complete than the exhibits of any other nation. It is now the turn of Germany or of England. If they hold the next exhibition in Berlin or in London we shall go there to learn from them.

Mr. Stead, commenting upon this French opinion, thinks that possibly it is rather an exaggeration of the unpopularity of the Exposition.

THE IDEAL CITY.

He goes on to speak of the suitability of Paris for the holding of such world shows :--

No other city in the world is so ideal a place for the holding of an international exhibition as Paris. If it were for nothing else than the glorious vista which begins with the Louvre and ends with the Arc de Triomphe, Paris is and must ever remain one of the great shrines toward which the pilgrims of humanity bend their steps. The city itself is a permanent exhibition. It may not be altogether an ideal capital of civilisation, but no other city combines so many elements of interest and preserves so many great memories of the past in a casket of such unequalled charm.

A NOVEL step in the development of the model village is described by Frank Parker in the August Puritan. Besides all its other advantages—in tree-lined streets, in picturesque cottage homes, in the absence of publichouses, in a host of social and recreative agencies—Port Sunlight is to have "a spiritual director," who will have "full control and oversight of the religious and social work of the community." The work will be "entirely undenominational," self-governed and congregational. The man chosen for the post of undenominational rector of the village is Rev. S. Gamble Walker, who has resigned his Wesleyan ministry in order to take up the work. £25,000 will be spent on a new church to accommodate about fifteen hundred. Needless to say the initiative in this movement came from Mr. W. H. Lever.

des Deux g scientific "Antarctic the region

ed so much unding the s an extrahe meteorne between d'Urville. then there ne Belgian Gerlache, years of nnounced, e German ne south of ian which nglish exesian Sea. m's Land. e south of ave been enterprises ographical

e geology magnetic.

ns of the important

mosphere

ographers

continent, unlike the

misphere with Pole. arallel of 34 deg.; te 56 deg. he South of bergs and is to say, are the that the

are the that the plausible uggested riangular and the the sides the beds e primineory of Thus, oressions a rough and other ears are rticle on domain

ne most ls' Clubs

SOME NOTABLE NEW INVENTIONS.

THE month's magazines register several strides forward in man's campaign of conquest over his material environment.

200 MILES AN HOUR ON LAND.

Mr. H. J. Shepstone describes in the August Harms-worth's Mr. H. S. Halford's patent gradient railway which promises to yield a rate of 200 miles an hour by train, and makes a journey of fifteen minutes from London to Brighton conceivable. The inventor has already worked out the idea in a model 50 yards in length:—

The permanent way is laid upon girders. There are six girder sections in the model, each 25 feet in length. These girders are supported upon rams moving the supporting columns as pistons. These rams are the terminal points of sections, and are made to rise and so cause a gradient down which the train runs. It will be seen, therefore, that the train is made to travel by greatition obtained by breathing are then proved.

by gravitation obtained by hydraulic or other power.

The automatic rising of the rams as the train proceeds is obtained as follows. At a point about five feet from the completion of the first graded section one of the levers in the trolley above the rail cleverly depresses a lever, called an actuator, automatically admitting the water pressure below the piston of the column in front of it, which naturally begins to rise. The ram does not reach its full height until the train has passed the rising column. This is repeated at all remaining columns, with the result that the train is continuing its run at an ever-increasing speed.

The time taken to cover the whole distance of 50 yards is 26\(\frac{1}{2}\) seconds, made up as follows:—Starting section 8 seconds, second section 6 seconds, third section 4\(\frac{1}{2}\) seconds, fourth section 2\(\frac{1}{2}\) seconds, and the last section 2 seconds, or one quarter of the time required to cover the first section. Directly the rams are passed they commence to fall very slowly, but, of course, have not sunk appreciably until the train has passed.

The initial cost of such a railway would be enormous, but the working expenses would be small:—

Mr. Halford claims for his system the following advantages:—
(1) That it is the quickest and fastest system in the world;
(2) that there are no boilers to explode, no smoke or smell, and no dirt; (3) no running off the line; (4) no dangerous level crossings; and (5) a minimum of wear and tear.

A FLYING SHIP ON ITS TRIAL TRIP.

Pearson's, which is honourably distinguished for its early records of new and surprising inventions, gives prominence to two notable novelties of this kind in its September issue. Gustav Levering tells of the first voyage of "the ship that flies," as he calls Count von Zeppelin's air-ship. This is his description of the first ship to navigate the aerial sea:—

In appearance, Count von Zeppelin's air-ship resembles a huge cigar, pointed at both ends; it is made chiefly of aluminium. Its length is about 415ft. The diameter of the cylinder is 40ft., and the total depth of the structure, including the gondolas in which the passengers are to sit, is rather more than 80ft. The framework of this huge cylinder consists of aluminium bands, twenty-four in number. The interior of the cigar is divided by sixteen vertical ribs into seventeen compartments, each of which contains an independent balloon, made of material which the manufacturer calls "ballonin."... The balloons now used have retained hydrogen gas for five weeks without sensible loss. The capacity of the cigar is 11,000 cubic mètres... The total weight of the ship, including its crew, is estimated not to exceed 20,000lbs... Four screws or propellers attached to the sides of the cigar are actuated by two Daimker motors of 15 horse-power each, and are capable of turning at the rate of 1,200 revolutions per minute. These propellers are made with blades of aluminium... The steering apparatus consists of four rudders connected in pairs.

The writer depicts the sensation felt by the crowds at Friedrichshaven on Lake Constance on July 2nd, when they saw the monster air-ship ascend with propellers revolving 1,200 times a minute, to a height of 1,300 feet, and after rising and sinking and circling at the will of the inventor, who had a tiny crew with him on board, return in safety to the lake after having flown a distance of six miles. The result was satisfactory, but further improvements are promised. Some of the aluminium portions will be replaced by a new and lighter substance called magmalium.

THE ICE-BREAKER AS POLAR DISCOVERER.

As the air-ship makes its way through the tenuous atmosphere by its lightness, so Admiral Makaroff's icebreaker, the Ermack as described by Earl Mayo in the September Windsor, forges its way through vast strata of solidified water by sheer weight. The Russian Admiral assured the Irish nobleman that "the future of Arctic and Antarctic exploration, including the discovery of the Poles, will depend mainly on the use of powerful ice-breakers." Nansen having found it possible to build a ship strong enough to withstand the pressure of the ice, the ice-breaker turns his defensive into an offensive. The construction of the ice-breaker has been described before in our pages. Earl Mayo adds the description of the Ermack's progress through Arctic ice, The vessel has gone through the thickest ice of the Spitzbergen region, as thick as any, in the Admiral's judgment, that lies between us and the North Pole. Here is the story of how she went through a Spitzbergen floe:—

At the first impact the ship's speed did not slacken perceptibly, but it was noticeable that the bow began to rise slowly into the air as though she were being lifted from below by a giant hand. The ice showed no sign of yielding, and the ship moved on, going more and more slowly, until perhaps nine feet of the glistening surface usually below the water-line was exposed to view. At length she seemed to stand still. Her engines had not ceased their efforts; the screws were whirling at their highest speed and churning the water at her stern; but progress had decreased until it could hardly be observed by the eye. She was pressing upon the ice with a weight of 900 tons, and it was still firm. She even slipped back a few inches. It seemed as if she were going to fail. Then, suddenly, a crack which, beginning below the surface, had not before revealed itself, appeared in a long, irregular line extending from the ship's side. Sharp reports like the barking of quick-firing guns were heard. The whole field trembled as though moved by an earthquake shock. A great strip of it, a mile across and weighing in the aggregate thousands of tons, detached itself from the principal mass and moved slowly off. After remaining poised motionless for some minutes, the Ermack now darted forward swiftly, like a living thing. Giant ice boulders, detached by the shock, plunged into the water, while others rising from great depths sprang into the air, looking as green as emeralds and as clear. They fell back into the water, and were crushed by the flying screws as in the jaws of a monster. Proceeding in this manner, the Ermack made her way through ice-ridges that sometimes rose to a height of eighteen feet above the surface of the water and extended to a depth of nine fathoms below.

So with feet of steel the modern man may trample

So with feet of steel the modern man may trample through the fields of Arctic ice to the North Pole.

WIRELESS TELEPHONY.

"Talking along a beam of light" is the lucid title which Mr. C. M. M'Govern gives to his account in the September Pearson's of Mr. Hayes' Radiophone. It is, roughly speaking, a telephone, in which the rays of a searchlight play the part of the connecting wire. This is the writer's graphic way of explaining it:—

the writer's graphic way of explaining it:

At the sending point—let us suppose it is a lighthouse—is a sound-proof telephone box. On the table in this telephone box there are four ordinary transmitters instead of the single transmitter in common usage, and the four pairs of wires that run light a small and results of the fixed —the small mirro tube, The the m in a l

clearl

or tw

the li

from 1

wheth is no the li fixing that is Th Mass has which can capal accur of the expla

Wi

radiat

the gloof the variate heat syllah while expans wheth key, of Neitl missi Be pupil are e tudin Mr "the the l Yerke diame heard interest. She stionablend she s

the B

in the

Again

millio

nd, when ropellers 300 feet, e will of board, n a disory, but the alulighter ER. tenuous off's ice-Mayo in gh vast Russian e future ng the on the found it and the sive into ker has yo adds h Arctic e of the dmiral's e. Here floe :ceptibly. into the nt hand. oved on.

t of the posed to ines had highest ress had e. She , and it seemed which, d itself, e ship's ng guns oss and self from g poised forward d by the om great

s and as d by the in this at somee of the rample id title in the ys of a This is se—is a one box le transthat run from these transmitters extend to the back of an ordinary searchlight placed just outside the box, the wires first passing through a small "knife switch" and through a small "resistance box and regulator" on their way to the searchlight.

Supposing the person it is desired to talk to is the captain of an incoming steamer which is some two miles away : There is an ordinary telephone box in the pilot-house of the ship, where instead of the "wire" telephone receiver there hangs on the wall of the box a circular, concave mirror, in the centre of which is fixed a small glass bulb-shaped like the glass of a thermometer the glass bulb being half filled with carbonised filament. The small end of this glass bulb penetrates through to the back of the mirror, where it fits into the end of an ordinary phonograph ear-tube, whose opposite ends are placed in the captain's ears.

The searchlight at the sending station is now thrown upon the mirror in the pilot-house, the person in the land station talks in a loud voice, and immediately the captain hears the voice as clearly and distinctly as if it were at his elbow instead of a mile or two away-it makes no difference whether he is near or far ; the light used is the same, and the conversation is as intelligible whether the ship is still, or steaming farther or nearer. There is no bell to ring in order to tell the captain that the person in the lighthouse wishes to speak to him; he sees the lighthouse fixing its searchlight upon his pilot-house, and he knows that that is the signal for him to answer "Hello."

The inventor is Mr. Hammond V. Hayes, of Boston, Mass., "one of the most modest inventors" the writer has ever met. He says that the scientific basis upon which the radiophone works is that "varied heat waves can be transmitted in a beam of light to a receiver capable of reproducing delicate sound vibrations with accuracy." His distinctive work has been the evolution of the little glass bulb with the carbonised filament. He explains the marvel thus :-

With each infinitesimal variation in the intensity of the radiation (caused by speaking into the transmitter) which reaches the glass bulb, there is a corresponding variation in the heating of the filament, and in consequence there is a corresponding variation in the expansion of the air in the bulb-its degrees of heat being so much varied. Certain sounds-words and syllables—produce one sort of expansion of the air in the bulb, while certain other words and syllables produce other sorts of expansion, and thus every vibration through the transmitter, whether by the human voice or by an instrument like a telegraph key, or a cornet, is reproduced upon the receiver.

Neither bright sunlight nor thick fog affects the transmission of the heat ray which conveys the message.

Bearing in mind the new voice-magnifier, wherewith a pupil of Edison proposes to make his voice distinctly heard from the top of the Eiffel Tower all over Paris, we are evidently approaching a marvellous era of multitudinous inter-communication.

Mr. Frank Ballard, in the Young Man, describes "the latest and greatest astronomical observatory" at the lake of Geneva in Wisconsin, where stands the Yerkes telescope, 75 feet long, with its lenses of 40 in. diameter, its movable floor, and its dome of 65 ft. and 150 tons, "the largest movable roof ever constructed."

"SOME Neighbours on the Veldt" is the title of several interesting glimpses of South African life which Miss J. H. Spettigue gives us in the September Sunday at Home. She sketches the varied services held at "the undenominational church"—an agency of racial as well as religious blending. One remark about a gentleman with whom she stayed is very significant. She says :-

A better reproduction of the most courtly type of John Bull could not have been seen, but all the same he was a member of the Bond. He did not choose to be "snuffed out" of politics in the colony, he said, which he should be if he did not join it. Against influences like these Lord Roberts' quarter-of-amillion soldiers are in the end powerless.

THE SUBMARINE BOAT.

"THE submarine has arrived "-at least this is the opinion of Mr. Kimball, who deals with the subject in a well-illustrated article in the September Harper's Magazine. The writer considers that "the most practical dimensions for submarine torpedo-boats are about 70 to 80 feet long, and 12 feet diameter"; this size of boat is easily steered and is not clumsy. The present French submarines are considerably larger, but the tendency is to reduce their size.

THE DIFFICULTIES OF DESIGN.

The principal difficulties met with to-day in designing a submarine torpedo-boat are as follows: providing for sufficient stored power of a kind that can be economically expended in driving her when submerged; devising a good method of directing her toward an object constantly changing its position; installing an efficient armament; retaining a fixed centre of gravity and fixed weight in spite of exhaustion of stores and movements of weights; modelling her to meet the physical requirements of crushing strains and the tactical requirements of handiness; ballasting and trimming her so that she will have sufficient stability, and at the same time move readily in obedience to both horizontal and vertical rudder efforts.

THE MOTIVE-POWER.

Steam and gas-engines have to give way before the advantages of electricity drawn from storage cells. This motive-power does not consume the air; in fact, it does not need air to work :-

The Holland, an American boat, uses a gasoline-engine for surface and stored electricity for under-water work. Her surface radius of action is a good eight hundred miles, and her sub-merged one about fifty. The large dynamo is run by her gasengine to store electricity when the boat is on the surface, and when going under the gas-engine is thrown out of gear, and the dynamo is used as an electric motor, taking current from the cells it has stored.

DRAWBACKS OF THE SUBMARINES.

The chief difficulties in designing a submarine can all be satisfactorily met except those of propelling power under all conditions, and of field of vision when submerged. She will be deficient in speed until a now unknown power be found, and she cannot retain her invisibility below the surface and at the same time see her enemy without some discovery in the property of light that it is difficult to imagine. Although a submarine can be perfectly lighted by means of the storage cells, and perfectly ventilated by pumping the vitiated air overboard and renewing the supply from the compressed-air tanks, she will be uninhabitable for long periods owing to the cramped quarters; and the duties of the crew are so severe that the men must be relieved frequently.

THE PROGRESS OF THE SUBMARINE.

The submarine has arrived. The recognition of her capabilities within her limited field of usefulness cannot be much longer delayed. France has grasped the idea of the effectiveness of the type in general, and has so far developed it that she has a dozen submarines on her naval register, and has provided for thirtyeight all told. When she has employed them for coast defence sufficiently to make their potential felt, it will be apparent that she will be able to send her whole cruising fleet against an enemy's ships, ports, or lines of communication. Other civilised nations will then be forced to follow her lead, just as they did in the matter of surface torpedo-boats. Germany is yielding to the pressure of progress, and is to have a competition of submarine models at Kiel during the current year. Russia is at work on submarines, but her results are wisely kept secret. England discredits them as much as possible, for the same reason that she discredited surface torpedo-boats when they appeared. policy is quite correct, since, as the strongest power at sea, she should in every way try to prevent the appearance of craft that will so greatly limit the effectiveness of her present fleet.

Mr. Kimball thinks that England will provide submarines.

TWO VIEWS OF THE SOLAR ECLIPSE.

(1) IN NORTH CAROLINA.

REV. J. M. BACON has been fortunate enough to witness three eclipses, and describes his experiences in the September Pearson's. Norwegian Lapland in 1895, Central India in 1898, and North Carolina in 1990 were the three—most diverse—scenes. In the Arctic circle, he tells us, the party of astronomers "owned to a certain strange, overmastering feeling akin to awe," while the lower animals showed signs of grave perturbation. The eclipse in India similarly affected birds and beasts. At Wadesborough in North Carolina, this May, the approach of the shadow created great disquietude. Cocks crew loudly; the woods and fields emitted sounds of wild life heard only at eventide; night-birds stole out. But just before the total darkness a solemn hush fell, attended with a sense of strange chill. Then :-

The next moment, to those who could look upwards, the outline of the moon was revealed against a background ethereal, indescribable, and as yet but dimly visible. This was the first glimpse of the corona of 1900, and then the great shadow swept down on all beholders. This sudden leap into darkness is often accounted the most appalling feature of the eclipse. With the speed of a cannon shot the blackness rushes on.

A dozen miles to the south-west the broad valley below us sloped up towards the faint far sky line, but the mighty shadow leaped this gap in a few seconds, shrouting, swamping, blotting out the world. It was as though an intangible, but real and awesome presence, were around us. The sky directly overhead, which a little while before had been the deepest purple, was dusky now, toning down through hues of olive to orange tints on the far horizon; and half-way towards the zenith there hung the entire black body of the moon, while around it was displayed the silvery sheen of the corona. . . . Less conspicuous than the corona, but yielding nothing in wonder and beauty, are the ruby jewels now seen around the margin of the sun's limb. These solar prominences, as they are termed, betray themselves in a spectroscope as up-rushes mainly of glowing hydrogen from out of the sun's atmosphere, outbursts so stupendous that they have been known to attain a height of 200,000 miles in an interval to be measured by minutes only. . . .

One and a half minutes is sure all too brief an interval in which to grasp, in every detail, a spectacle so subline and fleeting as the eclipsed sun... Then with a flash, the light returned, flooding all the landscape. The transition was, as always, sudden, almost electric, and forthwith from the neighbouring hill, where thousands of onlookers had collected, uprose a shout, wild, spontaneous, and exultant. One last quick glance caught the rear of the great shadow flying with incredible velocity over the hill-tops into the north-east.

(2) IN ALGIERS.

Mr. Edmund Verney describes the same event as seen from an observatory in Algiers. He says:—

Some five or ten minutes before totality the sunlight seems changing in quality; colour goes out of everything, the air is sensibly colder, flowers begin to close their petals, some martins, who have their nests under the eaves of an observatory, make their preparations for going early to bed, the shaggy observatory dog coils himself up finally for the night, and presently the planet Mercury shines out brilliantly near the sun. There is a hush, a chill, a silence, and then, quite suddenly, comes the moment when the sun is wholly hidden. This is what we beheld: a solid disc of utter blackness, the like whereof one never thought to see in the heavens. Above and below the disc (more above than below) were quivering fan-shaped rays, like spun-glass in moonlight, stretching away into space some three, four, or five times the sun's diameter, while at the lower edge of the moon we saw a narrow rim of golden orange and flame colour, with glowing points of deep red like burning metal. This was all. It seems little enough when put into words, but the effect was surpassingly solemn. The molten coronium, so little seen, and in one part only, while extremely vivid, was less striking than we had expected; but what were the great pale rays stretching far away into the sky?

The minute of a total eclipse is the shortest minute in life. We dared not for one moment remove our eyes from our glasses; suddenly, in an instant, from the lower part of the moon, shot the first ray of returning light. With dramatic suddenness the world was again bathed in floods of sunshine; one great sigh of relief went up from the many on the hill-top, as the moment of

The temperature sank during totality 4 degrees on one station and 12 on another. The different effect produced on Arabs, Kabyles, French, and Jews is humorously described.

STORY OF THE DELAGOA BAY ARBITRATION.

MR. MALCOLM MCILWRAITH contributes to the Fortnightly Review for September a lengthy article describing the ins and the outs of the protracted arbitration on the Delagoa Bay Railway. This arbitration, which lasted nine years, and the pleadings and evidence of which fill some forty volumes of print, had long been a stumbling block for arbitration. Mr. McIlwraith is careful to exculpate the arbitrators from the charge usually brought against them of spinning out the arbitration in order to put money in their own pockets, but he cannot exempt them altogether from blame. He admits that-the Portuguese Government and its advisers were determined to contest every possible point, either of fact or law, and to fight the matter, inch by inch, to the bitter end. But after making every allowance for such considerations, there can be little doubt that the case might easily have been concluded in about half the time it actually occupied. The pleadings were long enough, in all conscience, but even they came to an end at the close of 1894, and one year longer should have amply sufficed for every-thing that there then remained to do. In short, if international arbitrations are to become effective and popular, as a substitute for more coercive measures, the Delagoa Bay case should be regarded as a shining example of how not to arbitrate.

Two points upon which he lays special stress may be

It is a mistake to submit an international dispute to a too exclusively national tribunal. In the present case the Swiss element predominated far too greatly. With three Swiss judges, three Swiss experts, and six Swiss counsel engaged in the case, the matter was reduced to the level of an ordinary Swiss lawsuit, and the natural result was that purely Swiss methods and procedure, which were not always suitable to litigation of this character, were somewhat slavishly followed throughout. Except for the settlement of some comparatively insignificant question of procedure, the arbitration tribunal never held any sittings in court, and the main issues of the case were never orally pleaded before it at all. Neither Mr. Underdown, the leading English counsel, nor the solicitor who had had charge of the English Company's interests from the outset (Mr. Capel Slaughter) ever had an opportunity of appearing before the Arbitrators, or even, I believe, of making acquaintance with them, in their official capacity. This impossibility of getting into touch either with the opposing counsel or the judges themselves, exercised a baleful influence on the moral of the combatants, and was probably responsible for a good deal of the rather derogatory bickering and irritating recriminations which disfigured some of the pleadings.

MR. ROYLANCE KENT, writing in Macmillan's on "a new political era," quotes a saying which aptly if profanely shows how the glib statement, "We are all Democrats now," appeals to the less educable order of Conservative: "A Tory squire of the old school is said to have summed up the matter thus-' Parties are now divided into Liberals and d-d Liberals."

art occ sen I mos the che

En

Fre

1 fase

Cha

add

aris

Th Th Fra a b the to ] up He und div

opi

not abo

car

cro gre wit arti pa the fou

Co to bet we sce his the his ho an tra big be M

ne qu be

THE STRANGE STORY OF A GREAT GIFT.

THE Hertford House Collections form the subject of a fascinating paper in the Pall Mayazine by the late Charles Yria rie. It is a veritable romance with the added charm of reality. It is a strange intermingling of aristocratic eccentricities, of international amenities, of art-accumulations, and of munificent generosity. The occasion of the narrative is given in the opening sentence:—

Lady Wallace, widow of Sir Richard Wallace, who inherited most of the wealth of the late Marquess of Hertford, bequeathed the Marquess's Art collections, now in Hertford House, Manchester Square, to the British Nation.

THE COLLECTOR'S FATHER.

Hertford House, to begin with, was the French Embassy—a fact suggestive of the happy blending of French and English life which its art-treasures attest. The third Marquess of Hertford—the original of Thackeray's Lord Steyne—preferred a home in the real France to one on the spot which had been diplomatically a bit of France in England. It came to pass thus:—

This Marquess of Hertford served in the British army during the wars of the First Empire; he was taken prisoner, carried to France, and incarcerated at Verdun. Subsequently he gave up living in England, and abandoned his London residence. He had married a celebrated actress, Marie Fognani; . . . and under these circumstances Lord Seymour elected to live abroad, dividing his time between Paris and Milan. . . He was enormously stout, extremely headstrong, and indifferent to public opinion. He lived according to his fancy, and soon became notorious throughout Lombardy for his eccentricities, travelling about in a large post-chaise, with parti-coloured postilions, his carriage crammed with showy women, the delight of the gaping crowds. This nobleman was possessed of much wit, and was a great patron of art and literature; he was also on intimate terms with Rossini, and extremely generous in all his dealings with artists.

THE MARQUESS, THE VESTRY, AND THE DRAINS.

Such was the father of the great art-collector, and the parentage makes the character more explicable. This is the writer's account of the man who became in 1842 the fourth Marquess of Hertford:—

The third Marquess died in 1842; and his son Lord Richard Conway Seymour, hitherto known as Lord Varmouth, succeeded to his hereditary honours as fourth Marquess of Hertford. He was born about the year 1800, was educated in England, and before attaining his majority entered the British army. He was well informed, bright, quick and intelligent, but somewhat of a sceptic; a brilliant conversationalist. . . He prided himself on his refined politeness, but, as the French say, the Devil was not the loser. When in 1842, at his father's death, he took his seat in the House of Lords as fourth Marquess of Hertford, he made his maiden speech, and disappeared not only from the political horizon but from England. The dispute between the Marquess and the parochial authorities is well known, for it became a tradition at Court and in Town. He occupied at that time a big house in Piccadilly, opposite Hyde Park, Hertford House not being in a fit state to receive him. A discussion arose between him and the vestry on the question of drainage; the Marquess obstinately refused to give way, left the staircase of his new house unfinished, closed the shutters, declared the place uninhabitable in order to avoid paying the rates, and abruptly quitted London. From that day forward the young nobleman became a thorough Parisian.

A LORDLY PLEASURE-HOUSE.

He bought a pleasure-house in the Bois de Boulogne, "a perfect gem of the Louis Sixteenth period," first built for the Comte d'Artois:—

Later on he was enabled, through the friendliness of Napoleon III., whom he had known during the latter's exile in London, to increase the small holding by successive purchases; and when the great transformation scene of the Bois de Boulogne took place, he fitted it up and arranged it in such a manner that Bagatelle ceased to be a mere pavilion and pied-à-terre, and became almost his permanent abode, and a residence, on a small scale, fit for a prince of royal birth. . . . This we may call the first collection.

ART-TREASURES WORTH £3,500,000.

He fitted up besides two residences in Paris, one for himself and one for his brother, Lord Henry Seymour. "the type of the English Parisian":—

Here in Paris, gradually and by daily purchases, he brought together paintings, furniture, bronzes, porcelains, miniatures, snuff-boxes, jewellery, a thousand elegant trifles by the artists of the eighteenth century; snuff-boxes on which Blarenberg had painted a hundred minute figures; fans, comfit-boxes, etc.—in a word, all those charming frivolities which are the delight of connoisseurs. . From 1842 to 1870, till the eve of the declaration of the Franco-German war, which is also the date of his death, he spent his days accumulating art-treasures.

death, he spent his days accumulating art-treasures.

It is quite evident—the great public galleries of Madrid, Paris, London, Dresden, Munich and Berlin excepted—that the collection at Hertford House ranks as one of the finest in the world. But its chief characteristic lies in its variety: it seems as though, with the exception of the antique, mediæval and primitive schools, everything were included.

These collections were valued in 1890 by a committee of experts at three and a half millions sterling.

A FORTUNATE LEGATEE.

One of his most trusted purchasers was Mr. Richard Wallace, "who, twenty years his junior, was brought upunder the care of the Dowager Marchioness of Hertford, widow of the third Marquess." In 1870 the eccentric Marquess died. His title and his entailed property, which "was not very considerable," passed to a cousin:—

The French property, however, as well as the unentailed English property and all his securities—which represented an enormous total, he devised with spontaneous liberality to Mr. Richard Walkace, who, according to the tenor of the late Marquees' will, "had attended him so devotedly during his long illness."

A HERO OF THE SIEGE OF PARIS.

Here is romance enough, with unspoken suggestions of more. But a totally new element enters with the advent of war and siege:—

The war of 1870-71 breaks out: Sir Richard finds himself shut up in Paris with his wife and son—the latter a Frenchman, a lieutenant in the Cuirassiers of the Guard, and staff officer to General Vinoy, who commanded the 13th Army Corps, and who, after gallantly striving to rejoin MacMahon before Sedan, escaped the general disaster by his masterly retreat on Mezières, and returned to Paris, where, on the retirement of General Trochu, he became Governor and Commander-in-chief. Richard Wallace's conduct during the siege of Paris is well known, and has made him famous. He carefully watched events, encouraged and assisted the population, spent a million francs (£40,000) in charitable deeds, and took part in the re-victualling of the capital, earning honours from the Government and the blessings of the people. . . . Desirous to reward an English personage, whose generous action during the war had reflected credit on his nation, the Government, in the person of Mr. Gladstone, at that time Prime Minister, proposed that Her Majesty should confer a baronetcy on the Marquess' successor, thenceforth Sir Richard Wallace. His wife, who was of French origin, became Lady Wallace, and his son George, the French captain, an English subject. Paris became for him but a place of repose, . . . but having soon after been elected a Member of Parliament for the County of Antrim, Sir Richard's permanent domicile was necessarily in England. Thenceforth the fate of the collections was decided, and at the close of the year 1871 it was settled that everything was to be sent to England.

reat pale te in life.

te in life.
r glasses;
oon, shot nness the t sigh of oment of

on one roduced norously

TION.
ne Fortscribing
n on the n lasted

lasted hich fill imbling reful to brought order to exempt mined to to fight making le doubt half the ough, in close of reverynational abstitute

ould be

o a too e Swiss Swiss aged in ordinary o Swiss able to obllowed ratively all never se were rdown, ad had et (Mr.

before intance lity of or the coral of deal of nations

otly if re all der of s said e now

"THE DEEP POWER OF JOY" IN ART.

MR. MARCUS STONE, R.A., expresses himself to Mr. Arthur Mee, in the September Young Man, on the pains and pleasures of his art, in a striking and salutary way. Mr. Stone thinks that "the artist has reason to envy most people, because most people can become masters of their craft, and he cannot." The man who hoes turnips, even the banker, the lawyer, can feel he has attained. But "the artist has no exact test of achievement." Nevertheless, Mr. Stone goes on to say, the artist "loves his work because it is difficult."

His strictures on the kind of art which loves to portray moral garbage are severe and healthful. Of "the sordid meanness of life in contrast with its grandeur and glamour," he says :-

"It may, of course, be painted very well. But I am going to venture an opinion with which most people will disagree—I am going to say that the mean side of life is painted for the reason that it is so easy. I think it is very, much more difficult, both in literature and painting, to picture joy than sorrow. You will find that the great masters in literature leave you with a great emotional joy, and a great glow of sympathy. The poorer practitioners like killing their heroines of consumption, or harrowing you with murder and bloodshed. These things are simple, and not at all difficult. Red paint is cheap. It wants the consummate master to paint or write something light, and yet impress you . . . It is very easy to move somebody by painting or writing of ugly things, but I don't believe that realism of this sort is an evidence of force. To me it is rather an evidence of weakness."

"But there are great pictures and great books which depict the ugly side of life?"

"Yes, no doubt; but the greatest achievements of art have always been in the other direction. All the great works of the greatest masters have been in that direction. They have not shirked the serious element, but I think the greatest achievements have been in a sort of noble joyfulness—not a frivolous joy. I have always found that that has been one of the evidences of the great master in literature and art. Nobody could make you cry of joy as Thackeray and Dickens could."

"Red paint is cheap." There is a world of criticism in that jet of scorn. It is refreshing to find so frank an avowal of faith in what Wordsworth calls "the deep power of joy."

THE IRON DUKE AND THE IRATE PAINTER.

In the "Pleasant Pastels from Spain" which Mrs. M. L. Woods is contributing to Cornhill, she deals this month with portraits by Goya. In them she finds reflected with clever realism the artificial and immoral Spanish Court life of a hundred years ago. She blames his age, not him, for the stiff pose and affected mien of his portraits. She observes, by the way, that though we abhor the unnatural carriage of the old Spanish dames, which was something of a strut, "one hopes that Nature is not altogether responsible for the gait of our modern young Englishwoman, who hurls herself along the street like a loose-jointed lout in petticoats." She closes her interesting study with the following story of the passage between the painter and Wellington, who had recently entered Madrid in triumph from his victory at Salamanca:

In the Quinta, then, waits the proud, irascible Spanish painter, accustomed to be treated by kings and nobles with a deference at that time not accorded to genius in England, his temper, too, hardly improved by his terrible infirmity—deafness so hopeless that he could not hear a cannon fired at four paces from him. To him enters the haughty, uneducated Briton, busy doubtless, grudging the hour which was all Goya required to sketch in a portrait, and regarding the painter-fellow as a kind of tradesman, bound to supply goods as per order. Alava, Wellington's Spanish friend, was there, and also a young man, Goya's son. When Goya had worked at the sketch awhile, he showed it to the Duke. Obviously Wellington was no more competent to give an opinion on a picture than Goya was to plan a campaign; but this does not seem to have struck him. He called the thing a daub, emphasising his uncomplimentary remarks with gestures and desiring Goya's son to repeat them to the painter. The son declined to do so, and, together with Alava, endeavoured to reason with the strange art-critic. In vain; El Lord's contempt only became more vocal. Meantime the deaf man watched, with thunder lowering on the massive brow, a stormy out-thrust of the big under-lip, the very mane of him electric with rage. Now El Lord clapped on his hat, and haughtily, without further civility, prepared to depart. Then the storm burst. A brace of loaded pistols happened to be upon the table: Goya seized them and leapt towards the Duke. Wellington's hand flew to his sword; Alava just succeeded in hurling himself between them, while the son struggled with his father, endeavouring to tear the pistols from his hands. So in towering wrath the victor of Salamanca was hustled out of the house of the yet more infuriated painter.

The writer asks in conclusion whether there was not something in the remark of the elder Wellesley; "My brother Arthur is an ass!" She adds:—

The demeanour of the Iron Duke in Madrid, among friends and allies, was foolish with a folly easily pardoned by Britons, because, as has recently been said, it is so fatally common among them—the folly of Contempt.

A Plea for the Poor Hunted Microbe.

MR. MAURICE L. JOHNSON heads his paper in the Westminster Review "Microbes: are they inherently pathogenic?" and proceeds to answer the question with an emphatic negative. He quotes a paper read by Mr. George G. Bantock, M.D., F.R.C.S.E., in the March of last year, in which the doctor presents facts to show "that the modern doctrine of bacteriology is a gigantic mistake," and "that these various bacilli play a beneficent rôle in the economy of nature." The writer proceeds:—

As Dr. Bantock and other eminent authorities assure us, the germs which have come to be regarded as the causes of the most virulent diseases are constantly found swarming in perfectly healthy people, and as their decrescence is frequently attended with unfavourable results, there is good ground for believing them to be necessary and beneficent. But the misconceptions in regard to them seem to have arisen from the mistaking of an effect for a cause. For example, the Klebs-Löeffler bacillus has been looked upon as the cause of diphtheria, while it is universally admitted that it is continually present in perfectly healthy mouths and fauces. But, of course, when an individual contracts diphtheria, all the microbes of his system, including this denizen of the fauces to which the diphtheritic stigma has been attached, must participate in the contamination, and acquire the diphtheritic diathesis; so when, under such conditions, it has been taken and injected into animals, and they have developed diphtheria, the false assumption has arisen that this microbe, harmless enough when taken from a healthy person, was the cause of diphtheria, because it induced the disease when taken from a diphtheritic patient, any other microbe or emanation from whom would have possessed the same pathogenic property.

Dr. Foster Palmer is cited as saying that "the pathogenic microbe is powerless to cause disease in a healthy organism." Whence the writer deduces the moral that we should be more careful about maintaining the general health of the system than in hunting down the poor microbe, who is only harmful when coming from and entering into diseased or impaired organisms.

Em aga insis reso to co pac their lam refo ago of v

T

from attit

by 1

bei gu: Ch rel no nu

Ch

for pol

be be pr de U at isl

mon

P in A c:

a v c a

THE REVIEWS REVIEWED.

THE AMERICAN REVIEW OF REVIEWS.

THE September number naturally gives prominence to the Chinese problem. Mr. Joseph King Goodrich writes from Kyoto under date of July 24th on Japan's present attitude to China. He gives in full the message sent by the Emperor of China on July 11th, imploring the Emperor of Japan to make common cause with him against the Western Powers, and the Mikado's reply insisting first on the suppression of the insurgents and the rescue of the Legations. The general feeling in Japan is to consent to undertake a greater share in the work of pacifying China than the other Powers, after they find their inability and begin to lean on Japan. The writer laments that the United States did not back up the reforming efforts of the Chinese Emperor three years ago, and three months ago did not send troops and menof-war to be ready for an emergency.

Dr. James Dennis contributes a defence and an appreciation of missions in China. He argues that the animus of the Chinese is anti-foreign rather than anti-Christian, and due to the hustling aggressiveness of the foreigner in all departments of enterprise, crowned by political encroachments. He denies the frequent statement that missionaries were forced on China by European cannon; missionaries were in China a thousand years before the treaties were made; the treaties only safeguarded interests already there. And by Imperial decrees Christianity has been declared a recognised and tolerated religion in China. Missionaries are there by violation of no compact. The writer reckons Chinese Christians to number some one million and a half.

Does Jamaica contain a lesson in Colonial government?" asks Julius Moritzen, and answers, "Yes; how not to do it." He puts the blame on the Home Government, and remarks: "The Transvaal is not the only spot on earth where the name of Joseph Chamberlain is unbeloved." The elected representatives of the people have been overruled by the Colonial Office, and Jamaica is practically a Crown Colony. Nevertheless the writer declares: "Jamaica has no desire for annexation to the United States. Whatever may have been former attempts in that direction, the inhabitants of the island are to-day as British as those of Great Britain." It is a very interesting account which the writer gives of Jamaican trade and prospects: and valuable to those who would understand the new situation introduced by the United States as a West Indian Power.

The National Prohibition Party and its candidates are sympathetically sketched by Edward J. Wheeler. The Party is one of the eight minor parties that are entering into the Presidential contest. This is its eighth attack. At the last it gained only one per cent of the votes cast, and at an earlier time a quarter of a million votes. This time they expect to get half a million or even one million votes. John Granville Woolley, the eighth Presidential candidate, is a converted drunkard. The change took place in 1888. He is a magnetic speaker, a liberal Christian, an Endeavourer, but an unbending Prohibitionist. on a religious basis is his demand. His party counts on an increase in the vote because the canteen questionwhether the War Office should provide drink for United States soldiers-has come into prominence.

THE NATIONAL REVIEW.

THE September number is chiefly notable for Mr. Adrian Hofmeyr's "Afrikander Reflections," Mr. Proyand's essay on the "Coal Problem," and the estimate by "Ignotus" of "Japan's Improved Position in the Far East," all of which claim separate notice.

WHAT GERMANY IS AFTER.

Sir Rowland Blennerhassett surveys the foreign policy of the German Government, by which, he urges, the foreign policy of England must be influenced. The main object, he says, of a large and increasing school of German politicians is to form a coalition against England to destroy her naval supremacy. The most obvious means to this end is an alliance between Germany and France:—

I am inclined, however, to think that the basis of a Franco-German alliance would be that France and Germany should enter into a customs union with Belgium and Holland . . Military and naval conventions between France and Germany on the one side, and Belgium and Holland would follow. . . .

English supremacy at sea once overthrown, Germany by alliance with Holland would dominate the ocean, and France would be supreme in the Mediterranean, with a vast Colonial Empire centring in North Africa. To face these possibilities-

We may form firm alliances, but those alliances to be firm must be the outcome of interests, and I venture to hold the opinion that England could combine her interests with those of Italy and Russia rather than with the interests of any other of the Great European Powers. The keynote of her international policy should be perseverance in the work of Imperial Federation.

AMERICAN MILITARISM AT MANILA.

Mr. John Foreman inquires, "Will the United States withdraw from the Philippines?" and argues strongly for an affirmative answer. It is no rosy picture he gives of the effect of the American occupation. He says:—

Within a fortnight after the capitulation of Manila the drinking saloons had increased fourfold. According to the latest advices there are at least twenty to one existing in the time of the Drunkenness, with its consequent evils, is rife all over the city among the new white population. The orgies of the new-comers, the incessant street brawls, the insults offered with impunity to natives of both sexes, the entry with violence into private homes by the soldiery, who maltreated the inmates and laid hands on what they chose, were hardly calculated to arouse in the natives admiration for their new masters. Brothels were absolutely prohibited under Spanish rule, but since the evacuation there has been a great influx of women of ill fame, whilst native women have been pursued by lustful tormentors. During a certain period after the capitulation there was indis-criminate shooting, and no peaceable native's life was safe in the suburbs.

He reports that Filipinos are bent on independence, and only a large permanent army of occupation will keep them down. He drafted terms of self-government under an American protectorate, which he submitted to the High Commissioner of the titular Filipino Republic: and received this answer :-

Señor Agoncillo told me that he agreed prima facie (1) to the appointment of an American Resident, (2) to the concession of an island in perpetuity, and (3) to the repayment of the twenty million gold dollars with interest; but although he objected to the American control of the Customs he suggested no alternative form of guarantee.

was there. had worked Obviously opinion on t this does g a daub. stures and

The son voured to contempt watched. out-thrust vith rage. ut further A brace of ized them w to his en them. g to tear victor of

: " My g friends Britons, n among infuriated

was not in the erently on with ead by March o show igantic olav a writer us, the of the ing in quently ind for ut the n from ample, is the hat it fauces. Il the fauces articihesis;

jected false when Cause tient, have thoalthy ieral poor and

that

A WARNING NOTE FOR BRITISH TRADE.

Mr. A. Maurice Low, in his American Chronicle, reports what an English traveller—an acknowledged authority in his line—had said to him after visiting most of the great American manufacturing establishments:—

Until a few months ago consumption exceeded the supply, but the tide is about to turn, if it has not already turned, and when there is an unmistakable ebb it will be a bad day for England. What we dread in England more than anything else is hard times in the United States, not because it means a diminished market for English goods in America, but because it means flooding the English and foreign markets with American goods.

OTHER ARTICLES.

"Royal Artillery" cries for the abolition of compulsory Church Parade in the Army. Apparently it is the parade rather than the going to the church which the soldier dislikes, for he is stated to attend numerously the free evening service. The House of Commons, now departing Parliamentary life, is severely judged from the ladies' gallery by "Grille." She finds its record most disappointing both in legislation and in leadership. The schoolboy's view of schoolmasters is humorously set forth by R. G. Hawtrey, who sketches an ideal master for boys.

THE ENGINEERING MAGAZINE.

THE August number contains several interesting articles, one of which, on the industrial development of Porto Rico, is noticed elsewhere.

CHINA IN REGENERATION.

Mr. John Foord writes on the opportunity now opened up in China for industrial development. He says:—

The cataclysm which has rendered impossible the perpetuation of the power of the Empress Dowager and her knot of reactionary advisers has opened up China to the world no less surely than the disappearance of the Shogunate marked the beginning of the new era in Japan.

He mentions the great increase that has been made in American trade with the Celestial Empire during the last few years. British trade is, of course, first in magnitude, but, says Mr. Foord:—

For all essential purposes, American and British interests in China are identical, no less in the matter of railroad construction and equipment than in the general field of commerce. Neither British nor American manufacturers want anything more in China than a fair field and no favour, and the promoters of no enterprise appealing to British or American capital are bound by any conditions as to the market from which they are to draw their materials.

He thus describes America's position with regard to China:-

The absolutely disinterested position which the United States Government occupies in relation to the greatest of all the problems now before the civilised world almost necessarily renders the side which it may take in the settlement of China's future the most powerful one. It has only to speak with sufficient decision and show its readiness to act with sufficient resolution to have its decision respected.

PARISIAN TRANSPORT.

Mr. Henry H. Suplee contributes a descriptive article upon local transportation at the Paris Exposition and in Paris itself. He says that it was realised that the existing facilities would be quite unequal to the demand for transport during the present exhibition, and numerous preparations were made for improvements. As a matter of fact, however, none of these improvements has been completed in time excepting those within the exhibition grounds, and the visitor has to manage as best he can with the existing and totally inadequate means provided.

MOTOR VERSUS LOCOMOTIVE AND HORSE.

Mr. Fred M. Maynard writes an interesting article on the possibilities of heavy motor vehicles for road service. He says:—

Railways must always prove the cheapest medium for rapid transport over long distances, but below forty miles the terminal charges are so great in proportion to the cost of haulage that promising scope is afforded to any system of road carriage that can by one straightforward journey dispense with such terminal charges. Thus has it been gradually recognised that an enormous field exists for an intermediate form of transport, which, while independent of fixed routes, should possess greater latitude, and shew in use economy superior to that of the horse.

Mr. Maynard demonstrates by the aid of examples that the motor-wagon is within certain limits the most economical of all systems of land carriage. Nor is the saving in working expenses the only recommendation of the new waggons. The streets will be better paved, as cobble-stones will have to give place to asphalt or other silent road covering:—

But with cleaner streets the cost of scavenging will be enormously reduced, and, owing to the absence of that pulverising action of the horses' roofs, a corresponding saving in the expenditure for maintenance and repairs of the road surfaces will be the natural result.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Mr. George H. Hull writes upon the industrial depression and the pig-iron reserve, showing that the abnormal prices of iron are the direct cause of business stagnation. Mr. Waldon Fawcett continues his series of papers on the shipbuilding yards of the United States. Mr. Hugo Diemer gives his third paper on the commercial organisation of the machine shop. Sidney F. Walker gives an interesting account of the use made of electricity in coal mines in Great Britain, and Mr. W. D. Ennis writes on the future of power development. The magazine contains the usual review of the Engineering press all over the world.

FEILDEN'S, MAGAZINE.

WITH the August number this magazine celebrated its birthday, and in consequence is even more attractively got up than usual. None of the articles except the one on the Simplon tunnel would be read with much interest by the man in the street.

THE LONGEST TUNNEL IN SWITZERLAND.

An article by "Our Special Commissioner," illustrated by photos and diagrams, describes the great tunnel twelve and a half miles long, which is being bored through the mountain from Brig in Switzerland to Isella in Italy. It differs chiefly from other tunnels, which have been made through these mountains, in that instead of one large boring, which will take two tracks, it consists of two parallel tunnels, each large enough to take a single track. At present only one is to be used, the other acting as a ventilating tube. The two tunnels are connected by cross galleries every 200 yards. The tunnel will be ready for traffic in 1904. Mr. Brandt, the engineer who designed the machinery and directed the work, died of apoplexy, without seeing the completion of his work. It is a peculiar coincidence that the engineer of the St. Gothard Tunnel, Louis Favre, died in the same way.

THE most i elsewh is hard

I do paper the his affords the int which exposi following if it is a first to i.e.

without voyage probab in safet without Mr. of the distrus

he say effect else i

Thier

The

Coloni four re of Min Englar toward The the si them the Colon

Impe

Mr

subje

unfor

ever tricts when rende the e Macl evils as tl Outla Gove an an the I an in that ment Mac polic By colon

was a seque fome large

has been exhibition est he can provided.

article on d service.

for rapid the terminal ulage that triage that a terminal enormous ich, while itude, and examples the most or is the endation r paved, phalt or be enor-

in the faces will rial delat the

at the business eries of States. mercial Walker ctricity is writes ne conver the ted its ctively ne one nterest welve h the Italy. been f one its of single cting d by trated

who ed of It

THE CONTEMPORARY REVIEW.

THE Contemporary Review for September is much the most interesting of the September reviews. I notice elsewhere several of the more weighty articles, but there is hardly a dull paper in the number.

THE EVIDENCE OF DESIGN IN HISTORY.

I do not know who Mr. William Larminie is, but his paper is a portent in its way, for he boldly maintains that the history of the world for the last four thousand years affords evidence of the existence of an All Ruler who is the intelligent disposer of events. I have not space in which to follow him in his rapid and sometimes brilliant exposition of the course of human Instory, but the following passage will explain how it is that I am inclined to early Mr. Larminie as a kind of Paley Redivivus:—

If it be possible for us to believe that a ship without steam, without rudder, or without pilot, could accomplish such a voyage in equal time, or in any time, we may likewise hold it probable that the barque of human civilisation has sailed so far insafety on its tortuous and dangerous course, without knowledge, without choice, and without guide.

THE COLONIAL OFFICE MYTH.

Mr. C. de Thierry devotes sixteen pages to an exposition of the reason why the Colonial Office is so universally distrusted outside those realms. "Only in these islands," he says, "is the Colonial Office regarded as potential to effect the solution of Imperial problems. Everywhere else it is regarded as a centre of red-tape." Mr. de Thierry says:—

The Colonial Office is a power nowhere in self-governing Colonies and is not a success in Crown Colonies; and this for four reasons: (1) The character of the Colonial Office; (2) lack of Ministerial responsibility; (3) the attitude of the people of England towards the Colonies; (4) the attitude of the Colonies towards the Colonial Office.

There have been twenty-nine Colonial Secretaries in the sixty years of the Queen's reign. One and all of them seem to have incurred the general condemnation of the Colonists, who, Mr. de Thierry declares, regard the Colonial Office as a monument to English indifference to Imperial development and colonial opinion.

THE CAUSES OF THE CAPE REBELLION.

Mr. Frederic Mackarness, in his paper upon this subject, brings into clear relief the hard case of the unfortunate Dutch Colonists of the Cape. None of them ever drew sword against the Empire, excepting in districts where the British authority had ceased to exist, and when they were, according to international law, bound to render obedience to those who ipso facto had superseded the existing Government by the power of the sword. Mr. Mackarness maintains that the only cure for the present evils is in the adoption of the policy of conciliation such as that which worked so well in Canada. When the Outlanders in Johannesburg conspired to overturn the Government, Mr. Chamberlain made use of that fact as an argument in favour of their enfranchisement. the Dutch Colonists of the Cape were forced to support an invasion from the Republics, Mr. Chamberlain makes that an excuse for demanding their life-long disfranchisement. Fortunately he was overruled in this, but Mr. Mackarness has reason when he thus describes the policy adopted by the present Government :-

By the abandonment to the invaders of whole districts of colonists allied by blood and feeling to those invaders, rebellion was almost invited. By the sweeping administration of martial law, its prolongation beyond any necessity for it, and its consequent application to illegal purposes, disaffection has been fomented. By the proposed disfranchisement of voters over large areas there will be inflicted a punishment carefully calculated in the eyes of the black races, themselves enfranchised, to brand with a political stigma one of the dominant European races, and that one which is numerically and electorally proponderant in the Colony.

MR. RICHARD CROKER.

Mr. Poultney Bigelow, in a very interesting and brightly written paper on "What I saw at Kansas City" when Bryan was nominated, brings out very clearly the extent to which Mr. Croker has succeeded in creating anew the old Kingship under the forms of American Democracy:

The German Emperor in the robes of the Black Eagle radiates no more power by smile or frown than does His Majesty King Croker holding audience in the bedroom of a Kansas City hotel. The Kaiser is limited by a constitution; Richard Croker is less trammelled, his power is complete, he governs a community vastly more rich and populous than was the whole of Præssia when Frederick the Great ascended the throne, and his treasury is full. There is not a crowned head in Europe that does not envy Mr. Croker; there is not a crowned head west of Warsaw whom Mr. Croker cannot afford to pity. Royalty has much in common the world over. But in that list I can recall few, very few, who made me feel more of the majesty encircling a king than did Richard Croker in the midst of his Tammany ccurtiers.

Mr. Croker received the homage of his courtiers as Queen Victoria submits to the ordeal of a Drawing-Room. "His manner was restful and had in it something hypnotic":—

Of excitable and perspiring politicians Croker alone seemed cool and indifferent; yet of them all it was he who kept the most machinery in action. Others did the shouting, but he selected the shouters. He, the most important single man at the Convention, made not a single speech, never mounted the platform; only a very few saw him at all.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Mr. Calderon gives a rather mournful account of the position of Russian trade in China. He says that neither official Russia nor private Russian enterprise can compete in cheapness or efficiency with English, Japanese, German or Norwegian cargo lines. "While the Russian Empire neglects the Russian individual for the sake of its large schemes, the Russian individual equally neglects the Russian Empire for the sake of his small schemes." He thinks that with the Russian character, its incapacity for combination (an odd accusation to bring against the nation which invented the artel), and the disinclination for picking up small profits, things would not improve even if Russia owned the whole of China. Hannah Lynch describes and denounces M. Barrès's "Appel au Soldat." The way in which she handles him can best be understood by reading the following quotation:

To discover what a vile and villainous thing humanity may become, we need only study certain kinds of "men of letters." Their pretentiousness, their absence of anything approaching decent feeling, are only overtopped by their subtle blackguardism. Beside them the hou ebreaker, the street ruffian, the common cutthroat, are men with some of the dignity of mankind about them.

The spirit of the vacation has evidently reached even Blackwood. The September number is of the open air, airy. Sir Herbert Maxwell depicts his "Valley of Enchantment"—Romsdal in Norway—with all an angler's enthusiasm. Mr. C. H. Hanbury Williams gives a graphic description of his adventures in pursuit of wild geese in Manitoba. The relative claims of golf, old and new, are discussed. "How we escaped from Pretoria," by Captain Haldane, is an exciting tale of hairbreadth scapes, yet suggesting that this was but a glorified version of the boy's game of hide and seek. "The Needs of the Navy" claim notice elsewhere.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

THIS is a good average number. Several of the articles are noticed shortly elsewhere.

SUGGESTED REFORM IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE.

Mr. Edmund Robertson, Q.C., M.P., in a paper on "Business Principles in the Public Service," writes in a somewhat professorial style on the difference in the way in which the national business is conducted, and the business principles applied by an ordinary firm. In the course of his inspection he makes various suggestions, one of which is as follows :-

I am strongly convinced of the desirability of submitting the Navy, Army, and Civil Service Estimates to separate select committees, before whom the responsible permanent officials might be called to explain and defend their proposals as the accounting officers explain and defend their accounts before the Public Accounts Committee. The gist of the thing is that a select committee should sit upon the Estimates both before they are voted and after they are executed, with the power of calling before it for examination the officials responsible for proposing them and for administering them.

Mr. Robertson reminds us that the pension system costs the country every year seven and a-half millions, of which three are absorbed by military and two by naval men, and two and a-half by the Civil Service.

A VINDICATION OF THE STAFF COLLEGE.

Colonel Lonsdale Hale, writing on the Staffwork in the war, makes the best case he can for the institution in which he spent seven of the happiest years of his life. The Staff College has been at work forty years. Of thirteen divisional generals only three passed through the college. Out of 460 generals and Staff officers now in South Africa only 120 passed through the Staff College. Colonel Hale says :

The Staff College has, with all its shortcomings, been of great value to the Service generally. It has been the only institution where officers have been able to study the higher work of the profession, or, in fact, to learn what the work of that profession is and how it should be carried out.

Nearly one thousand officers have graduated at the college since it was instituted. The roll from 1858 to 1887 compiled by General Clive gives some 600 names. In it we find the names of some well-known men—Lord Cromer, Sir Evelyn Wood, Sir John Ardagh, Sir E. H. Collin, and that born leader of men, the late Herbert Stewart; but there are not many of this type.

But notwithstanding these merits it has not been popular in the Army.

STATISTICS OF SUICIDE.

Mr. R. A. Skelton writes an essay cramfull of figures for the purpose of ascertaining the causes and characteristics of suicide. It is the result, he says, of a general and growing sense of malaise. Suicide is increasing in every country in Europe. It reached its highest point in Saxony in 1881-84, and is at its lowest in Ireland. The percentage is sixteen times as great in Saxony as in Ireland. Four men commit suicide for one woman. Norway has reduced her percentage of suicides by onehalf as a result of reducing her percentage of drink by three-quarters.

The most suicides occur in the hottest months. Girls between fifteen and twenty commit suicide more frequently than boys of the same age. But while old men often take their lives, old women very seldom commit suicide. He thus sums up the result of his examination of the effects of marriage and divorce on suicide :-

 Marriage tends to restrain suicidal desire.
 The influence of widowhood is not sensibly different from that of celibacy.

(3) Divorce is highly conducive to suicide.

(4) Difference in civil condition affects male more than female

THE TRADITIONAL BRITISH SAILOR.

Mr. W. J. Fletcher describes the Jack Tar of the novelist and the stage, and laments that the sailor is usually caricatured rather than described in literature. Mr. Fletcher says :

Lct us say between 1750 and 1805—our ships were notoriously and admittedly inferior to those of France and Spain. Class for class, our enemies' ships were larger, sailed better, carried their guns higher out of the water, and accommodated larger crews than ours.

Nevertheless, owing to the superiority of our personnel, the British Navy triumphed over all its rivals. Mr. Fletcher says of the sailor :-

They drew him and wrote of him as a grinning zany, a brawling ruffian, a blatant boaster, or a maudlin sentimentalist. No doubt he was each and all of these things on occasions; but he was something more. Prickly to handle, difficult to rule, he was unconquerable when well led. He knew and kept the laws of the sea, while often ignorant and defiant of the laws of the land. Faithful to his friends, he was terrible to his foes, yet merciful in victory. He was content to live like a dog and die like a hero for poor pay and the chance of prize-money.

CONFUCIANISM.

Professor Max Müller begins a series of papers on the religions of China, with an account of Confucianism. Professor Max Müller says :-

Confucius himself would have most strongly protested against any of the doctrines of his religion, as taught in the Five Kings and the Four Shûs, being ascribed to him or to any superhuman There is no other founder of any religious or philosophical system so anxious to hide his own personality. Confucius calls himself a transmitter only, not a maker, believing in and loving the ancients. When speaking of himself he says: "At fifteen I had my mind bent on learning. At thirty I stood firm. At forty I had no doubts. At fifty I knew the decrees of heaven. At sixty my ear was an obedient organ for the desired without transgressing what was right." Confucius died in 478 B.C., complaining that among all the princes of the Empire there was not one who had adopted his principles, not one who would obey his lessons. He was not an active reformer, so that while alive he scarcely produced a ripple on the smooth and silent surface of the religious thought of his own country.

OUR ALLIES AT WATERLOO.

Sir Herbert Maxwell devotes a paper under this title to an attempt to convince John Bull that he would never have won Waterloo if it had not been for the Prussians. He also vindicates the Dutch, who supplied one-third of the actual combatants. When Napoleon left Paris on June 12th to stake everything on a battle with Wellington, the latter had only 93,700 men under his command. Of these, 32,000 were Germans, 29,000 Dutchmen, and only 31,000 British.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Mr. Bradley Martin, Jun., in a somewhat pedantic, schoolboy fashion, sets forth the reason why he thinks that America would do well to annex the Philippines. Mr. Langton Douglas writes on the Maiolica of Siena, and Sir Wemyss Reid gives us his usual notes on the news of the day. It is odd to find a chronicler, usually so sane, carried away by the usual delusion as to the "humane" and "forbearing" way in which we have carried on the war in South Africa. If some day the same humanity was to be shown to British patriots defending their country against foreign invasion, Sir Wemyss Reid would be one of the first to discover the immensity of his mistake.

IH in this tembe Mr. V drama Lees who h of wa a lead sons They volun "La are P

Color

Mr alway

we an ships Th Navy now quenc propo not b stater thoug traini for th in the setti Shal W reall hope long dram actin posit

C

C Tree spea

of p T Miss mitt for Vol Eng but only and 186

For pap inc Ca sim

was

e than female

Tar of the ne sailor is literature.

e notoriously n. Class for carried their larger crews personnel. vals. Mr. ing zany, a timentalist. asions; but t to rule, he ept the laws laws of the is foes, yet log and die y.

rs on the fucianism. ed against

Five Kings uperhuman or philoity. Conelieving in f he says: rty I stood he decrees in for the my heart Confucius ces of the ciples, not an active this title ld never russians. -third of Paris on llington, nd. Of nd only ripple on f his own edantic, thinks ippines. Siena, on the usually to the e have ay the patriots on, Sir ver the

are Paul Adams, who wrote "La Force," and Lieutenant-Colonel Patry, who wrote "War as it is." THE ACHILLES HEEL OF OUR NAVY.

THE FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW.

I HAVE noticed elsewhere the more important articles in this review. One of the leading features of the September number are the two literary papers. In the one

Mr. William Sharp describes, analyses, and criticises the dramas of D'Annunzio. The other in which Mr. Frederick Lees gossips pleasantly concerning the various writers who have contributed to modern French romance stories of war. Among these writers on war to whom he gives a leading place are Messrs. Paul and Victor Margueritte, sons of General Margueritte, who was killed near Sedan. They are telling the story of the war of 1870-71 in three volumes, "Le Désastre," "Les Troncons du Glaive," and

"La Commune." Among the other authors mentioned

Mr. Rollo Appleyard, in a paper entitled "We are always ready," points out how very imperfectly provided we are with men to drive the engines of our great battle-

The true measure of the Navy is the Navy List; and the Navy List shows that the engine-rooms of our Fleet are even now deplorably under-manned. It is certain that, in consequence of under-manning in the engineer branch, a great proportion of our effective ships, if suddenly called upon, could not be added to the fighting line. The evidence in proof of this statement is irrefutable. It is high time for a truce to this thoughtless policy. We must insist upon the reconstruction of the engineer personnel, and the adjustment of its numbers, training, rank and pay. The danger cannot be over-estimated; for the efficiency of the engineer branch is the cardinal necessity in the efficiency of the Fleet.

THE STAGING OF SHAKESPEARE.

Colonel W. Hughes Hallett, replying to Mr. Beerbohm Tree, who had vindicated a gorgeous setting of Shakespeare's plays, declares that the result of the elaborate setting has been to practically destroy the effect of Shakespeare's plays :-

What man under five-and-thirty can remember having been really moved by the acting of Shakespeare? But is the case hopeless? Let us not say it. Let us rather hope that before long the reaction may come, that in the production of the poetic drama managers may put acting first, and acting second, and acting third, relegating scenery and costume to a purely ancillary position.

GORDON'S CAMPAIGN IN CHINA.

Colonel R. H. Vetch begins the publication of a series of papers in which Gordon tells the story of his operations in China against the Taipings. Colonel Vetch says :-

The notes, now for the first time published by permission of Miss E. M. Dunlop, General Gordon's niece, and of the Committee of the Royal Engineer's Institute, were written by Gordon, for the information of his brother officers, and contributed to Vol. xix. of The Professional Papers of the Corps of Royal Engineers, 1871. These papers at that time were not published, but were printed for the use of the officers of Royal Engineers only. Gordon's contributions formed No. xiii. of the volume, and was entitled, Notes on the Operations Round Shanghai in 1862-63-64, by Lieut.-Colonel C. G. Gordon, C.B., R.E.

ARE THE ENGLISH AN INFERIOR RACE?

Mr. George Gissing, who has been contributing to the Fortnightly for some months past a series of travel papers under the title of "By the Ionian Sea," describes incidentally his experiences at a café in the coast town of Catanzaro. He says:—

I could not but fall into a comparison of this scene with any similar gathering of middle-class English folk. The contrast was very greatly in favour of the Italians. Among these representative men, young and old, of Catanzaro, the tone of conversation was incomparably better than that which would rule in a cluster of English provincials met to enjoy their evening leisure. They did, in fact, converse—a word rarely applicable to English talk under such conditions; mere personal gossip was the exception; they exchanged genuine thoughts, reasoned lucidly on the surface of abstract subjects. The choice of topics and the mode of viewing them was distinctly intellectual. These people have an innate respect for things of the mind, which is wholly lacking to a typical Englishman. One need not dwell upon the point that their animation was supported by a tiny cup of coffee or a glass of lemonade; this is a matter of climate and racial constitution; but I noticed the entire absence of a certain kind of jocoseness which is so naturally associated with spirituous liquors; no talk could have been less offensive. From many a bar-parlour in English country towns I have gone away heavy with tedium and disgust; the café at Catanzaro seemed, in comparison, a place of assembly for wits and philosophers.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Mr. W. B. Yeats writes at some length concerning Irish Witch Doctors, and Mr. J. F. Taylor takes advantage of the indignation expressed at the acquittal of Sipido in order to remind Englishmen of the enthusiasm with which they welcomed the release of Bernard when tried for providing explosives to blow up the Emperor Napoleon.

The Lady's Realm.

THE Lady's Realm for September opens with a most beautiful picture of R. T. Wyatt's "Huntress," the marble original of which belongs to the Queen. There also some fine illustrations of the Queen's Gardens. In the sketches of General Ian Hamilton and of Princess Ludwig of Bayaria there is little to command attention: one wonders why the portrait of poor King Otto should have been given. Miss Edith Leverton gives a great deal of information about Paris ateliers for lady students, among other items, the fees for attendance. One of the teachers most sought by English women spends every summer in England with a sketching class. The cult of the cat in its recent accelerated developments is sketched by W. M. Elkington with many pictures of notable pussies and their mistresses. Of more serious value is an article by Robert Bell on ladies' papers a hundred years ago. He says, "One might describe the ladies' magazines of those days as strategical manuals concerning the attack and defence of feminine virtue." Poetry and music were plentiful; fashions not so prominent; foreign and home news were regularly supplied: otherwise the subjects were much the same as now.

Harmsworth.

Harmsworth for August possesses much variety of interest. Mr. Shepstone's account of the railway with trains running 200 miles an hour requires separate notice. Mr. Arthur Birnage describes the sand castle competitions which enterprising seaside municipalities are getting up to attract children and their parents. Mr. Wintle tells of a new apparatus for treating the horse surgically and turning him over on any side for operation. The Great Swiss National Athletic Festival at Chaux-de-Fonds supplies Mr. E. Spaley with an effective theme for pen and camera. The Church Army comes in for sympathetic description, as also the crack shots at Bisley.

THE principal articles in the Leisure Hour are one on "Dublin Castle" and another on the Hon. A. J. Watt, Postmaster General of Victoria, the youngest Cabinet Minister in the Empire. The other articles hardly require notice.

THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW.

THE September number rises very much above the Westminster average. There is no less reforming ardour, but panaceas are less obtrusive. Militarism and Jingoism form the chief enemy, but do not exclude constructive proposals. Mr. F. A. White's vehement blast of warning against another Septennate of Jingoism succeeding the coming Dissolution has been noticed elsewhere, as also Mr. W. D. Macgregor's scheme of Old Age Pensions and Maurice Johnson's defence of microbes.

WAR NOT THE ONLY SCHOOL OF VALOUR.

War "is the foundation of all the high virtues and faculties of men." This saying of Ruskin rouses Mr. Walter J. Baylis to ask, "Is War a Blessing?" His conclusion is:—

Surely life is difficult enough under ordinary conditions, and furnishes sufficient opportunities for the display of both physical and moral courage, without our going afield to create new opportunities. This cannot be disputed, at any rate, so far as moral courage is concerned; while as a school for physical courage we have the lifeboat service, the fire brigade, the fever hospital, the slums and alleys of our great towns, and the chastising of bullies, besides polar expeditions and the exploration of other distant and dangerous regions. We have mountaineering, ballooning, and, last but not least, opposing the present war, which requires considerable courage in some company! Pace John Ruskin, we cannot believe that it is absolutely necessary that nations should be either manslaughterers or cowards.

Nora Twycross follows with a paper on the clergy and the war, wherein she rebukes the Jingo parson, but does not forget the faithful among the faithless found. She is inclined to think "there is a deeper feeling of revolt against militarism than has ever been cherished before."

THE FOLLY OF CONSCRIPTION.

"The Case against Conscription" is vigorously stated by Mr. A. W. Livesey. He observes that the privileged classes have never taken the initiative in increasing our navy, they have only poured cold water on those who insisted on a big fleet, but have always been eager to increase the army, even to the extent of introducing conscription. The fleet, Mr. Livesey says, is not a standing menace to our liberties, and adds no power to the ruling classes. His general contention he thus sums up:—

It has been shown that, whilst the establishment of a colossal standing army, or of conscription, must inevitably sound the knell of English liberties, on the other hand, those classes of the community who imagine that they would derive solid advantages from such a retrogressive measure are living in a fool's paradise; for, like all other classes, they would suffer both directly and indirectly from it, the military classes themselves, even, being sufferers with the rest of us. Moreover, it has been shown that all rapid advancement in civilisation and the arts is made in times of peace; whilst the military spirit, and military organisation and habits of mind, are antagonistic to all such progress, and by causing a marked limitation of the producing powers of a country (which means inferior nourishment and worse physical conditions for the masses) indirectly lowers the vitality and energy of a race, constituting a serious diminution of its ultimate chances in the international struggle for the survival of the fittest.

The assumption that a colossal army is necessary for purposes of Imperial defence is denounced as absurd.

LIGHT FROM "DARKEST ENGLAND."

Mr. Wm. H. Hunt offers General Booth's Hadleigh Colony as "an interesting industrial experiment" in the quest after a remedy for urban congestion and rural depopulation. He quotes figures from the report for 1899, which give "a grand total for the colony of £42,166 2s. 7½d. on the expenditure side, and £40,786 18s. 11d. for income, or a total deficit on the year's working of £1,379 3s. 8½d. In 1898 it was £855 os. 11d. on an expenditure of £37,612 11s. 5½d.; and in 1897, £750 4s. 10½d. on an expenditure of £35,113 os. 5d." General Booth "has been dealing with unproductive land by means of unskilled and incompetent men; and yet he has come within measurable distance of making the enterprise pay." Mr. Hunt asks, what might not be done with good land and accustomed labourers? True, he grants, the Salvation Army has the inestimable advantage of disinterested and devoted administrators. But, he argues, we have no right to suppose that disinterested administrators would be wanting were the experiment to be made on a national scale. This is an article to remember when social legislation recommences.

"FREEDOM, JUSTICE, VITALITY."

The three laws of social activity are declared by Leonard M. Burrell to be Freedom, Justice, Vitality. These, he finds, necessitate:—

(1) Free competition as to land, the single tax on its values, and laws as to its use. (2) Freedom in work and trade limited by laws as to kind and quality in productions. (3) Education which shall fit men to follow different industries when competition forces them to change their occupation, and which shall teach them that desire governs activity, and that reason and morality govern desire. That is, I advocate freedom limited by justice, and directed by wisdom.

OTHER ARTICLES.

The murder of sleep by night noises in towns is the theme of a plaint by Mr. George Trobridge. He advocates the suppression of steam hooters in factories, and of traction engines moving by night; the moderation of railway whistling; the use of wood pavement for granite; and the prohibition by the police of night rowdyism.

Harriet McIlquham calls to mind Cornelius Agrippa and his lectures on the nobility and pre-excellence of women

THE COSMOPOLITAN.

THE August number of this magazine contains many articles of interest. With those of Mr. Walker, Mr. W. T. Stead and Miss C. A. Crecvey we deal elsewhere. Mr. Frank R. Roberson's article, "With Boer and Briton," is a curious mixture of personal details and jumbled incidents. There seems no guiding motive in the article, which is otherwise interesting enough. The ideas expressed in Mr. Roberson's closing sentences will probably find many opponents. He says:—

The prevailing feeling in South Africa is that the war has been a godsend. It has given the British arm an experience it could not otherwise have attained. It has taught the Boer much, enlarged his horizon, and will eventually lessen his hatred of the individual Englishman and increase his own comforts and liberties.

William F. Howe writes upon "Some Notable Murder Cases," and arrives at the conclusion that in nearly every case the murderer himself betrays his crime in one way or another:—

The murder done, the murderer becomes a man without a country, a man without a friend, nay, more—he is a man without a God. Every man's hand is against him and his hand is against every man. His foes are they of his own household. His conscience becomes the avenger of his crime; he is forced to join the hue and cry society raises to protect itself.

Probler August "The F. F. H from th he fin 1 no case Philipp recomi Americ the su the fr ment Much "To t the fla that th to gov Spani instru persev rate c foreca

BESI

White Rome most either labor The to ke many want

In

Northard 27 p who need of class

say:
T is n proof for of t. Car curf

Imp

Gr col the loy eve

THE FORUM.

BESIDES the articles on Afghanistan and the Negro Problem in the Southern States, noticed elsewhere, the August Forum contains a hopefully-written paper on "The Present and Future of the Philippines," by Mr. F. F. Hilder, who, of course, views their condition purely from the American expansionist standpoint. On the whole he finds great cause for satisfaction in the Philippines. In no case will America, having once put her hand to the Philippine plough, be persuaded to turn Fack. He recommends the replacing of volunteers by regular American troops, and the enlistment of native soldiers; the substitution of clergy whom the people can trust for the friars whom they hate and distrust; the improvement of all communications, and universal education. Much has already been done, especially educationally. "To the credit of the Americans the school-house follows the flag." It is, indeed, mainly to the Filipino children that the Americans must look if they are ever successfully to govern the Islands. These children are taught both Spanish and English, although Spanish is the medium of instruction. They are extremely bright, capable, and persevering, and altogether show all the elements of firstrate citizens. The article concludes with a rose-coloured forecast of the future possibilities of Manila.

THE SHADOW OVER ITALY.

In contrast to this is a depressing article by Mr. H. R. Whitehouse, late secretary of the American Legation at Rome, on "Some Italian Problems." Italy, though the most heavily-taxed nation in Europe, has not money either for her army and navy or for her schools and laboratories:—

There is not a public library in the kingdom which can afford to keep abreast of the times. Even the State Archives are in many instances allowed to moulder and decay in damp vaults for want of funds to provide suitable storage.

Luxuries are either very little taxed or not at all, while necessaries pay exorbitantly. Continual political and commercial jealousies exist between North and South. Northern Italy, with 48 per cent. of the wealth, pays hardly 40 per cent. of the taxes; Southern Italy, with 27 per cent., pays 32 per cent. There is no statesman who could tackle the extensive reforms so urgently needed; and the writer's only remedy is that the people of Italy—"the intelligent professional and middle classes"—should take the matter into their hands.

UNITED STATES V. RUSSIA.

Mr. John Charlton's article on "Canada and Imperialism" is instructive if somewhat Jingo. He says:—

The devotion of Canada to the interests of the British Empire is not entirely one of sentiment. Material interests also play a prominent part; for Great Britain is almost the exclusive market for Canada's food products, and furnishes a market for two-thirds of the total exports from the Dominion. Self-interest forbids that Canada should suffer this market to be destroyed or seriously cuttailed.

America's tariff has repressed not only Canada's trade but also her affections. Canada has therefore transferred both to Great Britain. So highly does she appreciate Great Britain's "lenient and generous" treatment of her colonies, that not 10 per cent. of the Canadians (outside the Province of Quebec) are anything but thoroughly loyal to everything British. Imperial Federation, however, Mr. Charlton regards as neither likely nor essential to Imperial unity.

to Imperial unity.

Mr. Charles C. Conant's second paper on "The United States as a World-Power" deals with America's advantages in competition for commercial empire. These advantages he rates very highly. For the coming world-conflict he singles out Russia and the United States as pre-eminently fitted, and each has something to learn from the other. Both start with two vitally necessary articles in plenty—unexhausted coalfields and adequate supplies of food. In ability for immense organisation the Anglo-Saxon peoples—and especially the Americans—are supreme. State socialism he would only tolerate so long as greater commercial efficiency can be attained under it.

Another great danger escaped by America is "the entombment of some of the highest capacity of the country in the barren service of armies." Mr. Conant unhesitatingly assures us that the cause of modern social progress is irrevocably committed to the Anglo-Saxon race. In the United States the older interests have shrivelled up before this brilliant new Imperialism.

MR. KEIR HARDIE'S HOPES.

Mr. Keir Hardie discusses "Labour and Politics in Great Britain." He is by no means hopeful for the immediate future. The I.L.P., he tells us, mean to put forward at least a dozen candidates:—

A like number will be run by the Trades Unionists, and a smaller number by the Social Democratic Federation. In all, between forty and fifty candidates will go to the polls under the auspices of the United Labour Party; and if only a half or even a third of these are returned, they will form the nucleus of a party from which much may be reasonably expected. The Radicals in Parliament, together with the Irish Party, would probably find common ground of action with such a group; and, as a result, there would be a fighting force of, say, 120. Resolutely led, by taking advantage of every opportunity, it would steadily become a power in the land; causing the Whigs to go over in form as well as in spirit to their natural friends, the Tories, and bringing the nation face to face with the straight issue—Socialism versus Capitalism.

TOLSTOY'S MESSAGE FOR ENGLAND.

Mr. G. H. Perris, writing on Tolstoy's "Russia," is more appreciative of the man than of the country. We quote the following passage:—

In two details, I think, Tolstoy's teaching has even more pertinence to the English than it has to the Russian people. The first is his agrarianism—his demand that every healthy person shall do some hand labour, preferably on the land—his unbounded faith in the country life and the country people. The development of public ownership may remove some evils from our social structure; but will they do away with the bulk of them? The second point is Tolstoy's eloquent Internationalism. He sees, as some Englishmen and Americans are beginning to see, that empire is just the largest and most characteristic form which the great joint-stock company of capitalists, aristocrats, bureaucrats, and soldiers has taken in the last fifteen years, that at bottom Imperialism is the same thing whether it has a Slavic or a Saxon name. He knows what war means by experience.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Mr. G. Stanley Hall strongly advocates the study of child life as an aid to true education. "There is really no way," he says, "through all the mazes of culture and the distractions of modern life save by knowing the true nature and needs of childhood and adolescence. The Hon. Charles Denby tells "How Peace was made between China and Japan" mainly by himself and another American. Mr. Robert Hill has a paper on Texas, "the most democratic of all American commonwealths."

furder every e way hout a vithout against . His ced to colony of nd £40,786

the year's 855 os. 11d.

d in 1897, 13 os. 5d."

productive

ent men;

e distance asks, what ccustomed

ny has the evoted ad-

to suppose

ting were This is on recom-

clared by

Vitality.

its values.

de limited

Education

when com-

which shall eason and limited by is is the ge. He actories.

deration nent for

of night

Agrippa

lence of s many er, Mr.

ewhere. er and ils and

tive in The ces will war has ience it

e Boer hatred

rts and

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

THE September number of this magazine is full of interest. Julian Ralph's "The Teuton Tug of War," William W. Kimball's "Submarine Torpedo-Boats" and Edward Insley's "Paris in 1900," we have dealt with elsewhere. Paul Leicester Ford contributes a charming short story entitled "Wanted a Watchmaker"—the study of the little ragamuffin newspaper boy is wonderfully worked out. There are three other short stories and further instalments of the three serials. Walter McClintock has an interesting article entitled "Four Days in a Medicine Lodge," illustrated with many pictures.

BOXERS AND THE YELLOW PERIL.

Mr. R. van Bergen in the current Century deals with "The Revolution in China and Its Causes." He gives some details as to the Boxers, which will be of interest to everybody. He says:—

Every resident of Peking employs a watchman or doorkeeper, and that person is, in every instance, a member of the Ta-chuan (literally, "Big Fist"), or, as it is now called, "Boxer," society. Properly considered, it is not a secret society, but bears a great resemblance to our labour-unions. Its purpose is mainly benevolent, namely, to provide for old or disabled members.

The society of the Boxers is made up of men whose physical and muscular strength has been trained purposely and from early youth, not that they may enter the athletic arena, but that they may engage in a perfectly lawful and recognised career. They are engaged as watchmen by wealthy residents, and as guards by travellers carrying a large amount of money, or to convoy specie for great distances. Such a guard or watchman insures perfect safety, for it places the property or person under the protection of the Ta-chuan union, and thieves or malefactors dread arousing its vengeance. Not a single instance is on record where a member of the Ta-chuan was faithless to his trust.

The government recognised the union, and frequently employed it to convoy treasure. The father of Prince Tuan, and grandfather of the heir-apparent, is, and has been for years, the official patron of the union.

CAUSES OF THE REVOLT.

Mr. van Bergen considers that the opening of the railways may have been in some degree a cause of discontent among the Boxers. Satisfied, however, that this reason is insufficient, Mr. Bergen give a short resume of the aims of Japan and Russia and their hostility. The former, he says, wants only "Asia for the Asiatics"—whatever she may appear to be working for—while the latter desires to gradually absorb China:—

It is unnecessary to trace the causes of hostility between Japan and Russia; they are many, and of such a nature as to demand the arbitrament of the sword. Both nations are alive to the fact that the struggle is unavoidable; yet, at this stage, neither is inclined to initiate active hostilities. Russia desires the completion of the Trans-Siberian Railway; Japan is anxious to possess a fleet powerful enough to secure her territory against invasion, and, naturally, hesitates to enter upon a contest with an overwhelming foe.

THE REAL YELLOW PERIL.

Though both Russian and Japanese ambitions are a source of danger, Mr. van Bergen thinks that there is yet a more potent danger:—

Another danger threatens—one which deserves immediate and anxious consideration, because here there is no probability, but certainty. Whatever be the outcome of the present chaotic condition of China, the Manchu and Mandarin are doomed together with Confucianism; and modern progress, so far as it affects the physical sociology of China, must take their places. The morrow of the restoration of order will see the world face to face with the problem of competition from untold millions of industrious, thrifty, sober, enterprising, and deft-fingered people.

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW.

THE August number of this magazine is very "yellow," and a batch of seven articles on the Chinese question have been noticed elsewhere. Of the remaining articles the cleverest is that by Mr. T. P. O'Connor, M.P., on "Some Absurdities of the House of Commons." Over and over again, Mr. O'Connor says, he has seen a new member enter the House, having reached the climax of his ambition; but in a few months enthusiasm has given way to deep depression. The member learns that the great object of the House of Commons is not how to do business, but how not to do it; that it consists of men who, for the most part, unless for a couple of hours each day, avoid the place as if it were infected with the pestilence; and that, of those who remain in the House and take a part in its proceedings, the majority are wearied, disillusioned men, who have lost nerve and hope and the freshness of their energies.

Mr. O'Connor ridicules the House for beginning work at an hour when really active men have generally finished. The attendance of the House and its interest in the discussions are in inverse proportion to the importance of the subjects under debate. Small personal squabbles will often attract a large attendance, while the interests of the Empire are debated in an empty House. In the evening members dine or go out, or do anything rather than remain in their places. Big and full-dress debates with all the Ministers present are almost things of the past. It is more and more the habit for one Bill to be left in the hands of one Minister only. Those who, like Mr. Wyndham, are compelled to spend the regulation nine hours every night in the House infallibly break down. Mr. O'Connor concludes a melancholy article by saying:—

In short, if in this hour of national stocktaking, or perhaps I should call it national examination of conscience, Great Britain does not pay heed to the waste of time, of health, of careers, of efficiency which takes place in the House of Commons, it will fail to extirpate one of the causes that are devouring the best energies of the rulers of the Empire.

Mr. Booker T. Washing debates the question whether Education will solve the race problem in America, and concludes that it will. Mr. H. G. Wells writes appreciatively on Stephen Crane, and Mr. W. A. Peffer discusses whether America has not always been imperialistic. Nominally she has not, but practically she has, is his conclusion. What is now called Imperialism "is only mirage in the heated air of politics—and it will entirely disappear when the snow flies again." "British Strategy in South Africa" and "The Presidential Election" are the only remaining articles.

Pearson's.

THE September number is very good. Its way of popularising science is noticed elsewhere in citations on Count von Zeppelin's air-ship, Mr. Hayes' radiophone, and Mr. Bacon's three solar eclipses. Marcus Tindal tells how the British took the Taku forts in 1859-60, and remarks on the similarity of that campaign to the one now proceeding. A capital that moves is Mr. Herbert Vivian's description of the nomadic headquarters of Menelik the Abyssinian King. As soon as his capital has burnt up all available wood fuel in the neighbourhood, the inhabitants move on to a new centre. The structures, of which photographs are given, are naturally of no very durable kind. The difficulty of photographing cats and dogs is indicated by D. T. Timins, but shown by excellent portraits of the four-footed pets to be not insuperable. The pictures are as usual very good. The reproduction of M. Normenbruch's "Meditation" is beautiful.

THERI number, quotation Goya ar elsewher A ren H. Brai elephant decoyed of stout securing Derby I scene of Mr. laughs cones ea fishes a ditions, fishes p whether spawnir water, possibly a very i Mr. V that no by our

Gourma

and gat

He give

nomists

0. W. Fanny Fieldin The by Cha in-law, when strange of the ment. with n pardon Earle phobia declar Europ He th agains would This h wars. proph will had d

The
and c an ille dogs
Mr fough of vir

the g larity

period

more

the all

CORNHILL.

THERE is plenty of readable matter in the September number, but very little that lends itself to purposes of quotation. Mrs. Wood's story of the Spanish painter Goya and the Duke of Wellington has been treated elsewhere in these pages.

A remarkably vivid account is given by C. Dimond H. Braine of elephant hunting in Siam. The wild elephants are beaten up from the jungle, and then decoyed by tame tuskers into the corral with its paling of stout teak logs. The days set apart for selecting and securing a certain number of elephants form a sort of Derby Day to the people of Bangkok, even though the scene of the sport is fifty miles distant.

Mr. F. G. Aflalo discusses the food of fishes. He laughs at the common fancy that fishes live by the big ones eating the small. He reckons that "while small fishes are intermittently devoured under favourable conditions, the regular food of even the so-called predatory fishes probably consists of minute entomostraca." As to whether the salmon, in ascending rivers from the sea for spawning purposes, feeds or fasts while away from salt water, he leaves an open question, suggesting that possibly in any case the salmon is during that interval a very irregular and uncertain feeder.

Mr. W. E. Garrett Fisher is impressed with the fact that no anthologist has yet "collected the repasts given by our poets and novelists into a new 'Almanach des Gourmands.'" He offers hints for repairing this omission, and gathers them under the heading "Feasts in Fiction." He gives Thackeray the palm among all literary gastronomists. He cites also Miss Ferrier, Charlotte Brontë, O. W. Holmes, T. L. Peacock, A. H. Clough, Dickens, Fanny Burney, Miss Austen, Stevenson, Balzac, and

Fielding

The journal of a tour in the north of Europe in 1825-26 by Charles Earle, is presented in parts by his daughter-in-law, Mrs. C. W. Earle. Earle was in St. Petersburg when Nicholas I. succeeded Alexander I., and it is strange to be reminded by his diary that the accession of the new Tsar was resisted by the Moscow regiment. Artillery and cavalry dispersed the mutineers, with much slaughter. Next day the survivors were pardoned and their regimental colours restored to them. Earle seems to have been badly bitten with Russophobia. He identifies the Russians with barbarism, and declares, "What they aim at is universal dominion in Europe, and the annihilation of our power in the East." He thinks that the only bulwark that could be erected against Russian aggression in an else divided Europe would be an alliance between France and England. This he conceives to be hardly possible in view of recent wars. In visiting the Crimea he hazards the singular prophecy that Russian policy and Turkish impotence "will make this country, probably at no very distant period, the battlefield of Europe." This prediction is the more singular that the Crimean war when it came found the alliance between France and England, of which he had despaired, an actual fact.

The story of Sir Thomas Troubridge, ill-starred friend and comrade of Nelson, is told by Mr. W. J. Fletcher as an illustration of the persistent bad luck that occasionally dogs the footsteps of the ablest and bravest.

Mr. MacDonagh recalls the duel which Dan O'Connell fought with a merchant, D'Esterre, who took this method of vindicating the honour of Dublin Corporation, which the great advocate had assailed. It ended fatally for D'Esterre, but bestowed upon O'Connell immense popularity and undying remorse.

Longman's.

Longman's distinctly exceeds its average in the September number. Mr. H. G. Hutchinson's "Second Essay in Dreams," which is noticed elsewhere, does not quite correspond to the hopes raised by the first essay, but contains valuable facts and suggestions.

"Kingship in the Nineteenth Century" is too great a theme to be satisfactorily dealt with in a short paper; but C. B. R. Kent has the merit of opening up the subject and suggesting fruitful points of view. He considers that "the age of loyalty, if not gone like that of chivalry, must certainly be waning." Yet he points out that monarchies are more numerous than in the days before the Revolution, and sums up the gist of his essay by saying that:

Though the principle of kingship has, in spite of some manifestations of absolutism, lost much of its original source of strength, yet it is being refounded upon so strong a basis of practical utility, that it seems as likely as ever to endure, shorn somewhat of its splendour, and in an attenuated shape.

The third to appear in S. G. Tallentyre's charming gallery of "The Women of the Salons" is Mademoiselle de Lespinasse, illegitimate daughter of the Comtesse d'Albon, mistress of d'Alembert, "the most brilliant and sympathetic leader of the brilliant Society of France before the Revolution," but, above all, the genius of womanly passion. He says:—

She stands out, too, as one of the most extraordinary social figures of the most remarkable social epoch the world has seen. She rises from nothing. She has no money. ("It is only the bored and the stupid who need to be rich," says she.) She has very bad health; and her lover, though he speaks of her as having that in her face beside which beauty is a "cold perfection," speaks not the less frankly of her laideur. Yet as long as the Salon is remembered, so long will be remembered the woman who ruled hers by the power of exquisite sympathy and the most womanly genius that ever woman had.

Scribner's Magazine.

WITH the article on "The Slave Trade in America" we deal elsewhere. This number is full of interesting articles and, as always, beautifully illustrated. The two pictures accompanying Jacob D. Cox's interesting story of Tito, the coyote, are charming and wonderfully clever. Walter H. Wyckoff has a long, well-illustrated article entitled "With Arctic Highlanders," which will be concluded in the October number. Frederic Ireland tells of his hunting experiences in British Columbia—not only has he shot his game with rifle but also with camera, which lends much interest to the sketch. There are two stories, besides an instalment of J. M. Barrie's "Tommy and Grizel." W. D. Howells' "Personal Retrospect of James Russell Lowell" and Major-General Cox's "Chickamauga Crisis" are both of interest and of value.

Gentleman's.

Gentleman's for September is unusually interesting. We have quoted elsewhere Mr. Lowry's sketch of Arctic Co-operation and Mr. Verney's story of the eclipse as seen from Algiers. Mr. J. Taylor Fyfe gives much curious information about the old Song-schools of Scotland, notably of Aberdeen, which had its "Sang Master" as early as 1483, and in 1256 required "four singing boys" from the grammar school to attend service at St. Nicholas' Church. They are said to be an institution peculiar to Scotland. A paper on Mediæval West Pyrenæan Women, by A. R. Whiteway, shows that Basque women enjoyed a footing much more nearly equal to men than was accorded by the Roman Law. A pathetic and humorous chapter in the history of imposture is supplied by Albert Hyamson's account of the false Dauphins of the Temple.

yellow,"
question articles
M.P., on Over n a new imax of us given

ow to do

who, for void the

of those ngs, the t nerve

g work nished. in the ortance abbles terests In the rather ebates of the to be to, like n nine down.

ng:—
haps I Britain ers, of t will ether erica, vrites effer erialas, is "is will itish

Clec-

y of on and tells and now an's the rnt od, res, ery and ent ole.

of 24111

CASSIER'S MAGAZINE.

THERE are several interesting articles in the August number.

AN OLD SLOOP-OF-WAR.

Chief-Engineer B. F. Isherwood, of the U.S. Navy, writes on the old U.S. cruiser Wampanoag. She was specially built to prey upon the commerce of the Southern States and to prevent blockade-running. Such vessels, of which she was the best and fastest type—had to be able to keep the sea indefinitely, and to maintain their supplies and their small expenditure of coal from the prizes they might take. They were intended to destroy every prize, landing the crews as early as possible. They were to cruise in the great tracks of commerce, and were not intended to bombard towns; nor were they to fight, unless the conditions were such that battle could not be avoided. They were entirely too useful otherwise and too valuable to be risked.

OPENINGS FOR MECHANICAL ENGINEERS IN CHINA.

Lord Charles Beresford delivered an address before the Institution of Mechanical Engineers some months ago, and a summary of the address is printed in this month's Cassier's. It is illustrated with interesting photos, which, however, cannot be said to refer to the text in any way.

THE JAPANESE NAVY.

Rear-Admiral C. C. Fitzgerald, R.N., contributes an interesting and descriptive article on the growth of the Japanese navy. As he truly says, the rise and development of the Japanese navy is without precedent in the world's history. After describing the various ships building and in commission he goes on to speak of the Japanese themselves:—

The marvellous power of assimilating new ideas and new methods, entirely foreign to all their national traditions and the practice of centuries, which the Japanese have exhibited during the last few years, is a subject which has frequently been commented upon; but only those who have seen their ships in commission, and visited their dockyards in working hours can fully realise the significance of the wonderful strides they have made during the comparatively short period which has elapsed since they set to work to create and to maintain a modern navy. Their zeal, their earnestness, their close attention to small but essential details, as well as their power to grasp broad principles, must be seen to be appreciated.

OTHER ARTICLES.

W. J. Heseltine gives a short biographical sketch of James Dunn, Naval Constructor. Mr. Dunn acted for many years as chief assistant and coadjutor with Sir William White. He is a bachelor, with a rich fund of dry humour. The other articles are rather technical. Mr. Louis J. Magee writes on "Electric Cranes in German Harbours"; Mr. Alton D. Adams contributes a short paper on "Hot-water Heating in Industrial Works"; Mr. H. R. Barnhurst gives "A Word on Boiler Making"; Mr. W. D. Wansbrough writes on "The Fly-wheel—some Formulæ and how to apply them"; Mr. Alfred Herbert gives some particulars about "British Milling Machines"; and Mr. John Henderson D.Sc., F.R.S.E., discusses the "Manufacture of Light."

The Strand Magazine.

THE September Strand has—besides an excellent illustrated interview by Mr. W. Fitzgerald with the Antarctic explorer, Mr. C. E. Borchgrevink—a rather Jingo paper by Conan Doyle, called "A Glimpse of the Army," and a symposium upon "Doctors' Diversions" by Mr. Frederick Dolman. Other readable papers are on the "Zeppelin Air-shin" and "Ambulance Dogs in the German Army."

The Girl's Realm.

A TIMELY article in the Girl's Realm is on "The Girls of China," by A. Lennoys. Mrs. Stepney Rawson writes on "Music as a Career for Girls"; and the series of articles on "Famous Girls' Schools," is continued by an account of Roedean Schools, near Brighton. Mr. George Wade describes "Some Memories of Famous Women," from Carshalton Pool (John Ruskin's memorial to his mother), to Sarah Siddons' statue in Westminster Abbey and Florence Nightingale's ward in St. Thomas's Hospital. Another interesting paper to amateur photographers is on "How to Sit and How Not to Sit for One's Photograph." A holiday paper for Cornish visitors is by Mr. Edward Step, "An Hour in a Drang."

The Woman at Home.

MME. MARIE BELLOC, in the September Woman at Home, has an interview with M. Félix, the well-known Paris dress artist, and designer of the costumes in the historical tableaux in the "Palais du Costume," a work which has taken up most of his time for five years past. The article has some excellent photographs of the tableaux represented. It is interesting to note that M. Félix scouts the idea of woman ever adopting any form of "rational" dress. Incidentally, he pays a high tribute to American ladies, who "possess to quite an extraordinary degree the art of dress." The last of the articles on Lord Rosebery has now appeared. It deals with his personal characteristics, and is very entertaining reading. In this, as in other magazines, khaki stories are giving place to yellow ones.

The United Service Magazine.

THE United Service Magazine for September contains severe criticisms of the conduct of our South African campaign. Captain C. Holmes Wilson deals with the future of our artillery in the light of recent experiences on the veldt. "An Outsider" comments unsparingly on "The War: Some of Our Blunders." To console us, apparently, J. B. Hodge recalls "the muddles of ancient Rome." Mr. T. M. Macguire discourses on obligatory military service as "a blessing for Britons," especially industrial Britons faced with the fierce competition of stalwart artizans abroad disciplined in barracks. Mr. E. H. Parker writes on the Chinese Army, and reports that there is very little to frightens us on the Vangisze.

Geography in 1899.

THE Annales de Geographie has just issued its ninth annual bibliography number—that is, a Bibliography of Geography for 1899, under the general editorship of Louis Raveneau. The bibliography includes works, articles, etc., in most European languages, and those in the less-known languages have a French translation of the title added. Short signed notes explaining the scope of each article are appended. To geographers and others the annual must be indispensable. The price of the new volume, which is published by Armand Colin, 5, Rue de Mézières, Paris, seems to be only 5 francs; previous volumes may be had for 10 francs each.

THE September Quiver has an article on "The Guinness Buildings," which is worth reading. Another article on "Native Pastors" gives an account of the mission work done by native converts amongst those of their own race.

from for Art to who to Clon Art

Parli

limits

concl

etern

phen

for th

whol

centi

theor powe harm of th of wl of u is sti Rep him attri our orga aria way: when seco the in th It is third poss of th > trav scen not the obvi died char vice man thus do d dow com their

> > in mu

froi

bet

fort

hea

Cha

the sion

that

and

THE REVUE DES DEUX MONDES.

THE chief French review remains curiously removed from the immediate current of events. In its numbers for August, with the exception of an article on the Boxers, to which we have referred elsewhere, we do not get nearer to China than a travel paper on the Mekong. A paper on Antarctic exploration is also dealt with elsewhere.

PARLIAMENTARIANISM.

M. Benoist has a hopeful article on "Parliaments and Parliamentarianism," in which he traces the geographical limits of popular institutions, and thence derives the conclusion that Parliamentarianism-far from being an eternal and universal fact-is, on the contrary, a recent phenomenon essentially European and Western. It is for this very reason, he thinks, that it has proved on the whole so suitable a form of government for the nineteenth century. M. Benoist explains at great length the familiar theory of accord between the executive and the legislative powers; and he goes on to show the necessity for a harmonious balance of the relative strength of the head of the State, the Ministers, and the Parliament, not one of which can become too strong or too weak without risk of upsetting the whole. As regards France, M. Benoist is strongly in favour of assigning to the President of the Republic certain positive powers by way of compensating him for the absence of those mysterious and impressive attributes enjoyed by a constitutional monarchy such as our own. For the future he urges the necessity of organising universal suffrage. How can Parliament-arianism be restrained? There are three principal ways:-first, by despotism, as under the French Empire, when certain Parliamentary privileges were abolished; secondly, by popular veto, as occurs in Switzerland under the Referendum law; and thirdly, by judicial action, as in the case of the Supreme Court of the United States. It is hardly necessary to say that M. Benoist prefers the third alternative, but he is inclined to combine it, if possible, with the first. The election of the President of the Republic should be, he thinks, withdrawn from the Chambers and entrusted to a special College of Electors, the composition of which should be a matter of discussion. By some such scheme as this M. Benoist hopes that Parliamentarianism will be reconstructed on safe and well-regulated lines.

THE UPPER LAOS AND THE MEKONG.

Madame Isabelle Massieu continues her interesting travel papers on Indo-China. Her enthusiasm for the scenery is great, but, as we know from other sources, not too great. In one place she notes with horror that the people drank water drawn from streams which were obviously poisoned by the bodies of animals which had died of some epidemic. She gives the native of Laos the character of a child of nature, destitute alike of malice, vices and virtues. The social superiority of the man is marked by a large number of signs and ceremonies: thus, on one sacred day in the month the wives come to do baci before their husbands—that is to say, they kneel down and beg pardon for the faults which they have committed and the annoyances which they have caused their lords. Divorce, which is very frequent, is conducted in the most polite manner, and is a matter entirely for mutual agreement. The woman who wishes to separate from her husband presents him with some "quids" of betel-nut, says to him that she will consider him henceforth as a relation, and offers him her best wishes for his health; that is enough, and the marriage is dissolved. It is a bad country for lawyers! In the eyes of the woman of Laos the best sort of marriage is one with a European, which is much sought after. The native wife of a European official actually becomes ennobled, and is thereby entitled to associate with the daughters and wives of the native princes.

DRESS AND BOOTS.

Vicomte d'Avenel continues his interesting series on "The Mechanism of Modern Life" with a paper on dress and boots. He notes the curious fact that the essential distinction between masculine and feminine dress is comparatively modern; the robe of a Greek or Roman maiden scarcely differed at all from that of her brother. Towards the end of the fifteenth century the stronger sex practically abandoned long flowing robes to magistrates, doctors and priests. Luxury in dress, so much denounced nowadays, reached extraordinary excesses in the Middle Ages; thus, in 1375, the Duchess of Burgundy ordered a robe of cloth of gold to cost £500. Before the introduction of the modern corset women underwent the most terrible tortures in order to obtain what was considered a good figure, and Catherine de Medici invented a horrible machine which could be made of any hard, inflexible material. The modern corset industry has been practically revolutionised in the last thirty years. In 1870 there were about 4,000 corset-makers in Paris, and they made about 1,500,000 corsets every year; but now the volume of trade has quadrupled. The whole toilette of Frenchmen and Frenchwomen represents annually a total expenditure of two milliards of francs, and gives employment to about 1,000,000 people. "If your boots are too narrow," says a proverb of the Kirghiz people, "what does it matter that the world is wide? a maxim which will appeal to every one who has suffered from tight boots. The French annual production of boots is estimated at £32,000,000 worth. The leather comes, as regards the best qualities, from France itself, and the second qualities from South America and the Antilles. Tanned sheepskins are imported from India, and a certain small amount of trade is done in particularly delicate skins, such as those of the antelope and kangaroo. M. d'Avenel goes on to deal with the question of competition, against the workpeople of Europe, of the black and yellow races, whose needs, being less, would enable them, it is thought, to accept lower wages; but it is too often forgotten that the taste for luxuries is universal, and when you have given a shirt to a South African savage he is by no means content, but immediately wishes to have himself photographed in it. The Egyptian fellah and the Brazilian negro-to take two very different examples-have alike shown a growing taste for more elaborate costumes than their fathers had. It is probable, therefore, that rates of wages will tend to adjust themselves in accordance with the practical needs of the workers, of whatever colour they are.

OTHER ARTICLES.

It is certainly an honour of an unexpected kind for Mr. Hall Caine to have a short story of his published in the Revue des Deux Mondes; it seems to be admirably translated. For the rest, Dr. Bonnafy contributes a very clear and useful account of the Société des Œuvres de Mer, founded in 1895, to provide the sixteen thousand French deep-sea fishermen with the hospital-ships of which, unfortunately, they stand in frequent need and he also describes other organisations in various countries designed to improve the lot of these lonely workers.

y Rawson the series tinued by on. Mr. Famous memorial stminster Thomas's ur photofor One's tors is by

on "The

oman at all-known in the awork arrs past tableaux ix scouts ational merican a degree on Lord personal In this, place to contains African with the mees on agly on sole us, ancient ligatory pecially ition of arracks. ny, and on the s ninth apply of ship of works, nose in tion of e scope

rs and orice of Colin,
rancs;

Guinarticle ission ir own

THE NOUVELLE REVUE.

THE Nouvelle Revue keeps up well to the higher standard it has lately set itself; but, as many of the regular readers of the Revue will note with disappointment, Madame Juliette Adam's bi-monthly letters concerning the trend of foreign politics are omitted.

AN EXPERT'S CRITICISM OF THE WAR.

Captain G. Gilbert, a distinguished French officer. continues his highly technical account of the South African campaign, and to the many who are now begin-ning to take an interest in what may be called the theoretical side of the war, his criticisms concerning Magersfontein, Stormberg and Colenso-that is to say, the operations on the Modder River, in the Orange Free State and on the Tugela—will be found deeply interesting; the more so that he analyses at length the Boer and the British methods of warfare. He evidently considers that the leading mistake made by the British generals was that of underestimating their enemy, but he pays a well-deserved tribute to the many individual acts of bravery, and even of good sense, shown by certain minor British officers. He gives a marvellously vivid and powerful account of the Magersfontein disaster; and it is significant that a French officer goes out of his way to again and again pay testimony to the marvellous courage of the British troops. In the first September number Captain Gilbert continues his analysis of the campaign.

CONTEMPORARY CRITICISM IN FRANCE.

In the matter of periodical literature, and even in the matter of fiction, France, at any rate as regards output, is a hundred years behind this country and America. The would-be novelist always publishes his first story at his own expense, and even the most successful writers do not make anything like the huge profits which accrue as a matter of course to their great British rivals. Here every newspaper devotes a certain amount of space to literary criticism; in France, save by two or three leading Parisian sheets, no attempt at anything of the kind is made. Review copies are not sent round to the leading periodicals, and the only way in which a book gets advertised is literally by means of advertisement. It is easy to pay for the insertion of a very flattering notice; but then every intelligent reader is aware that the so-called review has been paid for, often at a very extravagant rate. It must, however, be admitted that there are some half a dozen French writers who give up much of their time to literary criticism, and who are—to their honour be it said—really incorruptible. They, however, either contribute a weekly signed article to some literary paper, or they publish their conclusions in one or other of the three great bi-monthly reviews. Among these literary critics may be especially mentioned MM. Brunetière, Faguet, Lemaître and Hallays.

FRENCH RED TAPE

Those who marvel why French life is so terribly encircled with red tape should make a point of reading M. Martin's article entitled "The Reign of Bureaucrats." He points out that the Republic owes not a little of its stability to the fact that an enormous number of Frenchmen of the lower and upper middle class are actually in its employment, and are to all intents and purposes its paid servants. Notwithstanding all that has been said to the contrary, the Frenchman is essentially a man of stable ideals; he has in him very little of the gambling instinct, and he can make himself happy on a tiny income provided that income is a sure and certain one.

This is why a post under Government is regarded as being so desirable. A Frenchman would rather see his son become a clerk in a Government office at fifty pounds a year, than the confidential manager of an ordinary business man at a salary ten times that figure. The number of people employed in the great Government offices doubles every few years. At the present moment the Finance Minister alone has under his orders fourteen hundred employés; and the different Ministries, or rather their clerks, absorb a yearly income of thirty million francs, mostly paid away in small salaries. The same system obtains in every provincial town. In 1858 there were two hundred and seventeen thousand State employés, costing the country in salaries two hundred and sixty million francs. Last year the number had just doubled, and the salary list had trebled. The same state of thing obtains, and to an even worse degree, in the French colonies. In Cochin China there are three thousand French people-men, women and children-and of these three thousand, seventeen hundred are Civil servants! Indeed, observes M. Martin, Cochin China may be called the Paradise of the bureaucracy; the functionaries are in such a majority that they carry a solid vote, and thanks to this fact they are able to decide what their own salaries are to be.

PARIS IN 1800.

Next year will see the publication of a great number of what may be called centennial articles. M. Dubor begins early with an interesting account of Paris in 1800. He gives a rapid sketch of the Society of that day, of the costumes worn, and of the amusements and interests of the men and women who had just witnessed the awful upheaval of the French Revolution.

"THE NEW IRELAND."

In the second August number of the Revue M. Hamelle describes under the title of "The New Ireland" the two Boer Republics. It is, he says, his wish to put down for the benefit of the future Plutarch a rough sketch of the drama now being played out on the South African veldt, and his article is interesting as giving a very vivid picture of how many of our Continental critics regard our coming action in the Transvaal; for what apparently fills them with horror is the thought that the two Republics, notwithstanding their heroic struggle, are to be wiped out from the face of the earth.

ANCIENT CHINESE STRATEGY.

M. de Contenson gives some curious particulars concerning the Chinese methods of making war. Even in the days anterior to the Christian era the Celestials had an elaborate military theory of their own, and had actually written works on the art of war. These curious documents-for books they cannot be called-were translated by a French priest, and it is with the help of these translations that the writer has written some very instructive pages. According to the Chinaman everything must be done to avoid an actual declaration of "Try and attain victory without having fought a battle," observed the wise Sun-Tze, who was, by the way, a contemporary of Homer. Even in those days the Chinese seem to have had a great belief in scouting, and also in having a regular army of spies—indeed, it is quite curious to note how the present Chinese government has followed in its main outlines Sun-Tze's theories regarding how a campaign should be carried on, or, rather, should be initiated. Once matters really come to fighting, the Eastern Wellington has very definite views as to the value of a few disciplined men over a large army.

seem mair occa

M

econ

of G

can

Han

the s disti the all, o genc says prod the r com Teut one s the n effor aided indus enor the s and With cally like a fertile

made

Each

hecta

of 8,0

which

M. math plain the s it lik corre prepa which fessio in E reade portic the F of no really not s busin to a itself, it. S the we the m less in power

where: teachi

THE REVUE DE PARIS.

THE August numbers of the Revue de Paris, which seems to have taken a new lease of vigorous life, fully maintain the standard of excellence which we have had occasion to notice now for some months past.

THE COMMERCIAL STRENGTH OF GERMANY.

M. de Rousiers begins a series of papers on the economic and social causes of the commercial power of Germany. Of the growth of German commerce there can be no doubt, and the nerve-centre of that growth is Hamburg. There may be seen the tangible results of the scientific cultivation of Saxony and Silesia, the spirit distilled in Pomerania and Brandenburg, the machines, the glass, the chemical products-coal, salt, and so onall, or almost all, drawn by German enterprise and intelli-gence out of German soil. But M. de Rousiers justly says that it is not enough to estimate and handle these products; it is also necessary to acquaint ourselves with the men to whose efforts they are due. The industrial and commercial movement of Germany is largely due to the Teutonic knack of organisation. The employers on the one side and the workmen on the other feel more and more the need for abandoning their isolation and for uniting their efforts for the common good. This tendency has been aided by circumstances, and also, one may add, by the industry and economy of past generations. Thus, the enormous sugar industry of Germany is directly due to the system of combination, by which proprietors, little and big alike, join together to secure the common end. Without this combination of capital it would be practically impossible to cultivate the beetroot on anything like a profitable scale, for the root requires an extremely fertile soil, and consequently the same field cannot be made to yield beetroot for more than four years running. Each refinery, therefore, though using up only 2,000 hectares of beetroot, requires altogether an available area of 8,000 hectares. So, too, with the co-operative dairies, which are very flourishing in Germany.

MATHEMATICS IN SECONDARY EDUCATION.

M. Tannery contributes an important paper on mathematics in secondary education, in which he complains that in France the sciences do not penetrate the system of secondary education, but are added to it like excrescences. The method of teaching them corresponds to no practical need, and serves as no preparation for a career, but rather for examinations which must be passed in order to enter certain professions. This is so much like the very general complaint in England that the article has an interest for English readers. M. Tannery declares that there are certain portions of mathematical science which take the place in the French democracy of those old heraldic quarterings of nobility, the possession of which in former days was really the sole qualification for State service. He does not suggest any palliatives—which he considers is the business of specialists—but he asserts that the evil is due to a false conception, not only of secondary education itself, but of the part which the sciences ought to play in Secondary education ought to form young people for the work which is to occupy their life, and that work in the majority of cases will consist in directing, more or less immediately, the physical labour of other men. This power of direction can only be derived from science, whereas M. Tannery complains the whole tendency of teaching is towards the enjoyment and production of literary work. M. Tannery evidently thinks that the future progress of France, both in the moral and in the economic spheres, is bound up in no small degree in this question of the reform of teaching methods.

VENICE IN DANGER.

M. de Souza sounds a cry of alarm to which, it must be feared, the world has by this time become tolerably accustomed. Persons of taste have mourned over the disfigurement of Rome and Florence, but they have always consoled themselves, says M. de Souza, with the recollection of Venice practically unspoiled. The complaint appears to be that wealthy English, American, German, Italian, and French people have bought one by one all the palaces on the Grand Canal, and have proceeded to restore them. A vast new palace, a pastiche of old architecture, destroys the effect of one of the most impressive views of the Grand Canal. Furthermore, the destruction of the Pescheria, a horribly ugly building close to the Grand Canal, is urgently demanded. The practice of colouring the houses which are built of stone or marble in white is to be regretted, M. de Souza thinks, and colour—preferably red—should be made compulsory. In general, it is the reviving commercial prosperity of Venice which brings in its train the vandalism of engineers, stimulated by the self-esteem of officialism.

ENGLISH OPINION AND THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR.

In the second August number M. Chevrillon prints some interesting notes which he made during a visit to England last February. Naturally the aspect of London in winter made him shiver. It seems to have been his fortunate experience to have seen none but perfectly silent newspaper boys-motionless and silent he describes them-above their placards which the passers-by look at without stopping. He describes well the occasional volunteer in khaki whom he met in the streets, and he realises the remarkable difference between the classes from which they were impartially drawn. The English officer receives his tribute, inasmuch as he does not regard his men as so many flocks of sheep, like the Continental soldier, but as individuals with whom he is linked by the common tie of humanity. At the same time he notes the singular British conception of military duties. The young officers, he says, go and risk their lives and nothing else is asked of them. There in the veldt they breakfast on tea, marmalade, and oatmeal, and eat ham and corned beef at other meals; play football and cricket most of the day, and only go into the trenches twice a week. Our visitor was astonished, too, that one lady who appealed for comforts for the troops was enabled in two days to send 2,000 sponges, 2,000 nailbrushes, and 4,000 cakes of glycerine soap. It is consoling to find that our visitor has a profound appreciation of the comforts of British clubs, where he found what he calls substantial realities; there he could contemplate this English life, so stable, distinct, and personal, resting on immemorial custom, sure of itself, and full of hidden energy. In the music halls our visitor studied the types of the great lower middle class, with forcible and simple faces, energetic, solid, but distinguished by a certain grossness as of a German or Russian workman. M. Chevrillon came to the conclusion that the war affected the mass of the people but little, because, in England, only the gentry have the care and responsibility of national affairs, and the people followed them slowly yet as a matter of as being his son pounds pounds ordinary c. The Government under different income salaries. In mousand les two

d. The degree, re three en—and c Civil China cy; the carry a decide number

mber of begins to. He of the rests of e awful the two own for a of the n veldt, picture coming s them cs, notped out ticulars Even lestials nd had curious -were help of ne very everytion of ught a by the those belief rmy of e how in its mpaign itiated. Eastern e of a

THE REVUE DES REVUES.

THE August numbers of this review contain a second article by Senator Paul Strauss upon "Puericulture," a paper which might have been inspired by Zola's "Fécondité." He advocates the legal protection of maternity, not only by forbidding women to work in factories for four or even six weeks after the birth of a child, but also by giving them an indemnity for wages lost. Excessive infant mortality is the chief cause of depopulation. In France one-sixth of the total number of deaths are those of infants. In Paris infant mortality is relatively low, but in some French industrial towns over fifty per cent. of the deaths are of children under one year. milk will be a great factor in the saving of infant life; yet the prime cause of the frightful mortality of young children will never be removed except by educating girls for their duties as mothers—an education which must begin as the school time ends. One institution, at least, has already been founded with this object, with the happiest results in the saving of infant life.

FIRST STEPS TOWARDS SOLIDARITY.

Anna Lampérière, Secretary General of the Education Congress, has a most interesting paper upon "Social Education" in France, in which she thinks France has made far greater strides than any Anglo-Saxon nation. "France is the brain of humanity;" French thought the light which guides the steps of the rest of the world. In many French schools much has been done to instil into the children's minds the idea of solidarity, co-operation, being able to do easily combined what would be impossible by individual effort. A typical exercise for teaching children the elements of social economy may be quoted:—

On Thursday the master, being pleased with his class, had promised that every one should go for a walk as a reward. In the morning the father of Louis, one of our mates, said that Louis would have to fetch in the wood instead of going for a walk. Then every one went to Louis' home to help him; the wood was brought in directly, and Louis went out walking with us. Every one was very glad, and he was very glad, and the master said that that was solidarity.

Some schools try more practical methods. In one the children club together to buy a bottle of expensive wine for a sick schoolmate unable to get it for himself. In others they club together to replace a boy's cap which has landed in the garden of a bad-tempered neighbour, or a spoiled dictionary. In Orleans a case is cited of a "Mutual Insurance Society against Window-Breaking," a club upon which a boy can draw when in play he has managed to break some one's window. In secondary schools less is being done than in primary; but co-operation is one of the leading notes of the "Universités Populaires."

OTHER ARTICLES.

Miss Constance Barnicoat, in an article on "The Alleged Disappearance of the Maori," replies to an anonymous French writer's assertion that the English had extirpated this race from the face of the earth, which is happily yet far from being the case. M. Camille Mauclair discusses the "Lied" in France, where he thinks it has a glorious future. M. Jacques Bainville discusses the "literary mania" of epigraphs. He holds them to be good if rightly used, and absurd if abused. M. Renard eagerly hails the first signs of spelling reform in France, the Minister of Education having last July published a decree which will greatly reduce the size of French grammars, and immensely simplify the task of learning either to spell or write that language correctly. Mme. Vera Starkoff writes on "Russian Writers Who Reach the People," among whom she mentions Novikoff and Tourguenieff. Mlle. Lecamp writes sensibly upon "Moral Teaching in School and in the Family." She asserts that the teacher, as well as the parent, is morally responsible for children's moral instruction. "If only one rule was required for our true education, I should say: Never put any but beautiful things before the eyes of a child. It is by the worship of the beautiful in all its forms that the child gets a great and generous soul, a free mind, open to all large thoughts." M. Frederic Passy gives some reminiscences of his peace propaganda, dating over thirty years back. Old as he is, M. Passy writes with hope and enthusiasm. Speaking of the French Society for International Arbitration, which for ten years past has been striving to apply the principles of arbitration before war, M. Passy says that its efforts. though at first received with some indifference, have been the object of more and more attention on the part of the Governments. "Not only have the ambassadors, through whom we had to send our letters, for the most part acknowledged their receipt in terms which were not mere flattery—several having even taken the trouble to leave their cards upon me—but a certain number, after acknowledging the letters, have renewed their thanks by order of their Government." Speaking of the Hague Conference, M. Passy says it is "a happy crowning of the work of the Interparliamentary Conferences and the Peace Congresses."

The Century.

THE current number of this magazine excels rather in good illustrations than in the quantity of fiction that it contains. There are only four stories, one of which is a further instalment of Bertha Runkle's well-told story, "The Helmet of Navarre." China claims two articles, one of which is dealt with elsewhere. The Rev. D. Sheffield, in his article on "The Influence of the Western World on China," pleads for the United States and Great Britain to prevent the dismemberment of China. Jean Schopper contributes a second article on "The Amusements of the Paris Exposition," and contrives in a wonderfully small space to give a most vivid account of many of the most interesting sights and shows. He considers that—the crowd constitutes the most exotic of spectacles. It is motley, and more languages are spoken in it than in New York even, the greatest cosmopolitan city. One may dine in Hungary, in Germany, in Turkey, in Spain, always with dancing and native music. At the Exposition Frenchmen and foreigners take their pleasures together, and see that, taken as a whole, they are very much alike, kindly and easy to live with, men who can have only passing misunderstandings. And this sight is the most welcome of all the instructive amusements.

André Castaigne's pictures help greatly in enabling one to get an idea of the beauties of the Exposition.

John Morley continues his study of Cromwell, having chapters on "The Military Dictatorship," "The Reaction," and "The Kingship." The illustrations in John Burroughs' article on "A Summer Holiday in Behring Sea" are very excellent, and enhance the value of this well-written and interesting narrative. There are also articles on "The Thames from Wapping to Blackwall," by Sir Walter Besant; "Père Didon," by Thomas Bentzon; and "The Detroit Bicentennial Memorial," by Anna Mathewson. With Professor Sterrett's "Troglodyte Dwellings in Cappadocia" are given many instructive illustrations.

Made paint the "into rarticle picture Germ The atmost known of Be at va

by A given tions air-pr earth, as his the m In China should she ha others Europ

India
Pro
"Goe
the le was de be bro
Oth
whole

The

The re

article

butes a hatred

us notl he con is prol howeve Coloni faction Germa and de made This 1 of the France as ma decades army, example that his bour, as valve fo rest of African German

GERMAN MAGAZINES.

Deutsche Revue.

MAX LAUTNER discusses the authenticity of the "Sistine Madonna" at Dresden. To prove that Raphael himself painted the picture, and that it is not simply a copy of the "Madonna" at Piacenza, he cites history, and goes into minute examinations of Raphael's monogram. The article is illustrated with reproductions of portions of the picture, an innovation rarely seen in the pages of the German review.

The use made of air-ships to test the density of the atmosphere and generally to increase our meteorological knowledge is fully described by Professor R. Börnstein, of Berlin. The first attempts to ascertain the temperature at varying altitudes were made by means of kites in 1748 by Alexander Wilson, near Glasgow. Kites have now given place to balloons, and the somewhat wild observations of Robertson, who said in 1803 that he knew the air-pressure in higher altitudes was less than on the earth, by the fact that he was unable to put on his hat as his head had swelled so much, have been followed by the most exact observations taken at great heights and in the most exhaustive manner.

In view of later events, M. O. Brandt's article on China rather loses its point. He says that Germany should take no prominent part in the Chinese trouble, as she has no more to revenge, no more to punish than have others. He deprecates judging events in the East by European standards for the incalculable factor. The hatred against the foreigner may suddenly burst all bounds. He cites the instances of our experiences in India and Afghanistan as proof of the fact

India and Afghanistan as proof of the fact.

Professor Th. Mommsen discusses the future of the "Goethe-Bund," which was called into being to oppose the lex Heinze. He rejoices in the fact that the Bill was defeated, but reminds his readers that it is sure to be brought forward again.

Other articles are not very interesting, in fact the whole number is rather below its usual standard.

Monatsschrift für Stadt und Land.

The August number is rather above the average. The review of events of the month has several interesting articles by various writers. Ulrich von Hassell contributes a brief sketch of the Chinese Empress which tells us nothing new, and concludes his article by saying that he considers the former Governor of Shantung, Hy-Siang, is probably responsible for the present troubles. He, however, is much more interesting in his remarks upon Colonial politics. Not unnaturally he speaks with satisfaction of the way in which the ten thousand men of the German China contingent were raised, fully equipped, and despatched to China, when absolutely no provision is made in the German army for such an emergency. This leads us to a discussion of the probabilities of the formation of a permanent colonial army. France, who, he reminds us, can look back upon as many centuries of colonisation as Germany can decades, has only now decided to found a Colonial army, and Germany will not be long in following her example. Von Hassell expresses a hope, however, that his country will not follow the example of her neighbour, and look upon the Colonial army as a sort of safetyvalve for the turbulent spirits among the officers. The rest of his article deals with the troubles in the East African colonies, and the financial situation of the other German possessions.

An anonymous writer contributes an article describing the different methods in Germany and America for regulating the slaughter of cattle and sale of meat. In Germany, the quantity of meat supplied has increased since 1883 by 30 per cent., whilst the population has only mounted by 21 per cent. Owing to the fact that all cattle have to be examined before slaughter and all meat also has to be inspected, the beasts instead of going as formerly direct from the farmers to the slaughterer and from him to the customer, now pass through the hands of many middlemen, and the result is that from forty to fifty marks more are paid on each beast. It is interesting to note that amongst other beasts mentioned as providing food for man, and therefore having to be examined, are goats and horses. Owing to the meat trust in America, all the smaller slaughter-houses have disappeared and only seven large firms remain. According to the writer there is absolutely no guarantee that the American meat is good, as no inspec-tion is required or ordered. The trust having secured its market at home turned its attention abroad. By selling meat at a figure much lower than in the United States it succeeded in establishing itself firmly in Europe. In 1894 it exported 1,450 million pounds, and in 1897 2,000 millions.

Julius Lohmann contributes an account of his visit to Ober Ammergau in order to assist people to answer the question whether or not, as Christians, they should go to see the Passion Play. He answers the question in the affirmative, but says any person who wishes to go there should first of all obtain and study the text. He criticises the play from a religious point of view, and objects to one or two additions made from legend to the Bible story. In fact, he seems not much satisfied with the text, and says that the wonderful acting is a good deal above it.

C. von Zepelin gives the first instalment of an article on the position of Russia and England in Asia at the beginning of the new century.

Other Magazines.

The Illustrirte Zeitung contains many interesting photographs and articles. Amongst the former is a new photograph of the King and Queen of Servia. Photos of the new King and Queen of Italy, of the new Duke of Coburg and the Regent, as well as of the late King Humbert and Prince Alfred. Naturally most of the illustrations represent the German-Chinese contingent drilling, embarking and leaving the Fatherland. A description of the new Klausen Road in Switzerland is most instructively illustrated with views of the wild regions through which it passes. A double-page drawing represents the battleships of the various Powers now in Chinese waters, and several views of "German China" are given.

In the Neue Deutsche Rundschau Felix Pappenberg writes a descriptive article upon the Paris Exhibition. He thinks it should be visited in the evening when illuminated, and everything looks fairylike, rather than during the day. The Exhibition seems to him a good representation of Paris, that is to say, that it is simply a constant fite.

One of the most interesting articles in Vom Fels zum Meer is an illustrated account of Count Zeppelin's airship. The cost of construction was £50,000, and to fill the balloon £200 worth of gas is required.

"COLDWATER SPELL BINDER"—the phrase appears in the American Review of Reviews—is one of the latest idioms to describe an effective Temperance orator.

off writes," among ff. Mlle. in School acher, as children's ed for our beautiful e worship d gets a n to all some re-

ing over sy writes

French for ten orinciples

ts efforts, ave been e part of assadors, the most were not rouble to ber, after hanks by e Hague ng of the and the on that it nich is a ld story, a articles, Rev. D. Western off China. on "The rives in a count of ws. He rather in

is motley, ork even, angary, in and native take their y are very can have the most

I, having the Reacin John Behring the of this are also wall," by Bentzon; by Anna oglodyte

structive

THE ITALIAN MAGAZINES.

THE Italian Reviews for August, as was only to be expected, are entirely dominated by the death of King Humbert. There can be no doubt that his assassination has called forth an amount of sympathy with and enthusiasm for the House of Savoy which will go far to strengthen its hold on the crown of United Italy. Never during his lifetime did the unfortunate monarch enjoy so much popularity as in these days of mourning for his death. Even the Jesuit organ the Civiltà Cattolica leads off with an article of correct and dignified condolence, and both the Rassegna Nazionale and the Rivista Politica e Letteraria appear with wide black borders. The Nuova Antologia, besides reproducing what considering the circumstances we can only call the very striking letters of condolence issued spontaneously by the Archbishops of Genoa, Naples and Florence, and the Bishops of Cremona, Pavia, Acqui and Piacenza, publishes in large type an eloquent expression of public lamentation and of sympathy with the widowed queen by the distinguished novelist Antonio Fogazzaro. theless it does not-like some other periodicals-allow its sorrow to run away with its political judgment, and the same number (August 15th) contains a striking article from the pen of the well-known writer Edoardo Arbib in most pessimistic vein, in which from quotations from the letters of the public men who built up Italian unity he shows how fervent was their patriotic enthusiasm, how invincible their faith in their country's future; whereas to-day, he declares, you find on all sides a timid anxiety as to what may happen, an uneasy conviction that the present régime cannot last much longer.

The Rivista Politica e Letteraria, however, takes a directly opposite view. Besides publishing an article of condolence on the death of the King couched in terms of somewhat extravagant eulogy, it attempts to prove in a second article how much Italy has progressed under his benign rule. The author has the courage to assert that the nation is greater, richer, and better governed than it was twenty years ago, and he is especially indignant at the suggestion emanating from many quarters that anarchism is the outcome of the misery and poverty of the people. Even the disastrous Abyssinian expedition finds in him an apologist, and the agrarian question which is troubling the ablest minds in the country is treated by him with airy optimism.

In his little Rivista Popolare the Radical deputy Napoleon Colajanni protests vehemently against repressive and reactionary measures as a result of the crime at Monza, and also against the identification of democratic and popular aspirations with those of the Anarchists.

All who wish to follow closely the progress of the important excavations now being carried on in the Roman Forum should study an important article in the Nuova Antologia by the engineer G. Boni, describing his own discoveries round the Aedes Vestae. It is illustrated by a series of excellent photographs. Other articles interesting to English readers are a translation of the address delivered recently to the Dante Society in London by our poet-laureate (August 16th), and an article dealing in somewhat condemnatory fashion with the evolution of English Imperialism of the last few years which, however, is disfigured by a number of misprints of English names.

Cosmos Catholicus continues to be distinguished by the excellence of its illustrations on topics of the day. The latest number contains an interesting account, with portraits, of the learned Abbé Duchesne, recently made a Monsignor by the Pope, who, it will be remembered, was a member of the Commission on Anglican Orders.

Pall Mall Magazine.

THE September number of the Pall Mall Magazine begins a new volume with some excellent reading. The late Charles Yriarte's account of the Hertford Collections -a real novel only asking to be written out at length-is noticed elsewhere, as also Mr. Schooling's plea for a redistribution of seats as between Ireland and England. The fate which has recently befallen Inverary Castle makes the Rev. A. H. Malan's sketch of its story and glory only the more pathetic. London Woods, as they were and as they are, supply Mr. J. B. Carlile with material for a most interesting paper, to be commended to all Londoners who wish to enjoy more intelligently their sylvan environs. Another open-air article is Capt. Bagot's breezy account of yachting. The frontispiece is a good reproduction of "Cupid's Holiday" by Bouguereau.

Windsor.

THE Windsor for September has in it much to interest and amuse without imposing any severe strain on the reader's intellect. Earl Mayo's account of the great Russian ice-breaker claims separate notice. "How Landowners are Made" is a lively sketch by Mr. Arthur Goodrich of the sale of freehold sites on either side of the Thames estuary. He tells how at Laindon plots, 100 feet by 20, are sold to working men for £5 down or 6d. a week for four years. Mr. George Wade's sketch of the "Yeomen of the Guard" declares the Gilbert and Sullivan opera mistaken in confounding the yeomen with the Warders of the Tower. The Beefeaters are a distinct corps which never served as King's bodyguard. Mr. Harry Golding tries to reckon up the £ s. d. of literary shrines, and beginning with Stratford-on-Avon, calculates that entrance fees alone to Shakespeare buildings amount to considerably more than £2,000 a year; he would put the total revenue to the town at something like £10,000 a year. Mr. A. Wallis Myers exhibits specimens of photography by Lady Molyneux, Lord Battersea, the Earl of Dartmouth, the Duchess of Bedford and others.

Cassell's.

THE September number is full of fresh and diversified interest. Mr. Arnold White's cry of alarm about our Navy is noticed elsewhere.

The speed with which locomotives can be put together when the constituent parts are ready is shown by Mr. Harold Shepstone. He gives photographs of a French locomotive in several stages of building, which were completed in 64 hours. But our own London and North Western Railway erected a goods-engine so far back as 1878 in 251 hours. Ten years later the Pennsylvania Railroad built a passenger-engine in 16 hours 50 minutes. To the Great Eastern Railway belongs the record achievement of building in 1891 a six-wheel coupled goods-engine and tender in 9 hours 47 minutes!

Mr. Edward Cooper writes a very bright paper, "On the Matterhorn." Two things he mentions call for remark. One is, that singers carefully taught to breathe for singing purposes make excellent climbers. Correct breath-management enables them to avoid the usual breathlessness. The other is, that when children have been trained to walk properly they make most happy and charming mountaineering companions, not suffering, as might have been expected, from fear or fatigue.

From "reveille" to "lights out," the work and play of a volunteer camp are vividly sketched by a sergeant of volunteers.

of t it m a ti he, not Is univ are I de wou of com Cor

> illus read boo

100, sern

pag end

pear phe upor Mr. His sam ally rom pek: nine with itsel cour bool live cond

If I worl sern it is to re othe that Tha and comp nove M mere Briti is p anyt book * 44 Londo

THE BOOK OF THE MONTH.

"THE MASTER CHRISTIAN." * BY MARIE CORELLI.

THE other day I suggested the title of "Candidates of Cain" as an apt description of the candidates who at the coming General Election will stand as advocates for the South African War. Discussing the question of title with a brilliant young Frenchman, he replied that it might do in England very well, but that in France such a title would be meaningless to the electors. "For," said he, "in France we do not know who Cain was. We are not nurtured on the Bible like you English." "But surely," I said, "the story of Cain and Abel is part of the universal literature of the world." "No," said he, "we are not biblical in France. In fact, in the Old Testament I do not think that there is any character whose name would be familiar to our public, except," he said, "that of Samson, and he is known only because Delilah comes in."

A SIGN OF THE TIMES.

I wonder what such a public would think of Marie Corelli's sermon which she has published under the title of "The Master Christian." Nothing more strikingly illustrates the contrast between the English and French reading public than the fact that Marie Corelli's new book should have been subscribed for to the extent of 100,000 copies. For it is not a novel; it is a sermon, a sermon that extends over more than 600 closely printed pages. The appetite with which our Puritan forefathers endured two-hour sermons from a Puritan pulpit reappears in the demand for such a book as this. phenomenon does not stand alone. It follows closely upon the heels of another great success in the shape of Mr. Sheldon's theological tractates which began with "In His Steps." "The Master Christian" is a book of the same kind, but its authoress, being a lady novelist, naturally deals with the question from a more imaginative and romantic point of view than the fervent evangelist of Topeka. The British public, it is evident, in the last year of the nineteenth century, prefers to take its theology served up with a sauce of fiction. The amalgam may not commend itself to a literary judgment, but the critics are out of court. Their judgment may be quite sound, and the book may perish and be forgotten as unworthy to live; but its temporary and immediate popularity is the conclusive answer to those who condemn it as unreadable. If 100,000 men and women of the English-speaking world find it in their hearts to pay 6s. for Marie Corelli's sermon, that conclusively disposes of the allegation that it is unreadable. There are more people ready and eager to read it than there are to read the novels of almost any other of our contemporary novelists. It may be a proof that the popular palate is not refined, or it may not. That is not the question. Miss Corelli has her public, and it is a wider public than that of most of those who compete with her in the task of amusing or edifying the novel-readers of to-day.

Mrs. Humphry Ward's success with "Robert Elsmere" is another indication of what goes down with the British public; and the phenomenal sale of such works is perhaps much more worthy of consideration than anything that is to be found within the covers of the books themselves.

.* "The Master Christian." By Marie Corelli. Methuen and Co., London. 634 pp.

WHAT "THE MASTER CHRISTIAN" IS LIKE.

If any one wants to know what "The Master Christian" is like, without reading its six hundred and thirty pages, he will not have much difficulty if he takes Sheldon's "In. His Steps," Zola's "Rome," and any of Marie Corelli's previous novels in equal proportions. The note which runs through the whole is the same as Mr. Sheldon's. The thesis is that we have to get back to the Christianity of Christ if mankind is to be saved. Therein she agrees very largely with Mrs. Humphry Ward and Mr. Sheldon. Her method of expounding this doctrine very much resembles Zola's handling of a different theme in "Rome," that is to say, she takes her typical Master Christian to the Vatican, and confronts him with the Pope and the Cardinals, with the results that might be anticipated. But the book has a great deal in it that differs very much from either Sheldon's "In His Steps" or Zola's "Rome." The distinctively Corellian note is a certain shrewish vindictiveness, and yet it is quite possible that this element will contribute as much to the success of the book as anything else.

A "NO POPERY" NOVEL.

For at this present moment a considerable section of the religious public in England is very irate with Rome and the Romanising clergy in the Establishment. The "No Popery" wave is rising, and "The Master Christian" will float like a cork on its topmost crest.

Marie Corelli in "The Master Christian" represents the priesthood of the Roman Church exactly as her heroine Angela, the artist, paints her typical priest. Here is her description of the picture which Angela had labelled "A Servant of Christ at the Madeleine, Paris":—

Low beetling brows—a sensual cruel mouth with a loosely projecting under-lip—eyes that appeared to be furtively watching each other across the thin bridge of nose—a receding chin and a narrow cranium, combined with an expression which was hypocritically humble, yet sly, this was the type Angela Sovrani had chosen to delineate, sparing nothing, softening no line, and introducing no redeeming point—a type mercilessly true to the life; the face of a priest—"A Servant of Christ," as she called him. The title, united with that wicked and repulsive countenance, was a terribly significant suggestion.

When she was upbraided for selecting such an evil type of priest, she declares that "there is no question of choice. These faces are ordinary among our priests! At all the churches, Sunday after Sunday, I have looked for a good, a noble face, in vain! for an even commonly honest face—in vain!"

That is her portrait of a priest. Her portrait of an archbishop, which is labelled, "Lord, I thank thee that I am not as other men," presents us with the following picture of a dignitary of the Church:—

The smooth countenance, the little eyes comfortably sunken in small rolls of fat, the smug smiling lips, the gross neck and heavy jaw . . . and above all, the perfectly self-satisfied and mock-pious air of the man.

Such is Marie *Corelli's typical archbishop. As she paints her "Servant of Christ" and her archbishop, so she paints the whole Roman Church.

Magazine ng. The ollections ength—is ea for a England.

y Castle

tory and hey were material d to all tly their s Capt.

ntispiece ay" by interest

on the e great w Land-

Arthur

side of n plots,

lown or ketch of

bert and en with a dis-

lyguard.

s. d. of n-Avon,

e build-

a year;

mething

exhibits

k, Lord hess of

ersified

out our ogether

by Mr.

French

h were on and so far

Penn-

ngs the k-wheel

nutes!

all for reathe

Correct

usual

n have py and

ing, as d play

rgeant

THE TYRANT MAN.

Nor is it only the Roman Church which she caricatures and libels. She is equally out of temper and equally out of sympathy with the relations of the sexes. Her typical man is very little better than a brute and a savage. The complete savage in low life kicks his wife to death, and the savage in high life kills the mother of his children by neglect and infidelity. There is no doubt an element of truth in what she says about the domination of man. but her voice always seems to rise into a kind of screamy shriek when she is dealing with marriage as it is, or with the reluctance of men to recognise the excellence of women's work. All of us, no doubt, could suggest many improvements, both in the conventional attitude of man to woman, as well as in the organisation and methods of the Christian Church; but even those who are most in sympathy with her ultimate aim feel constrained to protest against the exaggeration with which Miss Corelli delivers her message.

A WANT OF SYMPATHY.

As a book the chief fault of "The Master Christian" is lack of sympathy. Miss Corelli will, no doubt, retort that she is justified by the various passages in the sayings of Jesus in which He denounces woes upon the Scribes and Pharisees; but no one who reads the «Gospels with a dispassionate mind can for a moment profess that this denunciatory vein was the most typical or even the most persistent note in the teachings of the The familiar legend which tells of the different way in which Christ and His disciples treated the dead dog which they found lying at the city gates, might be commended with advantage to our splenetic authoress. The disciples only noticed the stench of the decaying corpse, while their Master bade them note with admiration the beauty and whiteness of its teeth. In contemplating the Churches, especially the Church of Rome, Marie Corelli can only feel the stench. If it has any beauties, they do not appeal to her. Hence she largely defeats her own end. There are faults in Rome as there are in all human institutions; but any one who takes up an attitude of wholesale depreciation, and can find nothing in the great organisations in which generation after generation of devout souls have endeavoured to give practical effect to the teaching of their Saviour, puts herself out of court. Even when you are attacking your opponent's case, it is as well to admit that there is some good in it. No institution that is wholly bad can survive; and whatever may be said against the Papacy and the Vatican, no one can deny that they have survived for many centuries, and are likely to survive for centuries to come. This may be too philosophical a reflection for the 100,000 readers who are devouring "The Master Christian," but it is true, nevertheless, and I must protest against the attempt to use the loftiest of all conceptions in order to give free rein to the indulgence of hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness in dealing with the institutions and the creeds which, with all their faults, have nevertheless been effectual in turning the minds of millions of our fellow-men towards the ideal life.

A LACK OF MORAL PERSPECTIVE.

In the world, as we see it to-day, when a foremost Christian nation which has repudiated the Pope and all his works can find nothing better to do with its accumulated wealth and strength than to carry fire and sword through the territories of two small Republics, it shows a lamentable lack of moral perspective to treat the Christian Church as if it were the great offender against humanity and religion. What is wanted to-day is not disputatious argument concerning rival creeds, or a scornful vituperation of the defects in religious organisations, so much as an insistence upon the fundamental and elementary tenet of "Thou shalt do no murder." When millions of professedly Christian people are intent above all things upon slaying their brother and seizing his land, it is mere trifling to worry about incense and to waste moral indignation upon the shortcomings of the wire-pullers of the Vatican.

HER CONCEPTION OF CHRIST-

Nevertheless, when all this has been said, the fact remains that Marie Corelli has set herself to preach Christ in her own way, and far be it from those who desire to have Christ preached to object too much to the methods by which that missionary work is undertaken. The disciples who forbade the irregulars, who cast out devils and did many wonderful works in the name of Christ, because they followed not the officially appointed teachers, set an example not to be followed, but to be The first thing, therefore, to ask in a book like this is not whether it has a good literary style or whether its perspective is right and just, but to inquire of the authoress, "What think ye of Christ?" Marie Corelli tells us in various ways what is her idea of the Christ whom she would have the world follow. Her heroine, Angela, paints a picture which we are told is the greatest work of art produced since Raphael's "Transfiguration." It is entitled "The Coming of Christ," and contains her idea of Christ as she conceives him, the most perfect Christ ever painted. Here is her description of this

"stupendous conception":-

The central glory of the whole picture was a figure of Christ—unlike any other Christ ever imagined by poet or painter—an etherealised form through which the very light of Heaven itself seemed to shine. Supreme, majestic, and austerely God-like, the face was more beautiful than any ever dreamed of by the hewers of the classic marbles; it was the face of a great Archangel, beardless and youthful, yet kingly and commanding. Round the broad brows a Crown of Thorns shone like a diadem, every prickly point tipped with pale fire, and from the floating folds of intense white which, cloud-like, clung about the divine form, faint flashes of the lightning gleamed. Above this grand Christ the heavens were opened, pouring out a rain of such translucent purity of colour and radiance as never were seen in any painted canvas before; but beneath the clouds were black as midnight-confused, chaotic, and drifting darkly on a strong wind, as it seemed, into weird and witch-like shapes, wherein were seen the sun and moon revolving pallidly, like globes of fire lost from their orbits and about to become extinct. And among those shifting black films were a crowd of human creatures, floating and falling into unknown depths of darkness, and striking out wild arms of appeal and entreaty and despair. The faces of these were all familiar, and were the life-like portraits of many of those preeminent in the history of the time. Chief among them was the Sovereign Pontiff, waxen and wan and dark-eyed, depicted as fastening fetters of iron round the body of a beautiful youth, laurel-crowned, the leaves of the laurel bearing faint gold letters which spelt the word "Science." Huddled beside him was a well-known leader of the Jesuits, busily counting up heaps of gold. Another remarkable figure was that of a wellknown magnate of the Church of England, who, leaning forward, eagerly sought to grasp and hold the garment of the Pope, but was dragged back by the hand of a woman crowned with an Imperial diadem. After these and other principal personages came a confusion of faces-all recognisable, yet needing study to discern -creatures drifting downwardly into the darkness: one was the vivisectionist whose name was celebrated through France, clutching at his bleeding victim and borne relentlessly onwards by the whirlwind-and forms and faces belonging to men of, every description of Church doctrine were seen trampling underneath them other human creatures scarcely discernible. And over

Me :

all th

Chris

a wo

its b arm s toget

Her

worn

expre

Han

a ho

of th senta

drag

gold

actu

the 1

Lord

scornful ations, so ntal and "When ent above his land, to waste the wire-

the fact preach ose who ch to the lertaken. cast out name of pointed it to be ook like whether of the Corelli Christ heroine, greatest ration."

ins her perfect of this gure of light of c, and ny ever he face ly and Thorns le fire, d-like, htning pened, ur and e; but haotic, weird and their hifting d fall-

l arms
l arms ere all e pren was picted routh,
gold
e him
g up
well-

ward, t was perial me a scern s the nce, rards n of, iderover all this blackness and chaos the supernal figure of the glorious Christ was aerially poised; one hand was extended, and to this a woman clung—a woman with a beautiful face made piteous in its beauty by long grief and patient endurance. In her other arm she held a sleeping child—and mother and child were linked together by a garland of flowers partially broken and faded. Her entreating attitude, the sleeping child's helplessness, her worn face, the perishing roses of earth's hope and joy, all expressed their meaning simply yet tragically; and as the Divine Hand supported and drew her up out of the universal chaos below, the hope of a new world, a better world, a wiser world, a holier world, seemed to be distantly conveyed. But the eyes of the Christ were full of reproach, and were bent on the Representative of St. Peter binding the laurel-crowned youth, and dragging him into darkness, and the words written across the golden mount of the picture, in clear black letters, seemed to be actually spoken aloud from the vivid colour and movement of the painting. "Many in that day will call upon Me and say, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in Thy name, and in Thy name cast out devils, and done many wonderful works?

"Then will I say to them, I never knew you! Depart from Me all ye that work iniquity!"

- AND OF THE IDEAL CHRISTIAN.

